1. How the notice of this is given to the prophet. "He cried it in mine ear with a loud voice," which intimates the vehemency of him that spoke. When men are highly provoked, and threaten in anger, they speak loud. They that regard not the counsels God gives them in a still small voice shall be made to hear the threatenings, to hear and tremble. It notes also the prophet's unwillingness to be told this; he was deaf on that ear, but there is no remedy, their sin will not admit an excuse, and therefore their judgment will not admit a delay. "He cried in mine ears with a loud voice," he made me hear it, and I heard it with a sad heart.

2. What this notice is. There are those that "have charge over the city" to destroy it; not the Chaldean armies,—they are to be indeed employed in this work, but they are not the visitors, they are only the servants, or tools rather. God's angels have received a charge now to lay that city waste which they had long had a charge to protect and watch over. They are at hand as destroying angels, as ministers of wrath; for "every man hath his destroying weapon in his hand," as the angel that kept the way of the tree of life with a flaming sword. Note, Those that have by sin made God their enemy have made the good angels their enemies too. These visitors are called, and caused to draw near. Note, God has ministers of wrath always within call, always at command; invisible powers, by whom he accomplisheth his purposes. The prophet is made to see this in vision, that he might with the greater assurance in his preaching denounce these judgments. God told it him with a loud voice, "taught it him with a strong hand," Isa. viii. 11, that it might make the deeper impression upon him, and that he might thus proclaim it in the people's ears.

Secondly. Their appearance upon these summons is recorded. Presently "six men came," ver. 2, one for each of the principal gates of Jerusalem. Two destroying angels were sent against Sodom, but six against Jerusalem; for Jerusalem's doom in the judgment will be thrice as heavy as that of Sodom. There is an angel watching at every gate to destroy, to bring in judgments from every quarter, and to take heed that none escape. One angel served to destroy the firstborn of Egypt, and the camp of the Assyrians; but here are six. In the Revelation we find seven that were to pour out the vials of God's wrath, Rev. xv. 6. They came with every one a slaughter weapon in his hand, prepared for the work to which they were called. The nations of which the king of Babylon's army was composed, which some reckon to be six, and the commanders of his army, of whom six are named as principal, Jer. xxxix. 3, may be called the slaughter weapons in the hands of the angels. The angels are thoroughly furnished for every service. Observe,

1. From whence they came. "From the way of the higher gate, which lieth toward the north," ver. 2, either because the Chaldeans came from the north; (Jer. i. 14, "Out of the north an evil shall break forth,") or because the image of jealousy was set up "at the door of the inner gate that looks towards the north," ch. viii. 3, 5. At that gate of the temple the destroying angels entered, to shew what it was that opened the door to them. Note, That way that sin lies judgments may be expected to come.

2. Observe where they placed themselves. "They went in and stood beside the brazen altar," on which sacrifices were wont to be offered, and atonement of jealousy can only be conjectured. We cannot suppose that "jealousy" was personified and worshipped, and must therefore conclude that the image or idol was one which provoked the jealousy of the Lord, as the closing words declare.

viii. 10. The representations of idolatrous objects upon the walls were in accordance with Assyrian and Egyptian customs. These nations portrayed upon their walls not merely the figures of their deities, but of serpents and many other animals which were regarded as symbols. The discoveries of recent times have thrown much light upon this and similar passages, and shown their strict correctness.

viii. 14. The worship of Tammuz is here represented by one of its most striking features. Tammuz was the counterpart of the Egyptian Osiris and of the Greek Adonis. Jerome says that according to the fable this deity had been slain in June, which was called by the Syrians Tammuz, that he was then lamented by women as dead, though afterwards celebrated with joy as returning to life. The made. When they acted as destroyers, they acted as sacrificers, not from any personal revenge or ill-will, but with a pure and sincere regard to the glory of God; for to his justice all they slew were offered up as victims. They "stood by the altar," as it were to protect and vindicate that, and plead its righteous cause, and avenge the horrid profanation of it. At the altar they were to receive their commission to destroy, to intimate that the iniquity of Jerusalem, like that of Eli's house, was "not to be purged by sacrifice."

Thirdly. The notice taken of one among the destroying angels, distinguished in his habit from the rest, from whom some favour might be expected. It should seem he was not one of the six, but "among them," to see that mercy be mixed with judgment, ver. 2. This man was "clothed with linen," as the priests were, and he had a writer's inkhorn hanging at his side, as anciently attorneys and lawyers' clerks had, which he was to make use of, as the other six were to make use of their destroying weapons. Here the honours of the pen exceeded those of the sword; they were angels that bore the sword, but he was the Lord of angels that made use of the writer's inkhorn; for it is generally agreed among the best interpreters that this man represented Christ as Mediator, saving those that are his from the flaming sword of Divine justice. He is our high priest clothed with holiness; for that was signified by the fine linen, Rev. xix. 8. As prophet he wears the writer's inkhorn; the Book of Life is the Lamb's book. The great things of the law and Gospel which God has written to us are of his writing; for it is the Spirit of Christ in the writers of the Scripture that testifies to us, and the Bible is the revelation of Jesus Christ. Note, It is matter of great comfort to all good Christians, that in the midst of the destroyers and the destructions that are abroad there is a Mediator, a great High Priest, who has an interest in heaven and whom saints on earth have an interest in.

Fourthly. The removal of the appearance of the Divine glory from over the cherubim. Some think this was that usual display of the Divine glory which was between the cherubim over the mercy-seat, in the most holy place, that took leave of them now, and never returned; for it is supposed it was not in the second temple. Others think it was that display of the Divine glory which the prophet now saw over the cherub in vision; and this is more probable, because this is called the glory of the God of Israel, ch. viii. 4; and this is it which he had now his eye upon. This was gone to the threshold of the house, as it were to call to the servants that attended without the door to send them on their errand and give them their instructions. And the removal of this as well as the former might be significant of God's departure from them, and leaving them their house desolate. And when God goes all good goes; but he goes from none till they first drive him from them. He went at first no farther than the threshold, that he might shew how loath he was to depart, and might give them both time and encouragement to invite his return to them, and his stay with them. Note, God's departures from a people are gradual; but gracious souls are soon aware of the first step he takes towards a remove. Ezekiel presently observed that "the glory of the God of Israel was gone up from the cherub;" and what is a vision of angels if God be gone?

Fifthly. The charge given to the man clothed in linen to secure the pious remnant from the general desolation. We do not read that this Saviour was summoned and sent for, as the destroyers were; for he is always ready, appearing in the presence of God for us; and to him, as the most proper person, the care of those that are marked for salvation is committed, ver. 4. Now observe,

1. The distinguishing character of this remnant that is to be saved. "They are such as sigh and cry;" sigh in themselves as men in pain and distress, cry to God in prayer, as men in earnest, "because of all the abominations that are committed in Jerusalem." It was not only the idolatries they were guilty of, but all their other enormities that were abominations to God. These pious few had witnessed against those abominations, and had done what they could in their places to suppress them; but, finding all their attempts for the reformation of manners fruitless, they sat down and sighed and cried, wept in secret, and complained to God because of the dishonour done to his name by their wickedness, and the ruin it was bringing upon their church and nation. Note, It is not enough that we do not delight in the sins of others, and that we have not fellowship with them, but we must mourn for them, and lay them to heart; must grieve for that which we cannot help, as those that hate sin for its own sake, and have a tender concern for the souls of others; as David, Ps. cxix. 136, and Lot, who vexed his righteous soul with the wicked conversation of his neighbours. The abominations committed in Jerusalem are to be in a special manner lamented, because they are in a particular manner offensive to God.

2. The distinguishing care taken of them. Orders are given to find them all out that are of such a pious, public spirit; "Go through the midst of the city" in quest of them; and, though they are never so much dispersed, and never so closely hid from the fury of their persecutors, yet see that you discover them, and "set a mark upon their foreheads." 1st. To signify that God owns them for his, and he will confess them another day. A work of grace in the soul is to God "a mark upon the forehead," which he will acknowledge as his mark, and by which he knows them that are his. 2nd. To give to them who are thus marked an assurance of God's favour, that they may know it themselves; and the comfort of knowing it will be the most powerful support and cordial in calamitous times. What need we perplex ourselves about this temporal life, if we know by the mark that we have eternal life? 3rd. To be a direction to the destroyers whom to pass by; as the blood upon the door-posts was an indication that that was an Israelite's house, and the firstborn there must not be slain. Note, Those who keep themselves pure in times of common iniquity, God will keep them safe in times of common calamity. They that distinguish themselves shall be distinguished; that cry for other men's sins shall not need to cry for their own afflictions; for they shall be either delivered from them or comforted under them. God will set a mark upon his mourners; will book their sighs, and bottle their tears. The "sealing of the servants of God in their foreheads," Rev. vii. 3, was the same token of the care God has of his own people with this here; only this was to secure them from being destroyed, that from being seduced, which is equivalent.

5 And to the others he said in mine hearing, Go ye after him through the city, and smite: let not your eye spare, neither have ye pity: 6 Slay utterly old and young, both maids, and little children, and women: but come not near any man upon whom is the mark; and begin at my sanctuary. Then they began at the ancient men which were before the house. 7 And he said unto them, Defile the house, and fill the courts with the slain: go ye forth. And they went forth, and slew in the city. 8 And it came to pass, while they were slaying them, and I was left, that I fell upon my face, and cried, and said, Ah Lord GOD! wilt thou destroy all the residue of Israel in thy pouring out of thy fury upon Jerusalem? 9 Then said he unto me, The iniquity of the house of Israel and Judah is exceeding great, and the land is full of blood, and the city full of perverseness: for they say, The LORD hath forsaken the earth, and the LORD seeth not. 10 And as for me also, mine eye shall not spare, neither will I have pity, but I will recompense their way upon their head. 11 And, behold, the man clothed with linen, which had the inkhorn by his side, reported the matter, saying, I have done as thou hast commanded me.

In these verses we have,

First. A command given to the destroyers to do execution according to their commission. They "stood by the brazen altar" waiting for orders, and orders are here given them to cut off and destroy all that were either guilty of, or accessary to, the abominations of Jerusalem, and that did not sigh and cry for them. Note, When God has gathered his wheat into his garner, nothing remains but to burn up the chaff, Mat. iii. 12.

1. They are ordered to destroy all, 1st. Without exception. They must "go through the city and smite;" they must slay utterly, slay to destruction, give them their death's wound, they must make no distinction of age or sex, but cut off old and young; neither the beauty of the virgins nor the innocency of the babes shall secure them. This was fulfilled in the death of multitudes by famine and pestilence, especially by the sword of the Chaldeans, as far as the military execution went. Sometimes even such bloody work as this has been God's work. But what an evil thing is sin then, which provokes the God of infinite mercy to such severity! 2nd. Without compassion. "Let not your eye spare, neither have ye pity," ver. 5; you must not save any whom God has doomed to destruction, as Saul did Agag and the Amalekites; that is doing the work of God deceitfully, Jer. xlviii. 10. None needs to be more merciful than God is, and he had said, ch. viii. 18, "Mine eye shall not spare, neither will I have pity." Note, Those that live in sin, and hate to be reformed, will perish in sin, and deserve not to be pitied; for they might easily have prevented the ruin, and would not.

2. They are warned not to do the least hurt to them that were marked for salvation. "Come not near any man upon whom is the mark;" do not so much as threaten or frighten any of them. It is promised them that there shall no evil come nigh them, and therefore you must keep at a distance from them. The king of Babylon gave particular orders that Jeremiah should be protected; Baruch and Ebed-melech were secured, and it is likely others of Jeremiah's friends for his sake. God had promised that it should "go well with his remnant," and they should be well treated, Jer. xv. 11. And we have reason to think none of the mourning, praying remnant fell by the sword of the Chaldeans, but God found out some way or other to secure them all; as in the last destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, the Christians were all secured in a city called Pella, and none of them perished with the unbelieving Jews. Note, None of those shall be lost whom God has marked for life and salvation, for the foundation of God stands sure.

3. They are directed to "begin at the sanctuary," ver. 6; that sanctuary which in the chapter before he had seen the horrid profanation of. They must begin there, because there the wickedness began which provoked God to send these judgments. The debaucheries of the priests were the poisoning of the springs, to which all the corruption of the streams was owing. The wickedness of the sanctuary was of all other most offensive to God, and therefore there the slaughter must begin. Begin there, to try if the people will take warning by the judgments of God upon their priests, and will repent and reform. Begin there, that all the world may see and know that the Lord, whose name is Jealous, is a jealous God, and hates sin most in those that are nearest to him. Note, When judgments are abroad they commonly begin at the house of God, 1 Pet. ii. 17. "You only have I known, and therefore I will punish you." Am. iii. 2. God's temple is a sanctuary, a refuge and protection for penitent sinners; but not for any that "go on still in their trespasses;" neither the sacredness of the place nor the eminency of their place in it will be their security.

It should seem the destroyers made some difficulty of putting men to death in the temple; but God bids them not boggle at that, but, ver. 7, "Defile the house, and fill the courts with the slain." They will not be "taken from the altar," as was appointed by the law, Ex. xxi. 14, but think to secure themselves by keeping hold of the horns of it, like Joab; and therefore, like him, let them die there, 1 Kin. ii. 30, 31. There the blood of one of God's prophets had been shed, Mat. xxiii. 35, and therefore there let their blood be shed. Note, If the servants of God's house defile it with their idolatries, God will justly suffer the enemies of it to defile it with their violences, Ps. lxxix. 1. But these acts of necessary justice were really, whatever they were ceremonially, rather a purification than a pollution of the sanctuary; it was putting away evil from among them.

4. They are appointed to go forth into the city, ver. 6, 7. Note, Wherever sin has gone before, judgment will follow after; and though judgment begins at the house of God, yet it shall not end there. The holy city shall be no more a protection to the wicked people than the holy house was to the wicked priests.

Secondly. Here is execution done accordingly. They observed their orders, and, 1. They began at the elders, "the ancient men that were before the house," and slew them first; either those seventy ancients that worshipped idols in their chambers, ch. viii. 12, or those twenty-five that worshipped the sun "between the porch and the altar," who might more properly be said to be before the house. Note, Ringleaders in sin may expect to be first met with by the judgments of God; and the sins of those who are in the most eminent and public stations call for the most exemplary punishments. 2. They pro-identity of Tammuz has been disputed in modern times by a few, but the evidence for the received opinion is too conclusive to be overthrown. Mr. Millington, in his "Testimony of the Heathen," quotes illustrative passages from Aristophanes, Bion, Theocritus, Plutarch, Lucian, and Ovid.

viii. 16. The worship of the sun was one of the most common forms of ancient idolatry, and that luminary was personified under a host of names. Sometimes the sun was worshipped directly, and not in the form of any image or symbol. The Persians, for example, appear to have abhorred all images, and yet they worshipped the sun, either as a god or the emblem of a god.

viii. 17. What is meant by putting the branch to the nose is very much disputed, and we can only conclude that it was some idolatrous rite, of which no other account exists.

ix. 2. Dr. Kitto says it is still the custom in the East to carry the ink-horn stuck in the girdle. Scribes carry them constantly in their ceeded to the common people; they "went forth and slew in the city," for when the decree is gone forth there shall be no delay. If God begin, he will make an end.

Thirdly. Here is the prophet's intercession for a mitigation of the judgment, and a reprieve for some; ver. 8, "While they were slaying them, and I was left, I fell upon my face." Observe here,

1. How sensible the prophet was of God's mercy to him, in that he was spared when so many round about him were cut off. Thousands fell on his right hand and on his left, and yet the destruction did not "come nigh him, only with his eyes did he behold the just reward of the wicked," Ps. xci. 7, 8. He speaks as one that narrowly escaped the destruction, attributing it to God's goodness, not his own deserts. Note, The best saints must acknowledge themselves indebted to sparing mercy that they are not consumed. And when desolating judgments are abroad, and multitudes fall by them, it ought to be accounted a great favour if we have our "lives given us for a prey," for we might justly have perished with them that perish.

2. Observe how he improved this mercy. He looked upon it that therefore he was left that he might stand in the gap to turn away the wrath of God. Note, We must look upon it that for this reason we are spared, that we may do good in our places, may do good by our prayers. Ezekiel did not triumph in the slaughter made, but "his flesh trembled for fear of God," as David's, Ps. cxix. 120, "He fell on his face and cried," not in fear for himself, he was one of them that were marked, but in compassion to his fellow-creatures. They that sigh and cry for the sins of sinners cannot but sigh and cry for their miseries too; yet the day is coming when all this concern will be entirely swallowed up in a full satisfaction in this, that God is glorified; and they that now fall on their faces, and cry, "Ah, Lord God," will lift up their heads and sing Hallelujah, Rev. xix. 1, 3. The prophet humbly expostulates with God, "Wilt thou destroy all the residue of Israel," and shall there be none left but the few that are marked? Shall the Israel of God be destroyed, utterly destroyed? When there are but a few left shall those few be cut off who might have been the seed of another generation? And will the God of Israel be himself their destroyer? Wilt thou now destroy Israel, who wast wont to protect and deliver Israel? Wilt thou so "pour out thy fury upon Jerusalem," as by the total destruction of the city to ruin the whole country too? surely thou wilt not. Note, Though we acknowledge that God is righteous, yet we have leave to "plead with him concerning his judgments," Jer. xii. 1.

Fourthly. Here is God's denial of the prophet's request for a mitigation of the judgment, and his justification of himself in that denial, ver. 9, 10.

1. Nothing could be said in extenuation of this sin. God was as willing to shew mercy as the prophet could desire; he always is so, but here the case will not admit it. It is such as that mercy cannot be granted without wrong to justice; and it is not fit that one attribute of God should be glorified at the expense of another. Is it any pleasure to the Almighty that he should destroy, especially that he should destroy Israel? By no means; but the truth is, their crimes are so flagrant that the reprieve of the sinners would be a connivance at the sin. "The iniquity of the house of Judah and Israel is exceeding great," there is no suffering them to go on at this rate; "the land is filled with" innocent "blood," and when the city courts are appealed to for the defence of injured innocency, the remedy is as bad as the disease, for the city is full of perverseness, or wresting of judgment; and that which they support themselves with in this iniquity is the same atheistical, profane principle with which they flattered themselves in their idolatry; ch. viii. 12, "The Lord hath forsaken the earth," and left it to us to do what we will in it; he will not intermeddle in the affairs of it, and whatever wrong we do he sees not, either knows it not or will not take cognizance of it. Now, how can these expect benefit by the mercy of God, who thus bid defiance to his justice? No, nothing can be offered by an advocate in excuse for the crimes while the criminal puts in such a plea as this in his own vindication; and therefore,

2. Nothing can be done to mitigate the sentence, ver. 10. Whatever thou thinkest of it, as for me, "mine eye shall not spare, neither will I have pity." I have borne with them as long as it was fit such impudent sinners should be borne with, and therefore now "I will recompense their way on their head." Note, Sinners sink and perish under the weight of their own sins. It is their own way, which they deliberately chose rather than the way of God, and which they obstinately persisted in, in contempt of the word of God, that is recompensed on them. And great iniquities justify God in great severities; nay, he is ready to justify himself as he doth here to the prophet, for he will be clear when he judgeth.

Fifthly. Here is a return made of the writ of protection, which was issued out for the securing of them that mourned in Zion; ver. 11, "The man clothed with linen reported the matter," gave an account of what he had done in pursuance of his commission. He had found out all that mourned in secret for the sins of the land, and cried out against them by a public testimony, and had marked them all in the forehead: Lord, "I have done as thou hast commanded me." We do not find that those who were commissioned to destroy reported what destruction they had made; but he who was appointed to protect reported his matter, for it would be more pleasing both to God and to the prophet to hear of those that were saved than of those that perished. Or, this report was made now because the thing was finished, whereas the destroying work would be a work of time, and when it was brought to an end then the report should be made. See how faithful Christ is to the trust reposed in him. Is he commanded to secure eternal life to the chosen remnant? He has done as was commanded him: "Of all that thou hast given me I have lost none."

CHAPTER X.

The prophet had observed to us, ch. viii. 5, that when he was in vision at Jerusalem he saw the same appearance of the glory of God there that he had seen by the river Chebar. Now in this chapter he gives us some account of the appearance there, as far as was requisite for the clearing up of two farther indications of the approaching destruction of Jerusalem, which God here gave the prophet. I. The scattering of the coals of fire upon the city, which were taken from between the cherubims, ver. 1—7. II. The removal of the glory of God from the temple, and its being upon the wing to be gone, ver. 8—22. When God goes out from a people all judgments break in upon them.

THEN I looked, and, behold, in the firmament that was above the head of the cherubims there appeared over them as it were a sapphire stone, as the appearance of the likeness of a throne. 2 And he spake unto the man clothed with linen, and said, Go in between the wheels, even under the cherub, and fill thine hand with coals of fire from between the cherubims, and scatter them over the city. And he went in in my sight. 3 Now the cherubims stood on the right side of the house, when the man went in; and the cloud filled the inner court. 4 Then the glory of the LORD went up from the cherub, and stood over the threshold of the house; and the house was filled with the cloud, and the court was full of the brightness of the LORD's glory. 5 And the sound of the cherubims' wings was heard even to the outer court, as the voice of the Almighty God when he speaketh. 6 And it came to pass, that when he had commanded the man clothed with linen, saying, Take fire from between the wheels, from between the cherubims; then he went in, and stood beside the wheels. 7 And one cherub stretched forth his hand from between the cherubims unto the fire that was between the cherubims, and took thereof, and put it into the hands of him that was clothed with linen: who took it, and went out.

To possess us with a holy awe and dread of God, and to fill us with his fear, we may observe in this part of the vision which the prophet had,

First. The glorious appearance of his majesty. Something of the invisible world is here made visible; some faint representations of its brightness and beauty, some shadows, but such as are no more to be compared with the truth and substance than a picture with the life; yet here is enough to oblige us all to the utmost reverence in our thoughts of God, and approaches to him, if we will but admit the impressions this discovery of him will make.

1. He is here "in the firmament above the head of the cherubims," ver. 1. He manifests his glory in the upper world, where purity and brightness are both in perfection; and the vast expanse of the firmament aims to speak the God that dwells there infinite. It is the firmament of his power, and of his prospect too, for from thence he beholds all the children of men. The Divine nature infinitely transcends the angelical nature, and God is "above the head of the cherubims," in respect not only of his dignity above them, but his dominion over them. Cherubims have great power, and wisdom, and influence, but they are all subject to God and Christ.

2. He is here upon the throne; or, that which had "the appearance of the likeness of a throne," (for God's glory and government infinitely transcends all the brightest ideas our minds can either form or receive concerning them,) and it was "as it were a sapphire-stone," pure and sparkling; such a throne hath God prepared in the heavens, far exceeding the thrones of any earthly potentates.

3. He is here attended with a glorious train of holy angels. When God came into his temple, the "cherubims stood on the right side of the house," ver. 3, as the prince's lifeguard attending the gate of his palace. Christ has angels at command: the orders given to all the angels of God are to worship him. Some observe that they "stood on the right side of the house," that is, the south side, because on the north side the image of jealousy was, and other instances of idolatry, from which they would place themselves at as great a distance as might be.

4. The appearance of his glory is veiled with a cloud, and yet out of that cloud darts forth a dazzling lustre. In the house and inner court there was a cloud and darkness which filled them; and yet either the outer court or the same court, after some time was "full of the brightness of the Lord's glory," ver. 3, 4. There was a darting forth of light and brightness; but if any over-curious eye pried into it, it would find itself lost in a cloud. His righteousness is conspicuous as the great mountains, and the brightness of it fills the court; but his judgments are a great deep which we cannot fathom, a cloud which we cannot see through. The brightness discovers enough to awe and direct our consciences, but the cloud forbids us to expect the gratifying of our curiosity; for we cannot order our speech by reason of darkness. Thus, Hab. iii. 4, "He had beams coming out of his hand, and" yet "there was the hiding of his power." Nothing more clear than that God is, nothing more dark than what he is; God covers himself with light, and yet as to us makes darkness his pavilion. God took possession of the tabernacle and temple in a cloud, which was always the symbol of his presence. In the temple above there will be no cloud, but we shall see face to face.

5. The cherubims made a dreadful sound with their wings, ver. 5. The vibration of them, as of the strings of musical instruments, made a curious melody. Bees, and other winged insects, make a noise with their wings. Probably this intimated their preparing to remove, by stretching forth, and lifting up their wings, which made this noise as it were to give warning of it. This noise is said to be "as the voice of the Almighty God when he speaks;" that is, as the thunder, which is called "the voice of the Lord," Ps. xxix. 3. Or, as the voice of the Lord when he spake to Israel on mount Sinai; and, therefore, he then gave the law with abundance of terror, to signify with what terror he would reckon for the violation of it, which he was now about to do. This noise of their wings was heard even "to the outer court," the court of the people; for the Lord's voice in his judgments cries in the city, which those may hear that do not, as Ezekiel, see the visions of them.

Secondly. The terrible directions of his wrath. This vision has a farther tendency than merely to set forth the Divine grandeur; farther orders are to be given for the destruction of Jerusalem. The greatest devastations are made by fire and sword. For a general slaughter of the inhabitants of Jerusalem, orders were given in the foregoing chapter; now here we have a command to lay the city in ashes, by scattering coals of fire upon it, which in the vision were fetched from between the cherubims.

girdles; and ministers of state wear them in the same manner, as symbols of their office. The form in most general use is a flat case, about nine inches long by an inch and a quarter broad, and half an inch thick, the hollow of which serves to contain the reed pens and the pen-knife. Various forms occur in Persia and in Egypt, and to a similar apparatus the prophet no doubt alludes.

x. 1. In this continuation of the prophet's vision we find the imagery of the first chapters still prominent, although the "living creatures" are now spoken of by the more ordinary name of cherubim. The sense of the verse is not quite clear, and it may be doubted whether the so-called "firmament," a sort of platform, or the throne upon it, is compared to a sapphire stone. The analogous passage in chapter i. 26 seems to require the sense given in our translation, that the throne in some sense resembled a sapphire.

x. 2—7. Throughout this chapter careful attention must be paid to the parallel description in chapter i., to which various accessories

1. For the issuing out of orders to do this, "the glory of the Lord was lifted up from the cherub," (as in the chapter before, for the giving of orders there, ver. 3,) and "stood upon the threshold of the house in imitation of the courts of judgment, which they kept in the gates of their cities. The people would not hear the oracles which God delivered to them from his holy temple, and therefore from thence they shall be made to hear their doom.

2. The man clothed in linen, who had marked those that were to be preserved, is to be employed in this service; for the same Jesus that is the Protector and Saviour of them who believe, having "all judgment committed to him," that of condemnation as well as that of absolution, will come in flaming fire to take vengeance on those that obey not his Gospel. He that sits on the throne, calls to the man clothed in linen to "go in between the wheels, and fill his hand with coals of fire from between the cherubims, and scatter them over the city." This intimates, 1st. That the burning of the city and temple by the Chaldeans was a consumption determined; and therein they executed God's counsel. They did what he designed before should be done. 2nd. That the fire of Divine wrath, which kindles judgment upon a people, is just and holy; for it is fire fetched "from between the cherubims." The fire on God's altar, where atonement was made, had been slighted; to avenge which, fire is here fetched from heaven, like that by which Nadab and Abihu were killed for offering strange fire. If a city, or town, or house be burned, whether by design or accident, if we trace it in its original, we shall find the coals that kindled the fire came from between the wheels; for there is not any evil of that kind in the city but the Lord has done it. 3rd. That Jesus Christ acts by commission from the Father, for from him he "receives authority to execute judgment, because he is the Son of man." Christ came to "send fire on the earth," Lu. xii. 49; and in the great day will speak this world into ashes. By fire from his hand, the earth and all the works that are therein will be burnt up.

3. This man clothed with linen readily attended to this service. Though being clothed with linen he was very unfit to go among the burning coals, yet being called, he said, "Lo, I come." This commandment he had received of his Father, and he complied with it. The prophet saw him go in; ver. 2, "He went in and stood beside the wheels;" expecting to be furnished there with the coals he was to scatter, for what Christ was to give he first received, whether for mercy or judgment. He was directed to take fire, but he stayed till he had it given to him, to shew how slow he is to execute judgment, and how long-suffering to usward.

4. One of the cherubims reached him a handful of fire from the midst of the living creatures. The prophet, when he first saw this vision, observed that there were "burning coals of fire," and "lamps that went up and down among the living creatures," ch. i. 13; from thence this fire was taken, ver. 7. The spirit of burning, the refiner's fire, by which Christ purifies his church, is of a Divine original. It is by a celestial fire, fire from between the cherubims, that wonders are wrought. The cherubim "put it into his hand," for the angels are ready to be employed by the Lord Jesus, and to serve all his purposes.

5. When he had taken the fire he went out, no doubt to scatter it up and down upon the city, as he was directed. "And who can abide the day of his coming?" Who can stand before him when he goes out in anger?

8 And there appeared in the cherubims the form of a man's hand under their wings. 9 And when I looked, behold the four wheels by the cherubims, one wheel by one cherub, and another wheel by another cherub: and the appearance of the wheels was as the colour of a beryl stone. 10 And as for their appearances, they four had one likeness, as if a wheel had been in the midst of a wheel. 11 When they went, they went upon their four sides; they turned not as they went, but to the place whither the head looked they followed it; they turned not as they went. 12 And their whole body, and their backs, and their hands, and their wings, and the wheels, were full of eyes round about, even the wheels that they four had. 13 As for the weeels, it was cried unto them in my hearing, O wheel. 14 And every one had four faces: the first face was the face of a cherub, and the second face was the face of a man, and the third the face of a lion, and the fourth the face of an eagle. 15 And the cherubims were lifted up. This is the living creature that I saw by the river of Chebar. 16 And when the cherubims went, the wheels went by them: and when the cherubims lifted up their wings to mount up from the earth, the same wheels also turned not from beside them. 17 When they stood, these stood; and when they were lifted up, these lifted up themselves also: for the spirit of the living creature was in them. 18 Then the glory of the LORD departed from off the threshold of the house, and stood over the cherubims. 19 And the cherubims lifted up their wings, and mounted up from the earth in my sight: when they went out, the wheels also were beside them, and every one stood at the door of the east gate of the LORD's house; and the glory of the God of Israel was over them above. 20 This is the living creature that I saw under the God of Israel by the river of Chebar; and I knew that they were the cherubims. 21 Every one had four faces apiece, and every one four wings; and the likeness of the hands of a man was under their wings. 22 And the likeness of their faces was the same faces which I saw by the river of Chebar, their appearances and themselves: they went every one straight forward.

We have here a farther account of the vision of God's glory which Ezekiel saw, here intended to introduce that direful omen of the departure of that glory from them which would open the door for ruin to break in.

First. Ezekiel sees the glory of God shining in the sanctuary, so as he had seen it by the river of Chebar; and gives an account of it, that they who had by their wickedness provoked God to depart from them might know what they had lost, and might lament after the Lord, groaning out their Ichabod, "Where is the glory?" Ezekiel here sees the operations of Divine providence in the government of the lower world, and the affairs of it, represented by the four wheels; and the perfections of the holy angels, the inhabitants of the upper world; and their ministrations, represented by the four living creatures, every one of which had four faces. The agency of the angels in directing the affairs of this world is represented by the close communication that was between the living creatures and the wheels; the wheels being guided by them in all their motions, as the chariot is by him that drives it, but the same spirit being both in the living creatures and in the wheels, speaks that Infinite Wisdom which serves its own purposes by the ministration of angels, and all the occurrences of this lower world. So that this vision gives our faith a view of that throne which the Lord has prepared in the heavens, and that kingdom of his which ruleth over all, Ps. ciii. 19. The prophet observes that this was the same vision with that he saw by the river of Chebar, ver. 15, 22; and yet in one thing there seems to be a material difference, that that which was there the face of an ox, and was on the left side, ch. i. 10, is here the face of a cherub, and is the first face, ver. 14; whence some have concluded, that the peculiar face of a cherub was that of an ox, which the Israelites had an eye to when they made the golden calf. I rather think that in this latter vision the first face was the proper appearance or figure of a cherub, which Ezekiel knew very well, being a priest, by what he had seen in the temple of the Lord, 1 Kin. vi. 29; but which we now have no certainty of at all; and by this Ezekiel knew assuredly, whereas before he only conjectured it, that they were all cherubims, though putting on different faces, ver. 20. And this first appearing in the proper figure of a cherub, and yet it being needful to retain the number of four, that of the ox is left out and dropped, because that face of the cherubim had been most abused by the worship of an ox. As sometimes when God appeared to deliver his people, so now, when he appeared to depart from them, "he rode upon a cherub, and did fly." Now observe here,

1. That this world is subject to turns and changes, and various revolutions. The course of affairs in it is represented by wheels, ver. 9; sometimes one spoke is uppermost, and sometimes another; they are still ebbing and flowing like the sea, waxing and waning like the moon, 1 Sam. ii. 4, &c. Nay, their appearance is as if there were "a wheel in the midst of a wheel," ver. 10; which intimates the mutual references of providences to each other, and their dependencies on each other; and the joint tendency of all to one common end, while their motions as to us are intricate and perplexed, and seemingly contrary.

2. That there is an admirable harmony and uniformity in the various occurrences of providence, ver. 13. As for the wheels, though they moved several ways, yet it was cried to them, "O wheel;" they were all as one, being guided by one Spirit to one end, for God works all according to the counsel of his own will, which is one; for his own glory, which is one. And this makes the disposals of providence truly admirable, and to be looked upon with wonder. As the works of his creation considered separately were good, but all together very good, so the wheels of providence considered by themselves are wonderful, but put them together and they are very wonderful: "O wheel."

3. That the motions of providence are steady and regular, and whatever the Lord pleaseth that he doth, and is never put upon new counsels. "The wheels turned not as they went," ver. 11; and the living creatures "went every one straight forward," ver. 22. Whatever difficulties lay in their way, they were sure to get over them, and were never obliged to stand still, turn aside, or go back. So perfectly known to God are all his works, that he is never put upon new counsels.

4. That God makes more use of the ministration of angels in the government of this lower world than we are aware of. "The four wheels were by the cherubims, one wheel by one cherub, and another wheel by another cherub," ver. 9. What has been imagined by some concerning the spheres above, that every orb has its intelligence to guide it, is here intimated concerning the wheels below, that every wheel has its cherub to guide it. We think it a satisfaction to us, if under the wise God there are wise men employed in managing the affairs of kingdoms and churches; whether there be so or no, it appears by this, there are wise angels employed, "a cherub to every wheel."

5. That all the motions of providence, and all the ministrations of angels, are under the government of the great God. They were all full of eyes; those eyes of the Lord which run to and fro through the earth, and which the angels have always an eye to, ver. 12. The living creatures and the wheels concur in their motions and rests, ver. 17; for the Spirit of life, as it may be read, or, the spirit of the living creatures, is in the wheels. The Spirit of God directs all the creatures, both upper and lower, so as to make them serve the Divine purpose. Events are not determined by the wheel of fortune, which is blind, but by the wheels of providence, which are full of eyes.

Secondly. Ezekiel sees the glory of God removing out of the sanctuary, the place where God's honour had long dwelt; and this sight is as sad as the other was grateful. It was pleasant to see that God had not forsaken the earth, as the idolaters suggested, ch. ix. 9; but sad to see that he was forsaking his are added here. It must also be remembered that this is a vision, and that being such, and a grouping of emblematic persons, things, and actions, we may expect to find in it what we have no experience of, and what could hardly take place in this world. Cherubim taking fire into their hands is not more contrary to our experience than men able to carry burning coals without injury to themselves. Yet such allegories as this are most valuable as means of divine instruction.

x. 13. The word here translated "wheels" is very different from the one rendered "O wheel." The first properly means wheels in the ordinary sense, but the second includes the whole machinery. Thus in verse 2 the sense may be "go in among the machinery," and so in verse 6, "take fire from among the machinery." It is true that "machinery" is not an exact equivalent, but it suggests the true idea, namely, that the word galgal may denote the entire construction, wheels included. Some, however, think that galgal here describes sanctuary. The glory of the Lord "stood over the threshold," ver. 4. But now it departed from off the threshold, having thence given the necessary orders for the destruction of the city, and it stood over the cherubims; not those in the most holy place, but those that Ezekiel now saw in vision, ver. 18. It ascended that stately chariot, as the judge, when he comes off the bench, goes into his coach and is gone. And immediately "the cherubims lift up their wings," (ver. 19,) as they were directed; and they "mounted up from the earth," as birds upon the wing. And when they went out, the wheels of this chariot were not drawn, but went by instinct beside them, by which it appeared that the spirit of the living creatures was in the wheels. Thus, when God is leaving a people in displeasure, angels above and all events here below shall concur to further his departure. But observe here, in the courts of the temple where the people of Israel had dishonoured their God, had cast off his yoke, and withdrawn the shoulder from it, blessed angels appear very ready to serve him, to draw in his chariot, and to mount upwards with it. God had shewn the prophet how the will of God was disobeyed by men on earth, ch. viii.; here he shews him how readily it is obeyed by angels and inferior creatures. And it is a comfort to us, when we grieve for the wickedness of the wicked, to think how his angels "do his commandments, hearkening to the voice of his word," Ps. ciii. 20.

Let us now, 1. Take a view of this chariot, in which the glory of the God of Israel rides triumphantly. He that is the God of Israel is the God of heaven and earth, and has the command of all the powers of both. Let the faithful Israelites comfort themselves with this, that he that is their God is above the cherubims, (their Redeemer is so, 1 Pet. iii. 22,) and has the sole and sovereign disposal of all events; the living creatures and the wheels agree to serve him, so that he is "head over all things to the church." The rabbins call this vision that Ezekiel had, Mercabah,—'the vision of the chariot;' and from thence they call the more abstruse part of divinity, which treats concerning God and spirits, Opus currus,—'the work of the chariot,' as they do the other part that is more plain and familiar, Opus bereshith,—'the work of the creation.' 2. Let us attend the motion of this chariot. The cherubim, and the glory of God above them, "stood at the door of the east gate of the Lord's house," ready to depart and leave the house, ver. 19. But observe with how many stops and pauses God departs, as loath to go, and seeing if there be any that will intercede with him to return. None of the priests in the inner court, between the temple and the altar, would court his stay; therefore he leaves their court, and stands at the east gate, which led into the court of the people, to see if any of them would yet at length stand in the gap. Note, God removes by degrees from a provoking people; and, when he is ready to depart, would return to them if they were but a repenting, praying people.

CHAPTER XI.

This chapter concludes the vision which Ezekiel saw, and this part of it furnisheth him with two messages: I. A message of wrath against those who continued still at Jerusalem, and were there in the height of presumption, thinking they should never fall, ver. 1—13. II. A message of comfort to those who were carried captives into Babylon, and were there in the depth of despondency, thinking they should never rise. And, as the former are assured that God has judgments in store for them notwithstanding their present security, so the latter are assured that God has mercy in store for them notwithstanding their present distress, ver. 14—21. And so the glory of God removes farther, ver. 22, 23; the vision disappears, ver. 24; and Ezekiel faithfully gives his hearers an account of it, ver. 25.

MOREOVER the spirit lifted me up, and brought me unto the east gate of the LORD's house, which looketh eastward: and behold at the door of the gate five and twenty men; among whom I saw Jaazaniah the son of Azur, and Pelatiah the son of Benaiah, princes of the people. 2 Then said he unto me, Son of man, these are the men that devise mischief, and give wicked counsel in this city: 3 Which say, It is not near; let us build houses: this city is the caldron, and we be the flesh. 4 Therefore prophesy against them, prophesy, O son of man. 5 And the Spirit of the LORD fell upon me, and said unto me, Speak;

Thus saith the LORD;
Thus have ye said, O house of Israel:
For I know the things that come into your mind, every one of them.
6 Ye have multiplied your slain in this city,
And ye have filled the streets thereof with the slain.
7 Therefore thus saith the Lord GOD;
Your slain whom ye have laid in the midst of it,
They are the flesh, and this city is the caldron:
But I will bring you forth out of the midst of it.
8 Ye have feared the sword;
And I will bring a sword upon you, saith the Lord GOD.
9 And I will bring you out of the midst thereof,
And deliver you into the hands of strangers,
And will execute judgments among you.
10 Ye shall fall by the sword;
I will judge you in the border of Israel;
And ye shall know that I am the LORD.
11 This city shall not be your caldron,
Neither shall ye be the flesh in the midst thereof;
But I will judge you in the border of Israel:
12 And ye shall know that I am the LORD:
For ye have not walked in my statutes,
Neither executed my judgments,
But have done after the manners of the heathen that are round about you.

13 And it came to pass, when I prophesied, that Pelatiah the son of Benaiah died. Then fell I down upon my face, and cried with a loud voice, and said, Ah Lord GOD! wilt thou make a full end of the remnant of Israel?

We have here,

First. The great security of the princes at Jerusalem, notwithstanding the judgments of God that were upon them. The prophet was brought in vision to the gate of the temple where these princes sat in council, upon the present arduous affairs of the city; "The spirit lift me up, and brought me to the east gate of the Lord's house, and behold," twenty-five men were there. See how obsequious the prophet was to the Spirit's orders, and how observant of all the discoveries that were made to him. It should seem these twenty-five men were not the same with those twenty-five whom he saw at the door of the temple worshipping towards the east, ch. viii. 16. Those seem to have been priests or Levites, for they were between the porch and the altar; but these were princes, sitting in the gate of the Lord's house to try causes, Jer. xxvi. 10; and these here are charged, not with corruptions in worship, but maladministration of the government. Two of them are named, because they were the most leading active men, and perhaps because the prophet knew them, though he had been some years absent; Jaazaniah, not that mentioned ch. viii. 11; for he was the son of Shaphan, this the son of Azur. Some tell us, that Jerusalem was divided into twenty-four wards, and that these were the governors or aldermen of those wards, with their mayor or president. Now observe,

1. The general character which God gives of these men to the prophet; ver. 2, "These are the men that devise mischief." Under pretence of concerting measures for the public safety, they harden the people in their sins, and take off their fear of God's judgments which they are threatened with by the prophets; they "give wicked counsel in this city," counselling them to restrain and silence the prophets to rebel against the king of Babylon, and to resolve upon holding the city out to the last extremity. Note, It is bad with a people when the things that belong to their peace are hid from the eyes of those who are intrusted with their counsels; and when mischief is done God knows at whose door to lay it, and in the discovery and recompence will be sure to lay it at the right door, and will say, These are the men that devised it, though they are great men, and pass for wise men, and must not now be contradicted or controlled.

2. The particular charge exhibited against them in proof of this character. They are indicted for words spoken at their council-board, which he that stands in the congregation of the mighty would take cognizance of, ver. 3. They said to this effect, "It is not near;" the destruction of our city that has been so often threatened by the prophets is not near; not so near as they talk of. They are conscious to themselves of such an enmity to reformation, that they cannot but conclude it will come at last; but they have such an opinion of God's patience, (though they have long abused it,) that they are willing to hope it will not come this great while. Note, Where Satan cannot persuade men to look upon the judgment to come as a thing doubtful and uncertain, yet he gains his point by persuading them to look upon it as a thing at a distance, so that it loses its force. If it be sure, yet "it is not near;" whereas in truth, "the Judge stands before the door."

Now, if the destruction is not near, they conclude, "let us build houses;" let us count upon a continuance, for "this city is the caldron, and we are the flesh." This seems to be a proverbial expression, signifying no more but this, We are as safe in this city as flesh in the boiling pot. The walls of the city shall be to us as walls of brass, and shall receive no more damage by the besiegers about it than the caldron doth by the fire under it. Those that think to force us out of our city into captivity, it will be as much at their peril as it would be to take the flesh out of a boiling pot with their hands. This appears to be the meaning of it, by the answer God gives to it; ver. 9, "I will bring you out of the midst of the city," where you think yourselves safe; and then it will appear, ver. 11, that "this is not your caldron, neither are ye the flesh." Perhaps it has a particular reference to the flesh of the peace offering, which it was so great an offence for the priests themselves to take out of the caldron while it was in seething, as we find, 1 Sam. ii. 13, 14; and then it intimates, that they were the more secure, because Jerusalem was the holy city, and they thought themselves a holy people in it, not to be meddled with. Some think this was a banter upon Jeremiah, who in one of his first visions saw Jerusalem represented by a seething-pot, Jer. i. 13; Now, say they in a way of jest and ridicule, if it be a seething-pot, we are as the flesh in it, and who dares meddle with us? Thus they continued mocking the messengers of the Lord, even while they suffered for so doing; but "be ye not mockers, lest your bands be made strong." Those hearts are hard indeed, which are made more secure by those words of God which were designed for warning to them.

Secondly. The method taken to awaken them out of their security. One would think the providences of God that were concerning them, were enough to startle them; but, to help them to understand and improve those, the word of God is sent them, to give warning; ver. 4, "Therefore prophesy against them." and try to undeceive them; "Prophesy, O son of man," upon these dead and dry bones. Note, The greatest kindness ministers can do to secure sinners is to preach against them, and to shew them their misery and danger, though they are never so unwilling to see it. We then act most for them when we appear most against them; but the prophet, being at a loss what to say to men that were hardened in sin, and bade defiance to the judgments of God, the Spirit of the Lord fell upon him, to make him full of power and courage, and said to him, Speak. Note, When sinners are flattering themselves into their own ruin, it is time to speak, and to tell them they shall not have peace if they go on. Ministers are sometimes so bashful and timorous, and so much at a loss, that they must be put on to speak, and to speak boldly. But he that commands the prophet to speak gives him instructions what to say; and he must address himself to them as the house of Israel, ver. 5; for not the princes only, but all motion only, and understand it of the turning or whirling of the wheels. Others again explain it to mean a whirlwind. Another view regards the word as a verb—"revolve," or "turn round;" but this is improbable.

x. 14. From chapter i. 6, 10 we gather that each of the cherubim had the four faces of a man, a lion, an ox, and an eagle, while here the faces are those of a cherub, a man, a lion, and an eagle. It is not easy to decide whether the face of an ox is here called the face of a cherub, though many conjectures have been made on that supposition. The idea that each cherub is regarded as having but one face is contrary to the opening words of the verse; we must therefore agree with Piscator that the prophet described what he saw at that moment. Of one cherub he had a complete view, but of the others he only saw the faces which are specified. If this is correct, "cherub" does not stand for "ox," but for the entire living compound form of the one cherub which was wholly visible.

the people are concerned to know the truth of their case, to know the worst of it. They are the house of Israel, and therefore the God of Israel is concerned in kindness to them to give them warning, and they are concerned in duty to him to take the warning. And what is it he must say to them in God's name?

1. Let them know that the God of heaven takes notice of their vain confidences, with which they support themselves; ver. 5, "I know the things that come into your mind every one of them;" what secret reasons you have for these resolutions, and what you aim at in putting so good a face upon a matter you know to be bad. Note, God perfectly knows, not only the things that come out of our mouths, but the things that come into our minds; not only all we say, but all we think; even those thoughts that are most suddenly darted into our minds, and as suddenly slip out of them again, so that we ourselves are scarcely aware of them; yet God knows them. He knows us better than we know ourselves; "he understands our thought afar off;" the consideration whereof should oblige us to keep our hearts with all diligence, that no vain thoughts come into them, or lodge within them.

2. Let them know that all that had fallen and should yet fall in Jerusalem by the sword of the Chaldeans, they that advised them to stand it out should be accounted before God the murderers of them; and those slain were the only ones that should remain in the city as the flesh in the caldron; ver. 6, "You have multiplied your slain in this city," not only those whom you have by the sword of justice unjustly put to death, under colour of law; but those whom you have by your wilfulness and pride unwisely exposed to the sword of war, though you were told by the prophets you should certainly go by the worst. Thus you with your stubborn humour have filled the streets of Jerusalem with the slain. Note, Those who are either unrighteous or imprudent in beginning or carrying on a war bring upon themselves a great deal of the guilt of blood; and those who are slain in the battles or sieges which they, by such a reasonable peace as the war aimed at, might have prevented, will be called their slain. Now these slain are the only flesh that shall be left in this caldron, ver. 7. There shall none remain to keep possession of the city but those that are buried in it. There shall be no inhabitants of Jerusalem but the inhabitants of the graves there; no freemen of the city but the free among the dead.

3. Let them know that, how impregnable soever they thought their city to be, they should be forced out of it, either driven to flight or dragged into captivity. "I will bring you forth out of the midst of it," whether you will or no, ver. 7; and again, ver. 9. They had provoked God to forsake the city, and thought they should do well enough by their own policy and strength when he was gone; but God will make them know that there is no peace to them that have left their God. If they have by their sins driven God from his house, he will soon by his judgments drive them from theirs; and it will be found that those are least safe that are most secure. "This city shall not be your caldron, neither shall ye be the flesh;" you shall not soak away in it, as you promise yourselves, and die in your nest; you think yourselves safe in the midst thereof, but you shall not be long there.

4. Let them know that, when God has got them out of the midst of Jerusalem, he will pursue them with his judgments wherever he finds them; the judgments which they thought to shelter themselves from by keeping close in Jerusalem. They feared the sword if they should go out to the Chaldeans, and therefore would abide in their caldron; but, saith God, "I will bring a sword upon you," ver. 8; "and you shall fall by the sword," ver. 10. Note, The fear of the wicked it shall come upon him; and there is no fence against the judgments of God when they come with commission, no, not in walls of brass. They were afraid of trusting to the mercy of strangers; but, saith God, "I will deliver you into the hands of strangers," whose resentments you shall feel, since you were not willing to lie at their mercy: see Jer. xxxviii. 17, 18. They thought to escape the judgments of God; but God saith he will execute judgments upon them; and whereas they resolved, if they must be judged, it should be in Jerusalem, God tells them, ver. 10, and again, ver. 11, he will judge them in the borders of Israel, which was fulfilled when Nebuchadnezzar slew all the nobles of Judah at Riblah in the land of Hamath, on the utmost border of the land of Canaan. Note, Those who have taken never so deep root in the place where they live, yet cannot be sure that in that place they shall die.

5. Let them know, that all this is the due punishment of their sin, and the revelation of the righteous judgment of God against them. "Ye shall know that I am the Lord," ver. 10, and again, ver. 12. Those shall be made to know by the sword of the Lord that would not be taught by his word, what a hatred he has to sin, and what a fearful thing it is for impenitent sinners to fall into his hands. I will execute judgments, and then you shall know that I am the Lord; for the Lord is known by the judgments which he executeth upon those that have not walked in his statutes. Hereby it is known that he made the law, because he punisheth the breach of it. "I will execute judgments among you," saith God, "because you have not executed my judgments," ver. 12. Note, The executing of the judgments of God's mouth by us, in an uniform, steady course of obedience to his law, is the only way to prevent the executing of the judgments of his hand upon us in our ruin and confusion. One way or other God's judgments will be executed; the law will take place either in its precept or in its penalty. If we do not give honour to God by executing his judgments as he has commanded, he will get him honour upon us by executing his judgments as he has threatened; and thus we shall know that he is the Lord, the sovereign Lord of all, that will not be mocked. And observe, when they cast off God's statutes, and walked not in them, they did "after the manners of the heathens that were round about them," and introduced into their worship all their impure, ridiculous, and barbarous usages. When men leave the settled rule of Divine institutions, they wander endlessly; justly therefore was this made the reason why they should keep God's ordinances, that they might not commit the abominable customs of the heathen, Lev. xviii. 30.

Thirdly. This awakening word is here immediately followed by an awakening providence, ver. 13; where we may observe,

1. With what power Ezekiel prophesied, or rather, what a Divine power went along with it. "It came to pass, when I prophesied, that Pelatiah the son of Benaiah died," who was mentioned, ver. 1, as a principal man among the twenty-five princes that made all the mischief in Jerusalem. It should seem this was done in vision now, as the slaying of the ancient men, ch. ix. 6, upon occasion of which Ezekiel prayed, ver. 8, as he did here; but it was an assurance, that when this prophecy should be published it should be done in fact. The death of Pelatiah was an earnest of the complete accomplishment of this prophecy. Note, God is pleased oftentimes to single out some sinners, and to make them monuments of his justice, for warning to others of what is coming; and some that thought themselves very safe are snatched away suddenly, and drop down dead in an instant, as Ananias and Sapphira at Peter's feet when he prophesied.

2. With what pity Ezekiel prayed. Though the sudden death of Pelatiah was a confirmation of Ezekiel's prophecy, and really an honour to him, yet he was in a mighty concern about it, and laid it to heart as if he had been his relation or friend. "He fell upon his face, and cried with a loud voice," as one in earnest, "Ah Lord God! wilt thou make a full end of the remnant of Israel?" Many are swept away by the judgments we have been under, and shall the remnant which have escaped the sword die thus by the immediate hand of heaven? Then thou wilt indeed make a full end. Perhaps it was Ezekiel's infirmity to bewail the death of this wicked prince thus, as it was Samuel's to mourn so long for Saul; but thus he shewed how far he was from desiring the woful day he foretold. David lamented the sickness of those that hated and persecuted him; and we ought to be much affected with the sudden death of others, yea, though they are wicked.

14 Again the word of the LORD came unto me, saying, 15 Son of man, thy brethren, even thy brethren, the men of thy kindred, and all the house of Israel wholly, are they unto whom the inhabitants of Jerusalem have said, Get you far from the LORD: unto us is this land given in possession.

16 Therefore say,
Thus saith the Lord GOD;
Although I have cast them far off among the heathen,
And although I have scattered them among the countries,
Yet will I be to them as a little sanctuary
In the countries where they shall come.

17 Therefore say,
Thus saith the Lord GOD;
I will even gather you from the people,
And assemble you out of the countries where ye have been scattered,
And I will give you the land of Israel.

18 And they shall come thither,
And they shall take away all the detestable things thereof
And all the abominations thereof from thence.

19 And I will give them one heart,
And I will put a new spirit within you;
And I will take the stony heart out of their flesh,
And will give them an heart of flesh:

20 That they may walk in my statutes,
And keep mine ordinances, and do them:
And they shall be my people, and I will be their God

21 But as for them whose heart walketh after [tions,
The heart of their detestable things and their abomina-
I will recompense their way upon their own heads,
Saith the Lord GOD.

Prophecy was designed that by it every valley might be exalted, as well as every mountain and hill brought low, Isa. xl. 4; and prophets were to speak not only conviction to the presumptuous and secure, but comfort to the despised and desponding that trembled at God's word. The prophet having in the former part of this chapter received instructions for the awakening of those that were at ease in Zion, is in these verses furnished with comfortable words for those that mourned in Babylon, and by the rivers there sat weeping when they remembered Zion. Observe,

First. How the pious captives were trampled upon and insulted over by those who continued in Jerusalem, ver. 15. God tells the prophet what the inhabitants of Jerusalem said of him and the rest of them that were already carried away to Babylon. God had owned them as good figs, and declared it was for their good that he had sent them into Babylon; but the inhabitants of Jerusalem abandoned them, supposing them that were really the best saints to be the greatest sinners of all men that dwelt in Jerusalem. Observe, 1. How they are described. They are thy brethren, saith God to the prophet, whom thou hast a concern and affection for; they are the men of thy kindred, the men of thy redemption, (so the word is,) thy next of kin, to whom the right of redeeming the alienated possession doth belong, but who are so far from being able to do it, that they are themselves gone into captivity; they are the whole house of Israel. God so accounts of them because they only have retained their integrity, and are bettered by their captivity. They are not only of the same family and nation with Ezekiel, but of the same spirit; they were his hearers, and he had communion with them in holy ordinances, and perhaps upon that account they are called his brethren, and the men of his kindred. 2. How they were disowned by the inhabitants of Jerusalem. They said of them, "Get ye far from the Lord." They that were at ease and proud themselves scorned their brethren that were humbled under humbling providences. 1st. They cut them off from being members of their church, because they had separated themselves from their rulers, and in compliance with the will of God had surrendered themselves to the king of Babylon. They excommunicated them, and said, "Get ye far from the Lord," we will have nothing to do with you. Those that were superstitious were very willing to shake off those that were conscientious, and were severe in their censures of them and sentences against them, as if they were forsaken and forgotten of the Lord, and were cut off from the communion of the faithful. 2nd. They cut them off from being members of the commonwealth too, as if they had no longer any part or lot in the matter; "Unto us is the land given in possession," and you have forfeited your estates by surrendering to the king of Babylon, and we are thereby become entitled to them. God takes notice of, and is much displeased with, the contempt which those that are in prosperity put upon their brethren that are in affliction.

Secondly. The gracious promises which God made to them in consideration of the insolent carriage of their brethren towards them. They that hated them and cast them out said, "Let the Lord be glorified," but he shall appear to their joy, Isa. lxvi. 5. God owns that his hand was gone out against them, which had given occasion to their brethren to triumph over them, ver. 16. It xi. 3. This is not wholly plain. The literal rendering is, "It is not near to build houses: this is the caldron, and we are the meat." The first clause may then mean that building houses is not a thing to be done for some time, not by them at any rate. With regard to the second clause, it has been fairly said that it was spoken in derision of the vision of Jeremiah (i. 13). As Scott says, "The walls of the city would protect them against the Chaldeans, as the caldron keeps the fire from the flesh that is in it." Mr. Henry explains it similarly.

xi. 13. Although Ezekiel was present at Jerusalem in spirit and not in the body, yet the death of Pelatiah may have been an actual occurrence at that particular time, and revealed to him as other circumstances were. To the prophet the event was like the first of the series of judgments which he was proclaiming against the wicked priesthood.

xi. 16. The expression rendered "as a little sanctuary" may be otherwise explained "a sanctuary for a little while." On the whole is true, "I have cast them far off among the heathen, and scattered them among the countries;" they look as if they were an abandoned people, and so mingled with the nations as that they would be lost among them; but I have mercy in store for them. Note, God takes occasion, from the contempts which are put upon his people, to speak comfort to them, as David hoped God would reward him good for Shimei's cursing. His time to support his people's hopes is when their enemies are endeavouring to drive them to despair. Now God promiseth,

1. That he will make up to them the want of the temple and the privileges of it; ver. 16, "I will be to them as a little sanctuary, in the countries where they shall come." They at Jerusalem have the temple, but without God; they in Babylon have God, though without the temple. 1st. God will be a sanctuary to them, that is, a place of refuge; to him they shall flee, and in him they shall be safe, as he was that took hold on the horns of the altar. Or, rather, They shall have such communion with God in the land of their captivity as it was thought could be had nowhere but in the temple. They shall there see God's power and his glory, so as they used to see it in the sanctuary; they shall have the tokens of God's presence with them, and his grace in their hearts shall sanctify their prayers and praises as well as ever the altar sanctified the gift, so that they shall please the Lord better than an ox or bullock. 2nd. He will be a little sanctuary, not seen or observed by their enemies, who looked with an envious and evil eye upon that house at Jerusalem which was high and great, 1 Kin. ix. 8. They were but few and mean, and a little sanctuary was fittest for them; God regards the low estate of his people, and suits his favours to their circumstances. Observe the condescensions of Divine grace; the great God will be to his people a little sanctuary. Note, They that are deprived of the benefit of public ordinances, if it be not their own fault, may have the want of them abundantly made up in the immediate communications of Divine grace and comforts.

2. That God would in due time put an end to their afflictions, bring them out of the land of their captivity, and settle them again, them or their children, in their own land, ver. 17. I will gather even you that are thus dispersed, thus despised and given over for lost by your own countrymen; "I will gather you from the people," distinguish you from those with whom you are mingled, deliver you from those by whom you are held captives, "and assemble you," in a body, "out of the countries where you have been scattered;" you shall not come back one by one, but all together, which will make your return more honourable, safe, and comfortable; and then "I will give you the land of Israel," which now your brethren look upon you as for ever shut out from. Note, It is well for us that men's severe censures cannot cut us off from God's gracious promises. There are many that will be found to have a place in the holy land whom uncharitable men, by their monopolies of it to themselves, had secluded from it. "I will give you the land of Israel," give it you again by a new grant, "and they shall come thither." If there be any thing in the change of the person from "you" to "them," it may signify the posterity of those to whom the promise is made. You shall have the title, as the patriarchs had; and they that come after shall have the possession.

3. That God, by his grace, would part between them and their sins, ver. 18. Their captivity shall effectually cure them of their idolatry; when they come thither to their own land again they shall take away all the detestable things thereof. Their idols, that had been their delectable things, should now be looked upon with detestation, (not only the idols of Babylon, where they were captives, but the idols of Canaan, where they were natives;) they should not only not worship them as they had done, but they should not suffer any monuments of them to remain; "they shall take all the abominations thereof from thence." Note, Then it is in mercy that we return to a prosperous state, when we return not to the sins and follies of that state. "What have I to do any more with idols?"

4. That God would powerfully dispose them to their duty. They shall not only cease to do evil, but they shall learn to do well, because there shall be not only an end of their troubles, but a return to their peace.

1st. God will plant good principles in them. He will make the tree good, ver. 19. This is a Gospel promise, and is made good to all those whom God designs for the heavenly Canaan; for God prepares all for heaven whom he has prepared heaven for. It is promised, First. That God will give them one heart, that is, a heart entire for the true God, and not divided, as it had been, among many gods; a heart firmly fixed and resolved for God, and not wavering; steady and uniform, and not inconstant with itself. One heart is a sincere and upright heart, its intentions of a piece with its professions. Secondly. That he will "put a new spirit within them," a temper of mind agreeable to the new circumstances which God in his providence would bring them into. All that are sanctified have a new spirit, quite different from what it was; they act from new principles, walk by new rules, and aim at new ends. A new name or a new face will not serve without a new spirit; "If any man be in Christ, he is a new creature." Thirdly. That he will "take away the stony heart out of their flesh," out of their corrupt nature. Their hearts shall no longer be as they have been, dead, and dry, and hard, and heavy as a stone; no longer incapable of bearing good fruit, so that the good seed is lost upon it, as it was on the stony ground. Fourthly. That he will give them a heart of flesh; not dead or proud flesh, but living flesh. He will make their hearts sensible of spiritual pains and spiritual pleasures, will make them tender, and apt to receive impressions. This is God's work; it is his gift, his gift by promise; and a wonderful and happy change it is that is wrought by it, from death to life. This is promised to those whom God would bring back to their own land, for then such a change of the condition is for the better indeed, when it is accompanied with such a change of the heart; and such a change must be wrought in all those that shall be brought to the better country, that is, the heavenly.

2nd. Their practices shall be consonant to those principles. "I will give them a new spirit," not that they may be able to discourse well on religion, and to dispute for it, but that "they may walk in my statutes" in their whole conversation, "and keep mine ordinances" in all acts of religious worship, ver. 20. These two must go together, and those to whom God has given a new heart and a new spirit will make conscience of both; and then "they shall be my people, and I will be their God." The ancient covenant, which seemed to have been broken and forgotten, shall be renewed. By their idolatry, it should seem, they had cast God off; by their captivity, it should seem, God had cast them off: but when they were cured of their idolatry and delivered out of their captivity, God and his Israel own one another again. God, by his good work in them, will make them his people, and then by the tokens of his good-will towards them, he will shew that he is their God.

Thirdly. Here is a threatening of wrath against those who hated to be reformed. As, when judgments are threatened, the righteous are distinguished so as not to share in the evil of those judgments, so, when favours are promised, the wicked are distinguished so as not to share in the comfort of those favours; they have no part or lot in the matter, ver. 21. But as for them that have no grace, what have they to do with peace? Observe, 1. Their description. Their "heart walks after the heart of their detestable things." They have as great a mind to worship devils as devils have to be worshipped. Or, in opposition to the new heart which God gives his people, which is a heart after his own heart, they have a heart after the heart of their idols; that is, in their temper and practice they conformed themselves to the characters and accounts given them of their idols, and the ideas they have of them; and of them they learned lewdness and cruelty. Here lies the root of all their wickedness, the corruption of the heart; as the root of their reformation is laid in the renovation of the heart. The heart has its walks, and according as those are the man is. 2. Their doom. It carries both justice and terror in it; "I will recompense their way upon their own heads," that is, I will deal with them as they deserve. There needs no more than this to speak God righteous, that he doth but render to men according to their deserts; and yet, such are the deserts of sin, that there needs no more than this to speak the sinner miserable 22 Then did the cherubims lift up their wings, and the wheels beside them; and the glory of the God of Israel was over them above. 23 And the glory of the LORD went up from the midst of the city, and stood upon the mountain which is on the east side of the city. 24 Afterwards the spirit took me up, and brought me in a vision by the Spirit of God into Chaldea, to them of the captivity. So the vision that I had seen went up from me. 25 Then I spake unto them of the captivity all the things that the LORD had shewed me.

Here is, First. The departure of God's presence from the city and temple. When the message was committed to the prophet, and he was fully apprised of it, fully instructed how to separate between the precious and the vile, then "the cherubims lift up their wings, and the wheels beside them," ver. 22, as before ch. x. 19. Angels, when they have done their errands in this lower world, are upon the wing to be gone, for they lose no time. We left the glory of the Lord last at the east gate of the temple, ch. x. 19, which is here said to be in the midst of the city; now here we are told that, finding and wondering that there was none to intercede, none to uphold, none to invite its return, it removed next to the mountain which is on the east side of the city, ver. 23. That was the mount of Olives. On that mountain they had set up their idols to confront God in his temple when he dwelt there, 1 Kin. xi. 7, and thence it was called the mount of corruption, 2 Kin. xxiii. 13; therefore there God doth, as it were, set up his standard, his tribunal, as it were to confront them who thought to keep possession of the temple for themselves now God had left it. From that mountain there was a full prospect of the city; thither God removed, to make good what he had said, Deu. xxxii. 20, "I will hide my face from them, I will see what their end shall be." It was from this mountain that Christ beheld the city and wept over it, in the foresight of its last destruction by the Romans. The glory of the Lord removed thither, to be, as it were, yet within call, and ready to return, if now at length, in this their day, they would have understood the things that belonged to their peace. Loath to depart bids oft farewell. God, by going away thus slowly, thus gradually, intimated that he left them with reluctancy, and would not have gone if they had not perfectly forced him from them. He did now in effect say, "How shall I give thee up, Ephraim? how shall I deliver thee, Israel?" But though he bear long he will not bear always, but will at length forsake those, and cast them off for ever, who have forsaken him and cast him off.

Secondly. The departure of this vision from the prophet. At length it went up from him, ver. 24. He saw it mount upwards till it went out of sight, which would be a confirmation to his faith that it was a heavenly vision, that it descended from above, for thitherwards it returned. Note, The visions which the saints have of the glory of God will not be constant till they come to heaven. They have glimpses of that glory which they soon lose again, visions which go up from them; tastes of Divine pleasures, but not a continual feast. It was from the mount of Olives that the vision went up, typifying the ascension of Christ to heaven from that very mountain, when those that had seen him manifested in the flesh saw him no more; it was foretold, Zec. xiv. 4, that his feet should stand upon the mount of Olives, stand last there.

Thirdly. The prophet's return to them of the captivity. The same spirit that had carried him in a trance or ecstacy to Jerusalem brought him back to Chaldea, for there the bounds of his habitation are at present appointed, and that is the place of his service. The Spirit came to him, not to deliver him out of captivity, but, which was equivalent, to support and comfort him in his captivity.

Fourthly. The account which he gave to his hearers of all he had seen and heard, ver. 25. He received that he might give, and he was faithful to him that appointed him. He delivered his message very honestly; he spake all that and that only which God had shewed him. He told them of the great wickedness he had seen at Jerusalem, and the ruin that was hastening towards that city, that they might not repent of their surrendering themselves to the king of Babylon, as Jeremiah advised them, and blame themselves for it, nor envy those that stayed behind and laughed at them for going when they did, nor wish themselves there again, but be content in their captivity. Who would covet to be in a city so full of sin, and so near to ruin? It is better to be in Babylon under the favour of God than in Jerusalem under his wrath and curse. But, though this was delivered immediately to them of the captivity, yet we may suppose they sent the contents of it to them at Jerusalem, with whom they kept up a correspondence. And well had it been for Jerusalem if she had taken the warning hereby given.

CHAPTER XII.

Though the vision of God's glory be gone up from the prophet, yet his word comes to him still, and is by him sent to the people, and to the same purpose with that which was discovered to him in the vision, namely, to set forth the terrible judgments that were coming upon Jerusalem, by which the city and temple should be entirely laid waste. In this chapter, I. The prophet, by removing his stuff, and quitting his lodgings, must be a sign to set forth Zedekiah's flight out of Jerusalem in the utmost confusion, when the Chaldeans took the city, ver. 1—16. II. The prophet, by eating his meat with trembling, must be a sign to set forth the famine in the city during the siege, and the consternation that the inhabitants should be in, ver. 17—20. III. A message is sent from God to the people to assure them that all these predictions should have their accomplishment very shortly, and not be deferred, as they flattered themselves with hopes they would, ver. 21—28.

we prefer the second opinion, because it seems most natural that the promise should be so interpreted: "I will be their sanctuary, during the few years of their captivity and dispersion." This explanation has been favoured by Newcome, Boothroyd, Fairbairn, &c., and was proposed long ago by Piscator.

xi. 21. The phrase "whose heart walketh after the heart of their detestable things and their abominations" really means "whose disposition is according to the dispositions which characterise idolatry."

xi. 23. Mr. Henry correctly says the mountain on the east of Jerusalem here mentioned was the Mount of Olives.

xi. 24, 25. As previously observed, the visit of the prophet to Jerusalem, and the survey of what was going on there, was not in the body, but in vision. The circumstances under which this extraordinary revelation was made are indicated in chap. viii. 1. Grotius says Ezekiel was present in spirit at Jerusalem; and Calvin thinks what took place was not matter of fact, but an ecstatic vision.

THE word of the LORD also came unto me, saying, 2 Son of man, thou dwellest in the midst of a rebellious house, which have eyes to see, and see not; they have ears to hear, and hear not: for they are a rebellious house. 3 Therefore, thou son of man, prepare thee stuff for removing, and remove by day in their sight; and thou shalt remove from thy place to another place in their sight: it may be they will consider, though they be a rebellious house. 4 Then shalt thou bring forth thy stuff by day in their sight, as stuff for removing: and thou shalt go forth at even in their sight, as they that go forth into captivity. 5 Dig thou through the wall in their sight, and carry out thereby. 6 In their sight shalt thou bear it upon thy shoulders, and carry it forth in the twilight: thou shalt cover thy face, that thou see not the ground: for I have set thee for a sign unto the house of Israel. 7 And I did so as I was commanded: I brought forth my stuff by day, as stuff for captivity, and in the even I digged through the wall with mine hand; I brought it forth in the twilight, and I bare it upon my shoulder in their sight. 8 And in the morning came the word of the LORD unto me, saying, 9 Son of man, hath not the house of Israel, the rebellious house, said unto thee, What doest thou? 10 Say thou unto them, Thus saith the Lord GOD; This burden concerneth the prince in Jerusalem, and all the house of Israel that are among them.

11 Say, I am your sign:
Like as I have done, so shall it be done unto them:
They shall remove and go into captivity.
12 And the prince that is among them shall bear upon his [shoulder
In the twilight, and shall go forth:
They shall dig through the wall to carry out thereby:
He shall cover his face, that he see not the ground with his eyes.
13 My net also will I spread upon him, and he shall be taken in my snare: [deans;
And I will bring him to Babylon to the land of the Chal-
Yet shall he not see it, though he shall die there.
14 And I will scatter toward every wind
All that are about him to help him, and all his bands;
And I will draw out the sword after them.
15 And they shall know that I am the LORD,
When I shall scatter them among the nations,
And disperse them in the countries.
16 But I will leave a few men of them
From the sword, from the famine, and from the pestilence;
That they may declare all their abominations
Among the heathen whither they come;
And they shall know that I am the LORD.

Perhaps Ezekiel reflected with so much pleasure upon the vision he had had of the glory of God, that often, since it went up from him, he was wishing it might come down to him again; and he having seen it once, and a second time, was willing to hope he might be a third time so favoured; but we do not find that ever he saw it any more. And yet the word of the Lord comes to him, for God did in divers manners speak to the fathers, Heb. i. 1; and they often heard the words of God, when they did not see the visions of the Almighty. Faith comes by hearing, that word of prophecy which is more sure than vision. We may keep up our communion with God without raptures and ecstasies. In these verses the prophet is directed,

First. By what signs and actions to express the approaching captivity of Zedekiah king of Judah. That was the thing to be foretold; and it is foretold to them that are already in captivity, because as long as Zedekiah was upon the throne they flattered themselves with hopes that he would make his part good with the king of Babylon, whose yoke he was now projecting to shake off; from which it is probable these poor captives promised themselves mighty matters. And it may be, when he was forming that design, he privately sent encouragement to them to hope that he would rescue them shortly, or procure their liberty by exchange of prisoners; and while they were fed with these vain hopes they could not set themselves either to submit to their affliction or to get good by their affliction. It was therefore necessary, but very difficult, to convince them, that Zedekiah, instead of being their deliverer, should very shortly be their fellow-sufferer. Now one would have thought it might have been sufficient if the prophet had only told them this in God's name, as he doth afterwards, ver. 10; but to prepare them for the prophecy of it he must first give them a sign of it, must speak it to their eyes first and then their ears. And here we have,

1. The reason why he must take this method; ver. 2, it is because they are a stupid, dull, unthinking people, that will not heed, or will soon forget, or at least will not be at all affected with what they only hear of, it will make no impression at all upon them; "Thou dwellest in the midst of a rebellious house," whom it is next to impossible to work any good upon. They have eyes and ears, they have intellectual powers and faculties, but they see not, they hear not; they were idolaters, whose character it was that they were like the idols they worshipped, which have eyes and see not, ears and hear not, Ps. cxv. 5, 8. Note, Those are to be reckoned rebellious that shut their eyes against the Divine light, and stop their ears to the Divine law. They that are wilfully ignorant, that have faculties and means and will not use them, their ignorance is so far from being their excuse, that it adds rebellion to their sin. None so blind, so deaf, as those that will not hear, that will not see; they see not, they hear not, for they are a rebellious house. The cause is all from themselves; the darkness of the understanding is owing to the stubbornness of the will. Now this is the reason why he must speak to them by signs, as deaf people are taught, that they might be either instructed or ashamed. Note, Ministers must accommodate themselves, not only to the weakness, but to the wilfulness of those they deal with, and deal with them accordingly. If they dwell among those that are rebellious, they must speak to them the more plainly and pressingly, and take that course that is most likely to work upon them, that they may be left inexcusable.

2. The method he must take to awaken and affect them. He must furnish himself with all necessaries for removing, ver. 3; provide for a journey, clothes and money; he must remove from one place to another, as one unsettled and forced to shift. This he must do by day in the sight of the people. He must bring out all his household goods, to be packed up and sent away, ver. 4; and, because all the doors and gates were either locked up that they could not pass through them, or so guarded by the enemy that they durst not, he must therefore dig through the wall, and convey his goods away clandestinely through that breach in the wall, ver. 5. He must carry his goods away himself upon his own shoulders, for want of a servant to attend him. He must do this in the twilight, that he might not be discovered; and when he has made what shift he can to secure some of the best of his effects, he must himself steal away at even in their sight, with fear and trembling, and must go as they that go forth into captivity, ver. 4; that is, he must cover his face, ver. 6, as being ashamed to be seen, and afraid to be known, or in token of very great sorrow and concern. He must go away as a poor broken tradesman, that, when he is forced to shut shop, hides his head, or runs his country.

Thus Ezekiel must be himself a sign to them. And when, perhaps, he seemed somewhat backward to put himself to all this trouble, and to expose himself to be bantered and ridiculed for it, to reconcile him to it, God saith, ver. 3, "It may be they will consider," and will by it be taken off from their vain confidences, "though they be a rebellious house." Note, We must not despair even of the worst, but that yet they may be brought to bethink themselves and repent; and, therefore, must continue the use of proper means for their conviction and conversion, because while there is life there is hope. And ministers must be willing to go through the most difficult and inconvenient offices, (for such was this of Ezekiel's removing,) though there be but the "it may be" of success. If but one soul be awakened to consider, our care and pains will be well bestowed.

3. Ezekiel's ready and punctual obedience to the orders God gave him; ver. 7, "I did so as I was commanded." Hereby he teaches us all, and ministers especially, 1st. To obey with cheerfulness every command of God, even the most difficult. Christ himself learned obedience; and so we must all. 2nd. To do all we can for the good of the souls of others, to put ourselves to any trouble or pains for the conviction of those that are unconvinced. "We do all things," that is, we are willing to do any thing, "dearly beloved, for your edifying." 3rd. To be ourselves affected with those things wherewith we desire to affect others. When Ezekiel would give his hearers a melancholy prospect, he doth himself put on a melancholy aspect. 4th. To sit loose to this world, and prepare to leave it; to carry out our stuff for removing, because we have here no continuing city. "Arise, depart, this is not your rest, for it is polluted;" "Thou dwellest in a rebellious house," therefore prepare for removing. For who would not be willing to leave such a house, such a wicked world, as this is?

Secondly. He is directed by what words to explain those signs and actions; as Agabus, when he bound his own hands and feet, told whose binding was thereby signified. But observe, it was not till morning that God gave him an exposition of the sign,—till the next morning, to keep up in him a continual dependence upon God for instruction. As what God doth, so what he directs us to do, perhaps we know not now, but shall know hereafter.

1. It was supposed that the people would ask the meaning of this sign, or at least they should; ver. 9, "Hath not the house of Israel said unto thee, What dost thou?" Yes, I know they have; though they are a rebellious house, yet they are inquisitive concerning the mind of God, as those, Isa. lviii. 2, who sought God daily. Therefore the prophet must do such an odd, uncouth thing, that they might inquire what it meant; and then it may be hoped people will take notice of what is told them, and profit by it when it comes to them in answer to their inquiries. But some understand it as an intimation that they had not made any such inquiries; Hath not this rebellious house so much as asked thee, What dost thou? No; they take no notice of it, but tell them the meaning of it though they do not ask. Note, When God sends to us by his ministers, he observes what entertainment we give to the messages he sends us; he hearkens and hears what we say to them, and what inquiries we make upon them, and is much displeased if we pass them by without taking any notice of them. When we have heard the word, we should apply ourselves to our ministers for farther instruction, and then we shall know, if we thus follow on to know.

2. The prophet is to tell them the meaning of it. In general, ver. 10, "This burthen concerns the prince in Jerusalem;" they knew who that was, and gloried in it now they were in captivity, that they had a prince of their own in Jerusalem; and that the house of Israel was yet entire there, and therefore doubted not but in time to do well enough. But tell them, saith God, that in what thou hast done, they may read the doom of their friends at Jerusalem; "Say, I am your sign," ver. 11. As the conversation of ministers should teach

xii. 3. Dr. Benisch renders this, "Therefore, thou son of man, make thee vessels for exile, and wander out by day before their eyes; and thou shalt wander from thy place to another place before their eyes; it may be they will consider, though they be a house of rebellion." Dr. Fairbairn very truly says that what our translators call "stuff for removing" means the articles or implements which are proper to a person going as an exile or captive to a distant land; in particular, a staff, a scrip, and a knapsack, with a few supplies of food and clothing. Calvin and many others have explained the verse similarly. The prophet was to pack up and carry with him just such and so many articles for personal use as an exile would be able to take with him when starting on his sad journey.

xii. 4—7. This passage shows plainly enough that the exile intended in verse 3 was that of the fugitive rather than that of the captive. A captive in the ordinary sense would not secretly depart from the city; but an exile who desired to flee from the miseries the people what they should do, so the providences of God concerning them are sometimes intended to tell them what they must expect. The unsettlements and removes of ministers give warning to people what they must expect in this world; no continuance, but constant changes. When times of trouble are coming on, Christ tells his disciples, "they shall first lay their hands on you," Lu. xxi. 12.

1st. The people shall be led away into captivity; ver. 11, "As I have done, so shall it be done unto them." They shall be forced away from their own houses, no more to return to them, neither shall their place know them any more. We cannot say concerning our dwelling-place that it is our resting-place, for how far we may be tossed from it before we die we cannot foresee.

2nd. The prince shall in vain attempt to make his escape, for he also shall go into captivity. Jeremiah had told Zedekiah the same to his face, Jer. xxxiv. 3, "Thou shalt not escape, but shalt surely be taken." Ezekiel here foretells it to those who made him their confidence, and promised themselves relief from him.

First. That he shall himself carry away his own goods; "He shall bear upon his shoulder" some of his most valuable effects. Note, The judgments of God can turn a prince into a porter. He that was wont to have the regalia carried before him, and to march through the city at noonday, shall now himself carry his goods on his back, and steal away out of the city in the twilight. See what a change sin makes with men. All the avenues to the palace being carefully watched by the enemy, they shall dig through the wall, to carry out thereby. Men shall be their own housebreakers, and steal away their own goods; so it is when the sword of war has cancelled all right and property.

Secondly. That he shall attempt to escape in a disguise; with a mask or vizor on, which shall cover his face, so that he shall be able only to look before him, and shall not see the ground with his eyes. He that when he was in pomp affected to be seen now he is in his flight is afraid to be seen. Let none, therefore, either be proud of being looked at or overmuch pleased with looking about them, when they see a king with his face covered that he cannot see the ground.

Thirdly. That he shall be made a prisoner, and carried captive into Babylon; ver. 13, "My net will I spread upon him, and he shall be taken in my snare." It seemed to be the Chaldeans' net, and their snare, but God owns it for his. Those that think to outrun the sword of the Lord will find themselves taken in his net. Jeremiah had said that king Zedekiah should see the king of Babylon, and that he should go to Babylon. Ezekiel saith he shall be brought to Babylon, yet he shall not see it, though he shall die there. Those that were disposed to cavil would perhaps object, that these two prophets contradicted one another, for one said he should see the king of Babylon, the other said he should not see Babylon; and yet both proved true. He did see the king of Babylon at Riblah, where he passed sentence upon him for his rebellion, but there he had his eyes put out, so that he did not see Babylon when he was brought thither. These captives expected to see their prince come to Babylon a conqueror, to bring them out of their troubles; but he shall come thither a prisoner, and his disgrace will be a great addition to their troubles. Little joy could they have in seeing him, when he could not see them.

Fourthly. That all his guards should be dispersed and utterly disabled to do him any service; ver. 14, "I will scatter all that are about him to help him," so that he shall be left helpless; I "will scatter them among the nations, and disperse them in the countries," ver. 15; to be monuments of Divine justice wherever they go. But is there not hopes that they may rally again? He that flies one time may fight another time. No; "I will draw out the sword after them," which shall cut them off wherever it finds them. For the sword that God draws out will be sure to do the execution designed. Yet of Zedekiah's scattered troops some shall escape; ver. 16, "I will leave a few men of them." Though they shall all be scattered, yet they shall not all be cut off; some shall have their lives given them for a prey. And it is very observable for what end they are thus remarkably spared; "That they may declare all their abominations among the heathen whither they come." The troubles they are brought into will bring them to themselves, and to their right mind, and then they will acknowledge the justice of God in all that is brought upon them; and will make an ingenuous confession of their sins, which provoked God thus to contend with them; and as by this it shall appear that they were spared in mercy, so hereby they will make a suitable, grateful return to God for his favours to them in sparing them. Note, When God has remarkably delivered us from the deaths wherewith we were surrounded, we must look upon it that for this end, among others, we were spared, that we might glorify God, and edify others by making a penitent acknowledgment of our sins. And those that by their afflictions are brought to this are then made to know that God is the Lord, and may help to bring others to the knowledge of him. See how God brings good out of evil. The dispersion of sinners that had done God much dishonour and disservice in their own country proves the dispersion of penitents that shall do him much honour and service in other countries. The Levites are by a curse divided in Jacob and scattered in Israel, yet it is turned into a blessing, for thereby they have the fairest opportunity to teach Jacob God's laws.

17 Moreover the word of the LORD came to me, saying,
18 Son of man, eat thy bread with quaking,
And drink thy water with trembling and with carefulness;
19 And say unto the people of the land,
Thus saith the Lord GOD
Of the inhabitants of Jerusalem, and of the land of Israel;
They shall eat their bread with carefulness,
And drink their water with astonishment,
That her land may be desolate from all that is therein,
Because of the violence of all them that dwell therein.
20 And the cities that are inhabited shall be laid waste,
And the land shall be desolate;
And ye shall know that I am the LORD.

Here again the prophet is made a sign to them of the desolations that were coming on Judah and Jerusalem.

First. He must himself eat and drink in care and fear, especially when he was in company, ver. 17, 18. Though he was under no apprehension of danger to himself, but lived in safety and plenty, yet he must "eat his bread with quaking" the bread of sorrows, Ps. cxxvii. 2, "and drink his water with trembling, and with carefulness," that he might express the calamitous condition of those that should be in Jerusalem during the siege. Not that he must dissemble, and pretend to be in fear and care when really he was not; but, being to foretell this judgment, to shew that he firmly believed it himself, and yet was far from desiring it, in the prospect of it he was himself affected with grief and fear. Note, When ministers speak of the ruin coming upon impenitent sinners, they must endeavour to speak feelingly, as those that know the terrors of the Lord. And they must be content to endure hardness, so they may but do good.

Secondly. He must tell them that the inhabitants of Jerusalem should in like manner eat and drink with care and fear, ver. 19, 20. Both those that have their home in Jerusalem and those of the land of Israel that come to shelter themselves there, "They shall eat their bread with carefulness, and drink their water with astonishment;" either because they are afraid it will not hold out, but they shall want shortly, or because they are continually expecting the alarms of the enemy, "their life hanging in doubt before them," Deu. xxviii. 66 so that what they have they shall have no enjoyment of, nor will it do them any good. Note, Care and fear, if they prevail, are enough to embitter all our comforts, and are themselves very sore judgments. They shall be reduced to these straits that thus, by degrees, and by the hand of those that do thus straiten them, both city and country may be laid in ruins; for it is no less than an utter destruction of both that is aimed at in these judgments; "that her land may be desolate from all the fulness thereof," may be stript of all its ornaments, and robbed of all its fruits; and then of course "the cities that are inhabited shall be laid waste," for they are served by the field. This universal desolation was coming upon them, and then no wonder that they ate their bread with care and fear. Now we are here told, 1. How bad the cause of this judgment was. It is "because of the violence of all them that dwell therein;" their injustice and oppression, and the mischief they did one another, for which God would reckon with them, as well as for the affronts put upon him in his worship. Note, The decay of virtue in a nation brings on a decay of every thing else; and when neighbours devour one another it is just with God to bring enemies upon them to devour them all. 2. How good the effect of this judgment should be; "Ye shall know that I am the Lord." And, if by these judgments they learn to know him aright, that will make up the loss of all they are deprived of by these desolations. Those are happy afflictions, how grievous soever to flesh and blood, that help to introduce us into, and improve us in, an acquaintance with God.

21 And the word of the LORD came unto me, saying, 22 Son of man, what is that proverb that ye have in the land of Israel, saying, The days are prolonged, and every vision faileth? 23 Tell them therefore,
Thus saith the Lord GOD;
I will make this proverb to cease,
And they shall no more use it as a proverb in Israel;
But say unto them, The days are at hand,
And the effect of every vision.
24 For there shall be no more any vain vision
Nor flattering divination within the house of Israel.
25 For I am the LORD: I will speak,
And the word that I shall speak shall come to pass;
It shall be no more prolonged:
For in your days, O rebellious house, will I say the word,
And will perform it, saith the Lord GOD.
26 Again the word of the LORD came to me, saying,
27 Son of man, behold, they of the house of Israel say,
The vision that he seeth is for many days to come,
And he prophesieth of the times that are far off.
28 Therefore say unto them,
Thus saith the Lord GOD;
There shall none of my words be prolonged any more,
But the word which I have spoken shall be done,
Saith the Lord GOD.

Various methods have been used to awaken this secure and careless people to an expectation of the judgments coming, that they might be stirred up by repentance and reformation to prevent them. The prophecies of their ruin were confirmed by visions, and illustrated by signs, and all with such evidence and power that one would think they must needs be wrought upon. But here we are told how they evaded the conviction, and guarded against it, namely, by telling themselves and one another that, though these judgments threatened should come at last, yet they would not come of a long time. This suggestion with which they bolstered themselves up in their security is here answered, and shewed to be vain and groundless, in two several messages which God sent to them by the prophet at several times, both to the same purpose; such care, such pains, must the prophet take to undeceive them, ver. 21, 26. Observe,

First. How they flattered themselves with hopes that the judgments should be delayed. One saying they had, which was become proverbial in the land of Israel; ver. 22, they said, "The days are prolonged," the judgments are not come when they were expected to come, but seem to be still put off de die in diem,—'from day to day,' and therefore we may conclude that every vision fails, because it should seem that some do; that because the destruction is not come yet, it will never come; we will never trust prophet again, for we have been worse frighted than hurt. And another saying they had, which, if it would not conquer their convictions, yet would cool their affections and abate their concern, and that was, that "the vision was for a great while to come;" it refers to events at a mighty distance, and he prophesies of things which, though they may be true, yet are very far off, so that we need not trouble our heads about them, ver. 27; we may die in honour and peace before these troubles come. And if, indeed, the troubles had been thus adjourned, they might have made themselves easy, as Hezekiah did, "Is it not well if peace and truth shall be in my days?" But it was a great mistake, and they did but deceive themselves into their own ruin. And God is here much displeased at it: for, 1. It was a afflicting him in a besieged city, would act in the manner described. As the entire transaction was symbolical, we are not required to put upon it a construction so literal as to suppose that the prophet did in fact what is here represented. Inasmuch as he was not at Jerusalem, and these things related to that city, it is probable that the proceeding may be best described as a dramatic representation. There is a word rendered "twilight" in verses 6 and 7, which rather means dark or darkness, as it is explained in Gen. xv. 17.

xii. 10—13. It must not be forgotten that the Jews were carried captive on successive occasions, and that the prophecies under consideration were delivered before the last catastrophe in the time of King Zedekiah. The previous portion of this chapter points to Zedekiah's vain efforts to escape from the Babylonians by secret flight from Jerusalem; and these verses refer to the same series of events. Zedekiah was the prince who should flee, and who should be taken to the land of the Chaldeans, which he would not see, because wretched abuse of the patience of God, who, because for a time he kept silence, was thought to be altogether such a one as themselves, Ps. l. 21. That forbearance of God which should have led them to repentance hardened them in sin. They were willing to think their works were not evil, because sentence against them was not executed speedily, and therefore concluded the vision itself failed because the days were prolonged. 2. It received countenance from the false prophets that were among them, as should seem from the notice God takes (ver. 24) of the vain visions and flattering divinations, even within the house of Israel, to whom were committed the oracles of God. They that deceived themselves by worshipping pretended deities, no marvel if they deceived themselves by crediting pretended prophecies, to which strong delusions God justly gave them up for their idolatries. 3. These sayings were become proverbial, they were industriously spread among the people, so that they were got into every one's mouth; and not only so, but were generally assented to, as proverbs used to be, not only the proverbs of the ancients, but those of the moderns too. Note, It is a token of universal degeneracy in a nation when corrupt and wicked sayings are grown proverbial; and it is an artifice of Satan by them to confirm men in their prejudices against the word and ways of God, and a great offence to the God of heaven. It will not serve for an excuse in saying ill, to plead that it is a common saying.

Secondly. How they are assured that they do but deceive themselves, for the judgments shall be hastened. These profane proverbs shall be confronted; "Tell them, therefore, the days are at hand," ver. 23; and again, ver. 28, "There shall none of my words be prolonged any more." Their putting the evil day far from them doth but provoke God to bring it the sooner upon them; and it will be so much the sorer, so much the heavier, so much the more a surprise and terror to them when it doth come. He must tell them,

1. That God will certainly silence the lying proverbs, and the lying prophecies with which they buoyed up their vain hopes, and make them ashamed of both. 1st. "I will make this proverb to cease;" for when they find the days of vengeance are come, and not one iota or tittle of the prediction falls to the ground, they will be ashamed to use it as a proverb in Israel, "The days are prolonged," and the vision fails. Note, Those that will not have their eyes opened and their mistakes rectified by the word of God shall be undeceived by his judgments; for every mouth that speaks perverse things shall be stopped. 2. "There shall be no more any vain vision," ver. 24. The false prophets, who told the people they should have peace, and should soon see an end of their troubles, shall be disproved by the event, and then shall be ashamed of their pretensions, and shall hide their heads, and impose silence upon themselves. Note, As truth was elder than error, so it will survive it; it got the start, and it will get the race. The true prophets' visions and predictions stand, and be in full force, power, and virtue; they give law and receive credit, when the vain visions and the flattering divinations are lost and forgotten, and shall be no more in the house of Israel; for great is the truth, and will prevail.

2. That God will certainly and very shortly accomplish every word that he has spoken. With what majesty doth he say it, ver. 25, "I am the Lord, I am Jehovah!" That glorious name of his speaks him a God giving being to his word by the performance of it; and, therefore, to the patriarchs, who lived by faith in a promise not yet performed, he was not known by his name Jehovah, Ex. vi. 3. But as he is Jehovah in making good his promise, so he is in making good his threatenings. Let them know then that God, with whom they have to do, is the great Jehovah; and therefore,

1st. He will speak, whether they will hear or whether they will forbear; "I am the Lord, I will speak." God will have his saying whoever gainsays it. God's oracles are called lively ones, for they still speak when the pagan oracles are long ago struck dumb. There has been and shall be a succession of God's ministers to the end of the world, by whom he will speak; and, though contempt may be put upon them, that shall not put a period to their ministration. "In your days, O rebellious house, will I say the word." Even in the worst ages of the church God left not himself without witness, but raised up men that spoke for him, that spoke from him. I will say the word, the word that shall stand.

2nd. The word that he speaks shall come to pass; it shall infallibly be accomplished, according to the true intent and meaning of it, and according to the full extent and compass of it. "I will say the word, and will perform it," ver. 25; for his mind is never changed, nor his arm shortened, nor his infinite wisdom ever nonplussed. With men, saying and doing are two things, but they are not so with God; with him it is dictum, factum,—'said, and done.' In the works of providence, as in that of creation, he speaks and it is done, for he said, Let there be light, and there was light; let there be a firmament, and there was a firmament, Num. xiii. 19; 1 Sam. xv. 29. Whereas they had said, "Every vision fails," ver. 22, God saith, No, there shall be the effect of every vision, ver. 23. It shall not return void, but every sign shall be answered by the thing signified. They that see the visions of the Almighty do not see vain visions. God confirmeth the word of his servants by performing it.

3rd. It shall be accomplished very shortly. "The days are at hand" when you shall see "the effect of every vision," ver. 23. It is said, it is sworn, that delay shall be no longer, Rev. x. 6. The year of God's patience is now just expired, and he will no longer defer the execution of the sentence. "It shall be no more prolonged," ver. 25. He hath borne with you a great while, but he will not bear always. "In your days, O rebellious house," shall the word that is said be performed, and you shall see the threatened judgments and share them. "Behold, the Judge standeth at the door." The righteous are taken away from the evil to come, but this rebellious house shall not be so quietly taken away; no, they shall live to be hurried away, to be chased out of the world. This is repeated again, ver. 28, "There shall none of my words be prolonged any more," but judgment shall now hasten on apace; and the longer the bow has been in the drawing the deeper shall the arrow pierce. When we tell sinners of death and judgment, heaven and hell, and think by them to persuade them to a holy life, though we do not find them downright infidels, they will own that they do believe there is a state of rewards and punishments in the other world, yet they put by the force of those great truths, and avoid the impressions of them, by looking upon the things of the other world as very remote. They tell us, "The vision we see is for many days to come, and we prophesy of the times that are very far off;" it will be time enough to think of them when they come nearer; whereas really there is but a step between us and death, between us and an awful eternity,—yet a little while and the vision shall speak, and not lie. And therefore it concerns us to redeem time, and get ready with all speed for a future state; for though it is future it is very near, and while impenitent sinners slumber their damnation slumbers not.

CHAPTER XIII.

Mention had been made in the chapter before of the vain visions and flattering divinations with which the people of Israel suffered themselves to be imposed upon, ver. 24. Now this whole chapter is levelled against them. God's faithful prophets are nowhere so sharp upon any sort of sinners as upon the false prophets; not because they were the most spiteful enemies to them, but because they put the highest affront upon God, and did the greatest mischief to his people. The prophet here shews the sin and punishment, I. Of the false prophets, ver. 1—16. II. Of the false prophetesses, ver. 17—23. Both agreed to soothe men up in their sins, and, under pretence of comforting God's people, to flatter them with hopes that they should yet have peace; but the prophets shall be proved liars, their prophecies mere shams, and the expectations of the people illusion; for God will let them know that "the deceived and deceiver are his," are both accountable to him, Job xii. 16.

AND the word of the LORD came unto me, saying, 2 Son of man, prophesy against the prophets of Israel that prophesy, and say thou unto them that prophesy out of their own hearts,

Hear ye the word of the LORD;

3 Thus saith the Lord GOD;

Woe unto the foolish prophets,

That follow their own spirit, and have seen nothing!

4 O Israel, thy prophets are like the foxes in the deserts.

5 Ye have not gone up into the gaps,

Neither made up the hedge for the house of Israel

To stand in the battle in the day of the LORD.

6 They have seen vanity and lying divination, saying,

The LORD saith: and the LORD hath not sent them:

And they have made others to hope

That they would confirm the word.

7 Have ye not seen a vain vision,

And have ye not spoken a lying divination,

Whereas ye say, The LORD saith it;

Albeit I have not spoken?

8 Therefore thus saith the Lord GOD;

Because ye have spoken vanity, and seen lies,

Therefore, behold, I am against you,

Saith the Lord GOD.

9 And mine hand shall be upon the prophets

That see vanity, and that divine lies:

They shall not be in the assembly of my people,

Neither shall they be written in the writing of the house of Israel,

Neither shall they enter into the land of Israel;

And ye shall know that I am the Lord GOD.

The false prophets, which are here prophesied against, were some of them at Jerusalem; Jer. xxiii. 14, "I have seen in the prophets at Jerusalem a horrible thing;" some of them among the captives in Babylon, for to them Jeremiah writes, Jer. xxix. 8, "Let not your diviners that be in the midst of you deceive you." And as God's prophets, though at a distance from each other in place or time, yet preached the same truths, which was an evidence that they were guided by one and the same good Spirit; so the false prophets prophesied the same lies, being actuated by one and the same spirit of error. There was little hopes of bringing them to repentance, they were so hardened in their sin, yet Ezekiel must prophesy against them, in hopes the people might be cautioned not to hearken to them; and thus a testimony will be left upon record against them, and they thereby left inexcusable. Ezekiel had express orders to "prophesy against the prophets of Israel," so they called themselves, as if none but they had been worthy of the name of Israel's prophets, who were indeed Israel's deceivers. But it is observable that Israel was never imposed upon by pretenders to prophecy till after they had rejected and abused the true prophets, as afterwards they were never deluded by counterfeit Messiahs, till after they had refused the true Messiah, and rejected him. These false prophets must be required to hear the word of the Lord. They took upon them to speak what concerned others, as from God; let them now hear what concerned themselves as from him. And two things the prophet is directed to do.

First. To discover their sin to them, and to convince them of that if possible, or thereby to prevent their proceeding any farther, by making manifest their folly unto all men, 2 Tim. iii. 9. They are here called foolish prophets, ver. 3; men that did not at all understand the business they pretended to. To make fools of the people they made fools of themselves, and put the greatest cheat upon their own souls. Let us see what is here laid to their charge.

1. They pretend to have a commission from God, whereas he never sent them. They thrust themselves into the prophetical office without warrant from him who is the Lord God of the holy prophets, which was a foolish thing; for how could they expect God should own them in a work to which he never called them? They are prophets out of their own hearts, so the margin reads it, ver. 2, prophets of their own making; ver. 6. "They say, The Lord saith," they pretend to be his messengers, "but the Lord hath not sent them," has not given them any orders. They counterfeit the broad seal of heaven, than which they cannot do a greater indignity to mankind, for hereby they put a reproach upon Divine revelation, lessen its credit, and weaken its credibility. When these pretenders are found to be deceivers, atheists and infidels will thence infer they are all so. "The Lord has not sent them," for, though crafty enough in other things, like the foxes, and very wise for the world, yet they are foolish prophets, and have no experimental acquaintance with the things of God. Note, Foolish prophets are not of God's sending; for whom he sends he either finds fit or makes fit. Where he gives warrant, he gives wisdom.

2. They pretend to have instructions from God, whereas he never made himself and his mind known to them. "They follow their own spirit," ver. 3. They deliver that as a message from God which is the product either of their subtle invention, to serve a turn for themselves, or of their own crazed and heated imagination, to give vent to a fancy, for they have seen nothing; that is, they his eyes would be put out, and in which he would remain until his death. With the utter ruin of the king the complete abolition of the Jewish state is associated.

xii. 22. The proverb, or common saying of the people, amounted to this—that prophetic visions were not fulfilled, and that the threatened catastrophe did not come. Acting on the principle that so long as utter ruin did not overtake them they might disregard the prophets, they exhibited a strange want both of reason and of faith. An interesting passage parallel to this occurs in 2 Pet. iii. 3, 4.

xii. 24. This verse seems to point to the pretences and proceedings of false prophets, who were even then popular in Jerusalem.

xii. 27, 28. It is obvious that here we have an exposition and practical use of the proverb mentioned in verse 22.

xiii. 4. Dr. Benisch has here, "O Israel, thy prophets are like the foxes among the ruins." This translation agrees with the habits of have not really had any heavenly vision. They pretend that what they say, "the Lord saith it;" but God disowns it. "I have not spoken it," I never said, never meant any such thing. What they delivered was not what they had seen or heard, as that is which the ministers of Christ deliver, 1 Jno. i. 1; but either what they had dreamed or what they thought would please those they coveted to make an interest in. This is called their seeing "vanity and lying divination," ver. 6. They pretend to have seen that which they did not see, and produced that as a Divine truth which they knew to be false. To the same purpose, ver. 7, "Ye have seen a vain vision, and spoken a lying divination," which had no Divine original, and would have no effect, but would certainly be disproved by the event. And, ver. 8, the words are changed, "Ye have spoken vanity, and seen lies." What they saw and what they said was all alike, a mere sham. They saw nothing, they said nothing to the purpose, nothing that could be relied on, or deserved regard. Again, ver. 9, "They see vanity, and divine lies." They pretend to have had visions, as the true prophets had, whereas really they had none; but either it was the creature of their own fancy, they thought they had a vision, as men in a delirium do, (that was seeing vanity,) or it was a fiction of their own politics, and they knew they had none, and then they saw lies, and divined lies: see Jer. xxiii. 16, &c. Note, Since the devil is universally known to be the father of lies, those put the highest affront imaginable upon God who tell lies, and then father them upon him. But they that had put God's character upon Satan, in worshipping devils, arrived at length to that pitch of impiety as to put Satan's character upon God.

3. They took no care to prevent the judgments of God that were breaking in upon the kingdom. They were "like the foxes in the deserts," running to and fro, and seeming to be in a mighty hurry; but it was to get away and shift for their own safety, not to do any good. "The hireling flees and leaves the sheep." They are like foxes that are greedy of prey for themselves, crafty and cruel to feed themselves. But, ver. 5, "Ye have not gone up into the gaps, nor made up the hedge for the house of Israel." A breach is made in their fences at which judgments are ready to pour in upon them, and then, if ever, is a time to do them service; but ye have done nothing to help them. They should have made intercession for them to turn away the wrath of God; but they were not praying prophets, had no interest in heaven, nor intercourse with heaven, as prophets used to have, Gen. xx. 7, and so could do them no service that way. They should have made it their business, by preaching and advice, to bring people to repentance and reformation, and so have made up a hedge, and put a stop to the judgments of God; but this was none of their care,—they contrived how to please people, not how to profit them. They saw a deluge of profaneness and impiety breaking in upon the land, waging war with virtue and holiness, and threatening to crush them and bear them down; and then they should have come in "to the help of the Lord, to the help of the Lord against the mighty," by witnessing against the wickedness of the time and place they lived in; but they thought that would be as dangerous a piece of service as standing in a breach to make it good against the besiegers, and therefore they declined it, did nothing to stem the tide, stood not in the battle against vice and immorality, but basely deserted the cause of religion and reformation in the day of the Lord, when it was proclaimed, "Who is on the Lord's side? Who will rise up for me against the evil-doers?" Ps. xciv. 16. Those were unworthy the name of prophets that could think so favourably of sin, and had so little zeal for God and the public welfare.

4. They flattered people into a vain hope that the judgments God had threatened should never come, whereby they hardened those in sin whom they should have endeavoured to turn from sin; ver. 6, They have made others to hope that all should be well, and they should have peace though they went on still in their trespasses, and that the event would confirm the word. They were still ready to say, We will warrant you these troubles will be at an end presently, and we shall be in prosperity again, as if their warrants would confirm false prophecies in defiance of God himself.

Secondly. He is directed to denounce the judgments of God against them for these sins, from which their pretending to the character of prophets would not exempt them.

1. In general, here is a woe against them, ver. 3; and what that woe is we are told, ver. 8, "Behold I am against you, saith the Lord God." Note, Those are in a woful condition that have God against them. Woe, and a thousand woes, to them that have made him their enemy.

2. In particular, they are sentenced to be excluded from all the privileges of the commonwealth of Israel, for they are adjudged to have forfeited them all; ver. 9, God's hand shall be upon them, to seize them and bring them to his bar, to shut them out from his presence; and they will find it a fearful thing to fall into his hands. They pretend to be prophets, particular favourites of heaven, and authorised to preside in the congregation of his church on earth; but, by pretending to the honours they were not entitled to, they lost those that otherwise they might have enjoyed, Mat. v. 19. Their doom is, 1st. To be expelled out of the communion of saints, and not to be looked upon as belonging to it. "They shall not be in the secret of my people;" their folly shall be so clearly manifested that they shall never be consulted, nor their advice asked; they shall not be present at any debates about public affairs. Or, rather, they shall not be in the assembly of God's people for religious worship, for they shall be ashamed to shew their heads there, when they are proved by the events to be false prophets, and, like Cain, shall go out from the presence of the Lord. The people that are deceived by them shall abandon them, and resolve to have no more to do with them. They that usurped Moses' chair shall not be allowed so much as a doorkeeper's place. In the great day they shall not stand in the congregation of the righteous, Ps. i. 5, when God gathers his saints together to him, Ps. l. 5, 16, to be for ever with him. 2nd. To be expunged out of the book of the living. They shall die in their captivity, and shall die childless, shall leave no posterity to take their denomination from them, and so their names shall not be found among those who either themselves or their posterity returned out of Babylon; of whom a particular account was kept in a public register, which was called the writing of the house of Israel, such as we have Ezr. ii. They shall not be found among the living in Jerusalem, Isa. iv. 3. Or, they shall not be found written among those whom God has from eternity chosen to be vessels of his mercy to eternity. We read of those who prophesied in Christ's name, and yet he will tell them he never knew them, Mat. vii. 22, 23, because they were not among those that were given to him. The Chaldee paraphrase reads it, 'They shall not be written in the writing of eternal life, which is written for the righteous of the house of Israel:' see Ps. lxix. 28. 3rd. To be for ever excluded out of the land of Israel. God hath sworn in his wrath concerning them that they shall never enter with the returning captives into the land of Canaan, which a second time remains a rest for them. Note, Those who oppose the design of God's threatenings, and will not be awed and influenced by them, forfeit the benefit of his promises, and cannot expect to be comforted and encouraged by them.

10 Because, even because they have seduced my people, Saying, Peace; and there was no peace;
And one built up a wall,
And, lo, others daubed it with untempered morter:
11 Say unto them which daub it with untempered morter,
that it shall fall:

HOUSES BUILT WITH UNTEMPERED MORTAR.

There shall be an overflowing shower;
And ye, O great hailstones, shall fall;
And a stormy wind shall rend it.
12 Lo, when the wall is fallen, shall it not be said unto you,
Where is the daubing wherewith ye have daubed it?
13 Therefore thus saith the Lord GOD;
I will even rend it with a stormy wind in my fury;
And there shall be an overflowing shower in mine anger,
And great hailstones in my fury to consume it.
14 So will I break down the wall
That ye have daubed with untempered morter,
And bring it down to the ground,
So that the foundation thereof shall be discovered,
And it shall fall, and ye shall be consumed in the midst [thereof:
And ye shall know that I am the LORD.
15 Thus will I accomplish my wrath upon the wall,
And upon them that have daubed it with untempered morter,
And will say unto you, The wall is no more,
Neither they that daubed it;
16 To wit, the prophets of Israel which prophesy concerning Jerusalem,
And which see visions of peace for her,
And there is no peace, saith the Lord GOD.

We have here more plain dealing with the false prophets, and some farther articles of their doom. We have seen the people made ashamed of the false prophets, (though sometimes they had been fond of them,) and casting them away, as they shall do their false gods with indignation. Now here we find them as much ashamed of their false prophecies, which they had sometimes depended upon with much assurance. Observe,

First. How the people are deceived by the false prophets. Those flatterers seduce them, saying, "Peace, and there was no peace," ver. 10. They pretended to have seen "visions of peace," ver. 16; but that could not be, for "there was no peace, saith the Lord God." There was no prosperity designed for them, and therefore there could be no ground for their security: yet they told them God was at peace with them, and had mercy in reserve for them; and the war they were engaged in with the Chaldeans should soon end in an honourable peace, and their land should enjoy a happy repose and tranquillity. They told the idolaters, and other sinners, there was neither harm nor danger in the way they were in. Thus they seduced God's people, they put a cheat upon them, led them into mistakes, and drew them aside out of that way of repentance and reformation which the other prophets were endeavouring to bring them into. Note, Those are the most dangerous seducers who suggest to sinners that which tends to lessen their dread of sin, and their fear of God. Now this is compared to the building of a slight rotten wall, or, according to our Saviour's similitude, which is to the same purpose with this, (Mat. vii. 26,) the building of a house upon the sand, which seems to be a shelter and protection for a while, but will fall when a storm comes. One false prophet built the wall, set up the notion that God was not at all displeased with Jerusalem, but the city should be confirmed in its flourishing estate, and be victorious over the powers that now threatened it. This notion was very pleasing, and he that started it made himself very acceptable by it, and was caressed by every body; which invited others to say the same. They made the matter look yet more plausible and promising, they daubed the wall which the first had built, but it was with untempered mortar, sorry stuff that will not bind nor hold the bricks together; they had no ground for what they said, nor had it any consistency with itself.

the fox, as described by Canon Tristram: "The fox is common in Syria, and is to be found everywhere, especially about ruins." The Hebrew word rendered "deserts" or "ruins" is applicable to both. Some of the old expositors took it to mean ruins here, as we do.

xiii. 6. The latter clause, "they have made others to hope that they would confirm the word," is doubtfully and ambiguously expressed. Several other renderings have been proposed, as, "they have made others to hope to confirm the word," "hoped to establish their word," "they hoped that their words would be fulfilled," &c. The true sense probably is, "they make men hope for the establishing of the word;" the false prophets were so far successful that they excited hopes in their victims, who expected the fulfilment of their alleged predictions.

xiii. 10. The common explanation of the word rendered "untempered mortar" is, that it refers to a wall badly built and plastered over with worthless cement. By some the passage is thought but was like ropes of sand. They did not strengthen the wall, were in no care to make it firm, to see that they went upon sure grounds; they only daubed it, to hide the cracks and make it look well to the eye. And the wall thus built, when it comes to any stress, much more to any distress, will bulge and totter, and come down by degrees. Note, Doctrines that are groundless, though never so grateful, that are not built upon a Scripture foundation, nor fastened with a Scripture cement, though never so plausible, never so pleasing, are not of any worth, nor will stand men in any stead. And those hopes of peace and happiness which are not warranted by the word of God will but cheat men, like a wall that is well daubed indeed, but ill built

Secondly. How they will be soon undeceived by the judgment of God, which we are sure is according to truth.

1. God will in anger bring a terrible storm, that shall beat fiercely and furiously upon the wall. The descent which the Chaldean army shall make upon Judah, and the siege they shall lay to Jerusalem, will be as "an overflowing shower," or inundation, such as Solomon calls "a sweeping rain that leaves no food," Pr. xxviii. 3; will bear down all before it as the deluge did in Noah's time; "Ye, O great hailstones, shall fall," the artillery of heaven, every hailstone like a cannon ball battering this wall; and with these a stormy wind, which is sometimes so strong as to rend the rocks, 1 Kin. xix. 11, much more an ill-built wall, ver. 11. But that which makes this rain, and hail, and wind most terrible is that they arise from the wrath of God, and are enforced by that; that is it that sends them, that is it that gives them the setting on; ver. 13, it is "a stormy wind in my fury and an overflowing shower in my anger, and great hailstones in my fury." The fury of Nebuchadnezzar and his princes, who highly resented Zedekiah's treachery, made the invasion very formidable, but that was nothing in comparison with God's displeasure. "The staff in their hand is mine indignation," Isa. x. 5. Note, An angry God has winds and storms at command wherewith to alarm secure sinners; and his wrath makes them frightful and forcible indeed; for who can stand before him when he is angry?

2. This storm shall overturn the wall; "It shall fall," and the wind shall rent it, ver. 11. "The hailstones shall consume it," ver. 13. "I will break it down," ver. 14, "and bring it to the ground, so that the foundation thereof shall be discovered;" it will appear how false, how rotten it was, to the prophetical reproach of the builders. When the Chaldean army has made Judah and Jerusalem desolate, then this credit of the prophets and the hopes of the people will both sink together; the former will be found false in flattering the people, and the latter foolish in suffering themselves to be imposed upon by them, and so exposed to so much the greater confusion, when the judgment should surprise them in their security. Note, Whatever men think to shelter themselves with against the judgments of God, while they continue unreformed, will prove but a refuge of lies, and will not profit them in the day of wrath: see Isa. xxviii. 17. Men's anger cannot shake that which God has built, for the blast of the terrible ones is but as a storm against the wall, which makes a great noise but never stirs the wall, (see Isa. xxv. 4;) but God's anger will overthrow that which men have built in opposition to him. They and all their attempts, they and all the securities wherein they entrench themselves, shall be "as a bowing wall, and as a tottering fence," Ps. lxii. 10. And when their vain predictions are disproved, and their vain expectations disappointed, then it will be discovered that there was no ground for either, Hab. iii. 13. The day will declare what every man's work is, and the fire will try it, 1 Cor. iii. 13.

3. The builders of the wall, and those that daubed it, will themselves be buried in the ruins of it. "It shall fall, and ye shall be consumed in the midst thereof," ver. 14. And thus the threatenings of God's wrath, and all the just intentions of it, shall be accomplished to the uttermost, both upon the wall and upon them that have daubed it, ver. 15. The same judgments that will prove the false prophets to be false will punish them for their falsehood; and they themselves shall be involved in the calamity which they made the people believe there was no danger of, and become monuments of that justice which they bid defiance to. Thus, if the blind lead the blind, both the blind leaders and the blind followers will fall together into the ditch. Note, Those that deceive others will in the end prove to have deceived themselves; and no doom will be more fearful than that of unfaithful ministers, that flattered sinners in their sins.

4. Both the deceivers and the deceived, when they thus perish together, will justly be ridiculed and triumphed over; ver. 12, "When the wall is fallen, shall it not be said unto you," by those that gave credit to the true prophets, and feared the word of the Lord, Now, "where is the daubing wherewith ye have daubed the wall?" What is gone with all the fine soft words and fair promises wherewith you flattered your wicked neighbours, and all the assurances you gave them, that the troubles of the nation should soon be at an end. "The righteous shall laugh at them;" the righteous God shall, righteous men shall, saying, "Lo, this is the man that made not God his strength," Ps. lii. 6, 7; "I also will laugh at your calamity," Pr. i. 26. They will say unto you, ver. 15, "The wall is no more, neither he that daubed it;" your hopes are vanished, and them that supported them, even the prophets of Israel, ver. 16. Note, Those that usurp the honours that do not belong to them will shortly be filled with the shame that doth.

17 Likewise, thou son of man,
Set thy face against the daughters of thy people,
Which prophesy out of their own heart;
And prophesy thou against them,
18 And say,
Thus saith the Lord GOD;
Woe to the women that sew pillows to all armholes,
And make kerchiefs upon the head of every stature to
Will ye hunt the souls of my people, [hunt souls!
And will ye save the souls alive that come unto you?
19 And will ye pollute me among my people
For handfuls of barley and for pieces of bread,
To slay the souls that should not die,
And to save the souls alive that should not live,
By your lying to my people that hear your lies?
20 Wherefore thus saith the Lord GOD;
Behold, I am against your pillows,
Wherewith ye there hunt the souls to make them fly,
And I will tear them from your arms,
And will let the souls go,
Even the souls that ye hunt to make them fly.
21 Your kerchiefs also will I tear,
And deliver my people out of your hand,
And they shall be no more in your hand to be hunted;
And ye shall know that I am the LORD. [sad,
22 Because with lies ye have made the heart of the righteous
Whom I have not made sad;
And strengthened the hands of the wicked,
That he should not return from his wicked way,
By promising him life: [tions:
23 Therefore ye shall see no more vanity, nor divine divina-
For I will deliver my people out of your hand:
And ye shall know that I am the LORD.

EMBROIDERING WITH THE NEEDLE.—ver. 18.

As God has promised that, when he pours out his Spirit upon his people both their sons and their daughters shall prophesy, so the devil, when he acts as a spirit of lies and falsehood, is so not only in the mouth of false prophets, but of false prophetesses too; and those are the deceivers whom the prophet is here directed to prophesy against: for they are not such despicable enemies to God's truths as deserve not to be taken notice of, nor yet will either the weakness of their sex excuse their sin nor the tenderness and respect that is owing to it exempt them from the reproaches and threatenings of the word of God. No; "Son of man, set thy face against the daughters of thy people," ver. 17. God takes no pleasure in owning them for his people: They are "thy people," as Ex. xxxii. 7; and the women pretend to a spirit of prophecy, and are in the same song with the men, as Ahab's prophets were: Go on and prosper. They prophesy out of their own heart too; they say what comes uppermost, and what they know nothing of; the more prophesy against them from God's own mouth. The prophet must set his face against them, and try if they can look him in the face, and stand to what they say. Note, When sinners grow very impudent, it is time for reprovers to be very bold. Now observe,

First. How the sin of these false prophetesses is described, and what are the particulars of it.

1. They told deliberate lies to those who consulted them, and came to them to be advised, and to be told their fortune. You do mischief "by your lying to my people that hear your lies," ver. 19. They come to be told the truth, but you tell them lies; and because you humour them in their sins they are willing to hear you. Note, It is ill with those people that can better hear pleasing lies than unpleasing truths; and it is a temptation to them who lie in wait to deceive, to tell lies, when they find people willing to hear them, and to excuse themselves with this, Si populus vult decipi, decipiatur,—'If the people will be deceived, let them be deceived.'

2. They profaned the name of God, by pretending to have received those lies from him; ver. 19, "Ye pollute my name among my people," and make use of that for the patronising of your lies, and the gaining of credit to them. Note, Those greatly pollute God's holy name that make use of it to give countenance to falsehood and wickedness. Yet this they did "for handfuls of barley and pieces of bread." They did it for gain; they cared not what dishonour they did to God's name by their lying, so they could but make a hand of it for themselves. There is nothing so sacred which men of mercenary spirits, in whom the love of this world reigns, will not profane and prostitute, if they can but get money by the bargain. But they did it for poor gain. If they could get no more for it, rather than break, they would sell you a false prophecy that should please you to a nicety, for the beggar's dole, a piece of bread, or a handful of barley, and yet that was more than it was worth. Had they asked it as an alms for God's sake, sure they might have had it, and God would have been honoured; but, taking it as a fee for a false prophecy, God's name is polluted, and the smallness of the reward greatens the offence; "for a piece of bread that man will transgress," Pr. xxviii. 21. Had their poverty been to mean that bad mortar is used in the construction of the wall; and others again explain it of a wall coated with whitewash or something similar. Thus Fürst says it is whitewash or plaster for spreading upon walls—a figure of hypocrisy. (Compare Matt. xxiii 27; Acts xxiii. 3.) The idea is continued on to verse 16 inclusive.

xiii. 18. The common explanation of the first part of this verse is that it refers to the luxurious habits of Orientals, who recline upon couches and cushions. There are two chief objections to this: the first, that Oriental women do not appear ever to have sewn their cushions to their arm-holes or under the arms; the second is, that the Hebrew text has, not "arm-holes," but "joints of the hands." The word for "pillows" also is uncertain, and may mean anything from the size of a small pin-cushion upwards. The context and other considerations favour the idea that the women fastened to their wrists or elbows what were called cushions, but which were really amulets, charms, or badges, the meaning of which was well known, their temptation to steal, "and so take the name of the Lord in vain," it had been nothing so bad as when it tempted them to prophesy lies in his name, and so to profane it.

3. They perfectly kept people in awe, and terrified them with their pretensions. "Ye hunt the souls of my people," ver. 18; "hunt them to make them flee," ver. 20; 'hunt them into gardens,' so the margin reads it. You use all the arts you have to court or compel them into those places where you deliver your pretended predictions. Or, you have got such an influence upon them that you make them do just as you would have them do, and tyrannise over them. It was indeed the people's fault that they did regard them, but it was their fault by lies and falsehoods to command that regard. They pretended to save the souls alive that came to them, ver. 18. If they would but be hearers of them, and contributors to them, they might be sure of salvation. Thus they beguiled unstable souls that had a concern about salvation as their end, but did not rightly understand the way, and therefore hearkened to those who were most confident in promising it them; but will you pretend to save souls, or secure salvation to your party? Those are justly suspected that make such pretensions.

4. They discouraged those that were honest and good, and encouraged those that were wicked and profane. You "slay the souls that should not die, and save those alive that should not live," ver. 19, which is explained, ver. 22, "You have made the heart of the righteous sad, whom I have not made sad." Because they would not, they durst not, countenance your pretensions, you thundered out the judgments of God against them, to their great grief and trouble; you put them under invidious characters, to make them either despicable or odious to the people; and pretended to do it in God's name, which made them go many a time with a sad heart; whereas it was the will of God that they should be comforted, and by having respect put upon them should have encouragement given them. But on the other side, which is still worse, you have "strengthened the hands of the wicked," and emboldened them to go on in their wicked ways, and not to return from them, which was the thing the true prophets with earnestness called them to. You have promised sinners life in their sinful ways, have told them they shall have peace though they go on, by which their hands have been strengthened and their hearts hardened. Some think this here refers to the severe censures they passed upon those that were already gone into captivity, who were humbled under their affliction, by which their hearts were made sad; and the commendations they gave to those that rebelled against the king of Babylon, who were hardened in their impieties, by which their hands were strengthened. Or, by their polluting of the name of God they saddened the hearts of good people, who have a value and veneration for the word of God, and confirmed atheists and infidels in their contempt of Divine revelation, and furnished them with arguments against it. Note, Those have a great deal to answer for that grieve the spirits and weaken the hands of good people, and that gratify the lusts of sinners, and animate them in their opposition to God and religion. Nor can any thing strengthen the hands of sinners more than to tell them that they may be saved in their sins without repentance; or that there may be repentance though they do not return from their wicked ways.

6. They mimicked the true prophets by giving signs for the illustrating of their false predictions, as Hananiah did, Jer. xxviii. 10. And they were signs agreeable to their sex. They sewed little pillows to people's armholes, to signify that they might be easy and repose themselves, and needed not be disquieted with the apprehensions of trouble approaching. And they "made kerchiefs upon the head of every stature;" that is, of persons of every age, young and old, distinguishable by their stature, ver. 18. These kerchiefs were badges of liberty or triumph, intimating that they should not only be delivered from the Chaldeans, but be victorious over them. Some think these were some superstitious rites which they used with those to whom they delivered their divinations; preparing them for the reception of them by putting enchanted pillows under their arms, and handkerchiefs on their heads, to raise their fancies and their expectations of something great. Or, perhaps the expressions are figurative: they did all they could to make people secure, which is signified by laying them easy; and to make people proud, which is signified by dressing them fine with handkerchiefs, perhaps laid, or embroidered on their heads.

Secondly. How the wrath of God against them is expressed. Here is a woe to them, ver. 8; and God declares himself against the methods they took to delude and deceive, ver. 20; but what course will God take with them?

1. They shall be confounded in their attempts, and shall proceed no farther; ver. 23, "Ye shall see no more vanity, nor divine divinations;" not that they shall themselves lay down their pretensions in a way of repentance, but when the event gives them the lie they shall be silent for shame. Or, their fancies and imaginations shall not be disposed to receive impressions which assist them in their divinations as they have been. Or, they themselves shall be cut off.

2. God's people shall be delivered out of their hands when they see themselves deluded by them into a false peace and a fool's paradise; and that, though they would not leave their sin, their sin has left them, and they "see no more vanity, nor divine divinations." They shall turn their back upon them, shall slight their predictions; the righteous shall no more be saddened by them, no, nor the wicked strengthened. The pillows shall be torn from their arms, and the kerchiefs from their heads; the fallacies shall be discovered, their frauds detected, and the people of God shall no more be in their hand, to be hunted as they have been. Note, It is a great mercy to be delivered from a servile regard to, and fear of, those that, under colour of a Divine authority, impose upon and tyrannize over the consciences of men, and say to their souls, "Bow down that we may go over." But it is a sore grief to those who delight in such usurpations to have their power broken and the prey delivered; such was the reformation to the church of Rome. And when God doth this he makes it to appear that he is the Lord, that it is his prerogative to give law to souls.

CHAPTER XIV.

Hearing the word and prayer are two great ordinances of God in which we are to give honour to him, and may hope to find favour and acceptance with him. And yet in this chapter, to our great surprise, we find some waiting upon God in the one and some in the other, and yet not meeting with success, as they expected. I. The elders of Israel come to hear the word and inquire of the prophet; but because they are not duly qualified they meet with a rebuke instead of acceptance, ver. 1—5, and are called upon to repent of their sins, and reform their lives, else it is at their peril to inquire of God, ver. 6—11. II. Noah, Daniel, and Job are supposed to pray for this people, and yet, because the decree is gone forth, and the destruction of them is determined by a variety of judgments, their prayers shall not be answered, ver. 12—21. And yet it is promised in the close, that a remnant shall escape, ver. 22, 23.

THEN came certain of the elders of Israel unto me, and sat before me. 2 And the word of the LORD came unto me, saying, 3 Son of man, these men have set up their idols in their heart, and put the stumblingblock of their iniquity before their face: should I be enquired of at all by them? 4 Therefore speak unto them, and say unto them, Thus saith the Lord GOD; Every man of the house of Israel that setteth up his idols in his heart, and putteth the stumblingblock of his iniquity before his face, and cometh to the prophet; I the LORD will answer him that cometh according to the multitude of his idols; 5 That I may take the house of Israel in their own heart, because they are all estranged from me through their idols. 6 Therefore say unto the house of Israel, Thus saith the Lord GOD; Repent, and turn yourselves from your idols; and turn away your faces from all your abominations. 7 For every one of the house of Israel, or of the stranger that sojourneth in Israel, which separateth himself from me, and setteth up his idols in his heart, and putteth the stumblingblock of his iniquity before his face, and cometh to a prophet to enquire of him concerning me; I the LORD will answer him by myself: 8 And I will set my face against that man, and will make him a sign and a proverb, and I will cut him off from the midst of my people; and ye shall know that I am the LORD. 9 And if the prophet be deceived when he hath spoken a thing, I the LORD have deceived that prophet, and I will stretch out my hand upon him, and will destroy him from the midst of my people Israel. 10 And they shall bear the punishment of their iniquity: the punishment of the prophet shall be even as the punishment of him that seeketh unto him; 11 That the house of Israel may go no more astray from me, neither be polluted any more with all their transgressions; but that they may be my people, and I may be their God, saith the Lord GOD.

Here is, First. The address which some of the elders of Israel made to the prophet, as an oracle, to inquire of the Lord by him. They came and sat before him, ver. 1. It is probable they were not of those that were now his fellow-captives, and constantly attended his ministry, such as those we read of, ch. viii. 1, but some occasional hearers; some of the grandees of Jerusalem that were come upon business to Babylon, perhaps public business, or an embassy from the king, and in their way called on the prophet, having heard much of him, and being desirous to know if he had any message from God, which might be some guide to them in their negotiation. By the severe answer given them, one would suspect they had an ill design to ensnare the prophet, or to try if they could catch hold of any thing that might look like a contradiction to Jeremiah's prophecies, and so they might have occasion to reproach them both. However, they feigned themselves just men, complimenting the prophet, and sat before him gravely enough, as God's people used to sit. Note, It is no new thing for bad men to be found employed in the external performances of religion.

Secondly. The account which God gave the prophet privately concerning them. They were strangers to him, he only knew that they were elders of Israel,—that was the character they wore, and as such he received them with respect, and it is likely was glad to see them so well disposed; but God gives him their real character, ver. 3. They were idolaters, and did only consult Ezekiel as they would any oracle of a pretended deity, to gratify their curiosity; and therefore he appeals to the prophet himself whether they deserve to have any countenance or encouragement given them. "Should I be inquired of at all by them?" Should I accept their inquiries as an honour to myself, or answer them for satisfaction to them? No, they have no reason to expect it. For, 1. They have "set up their idols in their heart." They not only have idols, but they are in love with them; they doat upon them, are wedded to them, and have laid them so near their hearts, and have given them so great a room in their affections, that there is no parting them. The idols they have set up in their houses, though they are now at a distance from the chambers of their imagery, yet they have them in their hearts, and they are ever and anon worshipping them in their fancies and imaginations. 'They have made their idols to ascend upon their hearts,' so the word is; that is, they have subjected their hearts to their idols, they are upon the throne there. Or, when they came to inquire of the prophet, they pretended to put away their idols, but it was in pretence only; they still had a secret reserve for them. They kept and the origin superstitious. This is an old interpretation, but well deserving of consideration. The kerchiefs or coverings mentioned in the same verse probably formed a part of the objectionable paraphernalia of the lying prophetesses, or whatever they were, against whom the prediction is spoken. The expression, "the head of every stature," is as much as to say "the heads of persons of all ages, from the very youngest and smallest." "To hunt souls" is to lie in wait for them, or to endeavour by subtle arts to deceive and ensnare them.

xiii. 20. The words, "ye hunt the souls to make them fly," have been very much discussed, especially by the older critics, and certainly the common version is very unsatisfactory. The last Hebrew word may either mean "to fly," &c., as the infinitive of a verb, or it may mean "for birds," as the plural of a noun. Without giving the many interpretations which have been suggested, we agree with many modern scholars who translate "for birds;" i.e., as if they were birds, or instead of birds: "I will release the souls ye ensnare like them up in their hearts; and, if they left them for awhile, it was cum animo revertendi,—'with an intention to return to them,' not a final farewell. Or, it may be understood of spiritual idolatry, those whose affections are placed upon the wealth of the world and the pleasures of sense, whose god is their money, whose god is their belly; "They set up their idols in their hearts." Many that have no idols in their sanctuary yet have idols in their hearts, which is no less an usurpation of God's throne, and a profanation of his name. Little children keep yourselves from those idols. 2. "They put the stumblingblock of their iniquity before their face." Their silver and gold was called "the stumblingblock of their iniquity," ch. vii. 19; their idols of silver and gold, by the beauty of which they were allured to idolatry, and so it was the block at which they stumbled and fell into that sin. Or, their iniquity is their stumbling-block which throws them down, so that they fall into ruin. Note, Sinners are their own tempters. Every man is tempted when he is drawn aside of his own lust; and so they are their own destroyers. "If thou scornest, thou alone shalt bear it." And thus they put the stumblingblock of their iniquity before their own faces, and stumble upon it, though they see it before their eyes. It intimates that they are resolved to go on in sin, whatever comes of it. "I have loved strangers, and after them I will go;" that is the language of their hearts. And should God be inquired of by such wretches? Do they not hereby rather put an affront upon him than do him any honour, as those did that bowed the knee to Christ in mockery? Can they expect an answer of peace from God who thus continue their acts of hostility against him? Ezekiel, what thinkest thou of it?

Thirdly. The answer which God in just displeasure orders Ezekiel to give them, ver. 4. Let them know, that it is not out of any disrespect to their persons that God refuseth to give them an answer; but it is laid down as a rule for every man of the house of Israel, whoever he be, that if he continue in love and league with his idols, and come to inquire of God, God will resent it as an indignity done to him, and will answer him according to his real iniquity, not according to his pretended piety. He comes to the prophet, who he expects will be civil to him; but God will give him his answer by punishing him for his impudence. "I the Lord," who speak and it is done, "I will answer him that cometh according to the multitude of his idols." Observe, Those that set up idols in their hearts, and set their hearts upon their idols, commonly have a multitude of them. Humble worshippers God uses to answer according to the multitude of his mercies; but bold intruders he answers according to the multitude of their idols; that is, 1. According to the desire of their idols. He will give them up to their own heart's lusts, and leave them to themselves to be as bad as they have a mind to be, till they have filled up the measure of their iniquity. Men's corruptions are idols in their hearts, and they are of their own setting up. Their temptations are the "stumblingblock of their iniquity," and they are of their own putting, and God will answer them accordingly; let them take their course. 2. According to the desert of their idols. They shall have such an answer as it is just such idolaters should have. God will punish them as he useth to punish idolaters; that is, when they stand in need of his help, he will send them to the gods whom they have chosen, Jud. x. 13, 14. Note, The judgment of God will deal with men according to what they are really, that is, according to what their hearts are, not according to what they are in shew and profession. And what will be the end of this? What will this threatened answer amount to? He tells them, ver. 5, "That I may take the house of Israel in their own heart," may lay them open to the world, that they may be ashamed; nay, lay them open to the curse, that they may be ruined. Note, The sin and shame, and pain and ruin of sinners, is all from themselves, and their own hearts are the snares in which they are taken; they seduce them, they betray them; their own consciences witness against them, condemn them, and are a terror to them. If God take them, if he discover them, if he convict them, if he bind them over to his judgment, it is all by their own hearts. "O Israel, thou hast destroyed thyself." The house of Israel is ruined by its own hands, "because they are all estranged from me through their idols." Note, 1st. The ruin of sinners is owing to their estrangement from God. 2nd. It is through some idol or other that the hearts of men are estranged from God; some creature has gained that place and dominion in the heart that God should have.

Fourthly. The extent of this answer God had given them. To all the house of Israel, ver. 7, 8. The same thing is repeated, which intimates God's just displeasure against hypocrites, who mock him with the shows and forms of devotion, while their hearts are estranged from him, and at war with him. Observe, 1. To whom this declaration belongs. It concerns not only "every one of the house of Israel," as before, ver. 4, but "the stranger that sojourns in Israel." Let him not think it will be an excuse for him in his idolatries that he is but a stranger and a sojourner in Israel, and doth but worship the gods that his father served, and that he himself was bred up in the service of; no, let him not expect any benefit by Israel's oracles or prophets unless he thoroughly renounce his idolatry. Note, Even proselytes shall not be countenanced if they be not sincere. A dissembled conversion is no conversion. 2. The description here given of hypocrites. They separate themselves from God. By their fellowship with idols they cut themselves off from their relation to God, and their interest in him; they break off their acquaintance and intercourse with him, and set themselves at a distance from him. Note, Those that join themselves to idols separate themselves from God. Nor shall any be for ever separated from the vision and fruition of God but such as now separate themselves from his service, and wilfully withdraw their allegiance from him. But there are those who thus separate themselves from God, and yet come to his prophets with a seeming respect and deference to their office, to inquire of them concerning God; either to satisfy a vain curiosity, or stop the mouth of a clamorous conscience, or to get or save a reputation among men, but without any desire to be acquainted with God, or any design to be ruled by him. 3. The doom of those that thus trifle with God and think to impose upon him. "I the Lord will answer him by myself." Let me alone to deal with him, I will give him an answer that shall fill him with confusion, that shall make him repent of his daring impiety. He shall have his answer, not by the words of the prophet, but by the judgments of God. "And I will set my face against that man;" which notes great displeasure against him, and a fixed resolution to ruin him. God can outface the most impenitent sinner. The hypocrite thought to save his credit, nay, and to gain applause; but, on the contrary, God will make him a sign and a proverb, that is, will inflict such judgments upon him as shall make him remarkable and contemptible in the eyes of all about him. His misery shall be made use of to express the greatest misery; as when the worst of sinners are said to have their portion appointed them with hypocrites, Mat. xxiv. 51. God will make him an example; his judgments upon him shall be for a warning to others to take heed of mocking God; for thus shall it be done to the man that separates himself from God, and yet pretends to inquire concerning him. The hypocrite thought to have passed for one of God's people, and to have crowded into heaven among them; but God will "cut him off from the midst of his people," will discover him, and pluck him out from the thickest of them. And by this, saith God, "ye shall know that I am the Lord." By the discovery of hypocrites it appears that God is omniscient. Ministers know not how people stand affected when they come to hear the word, but God doth. And by the punishment of hypocrites it appears he is a jealous God, and one that cannot, that will not, be imposed upon.

Fifthly. The doom of those pretenders to prophecy, who give countenance to those pretenders to piety, ver. 9, 10. These hypocritical inquirers—though Ezekiel will give them no comfortable answer—yet hope to meet with some other prophets that will; and if they do, as perhaps they may, let them know that God permits those lying prophets to deceive them in part of punishment. "If the prophet" that flatters them "be deceived," and gives them hopes which there is no ground for, "I the Lord have deceived that prophet," have suffered the temptation to be laid before him, and suffered him to yield to it, and overruled it for the hardening those in their wicked courses that were resolved to go on in them. We are sure that God is not the author of sin; but we are as sure that he is the Lord of all, and the Judge of sinners, and often makes use of one wicked man to destroy another, and so of one wicked man to deceive another. Both are sins in him who doth them, and so they are not from God. Both are punishments to him to whom they are done, and so they are from God. We have a full instance of this in the story of Ahab's prophets, who were deceived by a lying spirit which God put into their mouths, 1 Kin. xxii. 23; and another in those whom God gives "up to strong delusions to believe a lie, because they receive not the love of the truth," 2 Thes. ii. 11. But read the fearful doom of the lying prophet: "I will stretch out my hand upon him, and will destroy him." When God hath served his own righteous purposes by him he shall be reckoned with for his unrighteous purposes; as when God had made use of the Chaldeans for the wasting of a sinful people, he justly punished them for their rage, so when he had made use of false prophets, and afterwards of false Christs, for the deceiving of a sinful people, he justly punished them for their falsehood. But herein we must acknowledge—as Calvin upon this place minds us—that God's judgments are a great deep, that we are incompetent judges of them; and though we cannot account for the equity of God's proceedings in the satisfying and silencing of every caviller, yet there is a day coming when he will be justified before all the world; and particularly in this instance, when the punishment of the prophet that flattered the hypocrite in his evil way shall be as the punishment of the hypocrite that seeketh to him, and bespeaks smooth things only, Isa. xxx. 10. The ditch shall be the same to the blind leader and the blind followers.

Sixthly. The good counsel that is given them for the preventing of this fearful doom; ver. 6, "Therefore repent, and turn yourselves from your idols." Let this separate between you and them, that they separate between you and God. Because they set God's face against you, do you turn away your faces from them? which notes not only forsaking them, but forsaking them with loathing and detestation. Turn from them as from abominations that you are sick of! And then you will be welcome to inquire of the Lord: "Come now and let us reason together."

Seventhly. The good issue of all this, as to the house of Israel. Therefore the pretending prophets and the pretending saints shall perish together by the judgments of God, that, some being made examples, the body of the people may be reformed. "That the house of Israel may go no more astray from me," ver. 11. Note, The punishments of some are designed for the prevention of sin, that others may hear, and fear, and take warning. When we see what comes of those that go astray from God, we should thereby be engaged to keep close to him; and if the house of Israel go not astray, they will not be polluted any more. Note, Sin is a polluting thing; it renders the sinner odious in the eyes of the pure and holy God, and in his own eyes too whenever conscience is awakened. And therefore they shall "no more be polluted, that they may be my people, and I may be their God." Note, Those whom God takes into covenant with himself, must first be cleansed from the pollutions of sin; and those who are so cleansed shall not only be saved from ruin, but be entitled to all the privileges of God's people.

12 The word of the LORD came again to me, saying, 13 Son of man, when the land sinneth against me by trespassing grievously, then will I stretch out mine hand upon it, and will break the staff of the bread thereof, and will send famine upon it, and will cut off man and beast from it: 14 Though these three men, Noah, Daniel, and Job, were in it, they should deliver but their own souls by their righteousness, saith the Lord GOD. 15 If I cause noisome beasts to pass through the land, and they spoil it, so that it be desolate, that no man may pass through because of the beasts: 16 Though these three men were in it, as I live, saith the Lord GOD, they shall deliver neither sons nor daughters; they only shall be delivered, but the land shall be desolate. 17 Or if I bring a sword upon that land, and say, Sword, go through the land; so that I cut off man and beast from it: 18 Though these three men were in it, as I live, saith the Lord GOD, they shall deliver neither sons nor daughters, but they only shall be delivered themselves. 19 Or if I send a pestilence into that land, and pour out my fury upon it in blood, to cut off from it man and beast: 20 Though Noah, Daniel, and Job, were in it, as I live, saith the Lord GOD, they shall deliver neither son nor daughter; they shall but deliver their own souls by their birds." These women succeeded in decoying and alluring the souls of the people to error and evil. The means employed by these sirens seem to have been as effectual as they were contemptible: so easily are men seduced to folly.

xiv. 4. For one to put "the stumbling-block of his iniquity before his face" is to bear in mind and to love in heart the iniquity which causes him to stumble in the right way. The whole means to condemn the idolatrous hypocrites who consult God's prophets. The latter words, rendered "I the Lord will answer him that cometh," &c., are difficult. We may perhaps translate them, "I the Lord will answer him accordingly, according to the number of his idols;" i.e., "My answer will depend on this, on the number of his idols."

xiv. 5—11. The general idea of all this is, that the idolatrous apostates who consulted false prophets should be rewarded according to their wickedness, and would not escape from their delusions. If they went to a false prophet they would receive a false answer, righteousness. 21 For thus saith the Lord GOD; How much more when I send my four sore judgments upon Jerusalem, the sword, and the famine, and the noisome beast, and the pestilence, to cut off from it man and beast? 22 Yet, behold, therein shall be left a remnant that shall be brought forth, both sons and daughters: behold, they shall come forth unto you, and ye shall see their way and their doings: and ye shall be comforted concerning the evil that I have brought upon Jerusalem, even concerning all that I have brought upon it. 23 And they shall comfort you, when ye see their ways and their doings: and ye shall know that I have not done without cause all that I have done in it, saith the Lord GOD.

The scope of these verses is to shew,

First. That national sins bring national judgments. When virtue is ruined and laid waste, every thing else will soon be ruined and laid waste too; ver. 13, "When the land sinneth against me," when vice and wickedness become epidemical,—when the land sinneth by trespassing grievously, when the sinners are become very numerous, and their sins very heinous, when gross impieties and immoralities universally prevail,—then will I stretch forth mine hand upon it, for the punishment of it. The Divine power shall be vigorously and openly exerted; the judgments shall be extended and stretched forth to all the corners of the land, to all the concerns and interests of the nation: grievous sins bring grievous plagues.

Secondly. That God has variety of sore judgments wherewith to punish sinful nations, and he has them all at command, and inflicts which he pleaseth. He did indeed refer it to David what judgment he would be punished with for his sin in numbering the people; for any of them would serve to answer the end, which was to lessen the numbers he was proud of. But David in effect referred it to God again: "Let us fall into the hands of the Lord;" let him choose with what rod we shall be beaten. But he useth a variety of judgments, that it may appear he hath a universal dominion, and that in all our concerns we may see our dependence on him. Four sore judgments are here instanced in: 1. Famine. The denying and withholding of common mercies is itself judgment enough; there needs no more to make a people miserable. God needs not bring the staff of oppression; it is but breaking the staff of bread, and the work is soon done. He cuts off man and beast by cutting off the provisions which nature makes for both in the annual products of the earth. God breaks the staff of bread when, though we have bread, yet we are not nourished and strengthened by it; Hag. i. 6, "Ye eat, but ye have not enough." 2. Hurtful beasts, noisome and noxious, either as poisonous or as ravenous. God can make these to pass through the land, to increase in all parts of it, and to bereave it, not only of the tame cattle, preying upon their flocks and herds, but of their people, devouring men, women, and children, so that "no man may pass through because of the beasts;" none dare travel, even in the high-roads, for fear of being pulled in pieces by lions, or other beasts of prey, as the children of Bethel by two bears. Note, When men revolt from their allegiance to God, and rebel against him, it is just with God that the inferior creatures should rise up in arms against man, Lev. xxvi. 22. 3. War. God often chastiseth sinful nations by bringing a sword upon them, the sword of a foreign enemy, and he gives it its commission, and orders what execution it shall do; ver. 17, "He saith, Sword, go through the land." It is bad enough if the sword do but enter into the borders of a land, but much worse when it goes through the bowels of a land; then by it God cuts off man and beast, horse and foot. What execution the sword doth God doth by it; for it is his sword, and it acts as he directs. 4. Pestilence. A dreadful disease which hath sometimes depopulated cities; by it God "pours out his fury in blood," that is, in death. The pestilence kills as effectually as if the blood were shed by the sword; for it is poisoned by the disease,—the sickness we call it. See how miserable the case of mankind is, that lies thus exposed to deaths in various shapes; see how dangerous the case of sinners is, against whom God hath so many ways of fighting, so that, though they escape one judgment, God has another waiting for them.

Thirdly. That when God's professing people revolt from him, and rebel against him, they may justly expect a complication of judgments to fall upon them. God has various ways of contending with a sinful nation; but if Jerusalem, the holy city, become a harlot, God will send upon her all his four sore judgments, ver. 21; for the nearer any are to God in name and profession the more severely will he reckon with them if they reproach that worthy name by which they are called, and give the lie to that profession they shall be punished seven times more.

Fourthly. That it is possible there may be, and commonly there are, some few very good men, even in those places that by sin are ripened for ruin. It is no foreign supposition, that even in a land that has trespassed grievously there may be three such men as Noah, Daniel, and Job. Daniel was now living, and at this time scarce arrived to the prime of his eminency, but he was already famous, at least this word of God concerning him would, without fail, make him so; but he was carried away into captivity with the first of all, Dan. i. 1. Some of the better sort of people in Jerusalem might perhaps think, if Daniel, of whose fame, in the king of Babylon's court, they had heard much, had but continued in Jerusalem, it had been spared for his sake, as the magicians in Babylon were. No, saith God, though you had him who was so eminently good in bad times and places, as Noah in the old world, and Job in the land of Uz, yet a reprieve should not be obtained. In the places that are most corrupt, and in the ages that are most degenerate, yet there is a remnant which God reserves for himself, and which still hold fast their integrity, and stand fair for the honour of delivering the land, as the innocent are said to do, Job xxii. 30.

Fifthly. That God oftentimes spares very wicked places for the sake of a few godly people in them. This is implied here as the expectation of Jerusalem's friends in the day of its distress. Surely God will stay his controversy with us; for are there not some among us that are emptying the measure of national guilt by their prayers, as others are filling it by their sins? And, rather than God will destroy the righteous with the wicked, he will preserve the wicked with the righteous. If Sodom might have been spared for the sake of ten good men, sure Jerusalem may Sixthly. That such men as Noah, Daniel, and Job will prevail, if any can, to turn away the wrath of God from a sinful people. Noah was a perfect man, and kept his integrity, when all flesh had corrupted their way; and for his sake his family, though one of them was wicked Ham, was saved in the ark. Job was a great example of piety, and mighty in prayer for his children, for his friends; and God turned his captivity when he prayed. Those were very ancient examples, before Moses that great intercessor; and therefore God mentions them, to intimate that he had some very peculiar favourites long before the Jewish nation was formed and founded, and would have such when it was ruined; for which reason, it should seem, those names were made use of rather than Moses, Aaron, or Samuel. And yet, lest any should think that God was partial in his respects to the ancient days, here is a modern instance, a living one, placed between those two that were the glories of antiquity, and he now a captive, and that is Daniel, to teach us not to lessen the useful good men of our own day, by over magnifying the ancients. Let the children of the captivity know that Daniel their neighbour and companion in tribulation, being a man of great humility, piety, and zeal for God, and instant and constant in prayer, had as good an interest in heaven as Noah or Job had. Why may not God raise up as great and good men now as he did formerly, and do as much for them?

Seventhly. That when the sin of a people is come to its height, and the decree is gone forth for their ruin, the piety and prayers of the best men shall not prevail to make up the controversy. This is here asserted again and again, that though these three men were in Jerusalem at this time, yet "they should deliver neither son nor daughter;" not so much as the little ones should be spared for their sakes, as the little ones of Israel were upon the prayer of Moses, Num. xiv. 31. No, "the land shall be desolate," and God will not hear their prayers for it, "though Moses and Samuel stood before him," Jer. xv. 1. Note, Abused patience will turn at last into inexorable wrath. And it should seem as if God would be more inexorable in Jerusalem's case than in another, ver. 6, because, besides the Divine patience, they had enjoyed greater privileges than any people beside, which were the aggravations of their sin.

Eighthly. That though pious praying men may not prevail to deliver others, yet they shall deliver their own souls by their righteousness; so that, though they may suffer in the common calamity, yet to them the property of it is altered. It is not that to them that it is to the wicked; it is unstung, and doth them no hurt; it is sanctified, and doth them good. Sometimes their souls, that is, their lives, are remarkably delivered, and given them for a prey. However their souls, that is, their spiritual interests, are secured; if their bodies be not delivered, yet their souls are. "Riches" indeed "profit not in the day of wrath, but righteousness delivers from death," from so great a death, so many deaths, as are here threatened. This should encourage us to keep our integrity in times of common apostacy; that if we do so, we shall be "hid in the day of the Lord's anger."

Ninthly. That, even then when God makes the greatest desolations by his judgments, he reserves some to be the monuments of his mercy, ver. 22, 23. In Jerusalem itself, though marked for utter ruin, yet "there shall be left a remnant," that shall not be cut off by any of those sore judgments before mentioned, but shall be carried into captivity, both sons and daughters, that shall be the seed of a new generation; the young ones that were not grown up to such an obstinacy in sin as their fathers were, who were therefore cut off as incurable. These shall be brought forth out of the ruins of Jerusalem by the victorious enemy. And, behold, "They shall come forth to you that are in captivity;" they shall make a virtue of necessity, and shall come the more willingly into Babylon, because so many of their friends are gone thither before them, and are there ready to receive them. And when they come, "ye shall see their ways and their doings;" that is, you shall hear them make a free and ingenuous confession of the sins they had formerly been guilty of, and an humble profession of repentance for them, with promises of reformation; and you shall see instances of their reformation, shall see what good their affliction hath done them, and how prudently and patiently they carry themselves under it. The good effect their narrow escape shall have upon them; it shall change their temper and conversation, and make them new men. And this will redound, 1. To the satisfaction of their brethren; "They shall comfort you when ye see their ways." Note, It is a very comfortable sight to see people when they are under the rod, repenting and humbling themselves, justifying God, and accepting the punishment of their iniquity. When we sorrow, as we ought to do, for the afflictions of others, it is a great comfort to us in our sorrow to see them improving their afflictions, and making a good use of them. When those captives told their friends how bad they had been, and how righteous God was in bringing these judgments upon them, it made them very easy, and helped to reconcile them to the calamities of Jerusalem, to the justice of God, in punishing his own people so, and to the goodness of God, which now appeared to have had kind intentions in all. And thus "ye shall be comforted concerning all the evil that I have brought upon Jerusalem;" and, when you better understand the thing, shall not have such direful apprehensions concerning it as you have had. Note, It is a debt we owe to our brethren, if we have got good by our affliction, to comfort them by letting them know it. 2. It will redound to the honour of God. "Ye shall know that I have not done it without cause," not without a just provocation, and yet not without a gracious design, "all that I have done in it." Note, When afflictions have done their work, and have accomplished that for which they were sent, then will appear the wisdom and goodness of God in sending them; and God will not only be justified, but glorified in them.

CHAPTER XV.

Ezekiel has again and again, in God's name, foretold the utter ruin of Jerusalem; but it should seem he finds it hard to reconcile himself to it, and to acquiesce in the will of God in this severe dispensation; and therefore God takes various methods to satisfy him not only that it shall be so, but that there is no remedy: it must be so, it is fit it should be so. Here, in this short chapter, he shews him (probably with design that he should tell the people) that it was as requisite Jerusalem should be destroyed as that the dead and withered branches of a vine should be cut off and thrown into the fire. I. The similitude is very elegant, ver. 1—5. But, II. The reddition of the similitude is very dreadful, ver. 6—8.

AND the word of the LORD came unto me, saying,
2 Son of man, What is the vine tree more than any tree,
Or than a branch which is among the trees of the forest?
3 Shall wood be taken thereof to do any work?
Or will men take a pin of it to hang any vessel thereon?
4 Behold, it is cast into the fire for fuel:

because God would prevent such lying seers from being able to give a true one. That false prophets are meant only the most perverse can doubt, because the Lord did not deceive true prophets and menace them with destruction. The case of Jeremiah has already been considered, and it has been shown that the word rendered "deceived" is not used in the sense we are apt to assign to it. A true prophet may be wrong in his hopes and expectations, because they do not accord with providential arrangements; and a false prophet may be wrong, not only in the same way, but also in his predictions. Both are in some sense "deceived," but there is an immense difference. There is guilt in the latter case, and none in the former. The menace of destruction in the verses before us necessarily imply guilt, and therefore that the prophet is not divinely inspired. Objectors to the Bible lay much stress on verse 9, but unjustly so, because it relates to the prophetic utterances of deceivers, which are belied by events. God deceives a false prophet, not by

The fire devoureth both the ends of it,
And the midst of it is burned.
Is it meet for any work?
5 Behold, when it was whole, it was meet for no work:
How much less shall it be meet yet for any work,
When the fire hath devoured it, and it is burned?
6 Therefore thus saith the Lord GOD;
As the vine tree among the trees of the forest,
Which I have given to the fire for fuel,
So will I give the inhabitants of Jerusalem.
7 And I will set my face against them;
They shall go out from one fire,
And another fire shall devour them;
And ye shall know that I am the LORD,
When I set my face against them.
8 And I will make the land desolate, [GOD.
Because they have committed a trespass, saith the Lord

The prophet, we may suppose, was thinking what a glorious city Jerusalem was above any city in the world. It was the crown and joy of the whole earth and therefore what pity it was that it should be destroyed. It was a noble structure, the city of God, and the city of Israel's solemnities. But if these were the thoughts of his heart, God here returns answer to them, by comparing Jerusalem to a vine.

First. It is true, if a vine be fruitful, it is a most valuable tree, none more so. It was one of those that were courted to have dominion over the trees, and the fruit of it is such as cheers God and man, Jud. ix. 12, 13; it "makes glad the heart," Ps. civ. 15. So "Jerusalem was planted a choice and noble vine, wholly a right seed," Jer. ii. 21; and, if it had brought forth fruit suitable to its character as a holy city, it would have been the glory both of God and Israel. It was a vine which God's right hand had planted, a branch out of a dry ground, which, though its original was mean and despicable, God had made strong for himself, Ps. lxxx. 15, to be to him for a name, and for a praise.

Secondly. But if it be not fruitful it is good for nothing; it is as worthless and useless a product of the earth as even thorns and briars are. "What is the vine-tree," if you take the tree by itself, without consideration of the fruit? "What is it more than any tree," that it should have so much care taken of it, and so much cost laid out upon it? What is a branch of the vine, though it spread more "than a branch which is among the trees of the forest," where it grows neglected and exposed? Or, as some read it, 'What is the vine more than any tree, if the branch of it be as the trees of the forest?' that is, if it bear no fruit, as forest trees seldom do; being designed for timber trees, not fruit trees. Now there are some fruit trees which, if they do not bear, yet the wood of them is of good use, and may be made to turn to a good account. But the vine is none of those; if that do not answer its end, as a fruit tree, it is worth nothing for a timber tree. Observe,

1. How this similitude is expressed here. The wild vine, that is among the trees of the forest, or the empty vine, (which Israel is compared to, Hos. x. 1,) that bears no more fruit than a forest tree, is good for nothing, it is as useless as a briar, and more so, for that will add some sharpness to the thorny hedge, which the vine branch will not. He shews, 1st. That it is fit for no use. The wood of it is not taken to do any work; one cannot so much as "make a pin of it to hang a vessel upon," ver. 2. See how variously the gifts of nature are dispensed for the service of man: among plants, the roots of some, the seeds or fruits of others, the leaves of others, and of some the stalks, are most serviceable to us: so among trees, some are strong, and not fruitful, as the oaks and cedars; others weak, but very fruitful, as the vine, which is unsightly, low, and depending, yet of great use. Rachel is comely, but barren; Leah homely, but fruitful. 2nd. That therefore it is made use of for fuel; it will serve to heat the oven with. Because it is not meet for any work, it is cast into the fire, ver. 4. When it is good for nothing else, it is useful this way, and answers a very needful intention, for fuel is a thing we must have; and to burn any thing for fuel which is good for other work is ill husbandry; "To what purpose is this waste?" The unfruitful vine is disposed of the same way with the briars and thorns, which are rejected, and whose end is to be burned, Heb. vi. 8; and what care is taken of it then? If a piece of solid timber be kindled, somebody perhaps may snatch it as a brand out of the burning, and say, it is pity to burn it, for it may be put to some better use. But if the branch of a vine be on fire, and, as usual, both the ends of it and the middle are kindled together, nobody goes about to save it. "When it was whole it was meet for no work, much less when the fire has devoured it," ver. 5; even the ashes of it are not worth saving.

2. How this similitude is applied to Jerusalem.

1st. That holy city was become unprofitable, and good for nothing. It had been as the vine-tree among the trees of the vineyard, abounding in the fruits of righteousness to the glory of God. When religion flourished there, and the pure worship of God was kept up, many a joyful vintage was then gathered in from it. And while it continued so God made a hedge about it; it was his "pleasant plant," Isa. v. 7, he watered it every moment, and kept it night and day, Isa. xxvii. 3. But it was now become the degenerate plant of a strange vine, of a wild vine, such as we read of, 2 Kin. iv. 39, "a vine-tree among the trees of the forest," which, being wild, "bringeth forth wild grapes," Isa. v. 4, which are not only of no use, but are nauseous and noxious, Deu. xxxii. 32, "their grapes are grapes of gall, and their clusters are bitter." It is explained, ver. 8, "They have trespassed a trespass;" that is, they have treacherously prevaricated with God, and perfidiously apostatized from him, for so the word signifies. Note, Professors of religion, if they do not live up to their profession, but contradict it, if they degenerate and depart from it, are the most unprofitable creatures in the world, like the salt that has lost its savour, and is thenceforth good for nothing, Mar. ix. 50. Other nations were famed for valour or politics, some for war, others for trade, and retained their credit; but the Jewish nation being famous for a holy people, when they lost their holiness, and became wicked, were thenceforth good for nothing: with that they lost all their credit and usefulness, and became the most base and despicable people under the sun, "trodden under foot of the Gentiles." Daniel and other pious Jews were of great use to their generation; but the idolatrous Jews then, and the unbelieving Jews now, since the preaching of the Gospel, have been, and are, of no common service not fit for any work.

2nd. Being so, it is given to the fire for fuel, ver. 6. Note, Those that are not fruitful to the glory of God's grace shall be fuel to the fire of his wrath and thus, if they give not honour to him, he will get him honour upon them, honour that will shine bright in that flaming fire by which impenitent sinners will be for ever consumed. He will not be a loser at last by any of his creatures; "The Lord hath made all things for himself, yea even the wicked," that would not otherwise be for him, "for the day of evil," Pr. xvi. 4. And they who would not glorify him as the God to whom duty belongs, in them he will be glorified as the God to whom vengeance belongs. The fire of God's wrath had before devoured both the ends of the Jewish nation, ver. 4. Samaria, and the cities of Judah, and now Jerusalem, that was the midst of it, was thrown into the fire to be burnt too; for it is meet for no work, it will not be wrought upon by any of the methods God has taken to be serviceable to him. The inhabitants of Jerusalem were like a vine-branch, rotten and awkward; and therefore; ver. 7, "I will set my face against them" to thwart all their counsels, as they set their faces against God to contradict his word, and defeat all his designs. It is decreed, the consumption is determined, "I will make the land quite desolate;" and therefore, "when they go out from one fire, another fire shall devour them," ver. 7. The end of one judgment shall be the beginning of another, and their escape from one only a reprieve till another comes. They shall go from misery in their own country to misery in Babylon. They that kept out of the way of the sword perished by famine or pestilence. When one descent of the Chaldean forces upon them was over, and they thought surely the bitterness of death is past, yet soon after they returned again with double violence, till they had made a full end. Thus "they shall know that I am the Lord," a God of almighty power, "when I set my face against them." Note, God shews himself to be the Lord by perfecting the destruction of his implacable enemies, as well as the deliverances of his obedient people. Those against whom God sets his face, though they may come out of one trouble little hurt, will fall into another; though they come out of the pit, will be taken in the snare, Isa. xxiv. 18; though they escape the sword of Hazael, will fall by that of Jehu, 1 Kin. xix. 17; for evil pursues sinners. Nay, though they go out from the fire of temporal judgments, and seem to die in peace, yet there is an everlasting fire that will devour them; for when God judgeth, first or last, he will overcome, and will be known by the judgments which he executeth: see Mat. iii. 10; Jno. xv. 6.

CHAPTER XVI.

Still God is justifying himself in the desolations he is about to bring upon Jerusalem; and very largely in this chapter he shews the prophet, and orders him to shew the people, that he did but punish them as their sins deserved. In the foregoing chapter he had compared Jerusalem to an unfruitful vine, that was fit for nothing but the fire. In this chapter he compares it to an adulteress, that, in justice, ought to be abandoned and exposed. And he must therefore shew the people their abominations, that they might see how little reason they had to complain of the judgments they were under. In this long discourse are set forth, I. The despicable and deplorable beginnings of that church and nation, ver. 3—5. II. The many honours and favours God had bestowed upon them, ver. 6—14. III. Their treacherous and ungrateful departures from him to the services and worship of idols, here represented by the most impudent whoredom, ver. 15—34. IV. A threatening of terrible destroying judgments which God would bring upon them for this sin, ver. 35—43. V. An aggravation both of their sin and of their punishment, by comparison with Sodom and Samaria, ver. 44—59. VI. A promise of mercy, in the close, which God would shew to a penitent remnant, ver. 60—63. And this is designed for admonition to us.

AGAIN the word of the LORD came unto me, saying, 2 Son of man, cause Jerusalem to know her abominations, 3 And say,

Thus saith the Lord GOD unto Jerusalem;
Thy birth and thy nativity is of the land of Canaan;
Thy father was an Amorite, and thy mother an Hittite.
4 And as for thy nativity, [cut,
In the day thou wast born thy navel was not
Neither wast thou washed in water to supple thee; [all.
Thou wast not salted at all, nor swaddled at 5 None eye pitied thee, to do any of these unto thee,
To have compassion upon thee;
But thou wast cast out in the open field, to the lothing of thy person,
In the day that thou wast born.

CHILD SWADDLED.

Ezekiel is now among the captives in Babylon; but, as Jeremiah at Jerusalem wrote for the use of the captives, though they had Ezekiel upon the spot with them, Jer. xxix., so Ezekiel wrote for the use of Jerusalem, though Jeremiah himself was resident there; and yet they were far from looking upon it as an affront to one another, or interfering with one another's business, for ministers have need of one another's help, both by preaching and writing. Jeremiah wrote to the captives for their consolation, which was the thing they needed; Ezekiel here is directed to write to the inhabitants of Jerusalem for their conviction and humiliation, which was the thing they needed. This is his commission; ver. 2, "Cause Jerusalem to know her abominations," that is, her sins; set them in order before her. Note, 1. Sins are not only provocations which God is angry at, but abominations which he hates, as contrary to his nature, and which we ought to hate, Jer. xliv. 4. 2. The sins of Jerusalem are in a special manner so. The practice of profaneness appears most odious in those that make a profession of religion. 3. Though Jerusalem is a place of great knowledge, yet she is loath to know her abominations. So partial are men in their own favour, that the 'are hardly made to see and own their own badness, but deny it, palliate or extenuate it. 4. It is requisite that we should know our sins, that we may confess them, and may justify God in what he brings upon us for them. 5. It is the work of ministers to cause inspiring him to tell a lie, but in thwarting his oracles. With reference to the "if" of our translation in verse 9, it is to be noted that the Hebrew should rather be rendered "when," and the whole clause altered: "And the prophet, when he is deluded and uttereth a word, I the Lord have caused that prophet to be deluded," &c.

xiv. 13. There is no article prefixed to the word "land" here in the Hebrew, and we should therefore translate, "when a land sinneth," &c.

xiv. 14. Hostile critics have objected to the mention of Daniel here, but without good reason, because Daniel had been long with the captives, and had acquired a reputation for righteousness which fully justified this allusion to him.

xiv. 22. The prophet tells his fellow-captives that after the utter ruin of Jerusalem a remnant would escape to them, and that the sight of them would remove dissatisfaction at the fall of the beloved city. How would this be? Some answer that the contentment sinners, sinners in Jerusalem, to know their abominations; to set before them the glass of the law, that in it they may see their own deformities and defilements; to tell them plainly of their faults: "Thou art the man." Now, that Jerusalem may be made to know her abominations, and particularly the abominable ingratitude she had been guilty of, it was requisite she should be put in mind of the great things God had done for her, as the aggravations of her ill carriage towards him. And, to magnify those favours, she is in these verses made to know the meanness and baseness of her original; from what poor beginnings God raised her, and how unworthy she was of his favour, and of the honour he had put upon her. Jerusalem is here put for the Jewish church and nation, which is here compared to an outcast child, baseborn and abandoned, which the mother herself has no affection or concern for.

First. The extraction of the Jewish nation was mean. "Thy birth is of the land of Canaan," ver. 3; that is, thou hadst from the very first the spirit and disposition of a Canaanite. The patriarchs dwelt in Canaan, and they were there but strangers and sojourners, had no possession, no power, not one foot of ground of their own, but a burying-place. Abraham and Sarah were indeed their father and mother, but they were only inmates with the Amorites and Hittites, who, having the dominion, seemed to be as parents to the seed of Abraham. Witness the court Abraham made to the children of Heth, Gen. xxiii. 4, 8, and the dependence they had upon their neighbours the Canaanites, and the fear they were in of them, Gen. xiii. 7; xxxiv. 30. If the patriarchs at their first coming to Canaan had conquered it, and made themselves masters of it, it had put an honour upon their family, and had looked great in history; but instead of that they went "from one nation to another," Ps. cv. 13, as tenants from one farm to another, almost as beggars from one door to another, when they were but few in number, yea very few. And yet this was not the worst: their fathers had served other gods in Ur of the Chaldees, Jos. xxiv. 2; even in Jacob's family there were strange gods, Gen. xxxv. 2. Thus early had they a genius leading them to idolatry, and upon this account their ancestors were Amorites and Hittites.

Secondly. When they first began to multiply, their condition was really very deplorable, like that of a new-born child, which must of necessity die from the womb, if the knees prevent it not, Job iii. 11, 12. The children of Israel, when they began to increase into a people, and became considerable, were thrown out from the country that was intended for them, a famine drove them thence. Egypt was the open field into which they were cast; there they had no protection or countenance from the government they were under; but, on the contrary, were ruled with rigour; and their lives embittered. They had no encouragement given them to build up their families, no help to build up their estates, no friends or allies to strengthen their interests. Joseph, that had been the shepherd and stone of Israel, was dead. The king of Egypt, that should have been kind to them for Joseph's sake, set himself to destroy this man-child "as soon as it was born," Rev. xii. 4; ordered all the males to be slain, which, it is likely, occasioned the exposing of many, as well as Moses, to which perhaps the similitude here has reference. The founders of nations and cities had occasion for all the arts and arms they were masters of, set their heads on work by policies and stratagems to preserve and nurse up their infant states; tantæ molis erat Romanam condre gentem,—'so vast were the efforts requisite to the establishment of the Roman name,'—Virg. But the nation of Israel had no such care taken of it, no such pains taken with it, as Athens, Sparta, Rome, and other commonwealths had when they were first founded; but, on the contrary, was doomed to destruction, like an infant new born, exposed to wind and weather, the navel string not cut, the poor babe not washed, not clothed, not swaddled, because not pitied, ver. 4, 5. Note, We owe the preservation of our infant lives to that natural pity and compassion which the God of nature has put into the hearts of parents and nurses towards new-born children. This infant is said to be cast out to the loathing of her person. It was a sign she was loathed by those that bare her; and she appeared loathsome to all that looked upon her. The Israelites were an abomination to the Egyptians, as we find, Gen. xliii. 32; xlvi. 34. Some think this refers to the corrupt and vicious disposition of that people from their beginning. They were not only "the weakest and fewest of all people," Deu. vii. 7, but the worst and most ill-humoured of all people. "God giveth thee this good land, not for thy righteousness, for thou art a stiff-necked people," Deu. ix. 6. And Moses tells them there; ver. 24, "You have been rebellious against the Lord from the day that I knew you." They were not suppled, nor washed, nor swaddled; they were not at all tractable or manageable, nor cast into any good shape. God took them to be his people, not because he saw any thing in them inviting or promising, but so it seemed good in his sight; and it is a very apt illustration of the miserable condition of all the children of men by nature. "As for our nativity, in the day that we were born" we were shapen in iniquity, and conceived in sin; our understandings darkened, our minds alienated from the life of God, polluted with sin, which rendered us loathsome in the eyes of God. "Marvel not" then that we are told "we must be born again."

6 And when I passed by thee, and saw thee polluted in thine own blood,
I said unto thee when thou wast in thy blood, Live;
Yea, I said unto thee when thou wast in thy blood, Live
7 I have caused thee to multiply as the bud of the field,
And thou hast increased and waxen great,
And thou art come to excellent ornaments:
Thy breasts are fashioned, and thine hair is grown,
Whereas thou wast naked and bare.
8 Now when I passed by thee, and looked upon thee,
Behold, thy time was the time of love; [ness:
And I spread my skirt over thee, and covered thy naked-

9 Then washed I thee with water;
Yea, I throughly washed away thy blood from thee,
And I anointed thee with oil.
10 I clothed thee also with broidered work,
And shod thee with badgers' skin,
And I girded thee about with fine linen,
And I covered thee with silk.
11 I decked thee also with ornaments,
And I put bracelets upon thy hands,
And a chain on thy neck.
12 And I put a jewel on thy forehead,
And earrings in thine ears,
And a beautiful crown upon thine head.

EGYPTIAN QUEEN IN FULL DRESS.

13 Thus wast thou decked with gold and silver;
And thy raiment was of fine linen, and silk, and broidered work;
Thou didst eat fine flour, and honey, and oil:
And thou wast exceeding beautiful,
And thou didst prosper into a kingdom. [beauty:
14 And thy renown went forth among the heathen for thy
For it was perfect through my comeliness,
Which I had put upon thee, saith the Lord GOD.

In these verses we have an account of the great things which God did for the Jewish nation, in raising them up by degrees to be very considerable.

First. God saved them from the ruin they were upon the brink of in Egypt; ver. 6, "When I passed by thee, and saw thee polluted in thine own blood," loathed, and abandoned, and appointed to die, as sheep for the slaughter, "then I said unto thee, Live." I designed thee for life when thou wast doomed to destruction, and resolved to save thee from death. Those shall live to whom God commands life. God looked upon the world of mankind as thus cast off, thus cast out, thus polluted, thus weltering in blood, and his thoughts towards it were thoughts of good, designing it life, and that more abundantly. By converting grace he saith to the soul, "Live."

Secondly. He looked upon them with kindness and a tender affection. Not only pitied them, but set his love upon them; which was unaccountable, for there was nothing lovely in them; but "I looked upon thee, and behold thy time was the time of love," ver. 8. It was the kindness and love of God our Saviour that sent Christ to redeem us, that sends the Spirit to sanctify us, that brought us out of a state of nature into a state of grace. That was a time of love indeed, distinguishing love, when God manifested his love to us, and courted our love to him; "Then was I in his eyes as one that found favour," Cant. viii. 10.

Thirdly. He took them under his protection. "I spread my skirt over thee," to shelter thee from wind and weather, and "to cover thy nakedness, that the shame of it might not appear." Boaz spread his skirt over Ruth in token of the special favour he designed her, Ru. iii. 9. God took them in his care, as an eagle bears her young ones upon her wings, Deu. xxxii. 11, 12. When God owned them for his people, and sent Moses to Egypt to deliver them, which was an expression of the good-will of him that dwelt in the bush, then he spread his skirt over them.

Fourthly. He cleared them from the reproachful character which their bondage in Egypt laid them under; ver. 9, "Then washed I thee with water," to make thee clean, "and anointed thee with oil," to make thee sweet, and supple thee. All the disgrace of their slavery was rolled away when they were brought with a high hand, and a stretched-out arm, "into the glorious liberty of the children of God;" when God saith, "Israel is my son, my firstborn, let my people go, that they may serve me." That word, backed as it was with so many works of wonder, "thoroughly washed away their blood;" and, when God led them under the convoy of the pillar of cloud and fire, he "spread his skirt over them."

Fifthly. He multiplied them, and built them up into a people. This is here mentioned, ver. 7, before his spreading his skirt over them, because their numbers increased exceedingly, while they were yet bond slaves in Egypt. They "multiplied as the bud of the field" in spring time; they "waxed great, exceeding mighty," Ex. i. 7, 20; their "breasts were fashioned" when they were formed into distinct tribes, and had officers of their own, Ex. v. 19. Their hair grew when they grew numerous, whereas they had been naked and bare, very few, and therefore contemptible would arise from the repentance of the fugitives. Others, with better reason, think the captives would admit the justice of God's judgments when they saw in the remnant escaped a sample, so to speak, of the extreme depravity of the inhabitants. Thus Calvin says: "You will see that the men are so wicked that both the city and themselves, you will be compelled to confess, were deserving of destruction."

xv. 1. The comparison here is between the wood of the vine and other wood, in which respect it furnishes an apt symbol of Jerusalem. Commentators have found many curious analogies in this passage, but it is doubtful whether they form part of the original idea.

xvi. 2, 3. This is commonly taken as a rehearsal of the history, guilt, and punishment of Israel, who is personified as a woman. But it is Jerusalem which is so personified, and whatever may be the accuracy of the description as regards the entire nation, it is Jerusalem which should be understood throughout. It could not be Sixthly. He admitted them into covenant with himself. See what glorious nuptials this poor, forlorn infant is preferred to at last; how she is dignified, who at first had scarce her life given her for a prey. "I sware unto thee, and entered into covenant with thee." This was done at mount Sinai, when the covenant between God and Israel was ratified and sealed; then "Thou becamest mine." God called them his people, and himself the God of Israel. Note, Those to whom God gives spiritual life he takes into covenant with himself; by that covenant they become his: his subjects and servants, that speaks their duty; his portion, his treasure, that speaks their privilege. And it is confirmed with an oath, that we might have strong consolation.

Seventhly. He beautified and adorned them. This maid cannot forget her ornaments, and she is gratified with abundance of them, ver. 10—13. We need not be particular in the application of these. Her wardrobe was well furnished with rich apparel; they had embroidered work to wear, shoes of fine badgers' skins, linen girdles, and silk veils, bracelets and necklaces, jewels and earrings, and even a beautiful crown, or coronet. Perhaps this may refer to the jewels and other rich goods which they took from the Egyptians; which might well be spoken of thus long after as a merciful circumstance of their deliverance, when it was spoken of long before, Gen. xv. 14, "They shall come out with great substance." Or, it may be taken figuratively, for all those blessings of heaven which adorned both their church and state. In a little time they came to excellent ornaments, ver. 7. The laws and ordinances which God gave them were to them as ornaments of grace to the head, and chains about the neck, Pr. i. 9. God's sanctuary which he set up among them was a beautiful crown upon their head, it was the beauty of holiness.

Eighthly. He fed them with abundance, with plenty, with dainty. "Thou didst eat fine flour, and honey, and oil;" manna, angels' food; "honey out of the rock, oil out of the flinty rock." In Canaan they did eat bread to the full, the finest of the wheat, Deu. xxxii. 13, 14. Those whom God takes into covenant with himself are fed with the bread of life, clothed with the robe of righteousness, adorned with the graces and comforts of the Spirit; "the hidden man of the heart is that which is incorruptible."

Ninthly. He gave them a great reputation among their neighbours, and made them considerable; acceptable to their friends and allies, and formidable to their adversaries. "Thou didst prosper into a kingdom," ver. 13; which speaks both dignity and dominion; and, ver. 14, "Thy renown went forth among the heathen for thy beauty." The nations about had their eye upon them, and admired them for the excellent laws by which they were governed, the privilege they had of access to God, Deu. iv. 7, 8. Solomon's wisdom and Solomon's temple were very much the renown of that nation; and, if we put all the privileges of the Jewish church and kingdom together, we must own it was the most accomplished beauty of all the nations of the earth. The beauty of it was perfect, you could not name the thing that would be the honour of a people, but it was to be found in Israel, in David's and Solomon's time, when that kingdom was in its zenith: piety, learning, wisdom, justice, victory, peace, wealth; and all sure to continue if they had kept close to God. "It was perfect," saith God, "through my comeliness which I had put upon thee;" that is, through the beauty of their holiness, as they were a people set apart for God, and devoted to him, to be to him "for a name, for a praise, and for a glory." This was it that put a lustre upon all their other honours, and was indeed the perfection of their beauty. We may apply this spiritually: sanctified souls are truly beautiful; they are so in God's sight, and they themselves may take the comfort of it. But God must have all the glory, for they were by nature deformed and polluted; and whatever comeliness they have it is that which God has put upon them, and beautified them with, and he will be well pleased with the work of his own hands.

15 But thou didst trust in thine own beauty,
And playedst the harlot because of thy renown,
And pouredst out thy fornications on every one that passed by; his it was.
16 And of thy garments thou didst take,
And deckedst thy high places with divers colours,
And playedst the harlot thereupon:
The like things shall not come, neither shall it be so.
17 Thou hast also taken thy fair jewels
Of my gold and of my silver, which I had given thee,
And madest to thyself images of men,
And didst commit whoredom with them,
18 And tookest thy broidered garments, and coveredst them:
And thou hast set mine oil and mine incense before them.
19 My meat also which I gave thee,
Fine flour, and oil, and honey, wherewith I fed thee,
Thou hast even set it before them for a sweet savour:
And thus it was, saith the Lord GOD.
20 Moreover thou hast taken thy sons and thy daughters,
Whom thou hast borne unto me,
And these hast thou sacrificed unto them to be devoured.
Is this of thy whoredoms a small matter,
21 That thou hast slain my children, and delivered them
To cause them to pass through the fire for them?
22 And in all thine abominations and thy whoredoms
Thou hast not remembered the days of thy youth,
When thou wast naked and bare, and wast polluted in thy blood.
23 And it came to pass after all thy wickedness,
(Woe, woe unto thee! saith the Lord GOD;)
24 That thou hast also built unto thee an eminent place,
And hast made thee an high place in every street.
25 Thou hast built thy high place at every head of the way.
And hast made thy beauty to be abhorred,
And hast opened thy feet to every one that passed by,
And multiplied thy whoredoms.
26 Thou hast also committed fornication
With the Egyptians thy neighbours, great of flesh:
And hast increased thy whoredoms, to provoke me to anger.
27 Behold, therefore I have stretched out my hand over thee,
And have diminished thine ordinary food,
And delivered thee unto the will of them that hate thee,
The daughters of the Philistines, which are ashamed of thy lewd way.
28 Thou hast played the whore also with the Assyrians,
Because thou wast unsatiable;
Yea, thou hast played the harlot with them,
And yet couldest not be satisfied.
29 Thou hast moreover multiplied thy fornication
In the land of Canaan unto Chaldea;
And yet thou wast not satisfied herewith.
30 How weak is thine heart, saith the Lord GOD,
Seeing thou doest all these things,
The work of an imperious whorish woman;
31 In that thou buildest thine eminent place in the head of every way,
And makest thine high place in every street;
And hast not been as an harlot, in that thou scornest hire;
32 But as a wife that committeth adultery,
Which taketh strangers instead of her husband!
33 They give gifts to all whores:
But thou givest thy gifts to all thy lovers,
And hirest them, that they may come unto thee on every side
For thy whoredom.
34 And the contrary is in thee from other women in thy whoredoms,
Whereas none followeth thee to commit whoredoms:
And in that thou givest a reward, and no reward is given unto thee,
Therefore thou art contrary.

In these verses we have an account of the great wickedness of the people of Israel, especially in worshipping idols, notwithstanding the great favours that God had conferred upon them, by which one would think they should have been for ever engaged to him. This wickedness of theirs is here represented by the lewd and scandalous conversation of that beautiful maid which was rescued from ruin, brought up and well provided for by a kind friend and benefactor, that had been in all respects as a father and a husband to her.

First. Their idolatry was the great provoking sin that they were guilty of. It began in the latter end of Solomon's time, (for from Samuel's till then I do not remember that we read any thing of it,) and from thence continued more or less the crying sin of that nation till the captivity. And though it now and then met with some check from the reforming kings, yet it was never totally suppressed, and for the most part appeared to a high degree impudent and barefaced. They not only worshipped the true God by images, as the ten tribes by the calves at Dan and Bethel, but they worshipped false gods, Baal and Moloch, and all the senseless rabble of the pagan deities.

Secondly. This is that which is here all along represented (as often elsewhere) under the similitude of whoredom and adultery. 1. Because it is the violation of a marriage covenant with God, forsaking him, and embracing the bosom of a stranger; it is giving that affection and service to his rivals which are due to him alone. 2. Because it is the corrupting and defiling of the mind, and the enslaving of the spiritual part of the man, and subjecting it to the power and dominion of sense, as whoredom is. 3. Because it debaucheth the conscience, sears and hardens it; and those who by their idolatries dishonour the Divine nature, and change the truth of God into a lie, and his glory into shame, God justly punisheth by giving them over to a reprobate mind, to dishonour the human nature with vile affections, Rom. i. 23, &c. It is a besotting, bewitching sin; and when men are given up to it they seldom recover themselves out of the snare. 4. Because it is a shameful, scandalous sin, for those that have joined themselves to the Lord to join themselves to an idol. Now here observe,

1st. What were the causes of this sin. How came the people of God to be drawn away to the service of idols? How came a virgin so well taught, so well educated, to be debauched? Who would have thought it? But, First. They grew proud; ver. 15, "Thou trustedst to thy beauty," and didst expect that that should make thee an interest, and didst "play the harlot because of thy renown." They thought, because they were so complimented and admired by their neighbours, that, farther to ingratiate themselves with them, and return their compliments, they must join with them in their worship, and conform themselves to their usages. Solomon admitted idolatry to gratify his wives and their relations. Note, Abundance of young people are ruined by pride, and particularly pride in their beauty; rara est concordia formæ atque pudicitiæ,—'beauty and chastity are seldom associated.' Secondly. They forgot their beginning; ver. 22, "Thou hast not remembered the days of thy youth;" how poor, and mean and despicable thou wast, and what great things said with any literal accuracy that the nation was of Canaan, and had Amorite and Hittite parents; but this might be said of Jerusalem. The city was founded when the land was called Canaan; it was at a remote period occupied by the Jebusites, a branch of the Amorites (Josh. x. 5), and next-door neighbours of the Hittites, their relations. The early history of the city is necessarily associated with Amorite and Hittite influences, previous to its occupation by Israel. To the primitive period of the city's history the first portion of the prophetic address will apply. What follows relates to its adoption by the Lord and its subsequent experiences, and the entire chapter can be consistently explained on this principle. Much of the language of the chapter is indicative of the simple habits and speech of an age when refined reserve was little studied.

xvi. 5, 6. The practice of exposing infants has been common in all ages among pagans. It was frequent among the Greeks and Romans, and is still usual in China and other countries of the East.

God did for thee, and what lasting obligations he laid upon thee thereby. Note, It would be an effectual check to our pride and sensuality to consider what we are, and how much we are beholden to the free grace of God.

Thirdly. They were weak in understanding and in resolution; ver. 30, "How weak is thy heart, seeing thou dost all these things?" Note, The strength of men's lusts is an evidence of the weakness of their hearts; they have no acquaintance with themselves, nor government of themselves. She is weak, and yet an imperious, whorish woman. Note, Those that are most foolish are commonly most imperious, and think themselves fit to manage others, when they are far from being able to manage themselves.

2nd. What were the particulars of it.

First. They worshipped all the idols that came in their way, all that they were ever courted to the worship of; they were at the beck of all their neighbours; ver. 15, "Thou pouredst out thy fornications on every one that passed by, his it was." They were ready to close with every temptation of this kind, though never so absurd. No foreign idol should be imported, no new god invented, but they were ready to catch at it, as a common strumpet, that prostitutes herself to all comers, and multiplies her whoredoms, ver. 25. Thus some common drunkards will be company for every one that puts up the finger to them. How weak are the hearts of such!

Secondly. They adorned their idol temples, and groves, and high places with the fine rich clothing that God had given them; ver. 16, 18, "Thou deckedst thy high places with divers colours;" with the coats of divers colours, like Joseph's, which God had given them as particular marks of his favour; and hast played the harlot," that is, worshipped idols thereupon. Of this he saith, "The like things shall not come, neither shall it be so;" that is, this is a thing by no means to be suffered; I will never endure such practices as these, without shewing my resentments.

Thirdly. They made images for worship of the jewels which God had given them; ver. 17, "The jewels of my gold and my silver which I had given thee." Note, It is God that gives us our gold and silver. The products of trade, of art and industry, are the gifts of God's providence to us, as well as the fruits of the earth. And what God gives us the use of he still retains a property in; It is my silver and my gold, though I have given it thee. It is his still, so as that we ought to serve and honour him with it, and are accountable to him for the disposal of it. Every penny has God's image upon it as well as Cæsar's. Would we make our silver and gold, our plate, money, jewels, the matter of our pride and contention, our covetousness and prodigality, if we duly considered that it is God's silver, and his gold? The Israelites began betimes to turn their jewels into idols, when Aaron made the golden calf of their earrings.

Fourthly. They served their idols with the good things which God gave them for their own use, and to serve him with; ver. 18, "Thou hast set mine oil and mine incense before them," upon their altars, as perfumes to these dunghill deities. "My meat, and fine flour, and oil," and that honey which Canaan flowed with, and "wherewith I fed thee," thou hast regaled them and their hungry priests with; hast made an offering of it to them, for a sweet savour, to purify them, and procure acceptance with them. "And thus it was, saith the Lord God;" it is too plain to be denied, too bad to be excused. "These things thou hast done;" he that knows all things knows it. See how fond they were of their idols, that they would part with that which was given them for the necessary subsistence of themselves and their families to honour them with; which may shame our niggardliness and strait-handedness in the service of the true and living God.

Fifthly. They had sacrificed their children to their idols. This is insisted upon here, and often elsewhere, as one of the worst instances of their idolatry; as indeed there was none in which the devil triumphed so much over the children of men, both their natural reason and their natural affection, as in this: see Jer. vii. 31; xix. 5; xxxii. 35. "Thou hast taken thy sons and thy daughters," and not only made them to pass through the fire, or between two fires, in token of their being dedicated to Moloch, but thou hast "sacrificed them to be devoured," ver. 20. Never was there such an instance of the degenerating of the paternal authority into the most barbarous tyranny as this was. Yet that was not the worst of it: it was an irreparable wrong to God himself, who challenged a special property in their children, more than in their gold and silver, and their meat; They are "my children," ver. 21; "the sons and daughters which thou hast borne unto me," ver. 20. He is the Father of spirits, and rational souls are in a particular manner his; and, therefore, the taking away of life, human life, unjustly, is a mighty affront to the God of life. But the children of the Israelites were his by a farther right; they were the children of the covenant, born in God's house: he had said to Abraham, "I will be a God to thee, and to thy seed." They had the seal of the covenant in their flesh from eight days old, they were to bear God's name, and keep up his church; to murder them was in the highest degree inhuman, but to murder them in honour of an idol was in the highest degree impious One cannot think of it without the utmost indignation, to see the pitiless hands of the parents shedding the guiltless blood of their own children; and, by offering those pieces of themselves to the devil for dying sacrifices, openly avowing the offering up of themselves to him for living sacrifices. How absurd was this, that the children which were born to God should be sacrificed to devils? Note, The children of parents that are members of the visible church are to be looked upon as born unto God, and his children; as such, and under that character, we are to love them, and pray for them, bring them up for him, and, if he calls for them, cheerfully part with them to him; for may he not do what he will with his own? Upon this instance of their idolatry, which indeed ought not to pass without a particular brand, this remark is made; ver. 20, "Is this of thy whoredoms a small matter?" which intimates there were those that made a small matter of it, and turned it into a jest. Note, There is no sin so heinous, so apparently heinous, which men of profligate consciences will not make a mock at. But is whoredom, is spiritual whoredom, a small matter? Is it a small matter for men to make their children brutes, and the devil their God? It will be a great matter shortly.

Sixthly. They built temples in honour of their idols, that others might be invited to resort thither, and join with them in the worship of their idols. "After all thy wickedness" of this kind committed in private, (for which, "woe, woe unto thee,"—that comes in a sad parenthesis, speaking those in a woful condition that are going on in sin, and giving them warning in time, if they would but take it,) thou hast at length arrived to such a pitch of impudence as to proclaim it. Thou hast long had a whore's heart, but now thou art come to have a whore's forehead, and canst not blush; ver. 23—25, "Thou hast built there an eminent place," 'a brothel house,' so the margin reads it, and such their idol temples were. "Thou hast made thee a high place" for one idol or other, "in every street, and at every head of the way;" and again, ver. 31. They did all they could to seduce and debauch others, and to spread the contagion by making the temptations to idolatry as strong as possibly they could; and hereby the ringleaders in idolatry did but make themselves vile. And even those that had courted them to it, finding themselves outdone by them, began to be surfeited with the abundance and violence of their idolatries; "Thou hast made thy beauty to be abhorred," even by those that had admired it. The Jewish nation, by leaving their own God, and doting on the gods of the nations round about them, had made themselves mean and despicable in the eyes even of their heathen neighbours. Much more was their beauty abhorred by all that were wise and good, and had any concern for the honour of God and religion. Note, Those shame themselves that bring a reproach on their profession; and justly will that beauty, that excellency, at length be made the object of others' loathing, which men have made the matter of their own pride?

3rd. What were the aggravations of this sin.

First. They were fond of the idols of those nations which had been their oppressors and persecutors. As, 1*st.* The Egyptians. They were a people notorious for idolatry, and for the most sottish, senseless idolatries. They had of old abused them by their barbarous dealings, and of late by their treacherous dealing, were always either cruel or false to them; and yet so infatuated were they, that "they committed fornication with the Egyptians their neighbours," not only by joining with them in their idolatries, but entering into leagues and alliances with them; and depending upon them for help in their straits, which was an adulterous departure from God. 2*nd.* The Assyrians. They had also been vexatious to Israel, and yet "thou hast played the whore with them," ver. 28. Though they lived at a greater distance, yet thou hast entertained their idols, and their superstitious usages, and so "hast multiplied thy fornications unto Chaldea;" hast borrowed images of gods, patterns of altars, rites of sacrificing, and one foolery or another of that kind, from that remote country, that enemy's country; and hast imported them into the land of Canaan, enfranchised and established them there. Thus Mr. George Herbert long since foretold, or feared at least,

> That Seine shall swallow Tiber, and the Thames
> By letting in them both pollute her streams.

Secondly. They had been under the rebukes of Providence for their sins, and yet they persisted in them; ver. 27, "I have stretched out my hand over thee," to threaten and frighten thee; so God did before he laid his hand upon them to ruin and destroy them. And that is his usual method, to try to bring men to repentance, first by lesser judgments; he did so here. Before he brought such a famine upon them as broke the staff of bread, he diminished their ordinary food; cut them short, before he cut them off. When the overplus is abused, it is just with God to diminish that which is for necessity. Before he delivered them to the Chaldeans to be destroyed he delivered them to the daughters of the Philistines to be ridiculed for their idolatries; for they hated them, and, though they were idolaters themselves, yet were ashamed of the lewd way of the Israelites, who were grown more profane in their idolatries than any of their neighbours, who changed their God, whereas other nations did not change theirs, Jer. ii. 10, 11; for this they were justly chastised by the Philistines. Or it may refer to the inroads which the Philistines made upon the south of Judah in the reign of Ahaz, by which it was weakened and impoverished, and which was the beginning of sorrows to them, 2 Chr. xxviii. 18; but they did not take warning by these judgments, and therefore were justly abandoned to ruin at last. Note, In the account which impenitent sinners shall be called to, they will be told not only of the mercies for which they have been ungrateful, but of the afflictions under which they have been incorrigible, Am. iv. 11.

Thirdly. They were insatiable in their spiritual whoredom; Thou "couldest not be satisfied," ver. 28, and again ver. 29. When they had multiplied their idols and superstitious usages beyond measure, yet still they were inquiring after new gods, and new fashions in worship. They that in sincerity join themselves to the true God find enough in him for their satisfaction; and, though they still desire more of God, yet they never desire more than God. But they that forsake this living fountain for broken cisterns will find themselves soon surfeited, but never satisfied; have soon enough of the gods they have, and are still inquiring after more.

Fourthly. They were at a great expence upon their idolatry, and laid out a great deal of wealth in purchasing patterns of images and altars, and hiring priests to attend upon them from other countries. Harlots generally had their hires, but this impudent adulteress, instead of being hired to serve idols, hired idols to protect her, and accept her homage. This is much insisted on, ver. 31—34. In this respect, "The contrary is in thee from other women in thy whoredoms;" others are courted, but thou makest court to those that do not follow thee; art fond of making leagues and alliances with those heathen nations that despise thee. Others have gifts given them, but thou givest thy gifts, that is, the gifts which God has graciously given thee, to thine idols; herein like a wife that commits adultery, not for gain, as harlots do, but purely for the sin's sake. Note, Spiritual lusts, those of the mind, such as theirs after idols were, are oftentimes as strong and impetuous as any carnal lusts are. And it is a great aggravation of sin when men are their own tempters, and, instead of proposing to themselves any worldly advantage by it, are at great expence upon it. Such are transgressors without cause, Ps. xxv. 3; wicked transgressors indeed.

And now is not Jerusalem in all this made to know her abominations? for what greater abominations could she be guilty of than these? Here we may see with wonder and horror what the corrupt nature of men is when God leaves them to themselves; yea, though they have the greatest advantages to be better, and do better. And the way of sin is downhill. Nitimur in vetitum,—'We incline to what is forbidden.'

35 Wherefore, O harlot, hear the word of the LORD:
36 Thus saith the Lord GOD;
Because thy filthiness was poured out,
And thy nakedness discovered through thy whoredoms with thy lovers,
And with all the idols of thy abominations,
And by the blood of thy children, which thou didst give unto them;
37 Behold, therefore I will gather all thy lovers,
With whom thou hast taken pleasure,
And all them that thou hast loved,
With all them that thou hast hated;
I will even gather them round about against thee,
And will discover thy nakedness unto them,
That they may see all thy nakedness
38 And I will judge thee,

xvi. 7. The verbs in this verse should be all in the narrative tense: "I caused thee to multiply, thou didst increase and wax great, thou didst come to great beauty: thy breasts were formed, and thine hair grew, but thou wast naked and uncovered." The infant which had been saved from death grew up to beautiful womanhood, but still remained neglected and unprovided for.

xvi. 9—13. The adoption and espousals, and the multitude of gifts, are set forth in order that the sin of apostacy may be the more apparent. Among the articles mentioned one or two only require explanation. What our translators call "badgers' skin" was probably the skin of one of the marine mammals, dugongs or seals, found in the Red Sea. The "crown" may either have been a bridal or a royal diadem. Of course the meaning of the whole is, that God bestowed upon Jerusalem a multitude of honours and benefits.

xvi. 15. In this and following verses the idolatrous practices of Jerusalem are represented under the very usual figure of licentious-

As women that break wedlock and shed blood are judged;
And I will give thee blood in fury and jealousy.
39 And I will also give thee into their hand,
And they shall throw down thine eminent place,
And shall break down thy high places:
They shall strip thee also of thy clothes, and shall take thy fair jewels,
And leave thee naked and bare.
40 They shall also bring up a company against thee,
And they shall stone thee with stones,
And thrust thee through with their swords.
41 And they shall burn thine houses with fire, [women:
And execute judgments upon thee in the sight of many
And I will cause thee to cease from playing the harlot,
And thou also shalt give no hire any more.
42 So will I make my fury toward thee to rest,
And my jealousy shall depart from thee,
And I will be quiet, and will be no more angry.
43 Because thou hast not remembered the days of thy youth,
But hast fretted me in all these things; [thine head,
Behold, therefore I also will recompense thy way upon Saith the Lord GOD: [abominations.
And thou shalt not commit this lewdness above all thine

Adultery was by the law of Moses made a capital crime. This notorious adulteress, the criminal at the bar, being in the foregoing verses found guilty, here hath sentence passed upon her. It is ushered in with solemnity, ver. 35; the prophet, as the judge, in God's name calls to her, "O harlot, hear the word of the Lord!" Our Saviour preached to harlots, for their conversion, to bring them into the kingdom of God, not as the prophet here, to expel them out of it. Note, An apostate church is a harlot; Jerusalem is so if she become idolatrous. "How is the faithful city become a harlot!" Rome is so represented in the Revelation, then when it is marked for ruin, as Jerusalem here; Rev. xvii. 1, "Come, and I will shew thee the judgments of the great whore." And those who will not hear the commanding word of the Lord, and obey it, shall be made to hear the condemning word of the Lord, and shall tremble at it. Let us attend while judgment is given.

First. The crime is repeated, and the articles of the charge summed up, ver. 36, and, as is usual, aggravated, ver. 43; for when God speaks in wrath he will be justified, and clear when he judgeth, clear when he is judged; and sinners when they are condemned shall have their sins so set in order before them that their mouth shall be stopped, and they shall not have a word to object against the equity of the sentence. The crimes which this harlot stands convicted of, and is now to be condemned for, are, 1. The violation of the two first commandments of the first table by idolatry, which is here called her whoredoms with her lovers; so she called them, Hos. ii. 12, because she loved them as if they had been indeed her benefactors; that is, with "all the idols of her abominations," the abominable idols which she served and worshipped. This was the sin which provoked God to jealousy. 2. The violation of the two first commandments of the second table, by the murder of their own innocent infants; "The blood of thy children which thou didst give unto them." It is not strange if those that have cast off God, and his fear, break through the strongest and most sacred bonds of natural affection.

The sins are aggravated from the consideration, 1st. Of the dishonour they had thereby done to themselves. Hereby "thy filthiness was poured out," that is, the uncleanness that was in thy heart was hereby discovered and brought to light, and thy nakedness was exposed to view, and thou thereby exposed to contempt. God is displeased with his professing people for shaming themselves by their sins. 2nd. Their base ingratitude is another aggravation of their sins; "Thou hast not remembered the days of thy youth," and the kindness that was done thee then, when otherwise thou hadst perished, ver. 43. And, 3rd. The vexation which their sins gave to God, whom they ought to have pleased; "Thou hast fretted me in all these things," not only angered me, but grieved me. It is a strange expression, and one would think enough to melt a heart of stone, that the great God, who cannot admit any uneasiness, is pleased to speak of the sins and follies of his professing people as fretting to him; "Forty years long was I grieved with this generation."

Secondly. The sentence is passed. In general, "I will judge thee as women that break wedlock, and shed blood, are judged," ver. 38; and those two crimes were punished with death, with an ignominious death. Thou hast shed blood, and therefore I will give thee blood; thou hast broken wedlock, and therefore I will give it thee not only in justice, but in jealousy,—not only as a righteous judge, but as an injured and incensed husband, who "will not spare in the day of vengeance," Pr. vi. 34, 35. He will "recompense their way upon their head," ver. 43. In all the judgments God executeth upon sinners we must see "their own way recompensed upon their own head." They are dealt with not only as they deserved, but as they procured; it is the end which their sin as a way had a direct tendency to. More particularly,

1. This criminal must be (as is usually done with criminals) exposed to public shame, ver. 37. Malefactors are not executed privately, but are made a spectacle to the world. Care is here taken to bring spectators together. "All them that thou hast loved, with whom thou hast taken pleasure," they shall come to be witnesses of the execution, that they may take warning, and prevent their own like ruin; and those also whom thou hast hated, who will insult over thee, and triumph in thy fall. Both ways the calamities of Jerusalem will be aggravated, that they will be the grief of her friends, and the joy of her foes. These shall not only be gathered around her, but gathered against her; even those with whom she took unlawful pleasure, with whom she contracted unlawful leagues, the Egyptians and Assyrians, shall now contribute to her ruin. As, "when a man's ways please the Lord, he maketh even his enemies to be at peace with him," so, when a man's ways displease the Lord, he maketh even his friends to be at war with him; and justly makes these a scourge and a plague to sinners, and instruments of their destruction, who were their tempters, and with whom they were partakers in wickedness. Those whom they have suffered to strip them of their virtue shall see them stripped, and perhaps help to strip them, of all their other ornaments; to see the nakedness of the land will they come. It is added to the same purpose, ver. 41, "I will execute judgments upon thee in the sight of many women;" thou shalt be made an example of, in terrorem, 'that others may see and fear,' and do no more presumptuously.

2. The criminal is condemned to die, for her sins are such as death is the wages of; ver. 40, "They shall bring up a company," that is, a company shall be brought up against thee, and "they shall stone thee with stones, and thrust thee through with their swords;" so great a death, so many deaths in one, is this adulteress adjudged to. When the walls of Jerusalem were battered down with stones shot against them, and the inhabitants of Jerusalem were put to the sword, then this sentence was executed in the letter of it.

3. The estate of the criminal is confiscated, and all that belonged to her destroyed with her; ver. 39, "They shall throw down thine eminent place;" and, ver. 41, they "shall burn thine houses," as the habitations of ill women are destroyed in detestation of their lewdness. Their high places, erected in honour of their idols, by which they thought to ingratiate themselves with their neighbours, shall be an offence to them; and even they shall break them down. It was long the complaint, even in some of the best reigns of the kings of Judah, that the high places were not taken away; but now the army of the Chaldeans, when they lay all waste, shall break them down. If iniquity be not taken away by the justice of the nation, it shall be taken away by the judgments of God upon the nation.

4. Thus both the sin and the sinner shall be abolished together, and an end put to both. "Thou shalt cease from playing the harlot;" that is, there shall be no remainders of idolatry in the land, because the inhabitants shall be wholly extirpated; and they shall give no more hire because they have no more to give. Some that will not leave their sins live till their sins leave them. When all that with which they honoured their idols is taken from them, they shall "not give hire any more," ver. 41. Then "thou shalt not commit this lewdness" of sacrificing thy children, which was a crime provoking "above all thine abominations;" for thy children shall all be cut off by the sword, or carried into captivity, so that thou shalt have none to sacrifice, ver. 43. Or it may be meant of the reformation of those of them that escape and survive the punishment; they shall take warning, and shall do no more presumptuously. The captivity in Babylon made the people of Israel to cease for ever from playing the harlot; it effectually cured them of their inclination to idolatry. And then all shall be well when this is the fruit, even the taking away of sin. Then, ver. 42, "My jealousy shall depart, I will be quiet, and no more angry." When we begin to be at war with sin, God will be at peace with us; for he continues the affliction no longer than till it has done its work. When sin departs, God's jealousy will soon depart; for he is never jealous but when we give him just cause to be so. Yet some understand this as a threatening of utter ruin, that God will make a full end, and the fire of his anger shall burn as long as there is any fuel for it. "His fury shall rest upon them," and not remove: compare this with that doom of unbelievers, Jno. iii. 36, "The wrath of God abideth on them." They shall drink the dregs of the cup, and then God will be no more angry, for he is eased of his adversaries, Isa. i. 24; is satisfied in the abandoning of them, and therefore will be no more angry, because there are no more for his anger to fasten upon. They had fretted him when judgment and mercy were contesting; but now he is quiet, as he will be in the eternal damnation of sinners, wherein he will be glorified, and therefore he will be satisfied.

44 Behold, every one that useth proverbs shall use this proverb against thee,
Saying, As is the mother, so is her daughter.
45 Thou art thy mother's daughter,
That lotheth her husband and her children;
And thou art the sister of thy sisters,
Which lothed their husbands and their children:
Your mother was an Hittite, and your father an Amorite.
46 And thine elder sister is Samaria,
She and her daughters that dwell at thy left hand:
And thy younger sister, that dwelleth at thy right hand,
Is Sodom and her daughters.
47 Yet hast thou not walked after their ways,
Nor done after their abominations:
But, as if that were a very little thing,
Thou wast corrupted more than they in all thy ways.
48 As I live, saith the Lord GOD,
Sodom thy sister hath not done, she nor her daughters,
As thou hast done, thou and thy daughters.
49 Behold, this was the iniquity of thy sister Sodom, Pride, fulness of bread, and abundance of idleness was
And in her daughters, [in her
Neither did she strengthen the hand of the poor and needy. [fore me:
50 And they were haughty, and committed abomination be-Therefore I took them away as I saw good.
51 Neither hath Samaria committed half of thy sins;
But thou hast multiplied thine abominations more than they,
And hast justified thy sisters in all thine abominations which thou hast done.
52 Thou also, which hast judged thy sisters, bear thine own shame for thy sins ness and conjugal unfaithfulness. The first part of verse 16 seems to refer to the pagan custom of adorning high places, i.e., altars or shrines, with pieces of cloth and the like. The gifts of God were alienated from their proper use, and devoted to wicked objects.

xvi. 20, 21. The custom of offering human sacrifices was widely prevalent, and often adopted by the rebellious Israelites.

xvi. 26—29. It is probable that Israel did not adopt the idolatries of all the nations mentioned in these verses, and that we must regard the references as pointing in part to the alliances which were entered into with them from time to time. As for the Egyptians, whose abominable worship requires no comment, it is well known that great reliance was placed upon them when the armies of Nebuchadnezzar menaced Jerusalem. "The daughters of the Philistines" may be the Philistines, who were sometimes allowed to vex Israel. Some of the allusions are necessarily obscure, because we have not all the details of the history. The Hebrew of verse 29 is

That thou hast committed more abominable than they:
They are more righteous than thou:
Yea, be thou confounded also, and bear thy shame,
In that thou hast justified thy sisters.
53 When I shall bring again their captivity,
The captivity of Sodom and her daughters,
And the captivity of Samaria and her daughters,
Then will I bring again the captivity of thy captives in the midst of them:
54 That thou mayest bear thine own shame,
And mayest be confounded in all that thou hast done,
In that thou art a comfort unto them
55 When thy sisters, Sodom and her daughters, shall return to their former estate,
And Samaria and her daughters shall return to their former estate,
Then thou and thy daughters shall return to your former estate.
56 For thy sister Sodom was not mentioned by thy mouth
In the day of thy pride,
57 Before thy wickedness was discovered,
As at the time of thy reproach of the daughters of Syria,
And all that are round about her, the daughters of the Philistines,
Which despise thee round about.
58 Thou hast borne thy lewdness
And thine abominations, saith the LORD
59 For thus saith the Lord GOD;
I will even deal with thee as thou hast done,
Which hast despised the oath in breaking the covenant.

The prophet here farther shews Jerusalem her abominations, by comparing her with those places that had gone before her, and shewing that she was worse than any of them, and therefore should, like them, be utterly and irreparably ruined. We are all apt to judge of ourselves by comparison, and to imagine that we are sufficiently good, if we are but as good as such and such that were thought passable; or that we are not dangerously bad, if we be not worse than such and such, who, though bad, were not of the worst. Now God, by the prophet, shews Jerusalem,

First. That she was as bad as her mother; that is, as the accursed devoted Canaanites that were the possessors of this land before her. They that use proverbs, as most people do, shall apply that proverb to Jerusalem, "As is the mother, so is her daughter," ver. 44. She is even mother's own child; the Jews are as like the Canaanites in temper and inclinations as if they had been their own children. The character of the mother was, that she "loathed her husband and her children." She had all the marks of an adulteress, and that is the character of the daughter; she forsakes the guide of her youth, and is barbarous to the children of her own bowels. When God brought Israel into Canaan he particularly warned them not to do according to the abominations of the men of that land, who went before them, for which it had spewed them out, Lev. xviii. 27, 28; the monuments of whose idolatry, with the remains of the idolaters themselves, would be a continual temptation to them. But they learned their way, and trod in their steps, and were as well affected to the idols of Canaan as ever they were, Ps. cvi. 38; and thus in respect of imitation it might truly be said, that their mother was a Hittite, and their father an Amorite, ver. 45, for they resembled them more than Abraham and Sarah.

Secondly. That she was worse than her sisters, Sodom and Samaria, that were adulteresses too, that "loathed their husbands and their children," that were weary of the gods of their fathers, and were for introducing new gods, a la mode,—'quite in style,' that came newly up, and new fashions in religion, and were given to change. On this comparison between Jerusalem and her sisters the prophet here enlargeth, that he might either shame them into repentance or justify God in their ruin. Observe,

1. Who Jerusalem's sisters were; ver. 45, Samaria and Sodom. Samaria is called the elder, or, rather, the greater sister, because it was a much larger city and kingdom, richer and more considerable, and more nearly allied to Israel; if Jerusalem look northward, this is partly on her left hand. This city of Samaria, and the towns and villages that were as daughters to that mother city, these had been lately destroyed for their spiritual whoredom. Sodom, and the adjacent towns and villages that were her daughters, dwelt at Jerusalem's right hand, and was her lesser sister, less than Jerusalem, less than Samaria; and these were of old destroyed for their corporal whoredom, Jude 7.

2. Wherein Jerusalem's sins resembled her sister's, particularly Sodom's; ver. 49, "This was the iniquity of Sodom," (it is implied, And this is thine iniquity too,) "pride, fulness of bread, and abundance of idleness." Their going after strange flesh, which was Sodom's most flagrant wickedness, is not mentioned, because notoriously known; but those sins which did not look so black, but opened the door and led the way to these more enormous crimes, and began to fill that measure of her sins which was filled up at length by their unnatural filthiness. Now these initiating sins were, 1st. Pride; in which the heart lifts up itself above and against both God and man. Pride was the first sin that turned angels into devils, and the garden of the Lord into a hell upon earth. It was the pride of the Sodomites that they despised righteous Lot, and would not bear to be reproved by him; and this ripened them for ruin. 2nd. Gluttony; here called fulness of bread. It was God's great mercy that they had plenty, but their great sin that they abused it, glutted themselves with it, ate to excess and drank to excess, and made that the gratification of their lusts which was given them to be the support of their lives. 3rd. Idleness; abundance of idleness, a dread of labour, and a love of ease. Their country was fruitful, and the abundance they had they came easily by, which was a temptation to them to indulge themselves in sloth, which disposed them to all that abominable filthiness which kindled their flames. Note, Idleness is an inlet to much sin. The men of Sodom that were idle were wicked, and sinners before the Lord, Gen. xiii. 13. The standing waters gather filth, and the sitting bird is the fowler's mark. When "David rose from off his bed at evening," he saw Bathsheba. Quæritur Ægistheus quare sit factus adulter? In promptu causa est, desidiosus erat,—'What made Ægistheus an adulterer? Indolence.' 4th. Oppression; Neither did she "strengthen the hands of the poor and needy." Probably it is implied that she weakened their hands, and broke their arms; however, it was bad enough, that when she had so much wealth, and consequently power, and interest, and leisure, she did nothing for the relief of the poor; in providing for whose wants those that themselves are full of bread may employ their time well,—they need not be so abundantly idle, as too often they are. These were the sins of the Sodomites, and these were Jerusalem's sins; their pride, the cause of their sins, is mentioned again ver. 50; they were haughty, with the horrid effects of their sins, their abominations which they committed before God. Men arrive gradually to the height of impiety and wickedness; Nemo repente fit turpissimus,—'No man reaches the height of vice at once.' But where pride has gotten the ascendant in a man he is in the high road to all abominations.

3. How much the sins of Jerusalem exceeded those of Sodom and Samaria; were more heinous in the sight of God, either in themselves or by reason of several aggravations. "Thou hast not only walked after their ways," and trod in their steps, but hast quite outdone them in wickedness, ver. 47. Thou thoughtest it as a very little thing to do as they did, didst laugh at them as sneaking sinners and silly ones; thou wouldst be more cunning, more daring in wickedness; wouldst triumph more boldly over thy convictions, and bid more open defiance to God and religion: if a man will break, let him break for something. Thus "thou wast corrupted more than they in all thy ways." Jerusalem was more polite, and therefore sinned with more wit, more art and ingenuity, than Sodom and Samaria could. Jerusalem had more wealth and power, and its government was more absolute and arbitrary, and therefore had the more opportunity of oppressing the poor, and shedding malignant influences around her, than Sodom and Samaria had. Jerusalem had the temple and the ark, and the priesthood, and kings of the house of David; and therefore the wickedness of that holy city, that was so dignified, so near, so dear to God, was more provoking to him than the wickedness of Sodom and Samaria, that had not Jerusalem's privileges and means of grace. "Sodom has not done as thou hast done," ver. 48. This agrees with what Christ saith, Mat. xi. 24, "It shall be more tolerable for the land of Sodom in the day of judgment than for thee." The kingdom of the ten tribes had been very wicked, and yet "Samaria has not committed half of thy sins," ver. 51; has not worshipped half so many idols, nor slain half so many prophets. It was bad enough that they of Jerusalem were guilty of Sodom's sins, sodomy itself not excepted, 1 Kin. xiv. 24; 2 Kin. xxiii. 7. And though the Dead sea, the standing monument of Sodom's sin and ruin, bordered upon their country, (Num. xxxiv. 12,) and that sulphureous lake was always under their nose, God having taken away Sodom and her daughters in such way and manner as he saw good, as he saith here, ver. 50, so as one thing should effectually make their "overthrow an ensample to those that after should live ungodly," (2 Pet. ii. 6,) yet they did not take warning, but "multiplied their abominations more than they." And,

1st. By this they justified Sodom and Samaria, ver. 51. They pretended, in their haughtiness and superciliousness, to judge them, and in the days of old, when they retained their integrity, they did judge them, ver. 52. But now they justify them comparatively; Sodom and Samaria are more righteous than thou, that is, less wicked. It will look like some extenuation of their sins, that, as bad as they were, Jerusalem was worse, though it was God's own city; not that it will serve as a plea to justify Sodom, but to condemn Jerusalem, against which Sodom and Samaria will rise up in judgment.

2nd. For this they ought themselves to be greatly ashamed. Thou who hast judged thy sisters, and cried out shame on them, now "bear thine own shame, for thy sins which thou hast committed," which, though of the same kind with theirs, yet being committed by thee are more abominable than theirs, ver. 52. This may be taken either as foretelling their ruin, "Thou shalt bear thy shame," or as inviting them to repentance, "Be thou confounded, and bear thy shame;" take the shame to thyself that is due to thee; and then it may be hoped sinners will forsake their sins, when they begin to be heartily ashamed of them. And therefore they shall go into captivity, and there they shall lie, that they may be "confounded in all that they have done;" because they had been a comfort and encouragement to Sodom and Samaria, ver. 54. Note, There is nothing in sin which we have more reason to be ashamed of than this, that by our sin we have encouraged others in sin, and comforted them in that for which they must be grieved, or they are undone. Another reason why they must now be ashamed is, because in the day of their prosperity they had looked with so much disdain upon their neighbours; "Thy sister Sodom was not mentioned by thee in the day of thy pride," ver. 56; they thought Sodom not worthy to be named the same day with Jerusalem, little dreaming that Jerusalem would at length lie under a worse and more scandalous character than Sodom herself. Those that are high may perhaps come to stand upon a level with those they contemn. Or, "Sodom was not mentioned," that is, the warning designed to be given to thee by Sodom's ruin was not regarded. If the Jews had but talked more frequently and seriously to one another and to their children concerning "the wrath of God revealed from heaven against Sodom's ungodliness and unrighteousness," it might have kept them in awe, and prevented their treading in their steps. But they kept the thought of it at a distance, would not bear the mention of it, and, as the ancients say, put Isaiah to death for putting them in mind of it, when he called them "rulers of Sodom and people of Gomorrah," Isa. i. 10. Note, Those are but preparing judgments for themselves that will not take notice of God's judgments upon others.

4. What desolations God had brought and was bringing upon Jerusalem for these wickednesses, wherein they had exceeded Sodom and Samaria. 1st. She hath already long ago been disgraced, and fallen into contempt among her neighbours; ver. 57, "Before her wickedness was discovered," before she came to be so grossly and openly flagitious, yet she bore the just punishment of her secret and more concealed lewdness, when she fell under "the reproach of the daughters of Syria; of the Philistines," who were said to despise her, and be ashamed of her," ver. 27; and of "all that were round about her;" which seems to refer to the descent made upon Judah by the Syrians in the days of Ahaz, and soon after another by the Philistines, 2 Chr. xxviii. 5, 18. Note, Those that disgrace themselves by yielding to their lusts will justly be brought into disgrace by being made to yield to their enemies. And it is observable that, before God brought potent enemies upon them for their destruction, he brought enemies upon them that were less formidable, for their reproach; and if lesser judgments would do the work God would not send greater. In this thou hast borne thy lewdness, ver. 58. Those that will not cast off their sins by repentance and reformation shall be made to bear their sins to their confusion. 2nd. She is now in captivity, or hastening into captivity, and therein is reckoned with, not only for her lewdness, ver 58, but for her perfidiousness and covenant-breaking, ver. 59, "I will deal with thee as thou hast done;" that is, I will forsake thee as thou hast forsaken me, and cast thee off as thou hast cast me off; for thou hast "despised the oath, in breaking the covenant," which seems to be variously rendered in part. For "in the land of Canaan unto Chaldea," Dr. Fairbairn has, "toward the land of Canaan, as far as Chaldea;" Dr. Benisch has, "with the land of Canaan unto Chaldea." Fürst supposes the land of Canaan here to mean "a territory north of the Persian Gulf, where there was a strong Phœnician settlement." If this can be established, all difficulty will disappear, and we may translate the words, "unto the land of Canaan in Chaldea," or in the direction of Chaldea. It is possible, however, that the sense is, "thou hast multiplied thy harlotries in the land of Canaan even unto Chaldea;" i.e., "from Canaan in the west to Chaldea in the east thou hast practised thy shameful arts." On the whole we prefer this view.

xvi. 43. The last clause, "and thou shalt not commit this lewdness above all thine abominations," is otherwise translated by some. Thus Dr. Benisch, "yet thou hast not carried out thine evil imagination with all thine abominations;" Sebastian Munster, "that thou meant of the covenant God made with their fathers at mount Sinai, whereby he took them and theirs to be a peculiar people to himself. They flatter themselves with a conceit that because God had hitherto continued his favour to them, notwithstanding their provocations, he would do so still. No, saith God, you have broken covenant with me, have despised both the promises of the covenant and the obligations of it, and therefore I will deal with thee as thou hast done. Note, Those that will not adhere to God as their God have no reason to expect that he should continue to own them as his people. 3rd. The captivity of the wicked Jews, and their ruin, shall be as irrecoverable as that of Sodom and Samaria. In this sense, as a threatening, most interpreters take ver. 53, 55, "When I shall bring again the captivity of Sodom and Samaria, and when they shall return to their former estate, then I will bring again the captivity of thy captives in the midst of them," and as it were for their sakes, and under their shadow and protection, because they are "more righteous than thou, and then thou shalt return to thy former estate." But Sodom and Samaria were never brought back, nor ever returned to their former estate, and therefore let not Jerusalem expect it; that is, those who now remained there, whom God would "deliver to be removed into all the kingdoms of the earth for their hurt," Jer. xxiv. 9, 10. Sooner shall the Sodomites arise out of the Salt sea, and the Samaritans return out of the land of Assyria, than they enjoy their peace and prosperity again; for, to their shame be it spoken, it is a comfort to those of the ten tribes who were dispersed and in captivity to see those of the two tribes who had been as bad or worse than they in like manner dispersed and in captivity. And therefore they shall live and die, shall stand and fall together; the bad ones of both shall perish together, the good ones of both shall return together. Note, Those who do as the worst of sinners do must expect to fare as they fare: "Let mine enemy be as the wicked."

60 Nevertheless I will remember my covenant with thee
In the days of thy youth,
And I will establish unto thee an everlasting covenant.
61 Then thou shalt remember thy ways, and be ashamed,
When thou shalt receive thy sisters, thine elder and thy younger:
And I will give them unto thee for daughters,
But not by thy covenant.
62 And I will establish my covenant with thee;
And thou shalt know that I am the LORD:
63 That thou mayest remember, and be confounded,
And never open thy mouth any more because of thy shame,
When I am pacified toward thee for all that thou hast done,
Saith the Lord GOD.

Here in the close of the chapter, after a most shameful conviction of sin, and a most dreadful denunciation of judgments, mercy is remembered mercy is reserved for those that shall come after; as was when God sware in his wrath concerning those who came out of Egypt that they should not enter into Canaan, "Yet," saith God, "your little ones shall;" so here. And some think that what is said of the return of Sodom and Samaria, ver. 53, 55, and of Jerusalem with them, is a promise; and it may be understood so, if by Sodom we understand, as Grotius and some of the Jewish writers do, the Moabites and Ammonites, the posterity of Lot, who once dwelt in Sodom; their captivity was returned, Jer. xlviii. 47, xlix. 6, as was that of many of the ten tribes, and Judah's with them. But these closing verses are without doubt a precious promise, which was in part fulfilled at the return of the penitent and reformed Jews out of Babylon, but was to have its full accomplishment in gospel times, and in "that repentance and remission of sins" which should then "be preached" with success "to all nations, beginning at Jerusalem." Now observe here,

First. From whence this mercy should take rise. From God himself, and his remembering his covenant with them, ver. 60. Nevertheless, though they have been so provoking, and God hast been so provoked, to that degree that one would think they could never be reconciled again, yet "I will remember my covenant with thee," that covenant which I made with thee "in the days of thy youth," and will revive it again. Though thou hast broken the covenant, ver. 59, I will remember it, and it shall flourish again. See how much it is our comfort and advantage that God is pleased to deal with us in a covenant way, for thus the mercies of it come to be sure mercies and everlasting, Isa. lv. 3; and while this root stands firm in the ground there is hope of the tree, though it be cut down, that through the scent of water it will bud again. We do not find that they put him in mind of the covenant, but ex mero motu,—'from his own mere good pleasure,' he remembers it as he had promised, Lev. xxvi. 42, "Then will I remember my covenant, and will remember the land." He that bids us to be ever mindful of the covenant no doubt will himself be ever mindful of it, "the word which he commanded;" and what he commands stands fast for ever, "to a thousand generations."

Secondly. How they should be prepared and qualified for this mercy; ver. 61, "Thou shalt remember thy ways," thine evil ways; God will put thee in mind of them, will set them in order before thee, that thou mayest be ashamed of them. Note, God's good work in us commenceth and keepeth pace with his good-will towards us. When he remembers his covenant for us, that he may not remember our sins against us, he puts us upon remembering our sins against ourselves; and if we will but be brought to remember our ways, how crooked and perverse they have been, and how we have walked contrary to God in them, we cannot but be ashamed; and when we are so we are best prepared to receive the honour and comfort of a sealed pardon and a settled peace.

Thirdly. What the mercy is that God has in reserve for them. 1. He will take them into covenant with himself; ver. 60, "I will establish unto thee an everlasting covenant; and again, ver. 62, "I will establish," re-establish, and establish more firmly than ever, "my covenant with thee." Note, It is an unspeakable comfort to all true penitents, that the covenant of grace is so well ordered in all things, that every transgression in the covenant doth not throw us out of covenant, for that is inviolable. 2. He will bring the Gentiles into church communion with them; ver. 61, "Thou shalt receive thy sisters," the Gentile nations that are round about thee, "thine elder and thy younger," greater than thou art and lesser, ancient nations and modern; and "I will give them unto thee for daughters," that is, they shall be founded, nursed, taught, and educated by that Gospel, that "word of the Lord which shall go forth from Zion and from Jerusalem;" so that all the neighbours shall call Jerusalem mother, while the church continues there, and shall acknowledge "the Jerusalem which is from above, and which is free, to be the mother of us all," Gal. iv. 26. They shall be thy daughters, "but not by thy covenant," that is, not by the covenant of peculiarity; not as being proselytes to the Jewish religion, and subjects to the yoke of the ceremonial law, but as being converts with thee to the Christian religion. Or, "not by thy covenant," that is, not upon such terms as thou shalt think fit to impose upon them as conquered nations, as captives and homagers, to whom thou mayest give law at pleasure, such a dominion as that the carnal Jews hope to have over the nations; no, they shall be the daughters by my covenant, the covenant of grace made with thee and them in concert, as an indenture tripartite. I will be a Father, a common Father, both to Jews and Gentiles, and so they shall become sisters to one another. And when thou shalt receive them thou shalt be ashamed of thine own evil ways wherein thou wast conformed to them. Thou shalt blush to look a Gentile in the face, remembering how much worse than the Gentiles thou wast in the day of thine apostacy.

Fourthly. What the fruit and effect of this will be.

1. God will hereby be glorified; ver. 62, "Thou shalt know that I am the Lord." It shall hereby be known that the God of Israel is Jehovah, a God of power, and faithful to his covenant. And thou shalt know it who hast hitherto lived as if thou didst not know or believe it. It had often been said in wrath, "Ye shall know that I am the Lord," shall know it to your cost; here it is said in mercy, Ye shall know it to your comfort. And it is one of the most precious promises of the new covenant which God has made with us, that "all shall know him, from the least unto the greatest."

2. They shall be hereby more humbled and abased for sin; ver. 63, That thou mayest be the more confounded at the remembrance of all that thou hast done amiss, mayest reproach thyself for it, and call thyself a thousand times unwise, undutiful, ungrateful, and unlike what thou wast; and mayest never open thy mouth any more in contradiction to God, reflection on him, or complaints of him, but mayest be for ever silent and submissive because of thy shame. Note, Those that rightly remember their sins will be truly ashamed of them; and those that are truly ashamed of their sins will see great reason to be patient under their afflictions, to be dumb, and not open their mouths against what God doth. But that which is most observable is, that all this shall be "when I am pacified toward thee, saith the Lord God." Note, It is the gracious ingenuity of true penitents that, the clearer evidences and the fuller instances they have of God's being reconciled to them, the more grieved and ashamed they are that ever they have offended. God is in Jesus Christ pacified towards us. He is our peace, and it is by his cross that we are reconciled, and in his Gospel that God is reconciling the world to himself. Now the consideration of this should be powerful to melt our hearts into a godly sorrow for sin. This is repenting because "the kingdom of heaven is at hand." The prodigal, after he had received the kiss, which assured him that his Father was pacified towards him, was ashamed and confounded, and said, "Father, I have sinned against heaven and before thee." And the more our shame for sin is increased by the sense of pardoning mercy, the more will our comfort in God be increased.

CHAPTER XVII.

God was in the foregoing chapter reckoning with the people of Judah, and bringing ruin upon them for their treachery in breaking covenant with him: in this chapter he is reckoning with the king of Judah for his treachery in breaking covenant with the king of Babylon; for when God came to contend with them he found many grounds of his controversy. The thing was now in doing, Zedekiah was practising with the king of Egypt underhand for assistance in a treacherous project he had formed to shake off the yoke of the king of Babylon, and violate the homage and fealty he had sworn to him. For this God by the prophet here, I. Threatens the ruin of him and his kingdom, by a parable of two eagles and a vine, ver. 1—10, and the reddition of that parable, ver. 11—21; but in the close, II. He promiseth hereafter to raise the royal family of Judah again, the house of David, in the Messiah and his kingdom, ver. 22—24.

AND the word of the LORD came unto me, saying, 2 Son of man, put forth a riddle, and speak a parable unto the house of Israel; 3 And say, Thus saith the Lord GOD;
A great eagle with great wings,
Longwinged, full of feathers, which had divers colours,
Came unto Lebanon, and took the highest branch of the cedar:
4 He cropped off the top of his young twigs,
And carried it into a land of traffick;
He set it in a city of merchants.
5 He took also of the seed of the land,
And planted it in a fruitful field;
He placed it by great waters, and set it as a willow tree.
6 And it grew, and became a spreading vine of low stature,
Whose branches turned toward him, and the roots thereof were under him:
So it became a vine,
And brought forth branches, and shot forth sprigs.
7 There was also another great eagle with great wings and many feathers:
And, behold, this vine did bend her roots toward him,
And shot forth her branches toward him,
That he might water it by the furrows of her plantation.
8 It was planted in a good soil by great waters,
That it might bring forth branches,
And that it might bear fruit,
That it might be a goodly vine.

shouldst not accomplish thine evil thought in all thine abominations;" Dr. Fairbairn, "and will not do what is scandalous upon all thine abominations." There is a various reading in the Hebrew, which partly accounts for the difference of translation. The text reads, "I will not do," and the margin has, "thou wilt not do." It is by no means easy to give a decided opinion, but we are quite inclined to prefer the version of Dr. Fairbairn, who says, "The verse treats of God's proceedings, not Israel's, and this clause is plainly a continuation of what he declared it his purpose to do to Israel. He will deal with her according to her sins, and will not be guilty of the scandalous part (such is the precise import of the phrase) of encouraging her in her sinful courses." The ancient versions mostly seem to oppose this explanation. The Syriac is, "because thou hast done abomination and lewdness;" the Greek is, "and thus hast thou committed impiety in addition to all thine iniquities;" the Latin is, "and I have not done according to all thy crimes in all thine abomina-

9 Say thou, Thus saith the Lord GOD; Shall it prosper?
Shall he not pull up the roots thereof,
And cut off the fruit thereof, that it wither?
It shall wither in all the leaves of her spring,
Even without great power or many people to pluck it up by the roots thereof.
10 Yea, behold, being planted, shall it prosper? [it?
Shall it not utterly wither, when the east wind toucheth
It shall wither in the furrows where it grew.
11 Moreover the word of the LORD came unto me, saying,
12 Say now to the rebellious house,
Know ye not what these things mean? [salem,
Tell them, Behold, the king of Babylon is come to Jeru-
And hath taken the king thereof, and the princes thereof,
And led them with him to Babylon;
13 And hath taken of the king's seed, and made a covenant
And hath taken an oath of him: [with him,
He hath also taken the mighty of the land:
14 That the kingdom might be base,
That it might not lift itself up,
But that by keeping of his covenant it might stand.
15 But he rebelled against him in sending his ambassadors into Egypt,
That they might give him horses and much people.
Shall he prosper? shall he escape that doeth such things?
Or shall he break the covenant, and be delivered?
16 As I live, saith the Lord GOD, [him king,
Surely in the place where the king dwelleth that made
Whose oath he despised, and whose covenant he brake,
Even with him in the midst of Babylon he shall die.
17 Neither shall Pharaoh with his mighty army and great
Make for him in the war, [company
By casting up mounts, and building forts, to cut off many persons:
18 Seeing he despised the oath by breaking the covenant,
When, lo, he had given his hand,
And hath done all these things, he shall not escape.
19 Therefore thus saith the Lord GOD;
As I live, surely mine oath that he hath despised,
And my covenant that he hath broken,
Even it will I recompense upon his own head.
20 And I will spread my net upon him,
And he shall be taken in my snare,
And I will bring him to Babylon,
And will plead with him there for his trespass
That he hath trespassed against me.
21 And all his fugitives with all his bands shall fall by the sword,
And they that remain shall be scattered toward all winds:
And ye shall know that I the LORD have spoken it.

THE ROMAN RETIARUS AND SECUTOR.

We must take all these verses together, that we may have the parable and the reddition of it at one view before us, because they will illustrate one another.

First. The prophet is appointed to put forth a riddle to the house of Israel, ver. 2; not to puzzle them, as Samson's riddle was put forth to the Philistines, not to hide the mind of God from them in obscurity, or to leave them in uncertainty about it, one advancing one conjecture, and another another, as is usual in expounding riddles; no, he is presently to tell them the meaning of it: "Let him that speaks in an unknown tongue pray that he may interpret," 1 Cor. xiv. 13. But he must deliver this message in a riddle or parable, that they might take the more notice of it, might be the more affected with it themselves, and might the better remember it and tell it to others. For these reasons God often used similitudes by his servants the prophets, and Christ himself opened his mouth in parables. Riddles and parables are used for an amusement to ourselves, and an entertainment to our friends. The prophet must make use of these to see if in this dress the things of God might find acceptance, and insinuate themselves into the minds of a careless people. Note, Ministers should study to find out acceptable words, and try various methods to do good; and, as far as they have reason to think will be for edification, should both bring that which is familiar into their preaching and their preaching too into their familiar discourse; that there may not be so vast a dissimilitude as with some there is between what they say in the pulpit and what they say out.

Secondly. He is appointed to expound this riddle to the rebellious house, ver. 12; though being rebellious they might justly have been left in ignorance, to see and hear and not perceive, yet the thing shall be explained to them. "Know ye not what these things mean?" They that knew the story, and what was now in agitation, might make a shrewd guess at the meaning of this riddle; but, that they might be left without excuse, he is to give it them in plain terms, stripped of the metaphor. But the enigma was first propounded for them to study on awhile, and to send to their friends at Jerusalem, that they might inquire after and expect the solution of it some time after. Let us now see what the matter of this message is.

1. Nebuchadnezzar had some time ago carried off Jehoiachin, the same that was called Jeconiah, when he was but eighteen years of age, and had reigned in Jerusalem but three months, him and his princes and great men, and had brought them captives to Babylon, 2 Kin. xxiv. 12. This in the parable is represented by an eagle's cropping the top and tender branch of a cedar, and carrying it into a land of traffic, a city of merchants, ver. 3, 4, which is explained, ver. 12. The king of Babylon took the king of Jerusalem, who was no more able to resist him than a young twig of a tree is to contend with the strongest bird of prey, that easily crops it off, perhaps towards the making of her nest. Nebuchadnezzar in Daniel's vision is a lion, the king of beasts, Dan. vii. 4; there he has eagles' wings, so swift were his motions, so speedy were his conquests. Here in this parable he is an eagle, the king of birds; a great eagle, that lives upon spoil and rapine, whose young ones suck up blood, Job xxxix. 30. His dominion extends itself far and wide, like the great and long wings of an eagle. The people are numerous, for it is full of feathers; the court splendid, for it has divers colours, which look like embroidering, as the word is. Jerusalem is Lebanon, a forest of houses, and very pleasant; the royal family is the cedar, Jehoiachin is the top branch, the top of the young twigs, which he crops off; Babylon is the land of traffic and city of merchants, where it is set. And the king of Judah, being of the house of David, will think himself much degraded and disgraced to be lodged among tradesmen; but he must make the best of it.

2. When he carried him to Babylon he made his uncle Zedekiah king in his room, ver. 5, 6. His name was Mattaniah, the 'gift of the Lord,' which Nebuchadnezzar changed into Zedekiah, the 'justice of the Lord,' to mind him to be just, like the God he called his, for fear of his justice. This was "one of the seed of the land," a native, not a foreigner, not one of his Babylonian princes. He was "planted in a fruitful field," for so Jerusalem as yet was; he "placed it by great waters," where it would be likely to grow like a willow tree, which grows quick, and grows best in moist ground, but is never designed or expected to be a stately tree. He set it with care and circumspection, so some read it; he wisely provided that it might grow, but that it might not grow too big. "He took of the king's seed," so it is explained, ver. 14, and "made a covenant with him," that he should have the kingdom, and enjoy the regal power and dignity, provided he held it as his vassal, dependent on him, and accountable to him. He "took an oath of him," made him swear allegiance to him, swear by his own God, the God of Israel, that he would be a faithful tributary to him, 2 Chr. xxxvi. 13. He also "took away the mighty of the land," the chief of the men of war, partly as hostages for the performance of the covenant, and partly that, the land being thereby weakened, the king might be the less able, and therefore the less in temptation, to break his league. What he designed we are told, ver. 14, "That the kingdom might be base," in respect both of honour and strength; might neither be a rival with its powerful neighbours nor a terror to its feeble ones as it had been; that "it might not lift up itself" to vie with the kingdom of Babylon, or to bear down any of the petty states that were in subjection to it. But yet he designed that "by keeping of this covenant it may stand," and continue a kingdom. Hereby the pride and ambition of that haughty potentate would be gratified, who aimed to be like the Most High, Isa. xiv. 14; to have all about him subject to him. Now see here, 1st. How sad a change sin made with the royal family of Judah. Time was when all the nations about were tributaries to that; now that has not only lost its dominion over other nations, but is itself become a tributary. "How is the gold become dim!" Nations by sin sell their liberty, and princes their dignity, and "profane their crowns by casting them to the ground." 2nd. How wisely Zedekiah did for himself in accepting these terms, though they were dishonourable, when necessity brought him to it. A man may live very comfortably, and contentedly, though he cannot bear a part, and make a figure as formely. A kingdom may stand firm and safe, though it do not stand so high as it hath sometimes done, and so may a family.

3. Zedekiah, while he continued faithful to the king of Babylon, did very well; and if he would but have reformed his kingdom, and returned to God and his duty, he had done better, and by that means might soon have recovered his former dignity, ver. 6. This plant grew, and though it was "set as a willow tree," and little account was made of it, yet it became "a spreading vine of low stature," a great blessing to his own country, and his fruits making glad their hearts. And it is better to be a spreading vine of low stature than a lofty cedar of no use. Nebuchadnezzar was pleased, for "the branches turned tions;" the Chaldee is, "thou hast not taken counsel with thyself to turn from all thine abominations."

xvi. 46, 47. After repeating what is said of her parentage in verse 3, Jerusalem is told that her elder sister is Samaria, and her younger sister Sodom. The word rendered "elder" is in Hebrew "great," and may be rendered "greater;" but whether explained as the elder or greater sister of Jerusalem, it seems to mean that Samaria was pre-eminent in sinfulness. Samaria and her daughters who dwelt at the left hand were Samaria and its dependent towns, all of which lay at the left hand, i.e., the north of Jerusalem. Some say that Samaria is called the elder sister of Jerusalem because, as capital of the northern kingdom, it was first in the practice of idolatry and rebellion against God. Sodom and its dependent towns are called the younger (Heb., small) sister of Jerusalem. The right hand here means the south, as the left hand the north, and is a phraseology arising out of facing the east, where the sun rises, and calling that towards him," and rested on him as the vine on the wall, and he had his share of this vine. "The roots thereof" too were "under him," and at his disposal. The Jews had reason to be pleased, for they sat under their own vine, which "brought forth branches, and shot forth sprigs," and looked pleasant and promising. See how gradually the judgments of God came upon this provoking people; how God gave them respite, and so gave them space to repent. He made their kingdom base, to try if that would humble them, before he made it no kingdom; yet left it easy for them, to try if that would win upon them to return to him, that the troubles threatened might be prevented.

4. Zedekiah knew not when he was well, but grew impatient of the disgrace of being a tributary to the king of Babylon, and to get clear of it entered into a private league with the king of Egypt. He had no reason to complain that the king of Babylon put any new hardships upon him, or improved his advantages against him, that he oppressed or impoverished his country; for, as the prophet had said before, ver. 6, to aggravate his treachery, he shews again, ver. 8, what a fair way he was in to be considerable; "He was planted in a good soil, by great waters;" his family was likely enough to be built up, and his exchequer to be filled in a little time, so that if he had dealt faithfully he might have been a goodly vine. But there was "another great eagle" that he had an affection for, and put a confidence in, and that was the king of Egypt, ver. 7. Those two great potentates, the kings of Babylon and Egypt, were but two great eagles, birds of prey. This great eagle of Egypt is said to have great wings, but not to be long-winged, as the king of Babylon, because, though the kingdom of Egypt was strong, yet it was not of such a vast extent as that of Babylon was. The great eagle is said to have many feathers, much wealth, and many soldiers, which he depended upon as a substantial defence, but really were no more than as many feathers. Zedekiah, promising himself liberty, made himself a vassal to the king of Egypt, foolishly expecting ease by changing his master. Now, this vine did secretly and underhand "bend her roots" towards the king of Egypt, that great eagle, and after awhile did openly "shoot forth her branches towards him," give him an intimation how much she coveted an alliance with him, "that he might water it by the furrows of her plantation," whereas it was "planted by great waters," and did not need any assistance from him. This is expounded, ver. 15. Zedekiah rebelled against the king of Babylon in "sending his ambassadors into Egypt," that they might "give him horses and much people," to enable him to contend with the king of Babylon. See what a change sin had made with the people of God. God promised they should be a numerous people, as the sand of the sea; yet now, if their king has occasion for much people, he must send to Egypt for them, they being for sin diminished and brought low, Ps. cvii. 39. See also the folly of fretful, discontented spirits, that ruin themselves by striving to mend themselves; whereas they might be easy and happy enough if they would but make the best of that which is.

5. God here threatens Zedekiah with the utter destruction of him and his kingdom, and in displeasure against him passeth that doom upon him, for his treacherous revolt from the king of Babylon. This is represented in the parable, ver. 9, 19, by the "plucking up of this vine by the roots, the cutting off the fruit, and the withering of the leaves," the leaves of her spring, when they are in their greenness, Job viii. 12, before they begin in autumn to wither of themselves. The project shall be blasted, it shall utterly wither, the affairs of this perfidious prince shall be ruined past retrieve, as a vine when the east wind blasts it, so that it shall be fit for nothing but the fire, as we had it in that parable, ch. xv. 4; it shall wither even "in the furrows where it grew," though they were never so well watered. It shall be destroyed "without great power or many people to pluck it up;" for what need is there of raising the militia to pluck up a vine? Note, God can bring great things to pass without much ado. He needs not great power and many people to effect his purposes, a handful will serve if he pleaseth. He without any difficulty ruined a sinful king and kingdom, and made no more of it than we do of rooting up a tree that cumbers the ground.

In the reddition of the parable the sentence is very largely recorded; "Shall he prosper?" ver. 15; can he expect to do ill and fare well? Nay, shall he that doth such wicked things escape? Shall he break the covenant and be delivered from that vengeance which is the just punishment of his treachery? No; can he expect to do ill, and not suffer ill? Let him hear his doom.

1st. It is ratified by the oath of God; ver. 16, "As I live, saith the Lord God, he shall die" for it. This intimates how highly God resented the crime, and how sure and severe the punishment of it would be. God swears in his wrath, as he did Ps. xcv. 11. Note, As God's promises are confirmed with an oath of comfort to the saints, so are his threatenings for terror to the wicked. As sure as God lives and is happy, I may add, and as long, so sure, so long, shall impenitent sinners die, and be miserable.

2nd. It is justified by the heinousness of the crime he had been guilty of. First. He had been very ungrateful to his benefactor, who had made him king, and undertook to protect him; had made him a prince when he might as easily have made him a prisoner. Note, It is a sin against God to be unkind to our friends, and to lift up the heel against those that have helped to raise us. Secondly. He had been very false to him whom he had covenanted with. This is mostly insisted on. He despised the oath; when his conscience or friends minded him of it, he made a jest of it, put on a daring resolution, and broke it, ver. 15, 16, 18, 19. He broke through it, and took a pride in making nothing of it, as a great tyrant in our own day, whose maxim (they say) it is, 'that princes ought not to be slaves to their word any farther than is for their interest.' That which aggravates Zedekiah's perfidiousness was that the oath by which he had bound himself to the king of Babylon, was, 1*st.* A solemn oath. An emphasis is laid upon this, ver. 18, "When, lo, he had given his hand," as a confederate with the king of Babylon, not only as his subject but as his friend, the joining of hands being a token of the joining of hearts. 2*nd.* A sacred oath. God saith, ver. 19, It is mine oath that he has despised, and "my covenant that he has broken." In every solemn oath God is appealed to as a witness of the sincerity of him that swears, and invocated as a judge and revenger of his treachery if he now swear falsely, or at any time hereafter break his oath. But the oath of allegiance to a prince is particularly called the oath of God, Eccl. viii 2, as if that had something in it more sacred than another oath; for princes are ministers of God to us for good, Rom. xiii. 4. Now Zedekiah's breaking this oath and covenant is the sin which God will "recompense upon his own head," ver. 19; the "trespass which he hath trespassed against God," for which God will plead with him, ver. 20. Note, Perjury is a heinous sin, and highly provoking to the God of heaven. It would not serve for an excuse, (1.) That he who took this oath was a king, a king of the house of David, whose liberty and dignity might surely set him above the obligation of oaths. No, though kings are gods to us, they are men to God, and not exempt from his law and judgment. The prince is doubtless as firmly bound, before God, to the people by his coronation oath, as the people to the prince by the oath of allegiance. (2.) Nor that this oath was sworn to the king of Babylon, a heathen prince, worse than a heretic, with whom the church of Rome saith no faith is to be kept. No, though Nebuchadnezzar was a worshipper of false gods, yet the true God will avenge his quarrel when one of his worshippers breaks his league with him. For truth is a debt owing to all men; and if the professors of the true religion deal perfidiously with those of a false religion, their profession will be so far from excusing, much less justifying them, that it aggravates their sin; and God will the more surely and severely punish it, because by it they give occasion to the enemies of the Lord to blaspheme; as that Mahometan prince who, when the Christians broke the league with him, cried out, 'O Jesus, are these thy Christians?' (3.) Nor would it justify him that the oath was extorted from him by a conqueror; for the covenant was made upon a valuable consideration. He held his life and crown upon this condition, that he should be faithful and bear true allegiance to the king of Babylon; and if he enjoy the benefit of his bargain, it is very unjust if he do not observe the terms. Let him know then that, having "despised the oath and broken the covenant, he shall not escape." And if the contempt and violation of such an oath, such a covenant as this, would be so punished, of how much sorer punishment shall they be thought worthy who break covenant with God, when, lo, they had given their hand upon it that they would be faithful; who tread under foot the blood of that covenant as an unholy thing? Betwixt the covenants there is no comparison.

3rd. It is particularized in divers instances, wherein the punishment is made to answer the sin. First. He had rebelled against the king of Babylon, and the king of Babylon should be his effectual conqueror. In the place where that king dwells whose covenant he broke, even "with him in the midst of Babylon he shall die," ver. 16. He thinks to get out of his hands, but he shall fall more than before into his hands; God himself will now take part with the king of Babylon against him: "I will spread my net upon him," ver. 20. God has a net for those that deal perfidiously, and think to escape his righteous judgments, in which they shall be taken and held that would not be held by the bond of an oath and covenant. Zedekiah dreaded Babylon; Thither I will bring him, saith God, and plead with him there. Men will justly be forced upon that calamity which they endeavour by sin to flee from. Secondly. He had relied upon the king of Egypt, and the king of Egypt should be his ineffectual helper. "Pharaoh with his mighty army shall not make for him in the war," ver. 17, shall do him no service, nor give any check to the progress of the Chaldean forces. He shall not assist him in the siege by casting up mounts and building forts, nor in battle by cutting off many persons. Note, Every creature is that to us that God makes it to be; and he commonly weakens and withers that arm of flesh which we trust in and stay ourselves upon. Now was again fulfilled what was spoken on a former like occasion, Isa. xxx. 7, "The Egyptians shall help in vain." They did so; for, though upon the approach of the Egyptian army the Chaldeans withdrew from the siege of Jerusalem, upon their retreat they returned to it again and took it. It should seem the Egyptians were not hearty, had strength enough but no goodwill to help Zedekiah. Note, Those who deal treacherously with those that put a confidence in them will justly be dealt treacherously with by those they put a confidence in. Yet, the Egyptians were not the only states Zedekiah stayed himself upon. He had bands of his own to stand by him. But those bands, though we may suppose they were veteran troops, and the best soldiers his kingdom afforded, yet they shall become fugitives, shall quit their posts and make the best of their way, and shall fall by the sword of the enemy; and the remains of them shall be scattered, ver. 21. This was fulfilled when "the city was broken up, and all the men of war fled," Jer. lii. 7. Then "ye shall know that I the Lord have spoken it." Note, Sooner or later God's word will prove itself; and those who will not believe shall find by experience the reality and weight of it.

22 Thus saith the Lord GOD;
I will also take of the highest branch of the high cedar,
and will set it;
I will crop off from the top of his young twigs a tender one,
And will plant it upon an high mountain and eminent:
23 In the mountain of the height of Israel will I plant it:
And it shall bring forth boughs, and bear fruit, and be a goodly cedar:
And under it shall dwell all fowl of every wing;
In the shadow of the branches thereof shall they dwell.
24 And all the trees of the field shall know
That I the LORD have brought down the high tree, have exalted the low tree,
Have dried up the green tree, and have made the dry tree to flourish:
I the LORD have spoken and have done it.

When the royal family of Judah was brought to desolation by the captivity of Jehoiachin and Zedekiah, it might be asked, What is now become of the covenant of royalty made with David, that "his children should sit upon his throne for evermore?" Do the sure mercies of David prove thus unsure? To which it is sufficient for the silencing of the objectors to answer, that the promise was conditional: If they will keep my covenant, then they shall continue, Ps. cxxxii. 12. But David's posterity broke the condition, and so forfeited the promise. But the unbelief of man shall not invalidate the promise of God. He will find out another seed of David in which it shall be accomplished; and that is promised in these verses.

First. The house of David shall again be magnified, and out of its ashes another phœnix shall arise. The metaphor of a tree which was made use of in the threatening is here presented in the promise, ver. 22, 23. This promise had its accomplishment in part when Zerubbabel, a branch of the house of David, was raised up to head the Jews in their return out of captivity, and to rebuild the city and temple, and re-establish their church and state. But it was to have its full accomplishment in the kingdom of the Messiah, who was a root out of a dry ground, and to whom God according to promise gave the throne of his father David, Lu. i. 32.

1. God himself undertakes the reviving and restoring of the house of David. Nebuchadnezzar was the great eagle that had attempted the re-establishing of the house of David in a dependence upon him, ver. 5. But the attempt miscarried; his plantation withered, and was plucked up. Well, saith God, the next shall be of my planting, "I will also take of the highest branch of the high cedar, and I will set it." Note, As men have their designs, God also hath his designs; but his will prosper when theirs are blasted. Nebuchadnezzar prided himself in setting up kingdoms at his pleasure, Dan. v. 19; but those kingdoms soon had an end: whereas "the God of heaven sets up a kingdom that shall never be destroyed," Dan. ii. 44.

"before," and the west "behind." Sodom here can scarcely be called the younger sister of Jerusalem in respect of age, and we may therefore take the word to mean "little" or lesser, as suggested by our translators in the margin. The aim of the whole is clear—viz., to show that Jerusalem was not only akin to the vile Amorite and Hittite, but even to Samaria and Sodom. A little lower, in verse 57, as if still more to bring out the guilt of Jerusalem, it is declared that even Syria looked on her with scorn; for the words "thy reproach," as our version reads, refer to the contempt and scorn with which Jerusalem was regarded by Syria. It is in vain to speculate upon the restoration of Sodom and Samaria indicated in verses 53—55, because other texts do not help us.

xvii. 3, 4. As a particular eagle is meant, the Hebrew is, "The great eagle, with great wings, long pinions, full plumage, and variegated array." "The highest branch of the cedar" is the leading shoot of the principal stem, and therefore that of most import-

2. The house of David is revived in "a tender one cropped from the top of his young twigs." Zerubbabel was so; what was in him that was hopeful was but the day of small things, Zec. iv. 10, yet before him great mountains were made plain. Our Lord Jesus was "the highest branch of the high cedar," the farthest of all from the root, for soon after he appeared the house of David was all cut off and extinguished; but the nearest of all to heaven, for his kingdom was not of this world. He was "taken from the top of the young twigs," for he is "the man, the branch, a tender plant, and a root out of a dry ground," Isa. liii. 2, but "a branch of righteousness, the planting of the Lord that he may be glorified."

3. This branch is planted in a high mountain, ver. 22, "in the mountain of the height of Israel," ver. 23. Thither he brought Zerubbabel in triumph, there he raised up his Son Jesus, sent him to gather the lost sheep of the house of Israel that were scattered upon the mountains; set him his king upon his holy hill of Zion, sent forth the Gospel from mount Zion, the word of the Lord from Jerusalem; there in the height of Israel, a nation which all its neighbours had an eye upon as conspicuous and illustrious, was the Christian church first planted. The churches of Judæa were the most primitive churches. The unbelieving Jews did what they could to prevent its being planted there; but who can pluck up what God will plant?

4. From thence it spreads far and wide. The Jewish state, though it began very low in Zerubbabel's time, was set as a tender branch which might easily be plucked up, yet took root, spread strangely, and after some time became very considerable. Those of other nations, "fowl of every wing," put themselves under the protection of it. The Christian church was at first like a grain of mustard-seed, but became, like this tender branch here, a great tree; its beginning small, but its latter end increasing to admiration. When the Gentiles flocked into the church then did the fowl of every wing (even the birds of prey, with those preyed upon, as the wolf and the lamb feeding together, Isa. xi. 6,) come and "dwell under the shadow of this goodly cedar:" see Dan. iv. 21.

Secondly. God himself will herein be glorified, ver. 24. The setting up of the Messiah's kingdom in the world shall discover more clearly than ever to the children of men that "God is the king of all the earth," Ps. xlvii. 7. Never was there a more full conviction given of this truth, that all things are governed by an infinitely wise and mighty Providence, than that which was given by the exaltation of Christ and the establishment of his kingdom among men; for by that it appeared that God has all hearts in his hand, and the sovereign disposal of all affairs. "All the trees of the field shall know," 1. That the tree which God will have to be brought down and dried up shall be so, though it be never so high and stately, never so green and flourishing. Neither honour nor wealth, neither external advancements nor internal endowments, will secure men from humbling, withering providences. 2. That the trees which God will have to be exalted, and to flourish, shall so be, shall so do, though never so low, and never so dry. The house of Nebuchadnezzar that now makes so great a figure shall be extirpated; and the house of David that now makes so mean a figure shall become famous again, and the Jewish nation that is now despicable shall be considerable. The kingdom of Satan that has borne so long, so large a sway, shall be broken, and the kingdom of Christ, that was looked upon with contempt, shall be established. The Jews, that in respect of church privileges had been high and green, shall be thrown out, and the Gentiles, that had been low and dry trees, shall be taken in their room, Isa. liv. 1. All the enemies of Christ shall be abased and made his footstool, and his interests shall be confirmed and advanced. "I the Lord have spoken," it is the decree, the declared decree, that Christ must be exalted, must be the head-stone of the corner; "and I have done it," that is, I will do it in due time, but it is as sure to be done as if it were done already. With men saying and doing are two things; but they are not so with God. What he hath spoken we may be sure he will do, nor shall one iota or tittle of his word fall to the ground: "for he is not a man that he should lie, or the son of man that he should repent," either of his threatenings or of his promises.

CHAPTER XVIII.

Perhaps, in the reading of some of the chapters foregoing, we may have been tempted to think ourselves not much concerned in them, (though they also were written for our learning), but this chapter at first view appears highly and nearly to concern us all very highly, very nearly; for, without particular reference to Judah and Jerusalem, it lays down the rule of judgment according to which God will deal with the children of men, in determining them to their everlasting state; and it agrees with that very ancient rule laid down, Gen. iv. 7; "If thou doest well, shalt thou not be accepted?" but, "if not, sin," the punishment of sin, "lies at the door." Here is, I. The corrupt proverb used by the profane Jews, which gave occasion to this message here sent them, and made it necessary for the justifying of God in his dealings with them, ver. 1—3. II. The reply given to this proverb, in which God asserts in general his own sovereignty and justice, ver. 4; Woe to the wicked, it shall be ill with them, ver. 4, 20; but say to the righteous, it shall be well with them, ver. 5—9. In particular, as to the case complained of, he assures us, 1. That it shall be ill with a wicked man, though he had a good father, ver. 10—13; 2. That it shall be well with a good man, though he had a wicked father, ver. 14—18, and therefore in this God is righteous, ver. 19, 20; 3. That it shall be well with penitents, though they began never so ill, ver. 21—23, and again, ver. 27, 28; 4. That it shall be ill with apostates, though they began never so well, ver. 24, 26. III. And the use of all this is: 1. To justify God, and clear the equity of all his proceedings, ver. 25, 29; 2. To engage and encourage us to repent of our sins and turn to God, ver. 30—32, and these are things which belong to our everlasting peace. O that we may understand and regard them, before they be hid from our eyes!

THE word of the LORD came unto me again, saying, 2 What mean ye, that ye use this proverb concerning the land of Israel, saying, The fathers have eaten sour grapes, and the children's teeth are set on edge?

3 As I live, saith the Lord GOD,
Ye shall not have occasion any more
To use this proverb in Israel.
4 Behold, all souls are mine; [mine:
As the soul of the father, so also the soul of the son is
The soul that sinneth, it shall die
5 But if a man be just,
And do that which is lawful and right,
6 And hath not eaten upon the mountains,
Neither hath lifted up his eyes to the idols of the house [of Israel,
Neither hath defiled his neighbour's wife,
Neither hath come near to a menstruous woman,
7 And hath not oppressed any,
But hath restored to the debtor his pledge,
Hath spoiled none by violence,
Hath given his bread to the hungry,
And hath covered the naked with a garment;
8 He that hath not given forth upon usury,
Neither hath taken any increase,
That hath withdrawn his hand from iniquity,
Hath executed true judgment between man and man,
9 Hath walked in my statutes,
And hath kept my judgments, to deal truly;
He is just, he shall surely live, saith the Lord GOD

Evil manners, we say, beget good laws; and, in like manner, sometimes unjust reflections occasion just vindications; evil proverbs beget good prophecies. Here is,

First. An evil proverb commonly used by the Jews in their captivity. We had one before, ch. xii. 22, and a reply to it; here we have another, that sets God's justice at defiance; "The days are prolonged, and every vision faileth;" the threatenings are a jest. This chargeth him with injustice, as if the judgments executed were a wrong; "You use this proverb concerning the land of Israel," now it is laid waste by the judgments of God, "saying, The fathers have eaten sour grapes, and the children's teeth are set on edge;" that is, we are punished for the sins of our ancestors; which is as great an absurdity in the Divine regimen as if the children should have their teeth set on edge, or stupified, by the fathers' eating sour grapes; whereas, in the order of natural causes, if men eat or drink any thing amiss, they only themselves shall suffer by it. Now,

1. It must be owned that there was some occasion given for this proverb. God had often said that he would "visit the iniquity of the fathers upon the children," especially the sin of idolatry, intending thereby to express the evil of sin, of that sin, his detestation of it, and just indignation against it, and the heavy punishments he would bring upon idolaters; and that parents might be restrained from sin by their affection to their children, and that children might not be drawn to sin by their reverence for their parent. He had likewise often declared by his prophets, that in bringing the present ruin upon Judah and Jerusalem he had an eye to the sins of Manasseh, and other preceding kings; for, looking upon the nation as a body politic, and punishing them with national judgments for national sins, and admitting the maxim in our law, that a corporation never dies, reckoning with them now for the iniquities of former ages was but like making a man when he is old to possess the iniquities of his youth, Job xiii. 26; and there is no unrighteousness with God in doing so. But,

2. They intended it as a reflection upon God, and an impeachment of his equity, in his proceedings against them. Thus far that is right which is implied in this proverbial saying, that they who are guilty of wilful sin eat sour grapes, they do that which they will feel from, sooner or later. The grapes may look well enough in the temptation, but they will be bitter as bitterness itself in the reflection. They will set the sinner's teeth on edge; when conscience is awake and sets the sin in order before them, it will spoil the relish of their comforts as when the teeth are set on edge. But they suggest it as unreasonable that the children should smart for the fathers' folly, and feel the pain of that which they never tasted the pleasure of; and that God was unrighteous in thus taking vengeance, and could not justify it. See how wicked the reflection is, how daring the impudence! yet see how witty it is, and how sly the comparison. Many that are impious in their jeers are ingenious in their jests; and thus the malice of hell against God and religion is insinuated and propagated. It is here put into a proverb, and that proverb used, commonly used; they had it up ever and anon. And though it had plainly a blasphemous meaning, yet they sheltered themselves under the similitude from the imputation of downright blasphemy. Now, by this it appears they were unhumbled under the rod; for, instead of condemning themselves and justifying God, they condemned him and justified themselves. But woe to him that thus strives with his Maker.

Secondly. A just reproof of, and reply to, this proverb; "What mean ye" to use it? that is the reproof; do you intend hereby to try it out with God? Or, can you think any other but that you will hereby provoke him to be angry with you till he has consumed you? Is this the way to reconcile yourselves to him, and make your peace with him? The reply follows, in which God tells them,

1. That the use of the proverb should be taken away. This is said, it is sworn; ver. 3, "Ye shall not have occasion any more to use this proverb." Or, as it may be read, 'Ye shall not have the use of this parable.' The taking away of this parable is made the matter of a promise, Jer. xxxi. 29, here it is made the matter of a threatening; there it intimates that God will return to them in ways of mercy, here it intimates that God would proceed against them in ways of judgment. He will so punish them for this impudent saying that they shall not dare to use it any more: as in another case, Jer. xxiii. 34, 36. God will find out effectual ways to silence those cavillers; or, God will so manifest, both to themselves and others, that they have wickedness of their own enough to bring all these desolating judgments upon them, that they shall no longer for shame lay it upon the sins of their fathers that they were thus dealt with. Your own consciences shall tell you, and all your neighbours shall confirm it, that you yourselves have eaten the same sour grapes that your fathers did eat before you, or else your teeth had not been set on edge.

2. That really the saying itself was unjust, and a causeless reflection upon God's government. For, 1st. God doth not punish the children for the fathers' sins, unless they tread in their steps, and fill up the measure of their iniquity," Mat. xxiii. 32, and then they have no reason to complain; for whatsoever they suffer it is less than their own sin has deserved. And when God speaks of "visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children," that is so far from putting any hardship upon the children, to whom he only renders according to their works, that it accounts for God's patience with the parents, whom he therefore does not punish presently, because he "lays up their iniquity for their children," Job xxix. 19. 2nd. It is not only in temporal calamities that children (and sometimes innocent ones) fare the worse for their parents' wickedness; and ance to the tree it belonged to. The lesser twigs were also cropped, and taken to "a land of Canaan," as the Hebrew, with the semblance of bitter irony, expresses it. It was to "a land of Canaan," i.e., of merchandise and trade, that Israel came from Egypt, and it was to "a land of Canaan" that Israel went when carried captive to the busy haunts of the Assyrians, among which Babylon was pre-eminent; for thither the merchants of all nations flocked to buy and sell. It was the centre of the world's commerce.

xvii. 7. The Hebrew word rendered "another" means "one," and should be translated "a certain great eagle," &c., the allusion being to Pharaoh. The enigma of the chapter is explained so fully that very few difficulties remain, none perhaps except two or three purely philological.

xvii. 20. "I will spread my net upon him," &c., may remind us of the "retiarii," as the Romans called a class of gladiators who fought with a net and a three-pronged weapon. The net they endeavoured

God can alter the property of those calamities, and make them work for good to those that are visited with them. But as to spiritual and eternal misery, (and that is the death here spoken of,) the children shall by no means smart for the parents' sins. This is here shewed at large, and it is a wonderful piece of condescension, that the great God is pleased to reason the case with such wicked and unreasonable men, that he did not immediately strike them dumb and dead, but vouchsafed to state the matter before them, that he may be clear when he is judged. Now in his reply,

First. He asserts and maintains his own absolute and incontestable sovereignty; "Behold, all souls are mine," ver. 4. God here claims a property in all the souls of the children of men, one as well as another. 1*st.* Souls are his. He that is the Maker of all things is in a peculiar manner the Father of spirits, for his image is stamped on the souls of men. It was so in their creation, it is so in their renovation. He "formeth the spirit of man within him," and is therefore called "the God of the spirits of all flesh," and embodied spirits. 2*nd.* "All souls are his," all created by him, and for him, and accountable to him. "As the soul of the father, so the soul of the son is mine." Our earthly parents are only the fathers of our flesh, our souls are not theirs, God challengeth them. Now, from hence it follows for the clearing of this matter, (1.) That it is certain God may do what he pleaseth, both with fathers and children, and none may say unto him, What doest thou? He that gave us our being doth us no wrong if he take it away again, much less when he only takes away some of the supports and comforts of it. It is as absurd to quarrel with him as for "the thing formed to say to him that formed it, Why hast thou made me thus?" (2.) That it is as certain God bears a good will both to father and son, and will put no hardship upon either. We are sure God hateth nothing that he has made, and therefore (speaking of the adult who are capable of acting for themselves) he has such a kindness for all souls, that none die but through their own default. "All souls are his," and therefore he is not partial in his judgment with them; let us subscribe to his interest in us, and dominion over us. He saith, "All souls are mine;" let us answer, Lord, my soul is thine, I devote it to thee, to be employed for thee, and made happy in thee. It is with good reason that God saith, "My son, give me thy heart," for it is my own; to which we must yield, Father, take my heart, it is thy own.

Secondly. Though God might justify himself by insisting upon his sovereignty, yet he waives that, and lays down the equitable and unexceptionable rule of judgment by which he will proceed as to particular persons, and it is this:

1*st.* The sinner that persists in sin shall certainly die; his iniquity shall be his ruin. "The soul that sinneth it shall die," shall die as a soul can die, shall be excluded from the favour of God, which is the life and bliss of the soul, and shall lie for ever under his wrath, which is its death and misery. Sin is the act of the soul, the body is but the instrument of unrighteousness. It is called the sin of the soul, Mic. vi. 7; and therefore the punishment of sin is the tribulation and anguish of the soul, Rom. ii. 9.

2*nd.* The righteous man that perseveres in his righteousness shall certainly live. "If a man be just," have a good principle, a good spirit and disposition, and, as an evidence of that, "do judgment and justice," ver. 5, "he shall surely live, saith the Lord God," ver. 9. He that makes conscience of conforming himself in every thing to the will of God, that makes it his business to serve God, and his aim to glorify God, he shall, without fail, be happy here and for ever, in the love and favour of God; and wherein he comes short of his duty, it shall be forgiven him through a Mediator.

1. He is careful to keep himself clear from the pollutions of sin, and at a distance from all the appearances of evil.

(1.) From sins against the second commandment. In the matters of God's worship he is jealous, for he knows God is so. He hath not only not sacrificed in the high places to the images there set up, but he has not so much as eaten upon the mountains, that is, not had any communion with idolaters by eating things sacrificed to idols, 1 Cor. x. 20. He would not only not kneel with them at their altars, but not sit with them at their tables in their high places. He detests not only the idols of the heathen, but the idols of the house of Israel, which were not only allowed of, but generally applauded and adored by, those that were accounted the professing people of God. He has not only not worshipped those idols, but he hath not so much as lift up his eyes to them, he has not given them a favourable look; has had no regard at all to them, neither desired their favour nor dreaded their frowns. He has observed so many bewitched by them, that he has not dared so much as to look at them, lest he should be taken in the snare. The eyes of idolaters are said to go a whoring, Eze. vi. 9: see Deu. iv. 19.

(2.) From sins against the seventh commandment. He is careful to possess his vessel in sanctification and honour, and not in the lusts of uncleanness; and therefore he has not dared to defile his neighbour's wife, nor said nor done any thing which had the least tendency to corrupt or debauch her; no, nor will he make any undue approaches to his own wife when she is put apart for her uncleanness, for it was forbidden by the law, Lev. xviii. 19; xx. 18. Note, It is an essential branch of wisdom and justice to keep the appetites of the body in subjection to reason and virtue.

(3.) From sins against the eighth commandment. He is a just man that hath not by fraud, and, under colour of law and right, oppressed any, and that hath not with force and arms spoiled any by violence, nor spoiled them of their goods or estates, much less of their liberties and lives, ver. 7. Oppression and violence were the sins of the old world, that brought the deluge, and are sins which still God is and will be the avenger of. Nay, he is one that has not lent his money upon usury, nor taken increase, ver. 8. Though being done by contract it may seem free from injustice, (volenti non fit injuria,—'what is done to a person with his own consent is no injury to him,') yet as far as it is forbidden by law he dares not do it. A moderate usury they were allowed to receive from strangers, but not from their brethren. A just man will not take advantage of his neighbour's necessity to make a prey of him, nor indulge himself in ease and idleness, to live upon the sweat and toil of others; and therefore will not take increase from those who cannot make increase of what he lends them, nor be rigorous in exacting what was agreed for from those that by the act of God are disabled to pay it, but is willing to share in loss as well as profit. Qui sentit commodum, sentire nebet et onus,—'He who enjoys the benefit should bear the burthen.'

2. He makes conscience of doing the duties of his place. He hath restored the pledge to the poor debtor, according to the law; Ex. xxii. 26, "If thou take thy neighbour's raiment" for a pawn, the raiment that is for necessary use, "thou shalt deliver it to him again," that he may sleep in his own bedclothes. Nay, he has not only restored to the poor that which was their own, but has given his bread to the hungry. Observe, it is called his bread, because it is honestly come by. That which is given to some is not unjustly taken from others; for God hath said, "I hate robbery for burnt offerings." Worldly men insist upon it that their bread is their own, as Nabal, who therefore would not give of it to David, 1 Sam. xxv. 17; yet let them know it is not so their own, but that they are bound to do good to others with it. Clothes are necessary as well as food, and therefore this just man is so charitable as to cover the naked also with a garment, ver. 7. The coats which Dorcas had made for the poor were produced as witnesses of her charity, Acts ix. 39. This just man has "withdrawn his hand from iniquity," ver. 8; if at any time he has been drawn in through inadvertency to that which afterwards has appeared to him to be an ill thing, he doth not persist in it, because he has begun it, but withdraws his hand from that which he now perceives to be iniquity; for he "executes true judgment between man and man," according as his opportunity is of doing it; as a judge, as a witness, as a juryman, as referee; and in all commerce is concerned that justice be done, that no man be wronged, that he that is wronged be righted, and that every man have his own; and is ready to interpose himself, and do any good office in order hereunto: this is his character towards his neighbour. Yet it will not suffice that he be just and true to his brother; to complete his character he must be so to his God likewise; ver. 9, "He hath walked in my statutes," those which relate to the duties of his immediate worship; he hath kept those and all other his judgments, has had respect to them all, has made it his constant care and endeavour to conform and come up to them all; to deal truly, that is, that so he may approve himself faithful to his covenant with God, that having joined himself to God, doth not treacherously depart from him, or dissemble with him. This is a just man, and living he shall live; he shall certainly live, shall have life, and shall have it more abundantly; shall live truly, live comfortably, live eternally. Keep the commandments, and thou shalt enter into life, Mat. xix. 17.

10 If he beget a son that is a robber, a shedder of blood,
And that doeth the like to any one of these things,
11 And that doeth not any of those duties,
But even hath eaten upon the mountains,
And defiled his neighbour's wife,
12 Hath oppressed the poor and needy,
Hath spoiled by violence,
Hath not restored the pledge,
And hath lifted up his eyes to the idols,
Hath committed abomination,
13 Hath given forth upon usury,
And hath taken increase:
Shall he then live? he shall not live:
He hath done all these abominations; he shall surely die;
His blood shall be upon him.
14 Now, lo, if he beget a son,
That seeth all his father's sins which he hath done,
And considereth, and doeth not such like,
15 That hath not eaten upon the mountains,
Neither hath lifted up his eyes to the idols of the house [of Israel,
Hath not defiled his neighbour's wife,
16 Neither hath oppressed any,
Hath not withholden the pledge,
Neither hath spoiled by violence,
But hath given his bread to the hungry,
And hath covered the naked with a garment,
17 That hath taken off his hand from the poor,
That hath not received usury nor increase,
Hath executed my judgments, hath walked in my statutes,
He shall not die for the iniquity of his father, he shall 18 As for his father, [surely live
Because he cruelly oppressed,
Spoiled his brother by violence,
And did that which is not good among his people,
Lo, even he shall die in his iniquity. [the father?
19 Yet say ye, Why? doth not the son bear the iniquity of
When the son hath done that which is lawful and right,
And hath kept all my statutes, and hath done them,
He shall surely live.
20 The soul that sinneth, it shall die.
The son shall not bear the iniquity of the father,
Neither shall the father bear the iniquity of the son:
The righteousness of the righteous shall be upon him,
And the wickedness of the wicked shall be upon him.

God by the prophet having laid down the general rule of judgment, that he will render eternal life to them that patiently continue in well-doing, but indignation and wrath to them that do not obey the truth, but obey unrighteousness, Rom. ii. 7, 8, comes in these verses to shew that men's parentage and relation shall not alter the case either one way or other.

First. He applies it largely and particularly both ways. As it was in the royal line of the kings of Judah, so it often happens in private families, that godly parents have wicked children, and wicked parents have godly children. Now here he shews,

1. That a wicked man shall certainly perish in his iniquity, though he was the son of a pious father. If that righteous man before described beget a son, whose character is the reverse of his father's, his condition will certainly be so too. 1st. It is supposed as no uncommon case, but a very melancholy one, that the

to throw over their opponents, in order to render them helpless and easy victims. But there is no reason to suppose Ezekiel alludes to this custom, the reference being rather to that of fowlers and hunters.

xvii. 22—24. As Dr. Fairbairn says, "Here the Lord presents himself as the rival of the king of Babylon, and the doer of a work precisely opposite in its character and effects to that which the earthly potentate had accomplished." The work of Nebuchadnezzar was one of judgment, that of the Lord one of mercy.

xviii. 2. There is a sense in which this proverb is true; the sins and follies of parents do often bring misfortune upon their children, and generally speaking, the sin of one man is a wrong done to another. But it was not in this sense that the Jews used the proverb; they meant that the children were punished judicially for the sins of the fathers, which was not true, because God punishes men only for their own sins.

xviii. 6. The reference to eating upon the mountains points to the child of a very godly father, notwithstanding all the instructions given him, the good education he has had, and the needful rebukes that have been given him, and the restraints he has been laid under, after all the pains taken with him, the prayers put up for him, may yet prove notoriously wicked and vile, the grief of his father, the shame of his family, and the curse and plague of his generation. He is here supposed to allow himself in all those enormities which his good father dreaded, and carefully avoided; and to shake off all those good duties which his father made conscience of, and took satisfaction in; undoes all that his father did, and goes counter to his example in every thing. He is here described to be a highwayman, "a robber and a shedder of blood;" an idolater, he hath eaten upon the mountains, ver. 11, and has lifted up his eyes to the idols, which his good father never did, and has come at length not only to feast with the idolaters, but to sacrifice with them, which is here called committing abomination, for the way of sin is down-hill. He is an adulterer, hath defiled his neighbour's wife; an oppressor, even of the poor and needy; he robs the spital, and squeezeth those who he knows cannot right themselves, and takes a pride and pleasure in trampling upon the weak, and impoverishing those that are poor already. He takes away from those to whom he should give. He hath spoiled by violence and open force; he hath given forth upon usury, and so spoiled by contract; and hath not restored the pledge, but unjustly detained it, even when the debt was paid. Let those good parents that have wicked children not look upon their case as singular; it is a case put here, and by it we see that grace doth not run in a blood, nor always attend the means of grace; nor is the race always to the swift or the battle to the strong, for then the children that are well taught would do well: but God will let us know that his grace is his own, and his Spirit a free agent; and that, though we are tied to give our children a good education, he is not tied to bless it. In this, as much as any thing, appears the power of original sin, and the necessity of special grace. 2nd. We are here assured that this wicked man shall perish for ever in his iniquity, notwithstanding his being the son of a good father. He may perhaps prosper awhile in the world for the sake of the piety of his ancestors; but, having committed all these abominations, and never repented of them, "he shall not live," he shall not be happy in the favour of God. Though he may escape the sword of men, he shall not escape the curse of God; "he shall surely die." He shall be for ever miserable; "his blood shall be upon him." He may thank himself; he is his own destroyer, and his relation to a good father will be so far from standing him in stead, that it will aggravate his sin and his condemnation. It made his sin the more heinous, nay, it made him really the more vile and profligate; and consequently will make his misery hereafter the more intolerable.

2. That a righteous man shall be certainly happy, though he is the son of a wicked father. Though the father did eat the sour grapes, if the children do not meddle with them, they shall fare never the worse for that. Here,

1st. It is supposed, and, blessed be God, it is sometimes a case in fact, that the son of an ungodly father may be godly; that, observing how fatal his father's errors were, he may be so wise as to take warning, and not tread in his father's steps, ver. 14. Ordinarily children partake of the parent's temper, and are drawn in to imitate their example; but here the son, instead of seeing his father's sins, and, as is usual, doing the like, sees them, and dreads doing the like. Men indeed do not gather grapes of thorns, but God sometimes doth; takes a branch from a wild olive, and grafts it into a good one. Wicked Ahaz begets a good Hezekiah, who "sees all his father's sins which he has done;" and though he will not, like Ham, proclaim his father's shame, or make the worst of it, yet he loathes it, and blushes at it, and thinks the worse of sin, because it was the reproach and ruin of his own father. "He considereth, and doth not such like." Considers how ill it became his father to do such things, what an offence it was to God and all good men, what a wound and dishonour he got by it, and what calamities he brought into his family; and therefore he doth not such like. Note, If we did but duly consider the ways of wicked men, we would all dread being associates with them, and followers of them. The particulars are here again enumerated, almost in the same words with that character given of the just man, ver. 6, &c., to shew how good men walk in the same spirit, and in the same steps. This just man here, when he took care to avoid his father's sins, took care to imitate his grandfather's virtues. And if we look back we shall find some examples for our imitation, as well as others for our admonition. This just man cannot only say as the Pharisee, "I am no adulterer, no extortioner," no oppressor, no usurer, no idolater; but he hath given his bread to the hungry, and covered the naked; he hath taken off his hand from the poor. Where he found his father had put hardships upon poor servants, tenants, neighbours, he eased their burthen; did not say, What my father has done I will abide by; and if it was a fault, it was his, and not mine; as Rehoboam, who contemned the taxes his father had imposed. No, he takes his hand off from the poor, and restores them to their rights and liberties again, ver. 15—17. Thus he hath "executed God's judgments, and walked in his statutes." Not only done his duty for once, but gone on in a course and way of obedience.

2nd. We are assured that the graceless father alone shall die in his iniquity, but his gracious son shall fare never the worse for it. As for his father, ver. 18, because he was a cruel oppressor, and did hurt; nay, because though he had wealth and power, he did not with it do good among his people; lo, "even he," as great as he is, "shall die in his iniquity," and be undone for ever. But he that kept his integrity "shall surely live," shall be easy and happy, and he shall not "die for the iniquity of his father." Perhaps his father's wickedness has lessened his estate, and weakened his interest, but it shall be no prejudice at all to his acceptance with God, and his eternal welfare.

Secondly. He appeals to themselves then, whether they did not wrong God with their proverb. Thus plain the case is, and yet ye say, "Doth not the son bear the iniquity of the father?" No; he doth not, he shall not, if he will himself "do that which is lawful and right," ver. 19. But this people, that bear the iniquity of their fathers, had not done that which is lawful and right, and therefore justly suffered for their own sin, and had no reason to complain of God's proceedings against them as at all unjust, though they had reason to complain of the ill example their fathers had left them as very unkind; "Our fathers have sinned, and are not, and we have borne their iniquity," Lam. v. 7. It is true that there is a curse entailed upon wicked families; but it is as true that the entail may be cut off by repentance and reformation. Let the impenitent and unreformed, therefore, thank themselves if they fall under it. The settled rule of judgment is therefore repeated, ver. 20, "The soul that sinneth it shall die," and not another for it. What direction God hath given to earthly judges, (Deu. xxiv. 16,) he will himself pursue; "The son shall not die," not die eternally, "for the iniquity of the father," if he do not tread in the steps of it; "nor the father for the iniquity of the son," if he endeavour to do his duty for the preventing of it. In "the day of the revelation of the righteous judgment of God," which is now clouded and eclipsed, "the righteousness of the righteous shall" appear before all the world to "be upon him," to his everlasting comfort and honour, upon him as a robe, upon him as a crown; and "the wickedness of the wicked upon him," to his everlasting confusion, upon him as a chain, upon him as a load, as a mountain of lead to sink him to the bottomless pit.

21 But if the wicked will turn from all his sins that he hath committed, [and right,
And keep all my statutes, and do that which is lawful
He shall surely live, he shall not die.
22 All his transgressions that he hath committed,
They shall not be mentioned unto him:
In his righteousness that he hath done he shall live.
23 Have I any pleasure at all that the wicked should die?
Saith the Lord GOD:
And not that he should return from his ways, and live?
24 But when the righteous turneth away from his righteous-
And committeth iniquity, [ness,
And doeth according to all the abominations that the wicked man doeth,
Shall he live? [tioned:
All his righteousness that he hath done shall not be men-
In his trespass that he hath trespassed,
And in his sin that he hath sinned,
In them shall he die
25 Yet ye say,
The way of the Lord is not equal.
Hear now, O house of Israel;
Is not my way equal? are not your ways unequal?
26 When a righteous man turneth away from his righteous-
And committeth iniquity, and dieth in them; [ness,
For his iniquity that he hath done shall he die.
27 Again, when the wicked man turneth away
From his wickedness that he hath committed,
And doeth that which is lawful and right,
He shall save his soul alive.
28 Because he considereth,
And turneth away from all his transgressions that he hath committed,
He shall surely live, he shall not die.
29 Yet saith the house of Israel,
The way of the Lord is not equal
O house of Israel, are not my ways equal?
Are not your ways unequal?

We have here another rule of judgment which God will go by in dealing with us, by which is farther demonstrated the equity of his government. The former shewed that God will reward or punish, according to the change made in the family or succession, for the better or for the worse. Here he shews that he will reward or punish according to the change made in the person himself, whether for the better or the worse. While we are in this world we are in a state of probation; the time and trial lasts as long as the time of life; and according as we are found at last it will be with us to eternity. Now see here,

First. The case fairly stated much as it had been before, ch. iii. 18, &c., and here it is laid down once, ver. 21—24, and again, ver. 26—28, because it is a matter of vast importance, a matter of life and death, of life and death eternal. Here we have,

1. A fair invitation given to wicked people to turn from their wickedness. Assurance is here given us, that if the wicked will turn he shall surely live, ver. 21, 27. Observe,

1st. What is required to denominate a man a true convert; how he must be qualified that he may be entitled to this act of indemnity. First. The first step towards conversion is consideration; ver. 28, "Because he considereth and turneth." The reason why sinners go on in their evil ways is, because they do not consider what will be in the end thereof; but if the prodigal once come to himself, if he sit down and consider a little how bad his state is, and how easily it may be bettered, he will soon return to his father, Lu. xv. 17; and the adulteress to her first husband, when she considers that "then it was better with her than now," Hos. ii. 7. Secondly. This consideration must produce an aversion to sin. When he considereth he must turn away from his wickedness, that notes a change in the heart, and in the disposition of that. He must turn from his sins and his transgressions, that notes a change in the life; he must break off from all his evil courses, and wherein he has done iniquity must resolve to do so no more, and this from a principle of hatred to sin. "What have I to do any more with idols?" Thirdly. This aversion to sin must be universal. He must turn from all his sins, and all his transgressions, without a reserve for any Dalilah, any house of Rimmon. We do not rightly turn from sin unless we truly hate it; and we do not truly hate sin as sin, if we do not hate all sin. Fourthly. This must be accompanied with a conversion to God and duty. He must keep all God's statutes, (for the obedience, if it be sincere, will be universal,) and must "do that which is lawful and right," which agrees with the word and will of God, which he must take for his rule, and not the will of the flesh and the way of the world.

2nd. What is promised to those that do thus turn from sin to God. First. They shall save their souls alive, ver. 27. They shall surely live, they shall not die, ver. 21, and again, ver. 28; whereas it was said, "The soul that sins, it shall die," yet let not those that have sinned despair but that the threatened death may be prevented, if they will but turn and repent in time. When David penitently acknowledgeth, "I have sinned," he is immediately assured of his pardon.

idolatrous feasts which were held when sacrifices were offered on the mountains. The intense hostility of the prophets to every kind of idolatry which characterises this period was instrumental in abolishing it for ever in Israel.

xviii. 13. The phrase, "his blood shall be upon him," means "his guilt shall be upon himself"—he shall be personally responsible. The expressions, "he shall live" and "he shall die," which are of frequent occurrence, must be explained in accordance with scriptural principles. The man who avoided the sins forbidden by the law, and obeyed the precepts of that law, would receive the blessing, even life for evermore; the disobedient would be excluded from the favour and grace of the Lord, and would die in their iniquity.

xviii. 21. Repentance and conversion are recognised, and he who had followed a course of sin was allowed and encouraged to enter upon a new career, in which he would find grace, and be delivered from the penalty of his former offences.

"The Lord has taken away thy sin, thou shalt not die," 2 Sam. xii. 13; thou shalt not die eternally. He shall surely live; that is, he shall be restored to the favour of God, which is the life of the soul, and shall not lie under his wrath, which is as messengers of death to the soul. Secondly. The sins they have repented of and forsaken shall not rise up in judgment against them, nor shall they be so much as upbraided with them. "All his transgressions that he has committed," though numerous, though heinous, though very provoking to God, and redounding very much to his dishonour, yet they "shall not be mentioned unto him," ver. 22, not mentioned against him. Not only they shall not be imputed to him to ruin him, but in the great day they shall not be remembered against him to grieve or shame him; they shall be covered, shall be sought for and not found. This speaks the fulness of pardoning mercy; when sin is forgiven, it is blotted out, it is remembered no more. Thirdly. In their righteousness they shall live; not for their righteousness, as if that were the purchase of their pardon and bliss, and an atonement for their sins, but in their righteousness, which qualifies them for all the blessings purchased by the Mediator, and is itself one of those blessings.

3rd. What encouragement a repenting, returning sinner hath to hope for pardon and life according to this promise. He is conscious to himself that his obedience for the future can never be a valuable compensation for his former disobedience; but he has this to support himself with, that God's nature, property, and delight is to have mercy, and to forgive; for he hath said, ver. 23, "Have I any pleasure at all that the wicked should die?" No, by no means; you never had any cause given you to think so. It is true that God has determined to punish sinners, his justice calls for it; and, pursuant to that, impenitent sinners will lie for ever under his wrath and curse; that is the will of his decree, his consequent will, but not his antecedent will, the will of his delight. Though the righteousness of his government requires that sinners die, yet the goodness of his nature objects against it. "How shall I give thee up, Ephraim?" It is spoken here comparatively. He hath not pleasure in the ruin of sinners, for he would rather they should turn from their ways and live. He is better pleased when his mercy is glorified in their salvation than when his justice is glorified in their damnation.

2. A fair warning given to righteous people not to turn from their righteousness, ver. 24, 26. Here is, 1st. The character of an apostate, that turns away from his righteousness. He never was in sincerity a righteous man, as appears by that of the apostle, 1 Jno. ii. 19, "If they had been of us, they would no doubt have continued with us;" but he passed for a righteous man, had the denomination and all the external marks of a righteous man, he thought himself one, and others thought him one; but he throws off his profession, leaves his first love, disowns and forsakes the truth and ways of God, and so "turns away from his righteousness," as one sick of it, and now shews what he always had, a secret aversion to it. And having "turned away from his righteousness, he commits iniquity," grows loose, and profane, and sensual, intemperate, unjust, and, in short, "doth according to all the abominations that the wicked man doth;" for when the unclean spirit recovers his possession of the heart, he "brings with him seven other spirits more wicked than himself, and they enter in and dwell there," Lu. xi. 26. 2nd. The doom of an apostate. Shall he live because he was once a righteous man?" No; factum non dicitur quod non perseverat,—'that which does not abide is not said to be done.' In his trespass, ver. 24, and for his iniquity, (that is the meritorious cause of his ruin,) for the iniquity "that he has done he shall die," shall die eternally; ver. 26, "The backslider in heart shall be filled with his own ways." But will not his former professions and performances stand him in some stead? will they not avail at least to mitigate his punishment? No, "all his righteousness that he has done," though never so much applauded by men, "shall not be mentioned," so as to be either a credit or a comfort to him. The righteousness of an apostate is forgotten, as the wickedness of a penitent is. Under the law, if a Nazarite was polluted, he lost all his foregoing days of his separation, Num. vi. 12; so those that have begun in the Spirit, and end in the flesh, may reckon all their past services and sufferings in vain, Gal. iii. 3, 4. Unless we persevere, we lose what we have gained, 2 Jno. 8.

Secondly. An appeal to the consciences even of the house of Israel, though very corrupt, concerning God's equity in all these proceedings; for he will be justified, as well as sinners judged, out of their own mouths. 1. The charge they drew up against God is blasphemous; ver. 25, 29, the house of Israel has the impudence to say, "The way of the Lord is not equal," than which nothing could be more absurd, as well as impious. "He that formed the eye, shall he not see?" Can his ways be unequal whose will is the eternal rule of good and evil, right and wrong? "Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?" No doubt he shall, he cannot do otherwise. 2. God's reasonings with them are very gracious and condescending, for even these blasphemers God would rather have convinced and saved than condemned. One would have expected that God should have immediately vindicated the honour of his justice by making those that impeached it eternal monuments of it. Must these be suffered to draw another breath that have once breathed out such wickedness as this? Shall that tongue ever speak again anywhere but in hell that has once said, "The ways of the Lord are not equal?" Yes, because this is the day of God's patience, he vouchsafes to argue with them, and he requires them to own, for it is so plain that they cannot deny, 1st. The equity of his ways; "Are not my ways equal?" No doubt they are; he never lays upon man more than is right. In the present punishments of sinners, and the afflictions of his own people, yea, and in the eternal damnation of the impenitent, "the ways of the Lord are equal." 2nd. The iniquity of their ways; "Are not your ways unequal?" It is plain they are, and the troubles you are in you have brought upon your own heads. God doth you no wrong, but you have wronged yourselves. "The foolishness of man perverts his ways," makes them unequal, and then "his heart frets against the Lord," as if his ways were unequal, Pr. xix. 3. In all our disputes with God, and in all his controversies with us, it will be found that his ways are equal, but ours are unequal; that he is in the right and we are in the wrong.

30 Therefore I will judge you, O house of Israel,
Every one according to his ways, saith the Lord GOD.
Repent, and turn yourselves from all your transgressions;
So iniquity shall not be your ruin.
31 Cast away from you all your transgressions, whereby ye have transgressed;
And make you a new heart and a new spirit:
For why will ye die, O house of Israel?
32 For I have no pleasure in the death of him that dieth,
Saith the Lord GOD: wherefore turn yourselves, and live ye

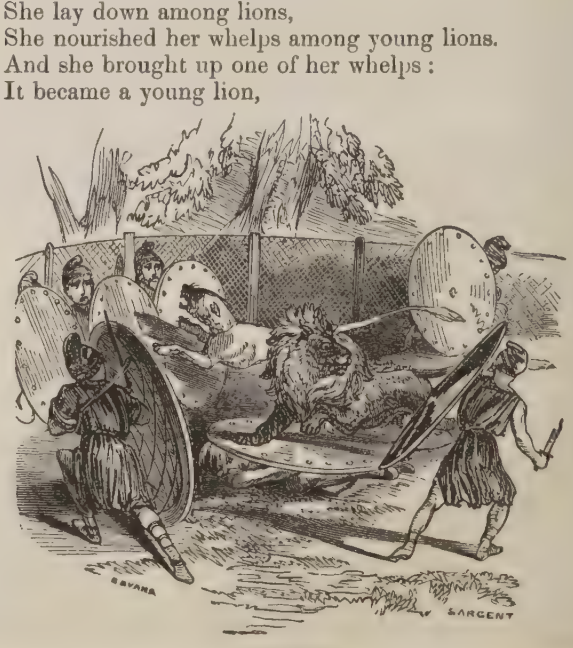
We have here the conclusion and application of this whole matter. After a fair trial at the bar of right reason, the verdict is brought in on God's side, it appears that his ways are equal; judgment therefore is next to be given, and one would think it should be a judgment of condemnation, nothing short of "Go, ye cursed, into everlasting fire." But behold a miracle of mercy; the day of grace and Divine patience is yet lengthened out; and therefore, though God will at last judge every one according to his ways, yet he waits to be gracious, and closes all with a call to repentance, and a promise of pardon upon repentance.



First. Here are four necessary duties that we are called to, all amounting to the same. 1. We must repent. We must change our mind and change our ways; we must be sorry for what we have done amiss, and ashamed of it, and go as far as we can towards the undoing of it again. 2. We must "turn ourselves from all our transgressions," ver. 30. And again, ver. 32, "Turn yourselves," face about; turn from sin, nay, turn against it as the enemy you loathe, turn to God as the friend you love. 3. We must "cast away from us all our transgressions;" we must abandon and forsake them with a resolution never to return to them again. Give sin a bill of divorce; break all the leagues we have made with it; throw it overboard, as the mariners did Jonah, for it has raised the storm; cast it out of the soul, and crucify it as a malefactor. 4. We must "make us a new heart, and a new spirit." This was the matter of a promise, ch. xi. 19; here it is the matter of a precept. We must do our endeavour, and then God will not be wanting to us to give us his grace. St. Austin well explains this precept, Deus non jubet impossibilia, sed jubendo monet et facere quod possis, et petere quod non possis,—'God does not enjoin impossibilities, but by his commands admonishes us to do what is in our power, and to pray for what is not.' He hereby admonishes us to do what is in our power, and to pray for what is not.

Secondly. Here are four good arguments to enforce these calls to repentance. 1. It is the only way, and it is a sure way, to prevent the ruin which our sins have a direct tendency to. "So iniquity shall not be your ruin;" which implies, that if we do not repent iniquity will be our ruin here and for ever; but if we do, we are safe, we are snatched as brands out of the burning. 2. If we repent not, we certainly perish, and our blood will be upon our own heads. "Why will ye die, O house of Israel?" What an absurd thing is it for you to choose death and damnation rather than life and salvation. Note, The reason why sinners die is, because they will die, they will go down the way that leads to death, and not come up to the terms on which life is offered. Herein sinners, especially sinners of the house of Israel, are most unreasonable, and act most unaccountably. 3. The God of heaven has no delight in our ruin, but desires our welfare; ver. 32, "I have no pleasure in the death of him that dieth;" which implies, that he has pleasure in the recovery of those that repent, which is both an engagement and an encouragement to us to repent. 4. We are made for ever if we repent. "Turn yourselves, and live ye." He that saith to us, Repent, thereby saith to us, Live; yea, he saith to us, Live; so that life and death are here set before us.

CHAPTER XIX.

The scope of this chapter is much the same with that of the seventh, to foretell and lament the ruin of the house of David, the royal family of Judah, in the calamitous exit of the four sons and grandsons of Josiah, Jehoahaz, Jehoiakim, Jeconiah, and Zedekiah, in whom that illustrious line of kings was cut off, which the prophet is here ordered to lament, ver. 1; and he doth it by similitudes. I. The kingdom of Judah and house of David is here compared to a lioness, and those princes to lions that were fierce and ravenous, but were hunted down and taken in nets, ver. 2—9. II. That kingdom and house are here compared to a vine, and these princes to branches, that had been strong and flourishing, but were now broken off and burnt, ver. 10—14. This ruin of that monarchy was now in the doing, and this lamentation of it was intended to affect the people with it, that they might not flatter themselves with vain hopes of the lengthening out of their tranquillity.

MOREOVER take thou up a lamentation for the princes of Israel, 2 And say,
What is thy mother? A lioness:
She lay down among lions,
She nourished her whelps among young lions.
3 And she brought up one of her whelps:
It became a young lion,

LION HUNT.

xviii. 24. On the other hand, perseverance was required, and he who, after a course of obedience, became an apostate and a rebel was excluded from the benefits which his allegiance would have resulted in but for his departure from right. He who began well and ended ill was in a worse position than he who began ill and ended well, because he had known the good and left it.

xviii. 30—32. The verb translated "repent" in these verses is the one elsewhere rendered "turn" and "convert," and in all cases points to the external change of conduct, rather than to regret and inward sorrow; to the return of the sinner to practical obedience and to God, rather than to an altered disposition. The change of mind and disposition is indicated, however, directly in the phrase, "a new heart and a new spirit." It therefore appears that both the inward and the outward reformation were demanded.

xix. 2, 3. The various shades of meaning belonging to the several words relating to lions in this passage cannot be well represented in

He was taken in their pit, [Egypt.

Here is, First. Orders given to the prophet to bewail the fall of the royal family, which had long made so great a figure by virtue of a covenant of royalty made with David and his seed, that the eclipsing and extinguishing of it is justly lamented by all that know what value to put upon the covenant of our God; as we find, after a very large account of that covenant with David, Ps. lxxxix. 3, 20, &c., a sad lamentation for the decays and desolation of his family; ver. 38, 39, "But thou hast cast off and abhorred, hast made void the covenant of thy servant, and profaned his crown," &c. The kings of Judah are here called princes of Israel; for their glory was diminished, and they were become as princes; and their purity was lost, they were become corrupt and idolatrous as the kings of Israel, whose ways they had learned. The prophet must take up a lamentation for them; that is, he must describe their lamentable fall, as one that did himself lay it to heart, and desired those he preached to and wrote to might do so too. And how can we expect others should be affected with that which we ourselves are not affected with? And ministers, when they boldly foretell, yet must bitterly lament, the destruction of sinners, as those that have not desired the woful day. He is not directed to give advice to the princes of Israel, (that had been long and often done in vain,) but the decree being gone forth he must take up a lamentation for them.

Secondly. Instructions given him what to say.

1. He must compare the kingdom of Judah to a lioness; so wretchedly degenerated was it from what it had been formerly, when it sat as a queen among the nations; ver. 2, "What is thy mother?" Thine, O king. We read of Solomon's crown wherewith his mother crowned him; that is, his people, Cant. iii. 11. Thine, O Judah; the royal family is as a mother to the kingdom, a nursing mother; she is a lioness, fierce and cruel, and ravenous. When they had left their divinity, they soon lost their humanity too; and when they feared not God, neither did they regard man. She lay down among lions. God had said the people shall dwell alone, but they mingled themselves with the nations, and learned their works. "She nourished her whelps among young lions:" taught the young princes the way of tyrants, which was then used by the arbitrary kings of the East; filled their heads betimes with notions of their absolute despotic power, and possessed them with a belief that they had a right to enslave their subjects, that their liberty and property lay at their mercy. Thus "she nourished her whelps among young lions."

2. He must compare the kings of Judah to lions' whelps, ver. 3. Jacob had compared Judah, and especially the house of David, to a lion's whelp, for its being strong and formidable to its enemies abroad; Gen. xlix. 9, "He is an old lion, who shall stir him up?" And if they had adhered to the Divine law and promise God had preserved to them the might, and majesty, and dominion of a lion; and doth it in Christ, the lion of the tribe of Judah. But these lions' whelps were so to their own subjects, were cruel and oppressive to them, preyed upon their estates and liberties; and when they thus by their tyranny made themselves a terror to those whom they ought to have protected, it was just with God to make those a terror to them whom otherwise they might have subdued. Here is lamented,

1st. The sin and fall of Jehoahaz, one of the whelps of this lioness. He became a young lion, ver. 3; he was made king, and thought he was made so that he might do what he pleased, and gratify his own ambition, covetousness, and revenge, as he had a mind; and so he was soon master of all the arts of tyranny: he "learned to catch the prey, and devoured men." When he had got power in his hand, all that had before in any thing disobliged him were made to feel his resentments, and become a sacrifice to his rage. But what came of it? He did not prosper long in his tyranny. The "nations heard of him," ver. 4, heard how furiously he drove at his first coming to the crown, how he trampled upon all that is just and sacred, and violated all his engagements, so that they looked upon him as a dangerous neighbour, and prosecuted him accordingly, "as a multitude of shepherds is called forth against a lion roaring on his prey," Isa. xxxi. 4; and he was taken as a beast of prey in their pit. His own subjects durst not stand up in defence of their own liberties; but God raised up a foreign power that soon put an end to his tyranny, and "brought him in chains to the land of Egypt." Thither Jehoahaz was carried captive, and never heard of more.

2nd. The like sin and fall of his successor, Jehoiakim. The kingdom of Judah for some time expected the return of Jehoahaz out of Egypt, but at length despaired of it, and then took another of the lion's whelps, and made him a young lion, ver. 5. And he, instead of taking warning by his brother's fate, to use his power with equity and moderation, and to seek the good of his people, trod in his brother's steps; "He went up and down among the lions," ver. 6; he consulted and conversed with those that were fierce and furious like himself, and took his measures from them, as Rehoboam took the advice of the rash and hotheaded young men; and he soon learned to catch the prey, and he devoured men, ver. 6. He seized his subjects' estates, fined and imprisoned them, filled his treasury by rapine and injustice, sequestrations and confiscations, fines and forfeitures, and swallowed up all that stood in his way. He had got the art of discovering what effects men had that lay concealed, and where the treasures were which they had hoarded up; he knew their desolate places, ver. 7, where they hid their money, and sometimes hid themselves; he knew where to find both out; and by his oppression he laid waste their cities, depopulated them, by forcing the inhabitants to remove their families to some place of safety. "The land was desolate," and the country villages were deserted; and though there was great plenty, and a fulness of all good things, yet people quitted it all for fear of the noise of his roaring. He took a pride in making all his subjects afraid of him, as the lion makes all the beasts of the forest to tremble, Am. iii. 8; and by his terrible roaring so astonished them that they fell down for fear; and, having not spirit to make their escape, became an easy prey to him, as they say the lions do. He hectored, and threatened, and talked big, and bullied people out of what they had. Thus he thought to have established his own power, but it had a contrary effect, it did but hasten his own ruin; ver. 8, "The nations set against him on every side," to restrain and reduce his exorbitant power, which they joined in confederacy to do for their common safety; and they spread their net over him, formed designs against him. God brought against Jehoiakim bands of the Syrians, Moabites, and Ammonites, with the Chaldees, 2 Kin. xxiv. 2, and he was taken in their pit. "Nebuchadnezzar bound him in fetters to carry him to Babylon," 2 Chr. xxxvi. 6. They put this lion within grates, bound him in chains, and "brought him to the king of Babylon," ver. 9. What became of him we know not, but "his voice was no more heard" roaring "upon the mountains of Israel." There was an end of his tyranny. He was "buried with the burial of an ass," Jer. xxii. 19, though he had been as a lion, "the terror of the mighty in the land of the living." Note, The righteousness of God is to be acknowledged when those that have terrified and enslaved others are themselves terrified and enslaved; when those that by the abuse of their power to destruction, which was given them for edification, make themselves as wild beasts, as roaring lions, and raging bears, for such, Solomon saith, wicked rulers are over the poor people, Pr. xxviii. 15, are treated as such; when those who, like Ishmael, have their hand against every man, come at last to have every man's hand against them. It was long since observed that bloody tyrants seldom die in peace, but have blood given them to drink, for they are worthy.

Ad generum Cereris sine cæde et sanguine pauci
Descendunt reges et sicca morte tyranni,—
'How few of all the boastful men that reign
Descend in peace to Pluto's dark domain.'—Juvenal.

And her stature was exalted among the thick branches,
And she appeared in her height with the multitude of her branches.
12 But she was plucked up in fury,
She was cast down to the ground,
And the east wind dried up her fruit:
Her strong rods were broken and withered;
The fire consumed them.
13 And now she is planted in the wilderness,

14 And fire is gone out of a rod of her branches,
Which hath devoured her fruit,
So that she hath no strong rod to be a sceptre to rule
This is a lamentation, and shall be for a lamentation.

Jerusalem, the mother city, is here represented by another similitude; she is a vine, and the princes are her branches. This comparison we had before, ch. xv.

First. Jerusalem is as a vine; the Jewish nation is so; "Like a vine in thy blood," ver. 10, the blood royal; like a vine set in blood, and watered with blood, which contributes very much to the flourishing and fruitfulness of vines. As if the blood which thou hast shed had been designed for the fattening and improving of the soil, in such plenty was it shed; and for a time it seemed to have that effect; for "she was fruitful and full of branches, by reason of" the waters, the "many waters," near which she was planted. Places of great wickedness may prosper for awhile; and a vine set in blood may be full of branches. Jerusalem was full of able magistrates, men of sense, men of learning and experience, that were strong rods, branches of this vine, of uncommon bulk and strength; or, poles for the support of this vine, for so magistrates are. The boughs of this vine were grown to such maturity that they were fit to make white staves of, "for the sceptres of them that bear rule," ver. 11. And they are strong rods only that are fit for sceptres; men of strong judgments, and strong resolutions, that are fit for magistrates. When the royal family of Judah was numerous, and the courts of justice filled with men of sense and probity, then Jerusalem's "stature was exalted among the thick our language. What is called "a young lion" bore the same relation to a "whelp" which a heifer bears to a calf, the word "young" being added by the translators to indicate this. The term for "lions" is, like the English word, inclusive of all sorts and ages. The lion has long disappeared from the west of the Jordan, and is now scarcely ever found west of the Euphrates, though it is not rare on the east of that river, and occasionally crosses it. Dr. Tristram says, "In Palestine the lions had their lairs in the forests which have perished with them, and in the cane brakes of the Jordan. Not only did they supply the imagery of psalmists and prophets, but they lingered there till the time of the Crusades, and are mentioned as living about Samaria by historians of the twelfth century." It will be remembered that Ezekiel prophesied on the banks of the Chebar, and the author we have quoted says that the lion is still near the site of Babylon, and adds, "It extends also far higher up, to the jungle of the Khabour, or Chebar, on the Upper Tigris, above Mosul branches;" when the government is in good able hands, a nation is thereby made considerable. Then she was not taken for a weak and lowly vine, but "she appeared in her height," a topping city, "with the multitude of her branches;" tanquam lenta solent inter viburna cupressus,—'In thy quietness,' so some read that, ver. 10, which we translate, "in thy blood," thou wast such a vine as this. When Zedekiah was quiet and easy under the king of Babylon's yoke, his kingdom flourished thus. See how slow God is to anger, how he defers his judgments, and waits to be gracious.

Secondly. This vine is now quite destroyed. Nebuchadnezzar, being highly provoked by Zedekiah's treachery, plucked it up in fury, ver. 12, ruined the city and kingdom, and cut off all the branches of the royal family that fell in his way. The vine was cut off close to the ground, though not plucked up by the roots; the east wind dried up the fruit that was blasted; the young people fell by the sword, or were carried into captivity. The aspect of it had nothing that was pleasing, the prospect nothing that was promising; "her strong rods were broken and withered;" her great men were cut off, judges and magistrates deposed. "The vine itself is planted in the wilderness," ver. 13. Babylon was as a wilderness to those of the people that were carried captives thither. The land of Judah was as a wilderness to Jerusalem. Now the whole country was ravaged and laid waste by the Chaldean army, a fruitful land turned into barrenness; it is burnt with fire, Ps. lxxx. 16, and that "fire is gone out of a rod of her branches," ver. 14; that is, the king himself, by rebelling against the king of Babylon, has given occasion to all this mischief. She may thank herself for the fire that consumes her; she has by her wickedness made herself like tinder to the sparks of God's wrath, so that her own branches serve as fuel for her own consumption; in them the fire is kindled which devoured the fruits, the sins of the elder being the judgments which destroy the younger. Her fruit is burned with her own branches, "so that she has no strong rod to be a sceptre to rule;" none to be found now that are fit for the government, or dare take this ruin under their hand, as the complaint is, Isa. iii. 6, 7; none of the house of David left that have right to rule; no wise men, or men of sense, that are able to rule. It goes ill with any state, and is like to go worse, when it is thus deprived of the blessings of government, and has no strong rods for sceptres. "Woe unto thee, O land, when thy king is a child;" for as good have no rod as not a strong rod. Those strong rods, we have reason to fear, had been instruments of oppression, assistant to the king in catching the prey, and devouring men, and now they are destroyed with him. Tyranny is the inlet to anarchy; and when the rod of government is turned into the serpent of oppression it is just with God to say, There shall be no strong rod to be a sceptre to rule; but let men be as the fishes of the sea, where the greater devour the lesser. Note, "This is a lamentation, and shall be for a lamentation." The prophet was bidden, ver. 1, to take up a lamentation; and, having done so, he leaves it to be made use of by others. "It is a lamentation" to us of this age; and, the desolations continuing long, it "shall be for a lamentation" to those that shall come after us; the child unborn will rue the destruction made of Judah and Jerusalem by the present judgments. They were a great while in coming, the bow was long in the drawing; but now they are come they will continue, and the sad effects of them will be entailed upon posterity. Note, Those who fill up the measure of their fathers' sins are laying up in store for their children's sorrows, and furnishing them with matter for lamentation; and nothing is more so than the overthrow of government.

CHAPTER XX.

In this chapter, I. The prophet is consulted by some of the elders of Israel, ver. 1. II. He is instructed by his God what answer to give them. He must, 1. Signify God's displeasure against them, ver. 2, 3. And, 2. He must shew them what just cause he had for that displeasure, by giving them a history of God's gracious dealings with their fathers, and their treacherous dealings with God; 1st. In Egypt, ver. 1—9; 2nd. In the wilderness, ver. 10—26; 3rd. In Canaan, ver. 27—32. 3. He must denounce the judgments of God against them, ver. 33—36. 4. He must tell them likewise what mercy God had in store for them, when he would bring a remnant of them to repentance, re-establish them in their own land, and set up his sanctuary among them again, ver. 37—44. 5. Here is another word dropped towards Jerusalem, which is explained and enlarged upon in the next chapter, ver. 45—49.

AND it came to pass in the seventh year, in the fifth month, the tenth day of the month, that certain of the elders of Israel came to enquire of the LORD, and sat before me. 2 Then came the word of the LORD unto me, saying, 3 Son of man, speak unto the elders of Israel, and say unto them, Thus saith the Lord GOD; Are ye come to enquire of me? As I live, saith the Lord GOD, I will not be enquired of by you. 4 Wilt thou judge them, son of man, wilt thou judge them? cause them to know the abominations of their fathers:

Here is, First. The occasion of this message which we have in this chapter. That sermon which we had, ch. xviii., was occasioned by their presumptuous reflections upon God; this was occasioned by their hypocritical inquiries after him. Each shall have their own. This prophecy is exactly dated in the seventh year of the captivity, about two years after Ezekiel began to prophesy. God would have them keep count how long their captivity lasted, that they might see how the years went on towards their deliverance, though very slowly. "Certain of the elders of Israel came to inquire of the Lord," not statedly, as those ch. viii. 1, but, as it should seem, occasionally, and upon a particular emergency. Whether they were of those that were now in captivity, or elders lately come from Jerusalem upon business to Babylon, is not certain; but by what the prophet saith to them, ver. 32, it should seem their inquiry was, whether, now they were captives in Babylon, at a distance from their own country, where they had not only no temple, but no synagogue for the worship of God, it was not lawful for them, that they might ingratiate themselves with their lords and masters, to join with them in their worship, and do as the families of these countries do that serve wood and stone. This matter was palliated as well as it would bear, like Naaman's indenting with Elisha for leave to bow in the house of Rimmon, in compliment to the king; but we have reason to suspect that their inquiry drove at this. Note, Those hearts are wretchedly hardened that ask God leave to go on in sin, and that when they are suffering for it. They came and sat very demurely, and with a show of devotion before the prophet, ch. xxxiii. 31.

Secondly. The purport of this message.

1. They must be made to know that God is angry with them. He takes it as an affront that they are come to inquire of him, when they are resolved to go on still in their trespasses. "As I live, saith the Lord God, I will not be inquired of by you," ver. 3. Their shows of devotion shall neither be acceptable to God nor advantageous to themselves. God will not take notice of their inquiries, nor give them any satisfactory answers. Note, A hypocritical attendance on God and his ordinances is so far from being pleasing to him, that it is provoking.

2. They must be made to know that God is justly angry with them, ver. 4; "Wilt thou judge them, Son of man, wilt thou judge them?" Thou art a prophet, surely thou wilt not plead for them, as an intercessor with God, but surely thou wilt pass sentence on them, as a judge for God. "See, I have set thee over the nation," wilt thou not declare to them the judgments of the Lord? "Cause them," therefore, "to know the abominations of their fathers;" so the orders run now, as before, ch. xvi. 2, he must cause them to know their abominations. Though their own abominations were sufficient to justify God in the severest of his proceedings against them, yet it would be of use for them to know the abominations of their fathers, that they might see what a righteous thing it was with God now at last to cut them off from being a people, who from the first were such a provoking people.

5 And say unto them, Thus saith the Lord GOD;
In the day when I chose Israel, [Jacob,
And lifted up mine hand unto the seed of the house of
And made myself known unto them in the land of Egypt,
When I lifted up mine hand unto them, saying,
I am the LORD your God;
6 In the day that I lifted up mine hand unto them,
To bring them forth of the land of Egypt
Into a land that I had espied for them,
Flowing with milk and honey,
Which is the glory of all lands:
7 Then said I unto them,
Cast ye away every man the abominations of his eyes,
And defile not yourselves with the idols of Egypt:
I am the LORD your God.
8 But they rebelled against me,
And would not hearken unto me: [their eyes,
They did not every man cast away the abominations of Neither did they forsake the idols of Egypt:
Then I said, I will pour out my fury upon them,
To accomplish my anger against them
In the midst of the land of Egypt.
9 But I wrought for my name's sake,
That it should not be polluted before the heathen,
Among whom they were,
In whose sight I made myself known unto them,
In bringing them forth out of the land of Egypt.

The history of the ingratitude and rebellion of the people of Israel here begins as early as their beginning; so doth the history of man's apostacy from his Maker. No sooner have we read the story of our first parents' creation, but immediately we meet with that of their rebellion; so we see here it was with Israel, a people designed to represent the body of mankind, both in their dealings with God and his with them. Here is,

First. The gracious purposes of God's law concerning Israel in Egypt, where they were bondslaves to Pharaoh. Be it spoken, be it written, to the immortal honour of free grace, that then and there, 1. He chose Israel to be a peculiar people to himself, though their condition was bad, and their character worse, that he might have the honour of mending both. He therefore chose them because they were the seed of the house of Jacob, the posterity of that prince with God, "that he might keep the oath which he had sworn unto their fathers," Deu. vii. 7, 8. 2. He made himself known to them by his name Jehovah, a new name, Ex. vi. 3, when by reason of their servitude they had almost lost the knowledge of that name by which he was known to their fathers, God Almighty. Note, As the foundation of our blessedness is laid in God's choosing us, so the first step towards it is God's making himself known to us. And, whatever distance we are at, whatever distress we are in, he that made himself known to Israel, even in the land of Egypt, can find us out, and follow us with the gracious discoveries and manifestations of his favour. 3. He made over himself to them, as their God in covenant. "I lift up my hand unto them," saying it, and confirming it with an oath, "I am the Lord your God," to whom you are to pay your homage, and from whom and in whom you are to expect your bliss. 4. He promised to bring them out of Egypt, and made good what he promised. He lifted up his hand, that is, he sware unto them that he would deliver them; and they being very unworthy, and their deliverance very unlikely, it was requisite the promise of it should be confirmed by an oath. Or, he lifted up his hand, that is, he put forth his almighty power to do it; he did it with an outstretched arm, Ps. cxxxvi. 12. 5. He assured them that he would put them in possession of the land of Canaan. He therefore brought them out of Egypt, "that he might bring them into a land he had spied out for them:" a second garden of Eden, which was "the glory of all lands," so he found it, the climate temperate, the soil, the situation pleasant, and every thing agreeable, Deu. viii. 7; xi. 12; however, so he made it, by setting up his sanctuary in it.

Secondly. The reasonable commands he gave them, and the easy conditions of his covenant with them at that time. Having told them what they might expect from him, he next tells them what was all he expected from them; it was no more than this, ver. 7, "Cast ye away every man" his images that he useth for worship, and Nineveh (the ancient Chebar), where Layard mentions an Arab being attacked by one, and escaping with the loss of his mare." No doubt Ezekiel knew them well.

xix. 4—9. It seems not to have been meant that each of the elements of this allegory should be applicable to specific persons and events; and it is certain that all attempts to give a distinct significance to every detail have failed. It is even doubtful who or what the word "mother" points to. With reference to the remainder, we know that the rulers of Israel must be intended, and that their misconduct and its fatal results are figured. We also know that Egypt and Babylon in succession lorded it over Israel. For the former see especially 2 Kings xxiii. 31—35; for both reference may be made to 2 Chron. xxxvi. 1—22, where the sad records are written.

xix. 10. For "in thy blood" the translators put in the margin "or in thy quietness, or in thy likeness." The critics have wearied themselves in endeavours to show that each of these ideas is that are the adorations, but should be "the abominations of his eyes." Let him abominate them, and put them out of his sight, and defile not yourselves with the idols of Egypt," which it seems many of them were fond of,—the golden calf was one of them. It was just, and what might reasonably be expected, that, being delivered from the Egyptian slavery, they should quit the Egyptian idolatry, especially when God, at bringing them out, executed judgments upon the gods of Egypt, Num. xxxiii. 4, and thereby shewed himself above them. And whatever other idols they might have an inclination to, one would think they should have a rooted aversion to the gods of Egypt, for Egypt's sake, which had been to them a house of bondage. Yet it seems they needed this caution, and it is backed with a good reason, I am the Lord your God, who neither need an assistant nor will admit a rival.

Thirdly. Their unreasonable disobedience to these commands, for which God might justly have cut them off as soon as ever they were formed into a people; ver. 8, "They rebelled against God;" not only refused to comply with his particular precepts, but shook off their allegiance, and in effect told him they would be at liberty to worship what God they pleased; and even then when God came down to deliver them, and sent Moses for that purpose, yet they would not forsake the idols of Egypt, which perhaps made them speak so affectionately of the onions of Egypt, Num. xi. 5, for among other things the Egyptians worshipped an onion. It was strange that all the plagues of Egypt would not prevail to cure them of their affection to the idols of Egypt. For this, God said he would pour out his fury upon them, even while they were yet in the midst of the land of Egypt. Justly might he have said, Let them die with the Egyptians. This magnifies the riches of God's goodness, that he was pleased to work so great a salvation for them, even then when he saw them ripe for ruin; well might Moses tell them, It is "not for your righteousness," Deu. ix. 5.

Fourthly. The wonderful deliverance which God wrought for them notwithstanding. Though they forfeited the favour while it was in the bestowing, and when God would have healed them then their iniquity was discovered, Hos. vii. 1, yet "mercy rejoiced against judgment," and God did what he designed purely for his own name's sake, ver. 9. When nothing in us will furnish him with a reason for his favours, he furnisheth himself with one. God made himself known to them in the sight of the heathen, when he ordered Moses publicly to say to Pharaoh, "Israel is my son, my firstborn, let them go, that they may serve me." Now, if he should have left them to perish for their wickedness as they deserved, the Egyptians would have reflected upon him for it, and his name would have been polluted, which ought to be sanctified, and shall be so. Note, The church is secured, even when it is corrupt, because God will secure his own honour.

10 Wherefore I caused them to go forth out of the land of Egypt,
And brought them into the wilderness
11 And I gave them my statutes,
And shewed them my judgments,
Which if a man do, he shall even live in them.
12 Moreover also I gave them my sabbaths,
To be a sign between me and them,
That they might know that I am the LORD that sanctify them.
13 But the house of Israel rebelled against me in the wilderness:
They walked not in my statutes,
And they despised my judgments,
Which if a man do, he shall even live in them;
And my sabbaths they greatly polluted:
Then I said, I would pour out my fury upon them in the wilderness,
To consume them.
14 But I wrought for my name's sake,
That it should not be polluted before the heathen,
In whose sight I brought them out.
15 Yet also I lifted up my hand unto them in the wilderness,
That I would not bring them into the land which I had given them,
Flowing with milk and honey,
Which is the glory of all lands;
16 Because they despised my judgments,
And walked not in my statutes, but polluted my sabbaths:
For their heart went after their idols.
17 Nevertheless mine eye spared them from destroying them,
Neither did I make an end of them in the wilderness.
18 But I said unto their children in the wilderness,
Walk ye not in the statutes of your fathers,
Neither observe their judgments,
Nor defile yourselves with their idols:
19 I am the Lord your God;
Walk in my statutes, and keep my judgments,
And do them;
20 And hallow my sabbaths;
And they shall be a sign between me and you,
That ye may know that I am the LORD your God
21 Notwithstanding the children rebelled against me:
They walked not in my statutes,
Neither kept my judgments to do them,
Which if a man do, he shall even live in them;
They polluted my sabbaths:
Then I said, I would pour out my fury upon them,
To accomplish my anger against them in the wilderness.
22 Nevertheless I withdrew mine hand,
And wrought for my name's sake,
That it should not be polluted in the sight of the heathen,
In whose sight I brought them forth.
23 I lifted up mine hand unto them also in the wilderness.
That I would scatter them among the heathen,
And disperse them through the countries;
24 Because they had not executed my judgments,
But had despised my statutes,
And had polluted my sabbaths,
And their eyes were after their fathers' idols.
25 Wherefore I gave them also statutes that were not good,
And judgments whereby they should not live;
26 And I polluted them in their own gifts,
In that they caused to pass through the fire all that openeth the womb,
That I might make them desolate,
To the end that they might know that I am the LORD

The history of the struggles between the sins of Israel, by which they endeavoured to ruin themselves, and the mercies of God, by which he endeavoured to save them and make them happy, is here continued; and the instances of that struggle in these verses have reference to what passed between God and them in the wilderness, in which God honoured himself and they shamed themselves. The story of Israel in the wilderness is referred to in the New Testament, (1 Cor. x., Heb. iii.,) as well as often in the Old, for warning to us Christians, and therefore we are particularly concerned in these verses. Observe,

First. The great things God did for them, which he puts them in mind of, not as grudging them his favours, but to shew how ungrateful they had been. And we say, if you call a man ungrateful, you can call him no worse. It was a great favour, 1. That God "brought them forth out of Egypt," ver. 10, though, as follows, he "brought them into the wilderness," and not into Canaan presently. It is better to be at liberty in a wilderness than bond-slaves in a land of plenty; to enjoy God and ourselves in solitude, than to lose both in a crowd; yet there were many of them who had such base, servile spirits as not to understand this, but when they met with the difficulties of a desert, wished themselves in Egypt again. 2. That he gave them the law upon mount Sinai, ver. 11; not only instructed them concerning good and evil, but by his authority bound them from the evil and to the good. He "gave them his statute," and a valuable gift it was: "Moses commanded them a law that was the inheritance of the congregation of Israel," Deu. xxxiii. 4. God made them to know his judgments; not only enacted laws for them, but shewed them the reasonableness and equity of those laws, with what judgment they were formed. The laws he gave them they were encouraged to observe and obey, for "if a man do them, he shall even live in them;" that is, in keeping of God's commandments there is abundance of comfort, and a great reward. Christ saith, "If thou wilt enter into life," and enjoy it, "keep the commandments." Though they who are most strict in their obedience are thus far unprofitable servants that they do no more than is their duty to do, yet it is thus richly recompensed, "This do, and thou shalt live." The Chaldee saith, "he shall live an eternal life in them." St. Paul quotes this, Gal. iii. 12, to shew that the law is not of faith, but proposeth life upon condition of perfect obedience, which we are not capable of performing, and therefore must have recourse to the grace of the Gospel, without which we are all undone. 3. That he revived the ancient institution of the sabbath day, which was lost and forgotten while they were bond-slaves in Egypt, for their task-masters there would by no means allow them to rest one day in seven. In the wilderness indeed every day was a day of rest, for what need had they to labour who lived upon manna, and whose raiment waxed not old? But one day in seven must be a holy rest; ver. 12, "I gave them my sabbath to be a sign between me and them." The institution of the sabbath was a sign of God's goodwill to them, and their observance of it a sign of their regard to him: "that they might know that I am the Lord that sanctify them." By this, God made it to appear he had distinguished them from the rest of the world, and designed to model them for a peculiar people to himself; and by their attendance on God in solemn assemblies on sabbath days they were made to increase in the knowledge of God, in an experimental knowledge of the powers and pleasures of his sanctifying grace. Note, 1st. Sabbaths are privileges, and are so to be accounted. The church acknowledgeth it as a great favour, in that chapter which is parallel to this, and seems to have a reference to this, Neh. ix. 14, "Thou madest known to them thy holy sabbaths." 2nd. Sabbaths are signs. It is a sign men have a sense of religion, and there is some good correspondence between them and God, while they make conscience of keeping holy the sabbath day. 3rd. Sabbaths, if duly sanctified, are the means of our sanctification. If we do the duty of the day, we shall find, to our comfort, it is the Lord that sanctifies us, makes us holy, that is, truly happy here, and prepares us to be happy, that is, perfectly holy, hereafter.

Secondly. The disobedient, undutiful carriage towards God, for which he might justly have thrown them out of covenant, as soon as he had taken them into covenant; ver. 13, "They rebelled in the wilderness." There where they received so much mercy from God, and had such a dependence upon him, and were in their way to Canaan, yet there they broke out in many open rebellions against the God that led them and fed them. They did not only not walk in God's statutes, but they despised his judgments as not worth observing; instead of sanctifying the sabbaths, they polluted them, greatly polluted them; one gathered sticks, many went out to gather manna on this day. Hereupon God was ready sometimes to cut them off; he said more than once he would "consume them in the wilderness," but Moses interceded, so did God's own mercy more powerfully, and most of all a concern for his own glory, that "his name might not be polluted and profaned among the heathen," ver. 14; that the appropriate. The Syriac and Latin Vulgate agree with our version, "in thy blood;" the Greek has "like the flower of a pomegranate;" and the Targum seems to attach the idea of likeness to the words.

xix. 11. The precise sense of this verse seems to be, "And she had strong rods like the sceptres of rulers, and the stature of it was raised up among the thick branches, and it was conspicuous in its stature in the multitude of its boughs." There is in the Hebrew a change of gender and subject, as in this paraphrase.

xix. 12. The east wind was unquestionably regarded as injurious to vegetation; but here the phrase indicates the forces of the Assyrians from the east.

xix. 14. As Bishop Hall puts it, "A destruction is risen from among themselves, even from the treachery of Zedekiah, which hath utterly destroyed the remainder of her hopes, so that now there is no more likelihood of any of the royal blood being exalted to the government."

Egyptians might not say, either for mischief he brought them thus far, or he was not able to bring them any farther, or he had no such good land as was talked of to bring them to, Ex. xxxii. 12; Num. xiv. 13. Note, God's strongest reasons for his sparing mercy are those which are fetched from his own glory.

Thirdly. God's determination to cut off that generation of them in the wilderness. He that lifted up his hand for them, ver. 6, now lifts up his hand against them; that then by an oath confirmed his promise to bring them out of Egypt, now by an oath confirmed his threatening that he would not bring them into Canaan; ver. 15, 16, "I lifted up my hand unto them, saying, As truly as I live, these men who have tempted me these ten times shall never see the land which I sware unto their fathers," Num. xiv. 22, 23; Ps. xcv. 11. By their contempt of God's laws, and particularly of his sabbaths, they put a bar in their own door; and that which was at the bottom of their disobedience to God, and their neglect of his institutions, was a secret affection to the gods of Egypt; "Their heart went after their idols." Note, The bias of the mind towards the world and the flesh, the money and the belly, those two great objects of spiritual idolatry, is the root of bitterness, from which springs all disobedience to the Divine law. The heart that goes after those idols despiseth God's judgments.

Fourthly. The reservation of a seed that should be admitted upon a new trial, and instructions given to that seed, ver. 17. Though they thus deserved ruin, and were doomed to it, yet "mine eye spared them." When he looked upon them he had a compassion for them, and did not make an end of them, but reprieved them till a new generation was reared. Note, It is owing purely to the mercy of God that he has not long ago made an end of us. This new generation was well educated; Moses in Deuteronomy reported and enforced the laws which had been given to those that came out of Egypt, that their children might have them as it were sounding in their ears afresh, when they entered Canaan; ver. 18, "I said unto their children in the wilderness," in the plains of Moab; walk in the statutes of your God, and "walk not in the statutes of your fathers." Do not imitate their superstitious usages, nor retain their foolish, wicked customs; away with their vain conversation, which has nothing else to say for itself but that it was received by the tradition of your fathers; 1 Pet. i. 18, "Defile not yourselves with their idols," for you see how odious they rendered themselves to God by them, but "keep my judgments, and hallow my sabbaths," ver. 19, 20. Note, If parents be careless and do not give their children good instructions as they ought, the children ought to make up the want by studying the word of God so much the more carefully and diligently themselves, when they grow up. And the bad examples of parents must be made use of by their children for admonition, and not for imitation.

Fifthly. The revolt of the next generation from God, by which they also made themselves obnoxious to the wrath of God; ver. 21, "The children rebelled against me" too. And the same that was said of the fathers' rebellion is here said of the children's, for they were a seed of evil-doers; Moses told them he knew their rebellion and their stiff neck, Deu. xxxi. 27, and Deu. ix. 24, "You have been rebellious against the Lord from the day that I knew you;" "They walked not in my statutes," ver. 21; nay, "they despised my statutes," ver. 25. They who disobey God's statutes despise them; they shew that they have a mean opinion of them, and of him whose statutes they are. They polluted God's sabbaths, as their fathers. Note, The profanation of the sabbath day is an inlet to all impiety; those who pollute holy time will keep nothing pure. It was said of the fathers, ver. 16, that "their heart went after their idols;" they worshipped idols because they had an affection for them. It is said of the children, ver. 24, that "their eyes went after their fathers' idols;" they were grown atheistical, and had no affection for any gods at all, but they worshipped their fathers' idols because they were their fathers', and they had them before their eyes; they were used to them. And if they must have gods, they would have such as they could see, such as they could manage; and that which aggravated their disobedience to God's statutes was, that if they had done them they might have lived in them, ver. 21; might have been a happy, thriving people. Note, They that go contrary to their duty go contrary to their interest; they will not obey, will not come to Christ that they may have life, Jno. v. 40; and it is therefore just that they who will not live and flourish as they might in their obedience should die and perish in their disobedience. Now the great instance of that generation's rebellion, and inclination to idolatry, was the iniquity of Peor, as that of their fathers was the golden calf; then the "anger of the Lord was kindled against Israel," Num. xxv. 3. Then there was a plague in the congregation of the Lord, which if it had not been seasonably stayed by Phinehas's zeal, had cut them all off; and yet they owned in Joshua's time, We are not "cleansed from that iniquity unto this day," Jos. xxii. 15; Ps. cvi. 29. Then it was that God said he would pour out his fury upon them, ver. 21; that he lifted up his hand unto them in the wilderness, when they were a second time just ready to enter Canaan, "that he would scatter them among the heathen." This very thing he said to them by Moses in his parting song, Deu. xxxii. 20; because they provoked him to jealousy with strange gods, he said, "I will hide my face from them;" and ver. 26, 27, he said, "I will scatter them into corners, were it not that I feared the wrath of the enemy," which explains this here, ver. 21, 22, "I said I would pour out my fury upon them, but I withdrew my hand for my name's sake." Note, When the corruptions of the visible church are such, and so provoking, that we have reason to fear its total extirpation, yet then we may be confident of this to our comfort, that God will secure his own honour by making good his purpose, that while the world stands he will have a church in it.

Sixthly. The judgments of God upon them for their rebellion. They would not regard the statutes and judgments by which God prescribed them their duty, but despised them; and therefore God gave them statutes and judgments that were not good, and by which they should not live, ver. 25. By which seems to be meant the several ways by which God punished them while they were in the wilderness, the plague that broke in upon them, the fiery serpent, and the like; which, in allusion to the law they had broken, are called judgments, because inflicted by the justice of God; and statutes, because he gave orders concerning them, and commanded desolations, as sometimes he had commanded deliverances, and appointed Israel's plagues as he had done the plagues of Egypt. When God said, "I will consume them in a moment," Num. xvi. 25; when he said, "Take the heads of the people, and hang them up," Num. xxv. 4; when he threatened them with the curse, and obliged them to say Amen to every curse, Deu. xxvii., xxviii.; then he gave them judgments by which they should not live: more is implied than is expressed,—they are judgments by which they should die. Those that will not be bound by the precepts of the law shall be bound by the sentence of it; for one way or other the word of God will take hold of men, Zec. i. 6.

Spiritual judgments are the most dreadful, and these God punished them with; the statutes and judgments which the heathen observed in the worship of their idols were not good, and in practising them they could not live. And God gave them up to those: he made their sin to be their punishment; gave them up to a reprobate mind, as he did the Gentile idolaters, Rom. i. 24, 26; gave them up to their own hearts' lusts, Ps. lxxxi. 12; punished them for their superstitious customs which were against the written law, by giving them up to those that were against the very light and law of nature. He left them to themselves, to be guilty of the most impure idolatries, as in the worship of Baal-peor he polluted them; that is, he permitted them to pollute themselves in their own gifts, ver. 26; and of the most barbarous idolatries, as in the worship of Moloch, when they caused their children, especially their firstborn, (which God challenged a particular property in, "The firstborn of thy sons shalt thou give unto me,") "to pass through the fire," that is, to be sacrificed to their idols; that thus he might make them desolate. Not only that he might justly do it, but that he might do it by their own hands; for this must needs be a great weakening to their families, and a diminution of the honour and strength of their country. Note, God sometimes makes sin to be its own punishment, and yet is not the author of sin; and there needs no more to make men miserable than to give them up to their own vile appetites and passions. Let them be put into the hand of their own counsels, and they will ruin themselves, and make themselves desolate. And thus God makes them know that he is the Lord, and that he is a righteous God, which they themselves will be compelled to own when they see how much their wilful transgressions contribute to their own desolations. Note, Those who will not acknowledge God as the Lord their Ruler, shall be made to acknowledge him as the Lord their Judge, when it is too late.

27 Therefore, son of man, speak unto the house of Israel, and say unto them,
Thus saith the Lord GOD;
Yet in this your fathers have blasphemed me,
In that they have committed a trespass against me.
28 For when I had brought them into the land,
For the which I lifted up mine hand to give it to them,
Then they saw every high hill, and all the thick trees,
And they offered there their sacrifices, [ing.
And there they presented the provocation of their offer-
There also they made their sweet savour,
And poured out there their drink offerings
29 Then I said unto them,
What is the high place whereunto ye go?
And the name thereof is called Bamah unto this day
30 Wherefore say unto the house of Israel,
Thus saith the Lord GOD;
Are ye polluted after the manner of your fathers?
And commit ye whoredom after their abominations?
31 For when ye offer your gifts,
When ye make your sons to pass through the fire,
Ye pollute yourselves with all your idols, even unto this day:

ANCIENT IDOL.

And shall I be enquired of by you, O house of Israel?
As I live, saith the Lord GOD, I will not be enquired of by you 32 And that which cometh into your mind shall not be at all,
That ye say, We will be as the heathen,
As the families of the countries, to serve wood and stone

xx. 1. Prebendary Lowth says this means the seventh year of Jeboiachin's captivity, and that all the prophecies recorded from chap. viii. to this belong to the sixth year of that captivity. This was the date accepted by older expositors, as Calvin, Junius, Piscator, and others.

xx. 4. Professor Fairbairn here translates, "Wilt thou not judge them? wilt thou not judge, son of man?" observing that the interrogative has the force of a command, and that the sign of interrogation is equivalent to "wilt thou not?" We prefer the common and literal rendering, because it involves no real difficulty, and because we see no need to eke out the expressions used by the inspired penman.

xx. 5, 6. The phrase, "to lift up the hand," signifies to give a solemn pledge or to swear—to pledge an oath. The historical reference is to various passages in the Pentateuch, the knowledge of which is clearly implied. The words, "which is the glory of all lands," applied to Palestine, signify "which is the most beautiful of

Here the prophet goes on with the story of their rebellions, for their farther humiliation; and shews,

First. That they had persisted in them after they were settled in the land of Canaan. Though God had so many times testified his displeasure against their wicked courses, yet in this, that is, in the very same thing, "your fathers have blasphemed me;" that is, continued to affront me, that they "also have trespassed a trespass against me," ver. 27. Note, It is a great aggravation of sin when men will not take warning by the mischievous consequences of sin in those that have gone before them. This is blaspheming God, it is speaking reproachfully of his judgments, as if they were of no significancy, and were not worth regarding.

1. God had made good his promise. I brought them into the land that I had sworn to give them; though their unbelief and disobedience had made the performance slow, and much retarded it, yet it did not make the promise of none effect. They were often very near being cut off in the wilderness, but a step between them and ruin; and yet they came to Canaan at last. Note, Even God's Israel gets to heaven by hell gates; so many are their transgressions, and so strong their corruptions, that it is a miracle of mercy they are happy at last; as hypocrites go to hell by heaven gates. The righteous scarcely are saved; per tot discrimina rerum tendimus ad cœlum,—'ten thousand dangers fill the road to heaven.'

2. They had broken his precept by their abominable idolatries. God had appointed them to destroy all the monuments of idolatry, that they might not be tempted to desert his sanctuary; but instead of defacing them they fell in love with them, and when they "saw every high hill," whence they had the most delightful prospects, and all the "thick trees," where they had the most delightful shades,—the former to shew forth their pompous idolatries, the latter to conceal their shameful ones,—"there they offered their sacrifices, and made their sweet savour," which should have been presented upon God's altar only. "There they presented the provocation of their offering," ver. 28; that is, their offerings, which, instead of pacifying God or pleasing him, were highly provoking; sacrifices which, though costly, yet being misplaced, were an abomination to the Lord.

3. They obstinately persisted herein, notwithstanding all the admonitions that were given them; ver. 29, "Then I told them" by my servants the prophets, told them where the high place was to which they went, nay, I put them upon considering it, and asking their own consciences concerning it, by putting this question to them, "Which is the high place whereunto you go?" What do you find there that is so inviting, that you will leave God's altars, where he requires your attendance, to frequent such places as he has forbidden to worship in? Do you not know that those high places are of a heathenish extraction, and that the things which the Gentiles sacrificed they sacrificed to devils, and not to God? Did not Moses tell you so? Deu. xxxii. 17, "And will you have fellowship with devils? What is that high place to which you go" when you turn your back on God's altars? O foolish Israelites, who or what has bewitched you, that you will forsake the fountain of life for broken cisterns? that worship which God appoints and will accept, for that which he forbids, which he abhors, and which he will avenge? And yet the name is called Bamah unto this day; that is, they will have their way, let God and his prophets say what they please to the contrary. They are wedded to their high places, even in the best reigns those were not taken away. You could not prevail to take away the name of Bamah, the high place, out of their mouths; but still they would have that in the place of their worship. The sin and the sinner are hardly parted.

Secondly. That this generation after they were unsettled continued under the dominion of the same corrupt inclination to idolatry, ver. 30. He must say to the present house of Israel, some of whose elders were now sitting before him, "Are ye polluted after the manner of your fathers?" After all that God hath said against you by a succession of prophets, and done against you by a series of judgments, yet will you take no warning? will you still be as bad as your fathers were, and commit the same abominations that they committed? I see you will, you have a mind to be at the old trade again; you offer your gifts in the high places, and you make your sons to pass through the fire; either you actually do it, or do it in purpose and imagination, and so you continue idolaters to this day. These elders seem now to have been projecting a coalition with the heathen; their hearts they will reserve for the God of Israel, but their knees they will be at liberty to bow to the gods of the nations among whom they live, that they may have the more respect, and the fairer quarter among them. Now the prophet is here ordered to tell those who are forming this scheme, and were for compounding the matter between God and Baal, that they should have no comfort or benefit by either. 1. They should have no benefit by their consulting in private with the prophets of the Lord; for, because they were hearkening after idols, God would have nothing to do with them; ver. 31, "As I live, saith the Lord God, I will not be inquired of by you." What he had said before, (ver. 3,) having largely shewed how just it was, he here repeats as that which he would abide by. Let them not think that they honoured him by their inquiries, nor expect an answer of peace from him, as long as they continued in love and league with their idols. Note, Those reap no benefit by their religion that are not entire and sincere in it; nor can we have any comfortable communion with God in ordinances of worship unless we be inward, and upright with him therein. We make nothing of our profession if it be but a profession. Nay, 2. They should have no benefit by their conforming in public to the practice of their neighbours; ver. 32, "That which comes into your mind" as a piece of refined politics in the present difficult juncture, and which you would be advised to for your own preservation, and that you may not by being singular expose yourselves to abuses; it "shall not be at all," it shall turn to no account to you. You say, "We will be as the heathen;" we will join with them in worshipping their gods, though at the same time we do not believe them to be gods, but wood and stone; and then we should be taken as the families of the countries. They will not know, or in a little while will have forgotten, that we are Jews, and will allow us the same privileges with their own countrymen. Tell them, saith God, that this project shall never prosper. Either their neighbours will not admit them to join with them in their worship, or, if they do, will think never the better, but the worse of them for it; and will look upon them as dissemblers, and not fit to be trusted, who are thus false to their God, and put a cheat upon their neighbours. Note, There is nothing got by sinful compliances; and the carnal projects of hypocrites will stand them in no stead. It is only integrity and uprightness that will preserve men, and recommend them to God and man.

33 As I live, saith the Lord GOD,
Surely with a mighty hand, and with a stretched out arm,
And with fury poured out, will I rule over you:
34 And I will bring you out from the people,
And will gather you out of the countries wherein ye are
With a mighty hand, and with a stretched out arm,
And with fury poured out.
35 And I will bring you into the wilderness of the people,
And there will I plead with you face to face.
36 Like as I pleaded with your fathers in the wilderness of the land of Egypt,
So will I plead with you, saith the Lord GOD.
37 And I will cause you to pass under the rod,
And I will bring you into the bond of the covenant:
38 And I will purge out from among you the rebels,
And them that transgress against me:
I will bring them forth out of the country where they
And they shall not enter into the land of Israel:
And ye shall know that I am the LORD.
39 As for you, O house of Israel, thus saith the Lord GOD;
Go ye, serve ye every one his idols,
And hereafter also, if ye will not hearken unto me:
But pollute ye my holy name no more
With your gifts, and with your idols.
40 For in mine holy mountain,
In the mountain of the height of Israel, saith the Lord GOD,
There shall all the house of Israel, all of them in the land, serve me:
There will I accept them,
And there will I require your offerings,
And the firstfruits of your oblations, with all your holy things.
41 I will accept you with your sweet savour,
When I bring you out from the people,
And gather you out of the countries wherein ye have been scattered;
And I will be sanctified in you before the heathen.
42 And ye shall know that I am the LORD,
When I shall bring you into the land of Israel,
Into the country for the which I lifted up mine hand
To give it to your fathers.
43 And there shall ye remember your ways,
And all your doings, wherein ye have been defiled;
And ye shall lothe yourselves in your own sight
For all your evils that ye have committed.
44 And ye shall know that I am the LORD,
When I have wrought with you for my name's sake,
Not according to your wicked ways, nor according to your corrupt doings,
O ye house of Israel, saith the Lord GOD

The design which was now on foot among the elders of Israel was, that the people of Israel, being scattered among the nations, should lay aside all their peculiarities, and conform to those among whom they lived; but God had told them the design should not take effect, ver. 32. Now in these verses he shews particularly how it should be frustrated. They aimed at the mingling of the families of Israel with the families of the countries. But it will prove in the issue, that the wicked Israelites, notwithstanding their compliances, shall not mingle with them in their prosperity, but shall be distinguished from them for destruction; for idolatrous Israelites, that are apostates from God, shall be sooner and sorer punished than idolatrous Babylonians, that never knew the way of righteousness. Read and tremble at the doom here passed upon them; it is backed with an oath not to be reversed. "As I live, saith the Lord God," thus and thus will I deal with you. They think to make both Jerusalem and Babylon their friends by halting between two. But God threatens that neither of them shall serve for a rest or refuge for them.

First. Babylon shall not protect them, nor any of the countries of the heathen; for God will cast them out of his protection, and then what prince, what people, what place, can serve to be a sanctuary to them? God was Israel's king of old, and had they continued his loyal subjects he would have ruled over them with care and tenderness, for their good; but now "with a stretched out arm, and with fury poured out, will I rule over them," ver. 33. That power which should have been exerted for their protection shall be exerted for their destruction. Note, There is no shaking off God's dominion; rule he will, either with the golden sceptre or with the iron rod; and they that will not yield to the power of his grace shall be made to sink under the power of his wrath. Now when God is angry with them, though they may think they shall be lost in the crowd of the heathen, among whom they are scattered, they will be disappointed; for, ver. 34, "I will gather you out of the countries wherein you are scattered," as when the rebels are dispersed in battle, those that have escaped the sword of war are pursued and brought together out of all the places whither they were scattered, to be punished by the sword of justice. They shall be brought into the wilderness of the people, ver. 35, either into Babylon, which is called a wilderness, ch. xix. 13, and the desert of the sea, Isa. xxi. 1, or into some place, which, though full of people, should be to them as the all lands," or, "which is a most beautiful land," the latter being probably the precise idea intended.

xx. 7, 8. It would seem that some of the Hebrews actually adopted the idolatry of the Egyptians, their oppressors. The rehearsal of the Lord's proceedings with his people, and of their waywardness, and unbelief, and sin while in the wilderness, is abundantly confirmed and illustrated by the books of Moses, where all the accusations here brought are justified by a multitude of facts.

xx. 37. This reference to passing under the rod is by many explained of tithing sheep, the custom being to mark every tenth sheep with a rod dipped in red paint: a very unsatisfactory explanation, because there is no allusion to tithing. The sense seems to be that God would bring them into subjection to himself, the rod being a sceptre, and that he would secure them by a firm bond or covenant. This, however, leaves the figure still obscure, though at first sight it looks like that of a man with a rod compelling the advance of wilderness was to Israel, after they came out of Egypt, a place where God will plead with them face to face, as he pleaded with their fathers in the wilderness of Egypt, ver. 36; where their carcases shall fall, and where he will swear concerning them, that they shall never return to Canaan; as he sware concerning their fathers, that they should never come into Canaan, where he will avenge the breach of his law with as much terror as he gave it in the wilderness of Sinai. Note, God has a good action against apostates, and will not only find time, but find a proper place too, to plead with them in upon that action, a wilderness even in the midst of the people for that purpose.

Secondly. Israel shall be no more able to protect them than Babylon could; nor shall their relation to God's people stand them in any more stead for the other world than their compliance with idolaters shall for this world; nor shall they stand "in the congregation of the righteous," any more than in the congregation of evil-doers; for there will come a distinguishing day, when God will separate between the precious and the vile. He will cause them, as the shepherd causeth his sheep, to pass under the rod, when he tithes them, Lev. xxvii. 32, that he may mark which is for God. God will take particular notice of each of them, one by one, as sheep are counted, and "He will bring them into the bond of the covenant," ver. 37; that is, he will try them and judge of them according to the tenor of the covenant, and the difference made between some and others by the blessings and curses of the covenant. Or, it may refer to those among them that repented and reformed; he will cause them to pass under the rod of affliction, and, having done them good by it, he will bring them again into the bond of the covenant,—will be to them a God in covenant, and use them again as heirs of promise.

1. He will separate the wicked men from among them; ver. 38, "I will purge out from among you the rebels," that have been a grief and scandal to you, and who have by their rebellions brought all these calamities upon you. The judgments of God shall find them out, and their naming the name of Israel shall be no shelter to them. They shall be "brought out of the countries where they sojourn," and shall not have that rest in them which they promised themselves; but they "shall not enter into the land of Israel," nor enjoy the benefit of that rest which God has promised to his people. Note, Though godly people may share with the wicked in the calamities of the world, yet wicked people shall have no share with the godly in the heavenly Canaan; but it shall be part of the blessedness of that world that they shall be purged out from among them, the tares from the wheat, the chaff from the corn, ch. xiii. 9. But wherever these idolaters of the house of Israel were contriving to worship both God and their idols, thinking to please both, God here protests against it, ver. 39, as Elijah had done in his name; "If the Lord be God, then follow him; but if Baal, then follow him." If you will serve your idols, do, and take what comes of it; but then do not pretend relation to God and a religious observance of him, nor pollute his holy name with your gifts at his altar. Spiritual judgments are the sorest judgments. Two of that kind of judgments are threatened in this verse against those that were for dividing between the God of Israel and the gods of the nations. 1st. That they should be given up to the service of their idols. To them he saith ironically, "Since you will not hearken unto me, go ye, serve every one his idols," now you think it will be for your interest, and hereafter also. You shall go on in it; Ephraim is joined to idols, let him alone, let him take his course, and see what he will get by it at last. Note, They who think to serve themselves by sin will find in the end that they have but enslaved themselves to sin. 2nd. That they shall be cut off from the service of God, and communion with God; You shall not pollute my holy name with your vain oblations, Isa. i. 11. You bring your gifts in your hands, wherewith you pretend to honour me, but at the same time you bring your idols in your hearts, and therefore you do but pollute me, which I will not suffer any more, Am. v. 21, 22. Note, Those are justly forbidden God's house that profane his house.

2. He will separate them to himself again. 1st. He will "gather them" in mercy "out of the countries whither they were scattered," to be monuments of mercy, as the incorrigible were gathered to be vessels of wrath, ver. 41. Not one of God's jewels shall be lost in the lumber of this world. 2nd. He will "bring them to the land of Israel," which he had promised to give to their fathers. And the discontinuance of their possession shall be no defeasance of their right; it is the land of Israel still, and thither God will bring them safe again, ver. 42. 3rd. He will re-establish his ordinances among them,—will set up his sanctuary in his holy mountain, which is here called "the mountain of the height of Israel;" for the mount Sion was none of the highest mountains, yet the temple there was one of the highest honours of Israel. It is promised that they who preserved their integrity, and would not serve idols in other lands, shall return to their prosperity, and shall serve the true God in their own land; "All of them in the land shall serve me." Note, It is the true happiness of a people, and a sure token for good to them, when there is a prevailing disposition in them to serve God. Whereas God had forbidden the idolaters to bring their gifts to his altar, of these he will require offerings and first-fruits, and will accept them, ver. 42. What he doth not require he will not accept, but what is done with a regard to his precepts he will be well pleased with. He will "accept them with their sweet savour," or 'savour of rest,' ver. 41, as being very grateful to him, and what he takes a complacency in; whereas to hypocritical worshippers he saith, "I will not smell in your solemn assemblies." 4th. He will give them true repentance for their sins, ver. 43. When they find how gracious God is to them they shall be overcome with his kindness, and blush to think of their ill carriage towards so good a God. There, in my holy mountain, when you come to enjoy the privileges of that again, there shall ye remember your doings, wherein ye have been defiled. Note, The more conversant we are with God's holiness, the more we shall see of the odious nature of sin. There "ye shall loathe yourselves in your own sight." Note, Ingenuous evangelical repentance makes people loathe themselves for their sins, as Job xlii. 5, 6. 5th. He will give them the knowledge of himself. They shall know by experience that he is the Lord; that he is a God of almighty power and inexhaustible goodness; kind to his people, and faithful to his covenant with them. Note, All the favours we receive from God should lead us into a more intimate acquaintance with him. 6th. He will do all this for his own name's sake, notwithstanding their undeservings, and ill deservings, ver. 44. He has wrought with them, that is, wrought for them, wrought in favour of them, wrought in concurrence with them, they doing their endeavour; he has wrought with them purely for his name's sake. His reasons were all fetched from himself. Had he dealt with them "according to their wicked ways, and their corrupt doings," though they were the better and sounder part of the house of Israel, he had left them to be scattered and lost with the rest; but he recovered and restored them for the sake of his own name, not only that it might not be polluted, ver. 14, but that he might be sanctified in them before the heathen, ver. 41; that he might sanctify himself, so the word is; for it is God's work to glorify his own name. He will do well for his people, that he may have the glory of it; that he may manifest himself to be a God pardoning sin, and so keeping promise; that his people may praise him, and that their neighbours may likewise take notice of him as they did when God "turned again their captivity," Ps. cxxvi. 1. "Then said they among the heathen, The Lord has done great things for them."

45 Moreover the word of the LORD came unto me, saying,
46 Son of man, set thy face toward the south,
And drop thy word toward the south,
And prophesy against the forest of the south field;
47 And say to the forest of the south,
Hear the word of the LORD;
Thus saith the Lord GOD;
Behold, I will kindle a fire in thee,
And it shall devour every green tree in thee,
And every dry tree:
The flaming flame shall not be quenched, [therein.
And all faces from the south to the north shall be burned 48 And all flesh shall see that I the LORD have kindled it:
It shall not be quenched.
49 Then said I, Ah Lord GOD! they say of me, Doth he not speak parables?

We have here a prophecy of wrath against Judah and Jerusalem, which should more fitly have begun the next chapter than have concluded this; for it has no dependence on what goes before, but that which follows in the beginning of the next chapter is the reddition or explication of it, when the people complained that this was a parable which they understood not. In this parable,

First. It is a forest that is prophesied against; "the forest of the south field," that is, Judah and Jerusalem. These lay south from Babylon, where Ezekiel now was; and therefore he is directed to set his face towards the south, ver. 46, to intimate to them, that God had set his face against them, was displeased with them, and determined to destroy them. But though it be a message of wrath he has to deliver, he must deliver it with mildness and tenderness; he must drop his word towards the south. His doctrine must distil as the rain, Deu. xxxii. 2, that people's hearts might be softened by it, as the earth by the river of God, which drops upon the pastures of the wilderness, Ps. lxv. 12, and which a south land more especially calls for, Jos. xv. 19. Judah and Jerusalem are called forests, not only because they had been full of people, as a wood of trees, but because they had been empty of fruit, for fruit trees grow not in a forest, and a forest is put in opposition to a fruitful field, Isa. xxxii. 15. They that should have been as the garden of the Lord, and his vineyard, were become like a forest, all overgrown with briers and thorns. And those that are so, that bring not forth the fruits of righteousness, God's word prophesies against.

Secondly. It is a fire kindled in his forest that is prophesied of, ver. 47. All those judgments, which wasted and consumed both the city and the country, sword, famine, pestilence, and captivity, are signified by this fire. 1. It is a fire of God's own kindling; "I will kindle a fire in thee." The breath of the Lord is not as a drop, but as a stream of brimstone to set it on fire, Isa. xl. 33. He that had been himself a protecting fire about Jerusalem is now a consuming fire in it. "All flesh shall see," by the fury of this fire, and the desolations it shall make, especially when they compare it with the sins which had made them fuel for this fire, that it is "the Lord that has kindled it," ver. 48, as a just avenger of his own injured honour. 2. This conflagration shall be general. All orders and degrees of men shall be devoured by it, young and old, rich and poor, high and low, even green trees, which the fire doth not easily fasten upon, shall be devoured by this fire; even good people shall some of them be involved in these calamities. And if this be done in the green tree what shall be done in the dry? The dry trees shall be as tinder and touch-wood to this fire. All faces, that is, all that covers the face of the earth, from the south of Canaan to the north, from Beersheba to Dan, shall be burnt therein. 3. The fire shall not be quenched; no attempts to give check to the dissolution shall prevail. When God will ruin a nation, who or what can save it?

Now observe, 1st. The people's reflection upon the prophet, on occasion of this discourse. They said, "Doth he not speak parables?" which was the language either of their ignorance or infidelity,—the plainest truths were as parables to them,—or of their malice and ill-will to the prophet. Note, It is common for those who will not be wrought upon by the word to pick quarrels with it. It is either too plain or too obscure, too fine or too homely, too common or too singular; something or other is amiss in it. 2nd. The prophet's complaint to God; "Ah, Lord God, they say" so and so of me. Note, It is a comfort to us, when people speak ill of us unjustly, that we have a God to complain to.

CHAPTER XXI.

In this chapter we have, I. An explanation of the prophecy in the close of the foregoing chapter concerning the fire in the forest, which the people complained they could not understand, ver. 1—5, with directions to the prophet to shew himself deeply affected with it, ver. 6, 7. II. A farther prediction of the sword that was coming upon the land, by which all should be laid waste; and this expressed very emphatically, ver. 8—17. III. A prospect given of the king of Babylon's approach to Jerusalem, to which he was determined by divination, ver. 18—24. IV. Sentence passed upon Zedekiah, king of Judah, ver. 25—27. V. The destruction of the Ammonites by the sword foretold, ver. 28—32. Thus is this chapter all threatening.

AND the word of the LORD came unto me, saying,
2 Son of man, set thy face toward Jerusalem,
And drop thy word toward the holy places,
And prophesy against the land of Israel.
3 And say to the land of Israel, Thus saith the LORD,
Behold, I am against thee,
And will draw forth my sword out of his sheath,
And will cut off from thee the righteous and the wicked.
4 Seeing then that I will cut off from thee the righteous and the wicked, some animal which is held in by a cord. Thus were horses, oxen, and captive men urged along. To suggest, perhaps, that the compulsion was in this case moral and not physical, the word "covenant" was introduced as explaining the "bond." This last term is put for a Hebrew word which occurs in no other text. A similar form in Syriac means both a "bond" and a "bundle" (Ex. xii. 22; Matt. xiii. 30).

xx. 39. This may signify, "And ye, O house of Israel, thus saith the Lord God, Go every one of you and serve his idols; and after, if none of you hearken unto me, ye will profane my holy name no more with your gifts and with your idols." We cannot see how the words, "and if none of you hearken unto me," can mean "surely ye will hearken unto me," because the grammatical construction here found requires the version we have adopted. When the natural Israel had abandoned the Lord's worship altogether, and refused to obey him, they would no longer serve the Lord and graven images at the same

Therefore shall my sword go forth out of his sheath
Against all flesh from the south to the north:
5 That all flesh may know [sheath:
That I the LORD have drawn forth my sword out of his
It shall not return any more.
6 Sigh therefore, thou son of man,
With the breaking of thy loins;
And with bitterness sigh before their eyes.
7 And it shall be, when they say unto thee, Wherefore sighest thou? [eth:
That thou shalt answer, For the tidings; because it com-
And every heart shall melt, and all hands shall be feeble,
And every spirit shall faint, and all knees shall be weak as water:
Behold, it cometh, and shall be brought to pass, saith the Lord GOD.

The prophet had faithfully delivered the message he was instructed with in the close of the foregoing chapter, in the terms wherein he received it; not daring to add his own comment upon it. But when he complained that the people found fault with him for speaking parables, the word of the Lord came to him again, and gave him a key to that figurative discourse, that with it he might let the people into the meaning of it, and so silence that objection; for all men shall be rendered inexcusable at God's bar, and every mouth shall be stopped. Note, He that speaks with tongues should pray that he may interpret, 1 Cor. xiv. 13. When we speak to people about their souls we would study plainness, and express ourselves as we may be best understood. Christ expounded his parables to his disciples, Mar. iv. 34.

First. The prophet is here more plainly directed against whom to level the arrow of this prophecy. He must drop his word toward the holy places, ver. 2, toward Canaan the holy land, Jerusalem the holy city, the temple the holy house. These were highly dignified above other places, but when they polluted them that word which used to drop in the holy places shall now drop against them,—"Prophesy against the land of Israel." It was the honour of Israel that it had prophets and prophecy; but these, being despised by them, are turned against them. And justly is Zion battered with her own artillery, which used to be employed against her adversaries, seeing she knew not how to value it.

Secondly. He is instructed, and is to instruct the people, in the meaning of the fire that was threatened to consume the forest of the south. It signified, a sword drawn,' the sword of war, which should make the land desolate; ver. 3, "Behold, I am against thee, O land of Israel!" There needs no more to make a people miserable than to have God against them; for as, if he be for us, we need not fear whoever are against us, so if he be against us we cannot hope whoever are for us. And God's professing people, when they revolt from him, set him against them who used to be for them. Was the fire there of God's kindling? The sword here is his sword, which he hath prepared, and which he will give commission to; it is he that will draw it out of its sheath, where it had lain quiet, and threatened no harm. Note, When the sword is unsheathed among the nations God's hand must be eyed and owned in it. Did the fire devour every green tree, and every dry tree? The sword in like manner shall cut off the righteous and the wicked. Good and bad were involved in the common calamities of the nation. The righteous were cut off from the land of Israel, when they were sent captives to Babylon, though perhaps few or none of them were cut off from the land of the living; and it was a threatening omen to the land of Israel that in the beginning of its troubles such excellent men as Daniel and his fellows, and Ezekiel, were cut off from it, and conveyed to Babylon. But though the sword cut off the righteous and the wicked, for it devours one as well as another, 2 Sam. xi. 25; yet far be it from us to think that the righteous are as the wicked, Gen. xviii. 25. No; God's graces and comforts make a great difference when his providence seems to make none. The good figs are sent into Babylon for their good, Jer. xxiv. 5, 6. It is only in outward appearance that "there is one event to the righteous and to the wicked," Eccl. ix. 2. But it speaks the greatness of God's displeasure against the land of Israel. Well might it be said "his eye shall not spare," when it shall not spare, no, not the righteous in it. Since there are not righteous men enough to save the land, to make the justice of God the more illustrious, the few that are shall suffer with it, and God's mercy shall make it up to them some other way. Did the fire "burn up all faces from the south to the north?" The sword shall go "forth against all flesh from the south to the north;" shall go forth as God's sword, with a commission that cannot be contested, with a force that cannot be resisted. Were all flesh made to know that God kindled the fire? They shall be made to know that he hath drawn forth the sword, ver. 5. And lastly, Shall the fire that is kindled never be quenched? So when this sword of the Lord is drawn against Judah and Jerusalem, the scabbard is thrown away, and it shall never be sheathed, it shall not return any more till it has made a full end.

Thirdly. The prophet is ordered, by expressions of his own grief and concern for these calamities that were coming on, to try to make impressions of the like upon the people. When he has delivered his message he must sigh, ver. 6, must fetch many deep sighs, with the breaking of his loins; he must sigh as if his heart would burst, sigh with bitterness, with other expressions of bitter sorrow; and this publicly in the sight of those to whom he delivered the foregoing message, that this might be a sermon to their eyes as that was to their ears, and it was well if both would work upon them. The prophet must sigh, though it was painful to himself and made his breast sore; and though it is probable the profane among the people would ridicule him for it, and call him a whining, canting preacher. But if we be beside ourselves, it is to God, and if this be to be vile, we will be yet more so. Note, Ministers, if they would affect others with the things they speak of, must shew that they are themselves in the greatest sincerity affected with them; and must submit to that which may create uneasiness to themselves, so that it will promote the ends of their ministry. The people observing the prophet to sigh so much, and seeing no visible occasion for it, would ask, "Wherefore sighest thou?" These sighs have some mystical meaning, let us know what it is; and he must answer them, ver. 7, It is "for the tidings," the heavy tidings that we shall hear shortly. The tidings come, the judgments come which we hear tidings of, it cometh apace, and then you will all sigh: nay, that will not serve, "every heart shall melt, and every spirit fail;" your courage will all be gone, and you will have no encouraging considerations to support yourselves with; and when heart and spirit fail, it will follow of course, that "all hands will be feeble" and unable to fight, "and all knees will be weak as water," and unable to flee or to stand their ground. Those who have God for them, when flesh and heart fail, have him to be the strength of their heart; but those who have God against them have no cordial for a fainting spirit, but are as Belshazzar when his thoughts troubled him, Dan. v. 6. But some people are worse frightened than hurt. May not the case be so here, and the event prove better than likely? No "behold it cometh and shall be brought to pass." It is not a bugbear that they are frightened with, but according to the fear so is the wrath, and more grievous than is feared.

8 Again the word of the LORD came unto me, saying,
9 Son of man, prophesy, and say, Thus saith the LORD;
Say, A sword, a sword is sharpened, and also furbished:
10 It is sharpened to make a sore slaughter;
It is furbished that it may glitter:
Should we then make mirth?
It contemneth the rod of my son, as every tree.
11 And he hath given it to be furbished, that it may be handled:
This sword is sharpened, and it is furbished,
To give it into the hand of the slayer.
12 Cry and howl, son of man:
For it shall be upon my people,
It shall be upon all the princes of Israel:
Terrors by reason of the sword shall be upon my people:
Smite therefore upon thy thigh.
13 Because it is a trial,
And what if the sword contemn even the rod?
It shall be no more, saith the Lord GOD.
14 Thou therefore, son of man, prophesy,
And smite thine hands together,
And let the sword be doubled the third time, the sword of the slain:
It is the sword of the great men that are slain,
Which entereth into their privy chambers.
15 I have set the point of the sword against all their gates,
That their heart may faint, and their ruins be multiplied:
Ah! it is made bright,
It is wrapped up for the slaughter.
16 Go thee one way or other,
Either on the right hand, or on the left,
Whithersoever thy face is set.
17 I will also smite mine hands together,
And I will cause my fury to rest:
I the LORD have said it.

Here is another prophecy of the sword, which is delivered in a very affecting manner. The expressions here used are somewhat intricate, and perplex interpreters. The sword was unsheathed in the foregoing verses, here it is fitted up to do execution, which the prophet is commanded to lament. Observe,

First. How the sword is here described, 1. It is sharpened that it may cut and wound, and make a sore slaughter. The wrath of God will put an edge upon it; and, whatever instruments God shall please to make use of in executing his judgments, he will fill them with strength, courage, and fury, according to the service they are employed in. Out of the mouth of Christ goes a sharp sword, Rev. xix. 15. 2. It is furbished that it may glitter, to the terror of those against whom it is drawn. It shall be a kind of flaming sword. If it have rusted in the scabbard for want of use, it shall be rubbed and brightened; for, though the glory of God's justice may seem to have been eclipsed for awhile, during the day of his patience, and the delay of his judgments, yet it will shine out again, and be made to glitter. 3. It is a victorious sword, nothing shall stand before it; ver. 10, "It contemneth the rod of my son, as every tree." "Israel," said God once, "is my son, my firstborn." The government of that people was called a rod, a strong rod, (we read, ch. xix. 11, of the strong rods they had for sceptres,) but when the sword of God's justice is drawn, it contemns this rod, makes nothing of it, though it be a strong rod, and the rod of his son; it is no more than any other tree. When God's professing people are revolted from him, and in rebellion against him, his sword despiseth them. What are they to him more than another people? The marginal reading gives another notion of this sword: 'It is the rod of my son;' and we know of whom God hath said, Ps. ii. 7, "Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee," and ver. 9, "Thou shalt break them with a rod of iron." This sword is that rod of iron which contemns every tree, and will bear it down. Or, this sword is the rod of my son, a correcting rod, for the chastening of the transgression of God's people, 2 Sam. vii. 14, not to cut them off from being a people. It is a sword to others, a rod to my son.

Secondly. How the sword is here put into the hand of the executioners. It is the rod of my son, and he has given it that it may be handled, ver. 11, that it may be made use of, for the end for which it was drawn. It is given into the hand, not of the fencer, to be played with, but of the slayer, to do execution with. The sword of war my son makes use of is a sword of justice, and to him all judgment is committed. It is made bright, ver. 15; it is wrapped up, that it may be kept safe, and clean, and sharp for the slaughter, not as Goliah's sword was wrapped up in a cloth, only for a memorial, 1 Sam. xxi. 9.

Thirdly. How the sword is directed, and against whom it is sent; ver. 12, "It shall be upon my people;" they shall fall by this sword. It is repeated again, as that which is scarce credible, that the sword of the heathen shall be upon time; they would be pagans pure and simple, although, as the next verse reminds them, the true Israel, the remnant of grace, would still be faithful.

xx. 45—49. These verses ought to have begun a new chapter, as they do in the Hebrew. Judea cannot well be meant by "the south" here, for it was not to the south of where Ezekiel prophesied, as some of the older commentators fancied. In verse 46 three different Hebrew words are rendered "south." The prophet himself offers no explanation, and we can only guess the application of his oracle. That a nation is meant is almost certain, and that this nation is Israel is extremely probable, because it comes in a series of predictions concerning his own people.

xxi. 1—7. The clearness of this prophecy as compared with the one it follows has led to the probable opinion that it was given rather as a duplicate than as a new prediction, and was meant to explain the former one. When it is said that the sword shall cut off

God's own people. Nay, "It shall be upon all the princes of Israel," their dignity and power as princes shall be no more their security than their profession of religion as princes of Israel. But if the sword be at any time upon God's people, have they not comfort within sufficient to arm them against every thing in it that is frightful? Yes, they have while they carry themselves as becomes his people. But these had not done so, and therefore terrors by reason of the sword shall be upon those that call themselves my people. Note, While good men are quiet, not only from evil but from the fear of it, wicked men are disturbed not only with the sword but with the terrors of it, arising from a consciousness of their own guilt. The sword is directed particularly against the great men, for they had been the greatest sinners among them; they had altogether broken the yoke and burst the bonds, Jer. v. 5; and therefore with them in a special manner God's controversy is, who had been the ringleaders in sin. "The sword of the slain is the sword of the great men that are slain," ver. 14. Though they have furnished themselves with places of retirement, places of concealment, where they flatter themselves with hopes that they shall be safe, they will find that the sword will "enter into their privy chambers," and find them out there, as the frogs, when they were one of Egypt's plagues, found admission into the chambers of their kings. The sword, the point of this sword, is directed against their gates, against all their gates, ver. 5, against all those things with which they thought to keep it out, and fortify themselves against it. Note, The strongest gates, though they be gates of brass, never so well barred, never so well guarded, are no fence against the point of the sword of God's judgments. But, when that is pointed against sinners, 1. They are ready to fear the worst; their hearts faint, so that they are not able to make any resistance. 2. The worst comes; whatever resistance they make it is to no purpose; but they are ruined, and their ruins are multiplied. But what need we observe the particular directions of this sword, when it has a general commission, is sent with a running warrant; ver. 16, "Go thee, one way or other," which way thou wilt, turn "to the right hand or to the left," thou wilt find those that are obnoxious, for there are none free from guilt; and thou hast authority against them, for there are none exempt from punishment; and therefore, "whithersoever thy face is set," that way do thou proceed, and, like Jonathan's sword, "from the blood of the slain, from the fat of the mighty, thou shalt never return empty," 2 Sam. i. 22. Note, So full is the world of wicked people, that which way soever God's judgments go forth, they will find work, will find matter to work upon. That fire will never go out on this earth for want of fuel. And such various methods God has of meeting with sinners, that the sword of his justice is still as it was at first when it flamed in the hand of the cherubims,—it turneth every way, Gen. iii. 24.

Fourthly. What is the nature of this sword, and what the intentions and limitations of it as to the people of God, ver. 13. It is a correction, it is designed to be so; the sword to others is a rod to them. This is a comfortable word which comes in in the midst of these terrible ones, though it be expressed somewhat obscurely. 1. The people of God begin to be afraid that "the sword will contemn even the rod;" that the sword will go on with such fury that it will despise its commission to be a rod only, will forget its bounds, and become a sword indeed even to God's own people. They fear lest the Chaldean's sword, which is the rod of God's anger, contemn its being called a rod, and become as the axe that "boasts itself against him that heweth therewith;" or, "the staff that lifts up itself as if it were no wood," Isa. x. 15. Or, "what if the sword contemn even the rod;" that is, what if this sword make the former rod, as that of Sennacharib, to be contemned as nothing to this? What if this should prove not a correcting rod, but a destroying sword, to make a full end of our church and nation. This is that which the thinking but timorous few are apprehensive of. Note, When threatening judgments are abroad it is good to suppose the worst that may be the consequences of them, that we may provide accordingly. "What if the sword contemn the tribe or sceptre," namely, that of Judah, and the house of David? so some think Shebet here signifies. What if it should aim at the ruin of our government? If it do, the Lord is righteous and will be gracious notwithstanding. But, 1. These fears are silenced with an assurance that it is not so; the sword shall not forget itself, nor the errand on which it is sent. "It is a trial," and it is no more than a trial. He that sends it makes what use of it, and sets what bounds to it, he pleaseth. Here shall its proud waves be stayed. Note, It is matter of comfort to the people of God when his judgments are abroad, and they are ready to tremble for fear of them, that, whatever they are to others, to them they are but trials; and when they are tried they shall come forth as gold, and the proving of their faith shall be the improving of it.

Fifthly. Here the prophet and the people must shew themselves affected with these judgments threatened.

1. The prophet must be very serious in denouncing these judgments. He must say, "A sword, a sword," ver. 9. Let him not study for fine words, and a variety of quaint expressions. When the town is on fire, people do not so give notice of it, but cry with a frightful, doleful voice, Fire, fire. So must the prophet cry, "A sword, a sword;" and ver. 14, "Let the sword be doubled the third time," in thy preaching. God speaketh once, yea twice, yea thrice. It were well if men after all would perceive and regard it. It shall be doubled the third time in God's providence; for it was Nebuchadnezzar's third descent upon Jerusalem that made a full end of it. Ruin comes gradually, but at last comes effectually, upon a provoking people. Yet this is not all; the prophet is not only as a herald at arms to proclaim war, and to cry, "A sword, a sword," once and again, and a third time, but as a person nearly concerned he must cry and howl, ver. 12; must sadly lament the desolations that the sword would make, as one that did himself not only sympathize with the sufferers but feel from the sufferings. Again, ver. 14, "Prophesy and smite thy hands together," wring thy hands, as lamenting the desolation; or, clap thy hands, as by thy prophesy instigating and encouraging those that were to be the instruments of it; or, as one standing amazed at the suddenness and severity of the judgment. The prophet must smite his hands together; for, saith God, "I will also smite mine hands together." God is in earnest in pronouncing this sentence upon them, and therefore the prophet must shew himself in earnest in publishing it. God's smiting his hands together, as well as the prophet's, is in token of a holy indignation at their wickedness, which was really very astonishing. When Balak's anger was kindled against Balaam, he smote his hands together, Num. xxiv. 10. Note, God and his ministers are justly angry at those who might be saved, and yet will be ruined. Some make it an expression of triumph and exultation, agreeing with that, Isa. i. 24, "Ah, I will ease me of mine adversaries;" and that Pr. i. 26, "I also will laugh at their calamity." And so it follows here. "I will cause my fury to rest," not only it shall be perfected, but shall be pleased. And observe with what solemnity, with what authority, this sentence is ratified; "I the Lord have said it," who can and will make good what I have said. "I have said it," and will never unsay it. "I have said it," and who can gainsay it?

2. The people must be very serious in the prospect of these judgments. An intimation of this comes in in a parenthesis; ver. 10, "Should we then make mirth?" seeing God hath drawn the sword, and the prophet sighs and cries, "Should we then make mirth?" The prophet seems to give this as a reason why he sighs, as Neh. ii. 3, "Why should not my countenance be sad," when Jerusalem lies waste? Note, Before we allow ourselves to be merry we ought to consider whether we should be merry or no. Should we make mirth, we that are sentenced to the sword, that lie under the wrath and curse of God? Shall we "make mirth as other people," who have "gone a whoring from our God?" Hos. ix. 1. Should we now make mirth, when the hand of God is gone out against us, when God's judgments are abroad in the land, and he by them calls to weeping and mourning? Isa. xxii. 11, 13. Shall we now make mirth, as the king and Haman, when the church is in perplexity? Est. iii. 15; when we should be grieving for the affliction of Joseph, Amos vi. 6.

18 The word of the LORD came unto me again, saying.
19 Also, thou son of man, appoint thee two ways,
That the sword of the king of Babylon may come:
Both twain shall come forth out of one land:
And choose thou a place,
Choose it at the head of the way to the city.
20 Appoint a way, that the sword may come to Rabbath of the Ammonites,
And to Judah in Jerusalem the defenced.
21 For the king of Babylon stood at the parting of the way,
At the head of the two ways, to use divination:
He made his arrows bright,
He consulted with images,
He looked in the liver.
22 At his right hand was the divination for Jerusalem,
To appoint captains,
To open the mouth in the slaughter,
To lift up the voice with shouting,
To appoint battering rams against the gates,
To cast a mount, and to build a fort.
23 And it shall be unto them as a false divination in their sight,
To them that have sworn oaths:
But he will call to remembrance the iniquity,
That they may be taken.
24 Therefore thus saith the Lord GOD;
Because ye have made your iniquity to be remembered,
In that your transgressions are discovered,
So that in all your doings your sins do appear;
Because, I say, that ye are come to remembrance,
Ye shall be taken with the hand.
25 And thou, profane wicked prince of Israel, whose day is come,
When iniquity shall have an end,
26 Thus saith the Lord GOD;
Remove the diadem, and take off the crown:
This shall not be the same:
Exalt him that is low, and abase him that is high.
27 I will overturn, overturn, overturn, it:
And it shall be no more, until he come whose right it is,
And I will give it him

The prophet in the verses before had shewed them the sword coming; he here shews them that sword coming against them, that they might not flatter themselves that by some means or other it should be diverted a contrary way.

First. He must see and shew the Chaldean army coming against Jerusalem, and determined by a supreme power to do so. The prophet must appoint him two ways, that is, he must upon a paper draw out two roads, ver. 19, as sometimes is done in maps; and he must bring the king of Babylon's army to the place where the roads part, for there they will make a stand. They both came out of the same land, but when they come to the place where one road leads to Rabbah, the head city of the Ammonites, and the other to Jerusalem, he makes a pause; for though he is resolved to be the ruin of both, yet he is not determined which to attack first. Here his politics and his politicians leave him at a loss; the sword must go either to Rabbah, or to Judah in Jerusalem. Many of the inhabitants of Judah had now taken shelter in Jerusalem, and all the interests of the country were bound up in the safety of the city, and therefore it is called Judah in Jerusalem the defenced; so strongly fortified was it, both by nature and art, that it was thought impregnable, Lam. iv. 12. The prophet must describe this dilemma that the king of Babylon is in, ver. 20; for "the king of Babylon stood," that is, he shall stand, considering what course to take, "at the head of the two ways." Though he was a prince of great foresight and great resolution, yet it seems he knew neither his own interest nor his own mind. Let not the wise man, then, glory in his wisdom, nor the mighty man in his arbitrary power, for even those that may do what they will yet seldom know what to do for the best. Now observe, 1. The method he took to come to a resolution. He used divination, applied himself to a higher and invisible power, either to the determination of providence by a lot, in order to which he made his arrows bright that were to be drawn for the lots, in honour of the solemnity, (perhaps Jerusalem was written on one arrow and Rabbah on the other, and that which was first drawn out of the quiver he determined to attack first); or to the direction of some pretended oracle, he consulted with images, or teraphim, expecting to receive audible answers from them; or to the observations which the augurs made upon the entrails of the sacrifices, he looked in the liver, whether the position of that portended good or ill luck. Note, It is a mortification to the pride of the wise men of the righteous and the wicked, we are not to understand all of both classes. "Righteous and wicked" are in the singular number, but have not the article in the Hebrew, and should not have it in a translation, because some only of each are meant.

xxi. 8—13. There are serious difficulties in some of these verses—in the second half of verse 10, for example, which has sorely puzzled the critics, ancient and modern. For the last clause our version has in the margin, "or, it is the rod of my son, it despiseth every tree;" i.e., "the sword is the rod of my son," &c. The explanation of Munster is worth notice; it is, "That there is no cause for joy, as if the sword were drawn against an enemy, for it is against the tribe of Judah, 'my son.'" But as he admits, the word which he translates a tribe may mean a sceptre or a rod, and we think it does. On the whole we should paraphrase the words thus: "Let us not rejoice; the sword is against the rod of my son, and despises every other tree;" i.e., is against "my son," who is its principal object. The the earth, that in difficult cases they have been glad to make their court to heaven for direction; as it is an instance of their folly that they have taken such ridiculous ways of doing it, when, in cases proper for an appeal to providence, it is sufficient that the lot be cast into the lap, with that prayer, Give a perfect lot, and a firm belief that the disposal thereof is not fortuitous, but of the Lord, Pr. xvi. 33. 2. The resolution he was hereby brought to. Even by these ill practices God served his own purposes, and directed him to go to Jerusalem, ver. 22. The divination for Jerusalem happened to be at his right hand, which, according to the rules of divination, determined him that way. Note, What services God designs men for he will be sure, in his providence, to lead them to, though perhaps they themselves are not aware what conduct they are under. Well, Jerusalem being the mark set up, the campaign is presently opened with the siege of that important place. Captains are appointed for the command of the forces to be employed in the siege, who must open the mouth in the slaughter, must give directions to the soldiers what to do, and make speeches to animate them. Orders are given to provide every thing necessary for carrying on the siege with vigour; battering rams must be prepared and forts built. O what pains, what cost, are men at to destroy one another!

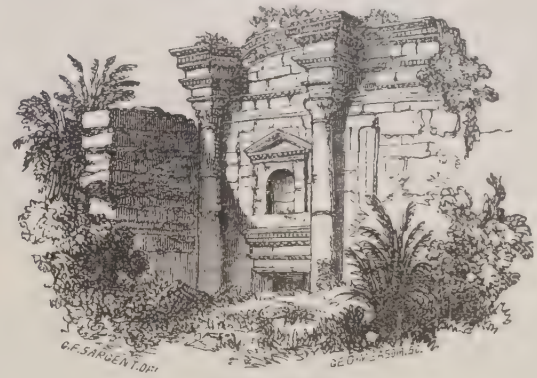
Secondly. He must shew both the people and the prince that they bring this destruction upon themselves by their own sin.



1. The people do so, ver. 23, 24. They slight the notices that are given them of the judgments coming; Ezekiel's prophecy is to them a false divination; they are not moved or awakened to repentance by it. When they hear that Nebuchadnezzar, by his divinations, is directed to Jerusalem, and assured of success in that enterprize, they laugh at it, and continue secure, calling it a false divination, because they have sworn oaths, that is, they have joined in a solemn league with the Egyptians, and they depend upon the promise they have made them to raise the siege, or upon the assurances which the false prophets have given them that it shall be raised. Or, it may refer to the oaths of allegiance they had sworn to the king of Babylon, but had violated; for which treachery of theirs God had given them up to a judicial blindness, so that the fairest warnings given them were slighted by them as false divinations. Note, Those who make a jest of the most sacred oaths, it is not strange if they can make a jest likewise of the most sacred oracles; for where will a profane mind stop? But shall their unbelief invalidate the council of God? Are they safe because they are secure? By no means. Nay, the contempt they put upon Divine warnings is a sin that brings to remembrance their other sins, and they may thank themselves if they be now remembered against them. 1st. Their present wickedness is discovered. Now God is contending with them, so perverse and obstinate are they, that whatever they offer in their own defence doth but add to their offence. They never carried themselves so ill as they did now they have the loudest call given them to repent and reform; "So that in all your doings your sins do appear;" turn you which way you will, and you shew a black side. This is too true of every one of us; for not only there is none that lives and sins not, but "there is not a just man upon earth that doth good and sinneth not." Our best services have such alloys of weakness, and folly, and imperfection, and so much evil is present with us, even when we would do good, that we may say with sorrow and shame, in all our doings, and in all our sayings too, our sins do appear and witness against us, so that if we were under the law we were undone. 2nd. This brings to mind their former wickedness; "You have made your iniquity to be remembered," not by yourselves, that it might be repented of, but by the justice of God, that it might be reckoned for. Your own sins make the sins of your fathers to be remembered against you, which otherwise you should never have smarted for. Note, God remembers former iniquities against those only that by the present discoveries of their wickedness shew that they do not repent of them. 3rd. That they may suffer for all together, they are turned over to the destroyer, that they may be taken, ver. 23; and ye shall be taken with the hand that God had appointed to seize you and to hold you, and out of which you cannot escape. Men are said to be God's hand, when they are made use of as the ministers of his justice, Ps. xvii. 14. Note, Those who will not be taken with the word of God's grace shall at last be taken by the hand of his wrath.

2. The prince likewise brings his ruin upon himself. Zedekiah is the prince of Israel, to whom the prophet here, in God's name, addresseth himself; and if he had not spoken in God's name he would not have spoken so boldly, so bluntly; for is it fit to say to a king, Thou art wicked?

1st. He gives him his character; ver. 25, "Thou profane and wicked prince of Israel." He was not so bad as some of his predecessors, and yet bad enough to merit this character. He was himself profane, lost to every thing that is virtuous and sacred. And he was wicked, as he promoted sin among his people; he sinned, and made Israel to sin. Note, Profaneness and wickedness is bad in any, but worst of all in a prince, a prince of Israel; that as an Israelite should know better himself, and as a prince give a better example, and have a better influence on those about him.

2nd. He reads him his doom. His iniquity has an end, the measure of it is full, and therefore his day is come, the day of his punishment, the day of Divine vengeance. Note, Though they who are wicked and profane may flourish awhile, yet their day will come to fall. The sentence here passed is, First. That Zedekiah shall be deposed. He has forfeited his crown, and he shall no longer wear it; he has, by his profaneness, profaned his crown, and it shall be cast to the ground; ver. 26, "Remove the diadem." Crowns and diadems are loseable things; it is only in the other world that there is a crown of glory that fadeth not away, "a kingdom that cannot be moved." The Chaldee paraphrase expounds it thus, 'Take away the diadem from Serajah the chief priest, and I will take away the crown from Zedekiah the king, neither this nor that shall abide in his place, but shall be removed. This shall not be the same,' not the same he has been; 'This, not this,' so the word is. Profane and wicked, perhaps, he is as he has been, but not prince of Israel, as he has been. Note, Men lose their dignity by their iniquity. Their profaneness and wickedness removes their diadem and takes off their crown, and makes them the reverse of what they were. Secondly. That great confusion and disorder in the state shall follow hereupon; everything shall be turned upside down. The conqueror shall take a pride in exalting him that is low, and abasing him that is high, preferring some, and degrading others at his pleasure, without any regard either to right or merit. Thirdly. Attempts to re-establish the government shall be blasted and come to nothing. Gedaliah's particularly, and Ishmael's, who was of the seed royal, to which the Chaldee paraphrase refers this; neither of them shall be able to make any thing of it. "I will overturn, overturn, overturn," first one project and then another; for who can build up what God will throw down? Fourthly. This monarchy shall never be restored till it is fixed for perpetuity in the hands of the Messiah. There shall be no more kings of the house of David after Zedekiah, till Christ comes, whose right the kingdom is, who is that seed of David in whom the promise was to have its full accomplishment, "and I will give it him." He shall have the throne of his father David, Lu. i. 32. Immediately before the coming of Christ there was a long eclipse of the royal dignity, as there was also a failing of the spirit of prophecy, that his shining forth in the fulness of time, both as king and prophet, might appear the more illustrious. Note, Christ has an incontestable title to the dominion and sovereignty both in the church and in the world; the kingdom is his right. And, having the right, he shall in due time have the possession,—I will give it him: and there shall be a general overturning of all, rather than he shall come short of his right; and a certain overturning of all the opposition that stands in his way, to make room for him. Dan. ii. 45; 1 Cor. xv. 25. This is mentioned here for the comfort of those who feared the promise made in David would fail for evermore. No, saith God, that promise is sure, for the Messiah's kingdom shall last for ever.

28 And thou, son of man, prophesy and say,
Thus saith the Lord GOD concerning the Ammonites,
And concerning their reproach; even say thou,
The sword, the sword is drawn:
For the slaughter it is furbished,
To consume because of the glittering:

RUINS OF AMMON.

29 Whiles they see vanity unto thee,
Whiles they divine a lie unto thee,
To bring thee upon the necks of them that are slain,
Of the wicked, whose day is come, when their iniquity shall have an end.

30 Shall I cause it to return into his sheath?
I will judge thee in the place where thou wast created,
In the land of thy nativity.

31 And I will pour out mine indignation upon thee,
I will blow against thee in the fire of my wrath,
And deliver thee into the hand of brutish men, and skilful to destroy.

32 Thou shalt be for fuel to the fire;
Thy blood shall be in the midst of the land;
Thou shalt be no more remembered:
For I the LORD have spoken it.

The prediction of the destruction of the Ammonites, which was effected by Nebuchadnezzar about five years after the destruction of Jerusalem, seems to come in here upon occasion of the king of Babylon's diverting his design against Rabbah, when he turned it upon Jerusalem. Upon this the Ammonites grew very insolent, and triumphed over Jerusalem; but the prophet must let them know that forbearance is no acquittance, the reprieve is not a pardon. Their day also is at hand, their turn comes next; and it will be but a poor satisfaction to them that they are to be devoured last, to be last executed.

First. The sin of the Ammonites is here intimated; it is their reproach, ver. 28. The reproach they put upon themselves when they hearkened to their false prophets, (for such, it seems, there were among them as well as among the Jews,) that pretended to foretell their perpetual safety in the midst of the desolations that were made of the countries round about them. "They see vanity unto thee, and divine a lie," ver. 29. They flatter thee with promises of peace, and thou art such a fool as to suffer thyself to be imposed upon by them, and to encourage them therein by giving credit to them. Note, Those that feed themselves with a self-conceit in the day of their prosperity prepare matter for a self-reproach in the day of their calamity. 2. The reproach they put upon the Israel of God, when they triumphed in their afflictions, and thereby added affliction to them, which was very barbarous and inhuman. Their divines, by puffing them up with a conceit that they were a better people than Israel, being spared when they were cut off, and with a confidence that their prosperity should always continue, made them so very haughty and insolent that they did even tread on the necks of the Israelites that were slain, slain by the wicked Chaldeans, who had commission to execute God's judgments upon them when their iniquity had an end, that is, when the measure of it was full: we shall meet with this again, ch. xxv. 3, &c. Note, Those are ripening apace for misery who trample upon the people of God in their distress, whereas they ought to tremble when judgment begins at the house of God.

Secondly. The utter destruction of the Ammonites is threatened. For the reproach cast on the church by her neighbours will be returned into their own bosom, Ps. lxxix. 12. Let us see how terrible the threatening is and the destruction will be. 1. It shall come from the wrath of God, who resents the indignities and injuries done to his people as done to himself; ver. 31, "I will pour out my indignation" as a shower of fire and brimstone upon thee. The least drop of Divine indignation and wrath will create tribulation and anguish same rod or sceptre is said to be despised in verse 13. In verse 12, for "terrors by reason of the sword shall be upon my people," we should rather translate, "they shall be given up to the sword with my people;" i.e., the princes shall be given up.

xxi. 14. The phrase, "let the sword be doubled the third time," has been much discussed, but we understand it of thrice repeated smiting. In the same verse, "the great men that are slain" should be "the great man who is wounded." The last words, "which entereth into their privy chambers," seem rather to refer to a sword "which is brandished at them." Other explanations have been proposed, but we prefer this.

xxi. 15. In the Hebrew the order is different, viz., "That the heart may faint, and obstacles be multiplied against all their gates, I appoint the destruction of the sword" (or, the destroying sword). For "wrapped up" the margin reads correctly "sharpened." This verse also is difficult in the origina enough to the soul of man that doth evil; what, then, would a full stream of that indignation and wrath do? "I will blow against thee in the fire of my wrath," that is, I will blow up the fire of my wrath against thee; it shall burn with the utmost vehemence. And ver. 32, "Thou shalt be for fuel to this fire." Note, Wicked men make themselves fuel to the fire of God's wrath; they are consumed by it, and it is inflamed by them. 2. It shall be effected by the sword of war. To them he must cry, as before to Israel, because they had triumphed in Israel's overthrow, "The sword, the sword is drawn," ver. 28, (compare ver. 9, 10); it is drawn to consume, because of the glittering, that is, because it is brandished and glitters, and is fit to be made use of. God's executions will answer his preparations. This sword, when it is drawn, shall not return into its sheath (ver. 30) till it has done the work for which it was drawn. When the sword is drawn it doth not return till God causeth it to return; and he is in one mind, and who can turn him? Who can change his purpose? 3. The persons employed in it are "brutish men and skilful to destroy." Men of such a bad character as this, that have the wit of men to do the work of wild beasts,—human reason, which makes them skilful, but no human compassion, which makes them skilful only to destroy,—though they are the scandal of mankind, yet sometimes are made use of to serve God's purposes. God delivers the Ammonites into the hands of such, and justly, for they themselves were brutish, and delighted in the destruction of God's Israel. We have reason to pray as Paul desired to be prayed for, that we may be delivered from wicked and unreasonable men, 2 Thes. iii. 2; men that seem made for doing mischief. 4. The place where they should thus be reckoned with. I will judge thee there where thou wast created, where thou wast first formed into a people, and where thou hast been settled ever since, and therefore where thou seemest to have taken root; the land of thy nativity shall be the land of thy destruction. Note, God can bring ruin upon us there where we are most secure, and turn us out of the land which we thought we had a title to not to be disputed, and a possession of not to be disturbed. "Thy blood shall be shed," not only in thy borders, but "in the midst of thy land." Lastly, It shall be an irreparable ruin; though thou mayest think to recover thyself, it is in vain to think of it, "thou shalt be no more remembered" with any respect, Ps. ix. 6. Justly is their name blotted out who would have Israel's name for ever lost.

CHAPTER XXII.

Here are three several messages which God intrusts the prophet to deliver concerning Judah and Jerusalem, and all to the same purpose, to shew them their sins, and the judgments that were coming upon them for those sins. I. Here is a catalogue of their sins, by which they had exposed themselves to shame, and for which God would bring them to ruin, ver. 1—16. II. They are here compared to dross, and are condemned as dross to the fire, ver. 17—22. III. All orders and degrees of men among them are here found guilty of the neglect of the duty of their place, and of having contributed to the national guilt, which therefore, since none appeared as intercessors, they must all expect to share in the punishment of, ver. 23—31.

MOREOVER the word of the LORD came unto me, saying,
2 Now, thou son of man, wilt thou judge, wilt thou judge the bloody city?
Yea, thou shalt shew her all her abominations.
3 Then say thou, Thus saith the Lord GOD,
The city sheddeth blood in the midst of it, that her time may come,
And maketh idols against herself to defile herself
4 Thou art become guilty in thy blood that thou hast shed;
And hast defiled thyself in thine idols which thou hast made;
And thou hast caused thy days to draw near,
And art come even unto thy years:
Therefore have I made thee a reproach unto the heathen,
And a mocking to all countries
5 Those that be near, and those that be far from thee, shall mock thee,
Which art infamous and much vexed.
6 Behold, the princes of Israel,
Every one were in thee to their power to shed blood
7 In thee have they set light by father and mother:
In the midst of thee have they dealt by oppression with the stranger:
In thee have they vexed the fatherless and the widow.
8 Thou hast despised mine holy things,
And hast profaned my sabbaths.
9 In thee are men that carry tales to shed blood:
And in thee they eat upon the mountains:
In the midst of thee they commit lewdness.
10 In thee have they discovered their fathers' nakedness:
In thee have they humbled her that was set apart for pollution.
11 And one hath committed abomination with his neighbour's wife;
And another hath lewdly defiled his daughter-in-law;
And another in thee hath humbled his sister, his father's daughter.
12 In thee have they taken gifts to shed blood;
Thou hast taken usury and increase,
And thou hast greedily gained of thy neighbours by extortion,
And hast forgotten me, saith the Lord GOD
13 Behold, therefore I have smitten mine hand
At thy dishonest gain which thou hast made,
And at thy blood which hath been in the midst of thee
14 Can thine heart endure, or can thine hands be strong,
In the days that I shall deal with thee?
I the LORD have spoken it, and will do it.
15 And I will scatter thee among the heathen,
And disperse thee in the countries,
And will consume thy filthiness out of thee.
16 And thou shalt take thine inheritance in thyself in the sight of the heathen,
And thou shalt know that I am the LORD.

In these verses the prophet, by a commission from heaven, is set as a judge upon the bench, and Jerusalem is made to hold up her hand as a prisoner at the bar. And if prophets were set over other nations, much more over God's nation, Jer. i. 10. This prophet is authorised to judge the bloody city, the city of bloods. Jerusalem is so called, not only because she has been guilty of the particular sin of bloodshed, but because her crimes in general were bloody crimes, ch. vii. 23, such as polluted her in her blood, and for which she deserved to have blood given her to drink. Now, the business of a judge with a malefactor is, to convict him of his crimes, and then to pass sentence upon him for them. These two things Ezekiel is to do here.

First. He is to find Jerusalem guilty of many heinous crimes here enumerated in a long bill of indictment; and it is billa vera,—'a true bill:' so he writes upon it, whose judgment we are sure is according to truth. He must "shew her all her abominations," ver. 2, that God may be justified in all the desolations brought upon her. Let us take a view of all the particular sins which Jerusalem here stands charged with, and they are all exceeding sinful.

1. Murder. "The city sheds blood," not only in the suburbs, where the strangers dwell, but "in the midst of it," where one would think the magistrates would, if anywhere, be vigilant; even there people were murdered, either in duels, or by secret assassinations and poisonings, or in the courts of justice, under colour of law; and there was no care taken to discover and punish the murderers according to the law, Gen. ix. 6; no, nor so much as the ceremony used to expiate an uncertain murder, Deu. xxi. 1, and so the guilt and pollution remains upon the city. Thus "thou art become guilty in thy blood that thou hast shed," ver. 4. This crime is insisted most upon, for it was Jerusalem's measure-filling sin more than any other: it is said to be that which the Lord would not pardon, 2 Kin. xxiv. 4. 1st. The princes of Israel that should have been the protectors of injured innocence, "every one were to their power to shed blood," ver. 6. They thirsted for it, and delighted in it, and whoever came within their power were sure to feel it; whoever lay at their mercy were sure to find none. 2nd. There were those who "carried tales to shed blood," ver. 9. They told lies of men to the princes, to whom they knew it would be pleasing, to incense them against them; or betrayed what passed in private conversation, to make mischief among neighbours, and set them together by the ears, to bite and devour, and worry one another even to death. Note, Those who, by giving invidious characters, and telling ill-natured stories of their neighbours, sow discord among brethren, will be accountable for all the mischief that follows upon it, as he that kindles a fire will be for all the hurt it doth. 3rd. There were those who took "gifts to shed blood," ver. 12, that would be hired with money to swear a man out of his life; or, if they were upon a jury, would be bribed to find an innocent man guilty. When so much barbarous, bloody work of this kind was done in Jerusalem, we may well conclude, First. That men's consciences were become wretchedly profligate and seared, and their hearts hardened; for they would stick at no wickedness that would not stick at this. Secondly. That abundance of quiet, harmless, good people were made away with; whereby, as the guilt of the city was increased, so the number of those that should have stood in the gap to turn away the wrath of God was diminished.

2. Idolatry. "She maketh idols against herself to destroy herself," ver. 3. And again, ver. 4, "Thou hast defiled thyself in thine idols which thou hast made." Note, Those who make idols for themselves will be found to have made them against themselves, for idolaters put a cheat upon themselves, and purpose destruction for themselves. Besides that thereby they pollute themselves, they render themselves odious in the eyes of the just and jealous God, and even their mind and conscience is defiled, so that to them nothing is pure. Those that did not make idols themselves, yet were found guilty of eating upon the mountains or high places, ver. 9, in honour of the idols, and in communion with idolaters.

3. Disobedience to parents; ver. 7, "In thee have the children set light by their father and mother," mocked them, cursed them, and despised to obey them; which was a sign of a more than ordinary corruption of nature as well as manners, and a disposition to all manner of disorder, Isa. iii. 5. They that set light by their parents are in the highway to all wickedness. God had made many wholesome laws for the support of the paternal authority, but no care was taken to put them in execution; nay, the Pharisees in their day taught children, under shew of respect to the Corban, to set light by their parents, and refuse to maintain them, Mat. xv. 5.

4. Oppression and extortion. To enrich themselves they wronged the poor; ver. 7, "They dealt by oppression and deceit with the stranger," taking advantage of his necessities, and his ignorance of the laws and customs of the country. In Jerusalem, that should have been a sanctuary to the oppressed, "they vexed the fatherless and widows" by unreasonable demands and inquisitions, or troublesome lawsuits, in which might prevails against right. "Thou hast taken usury and increase," ver. 12; not only there are those in thee that do it, but thou hast done it. It was an act of the city or community; the public money that should have been employed in public charity is put out to usury and extortion. "Thou hast greedily gained of thy neighbours by violence and wrong." For neighbours to gain by one another in a fair way of trading is well; but those who are greedy of gain will not be held within the rules of equity.

5. Profanation of the sabbath, and other holy things. This commonly goes along with the other sins for which they here stand indicted; ver. 8, "Thou hast despised mine holy things," holy oracles, holy ordinances. The rites which God appointed were thought too plain, too ordinary; they despised them, and therefore were fond of the customs of the heathen. Note, Immorality and

xxi. 16. This may be understood of a commission to the sword to go through all the land, north and south: "Turn to the right (the south), set thyself towards the left (the north), and in whatever direction thou wilt." Nothing short of minute verbal criticism and learning would suffice to cope with the singular obscurities and anomalies in this chapter. Indeed, there is scarcely one of the very difficult verses on which scholars quite agree.

xxi 19. For "both twain" read "both of them," and render the last clause, "Make a way-post, make it at the head of the way to the city."

xxi. 20. "Rabbath," or rather "Rabbah of the sons of Ammon," was a very famous city of Ammon, the site of which has long been a scene of ruin.

xxi. 21. "The parting of the way" is in Hebrew "the mother of the way;" i.e., the junction of two roads, or the spot where two roads branch out of one. It is called "the head of the way" both here and dishonesty is commonly attended with a contempt of religion and the worship of God. "Thou hast profaned my sabbaths." There was not in Jerusalem that face of sabbath sanctification that one would have expected in the holy city. Sabbath breaking is an iniquity that is an inlet to all iniquity. Many have owned it to contribute as much to their ruin as any thing.

6. Uncleanness, and all manner of seventh commandment sins, fruits of those vile affections to which God, in a way of righteous judgment, gives men up, to punish them for their idolatry, and profanation of holy things. Jerusalem had been famous for its purity, but now "in the midst of thee they commit lewdness," ver. 9; it goes barefaced, though in the most scandalous instances, as that of a man's having his father's wife, which is the discovery of the father's nakedness, ver. 10, and is a sin not to be named among Christians, without the utmost detestation, 1 Cor. v. 1, and was made a capital crime by the law of Moses, Lev. xx. 11. The time to refrain from embracing has not been observed; Eccl. iii. 6, "For they have humbled her which was set apart for her pollution." They made nothing of committing lewdness with a neighbour's wife, with a daughter-in-law, or a sister, ver. 11. And shall not God visit for these things?

7. Unmindfulness of God was at the bottom of all this wickedness; ver. 12, "Thou hast forgotten me," else thou wouldest not have done thus. Note, Sinners do that which provokes God, because they forget him; they forget their descent from him, dependence on him, and obligations to him. They forget how valuable his favour is, which they make themselves unfit for; and how formidable his wrath, which they make themselves obnoxious to. They that pervert their ways forget the Lord their God, Jer. iii. 21.

Secondly. He is to pass sentence upon Jerusalem for these crimes.

1. Let her know that she has filled up the measure of her iniquity, and her sins are such as forbid delays, and call for speedy vengeance. She has made her time to come, ver. 3, her days to draw near, and she is come to years of maturity for punishment, ver. 4, as an heir that is come to age, and is ready for his inheritance. God would have been longer with them, but they were arrived at such a pitch of impudence in sin, that God could not in honour give them a farther day. Note, Abused patience will at last be weary of forbearing; and when sinners (as Solomon speaks) grow overmuch wicked, they die before their time, Eccl. vii. 17, and shorten their reprieves.

2. Let her know that she hath exposed herself, and therefore God has justly exposed her, to the contempt and scorn of all her neighbours; ver. 4, "I have made thee a reproach to the heathen;" both those that are near, who are eye-witnesses of Jerusalem's apostacy and degeneracy, and those afar off, who, though at a distance, will think it worth taking notice of, ver. 5; they shall all mock thee. While they were reproached by their neighbours for their adherence to God, it was their honour, and they might be sure that God would roll away their reproach; but, now they are laughed at for their revolt from God, they must lie down in their shame, and must say, "The Lord is righteous." They make a mock at Jerusalem, both because her sins had been very scandalous, (she is infamous, polluted in name, and has quite lost her credit,) and because her punishment is very grievous; she is much vexed, and frets without measure at her troubles. Note, Those that vex most at their troubles have commonly those about them that will be so much the more apt to make a jest of them.

3. Let her know that God is displeased, highly displeased, at her wickedness, and doth and will witness against it; ver. 13, "I have smitten mine hand at thy dishonest gain." God, both by his prophets and by his providence, revealed his wrath from heaven against their ungodliness and unrighteousness; the oppressions they were guilty of, though they got by them, and their murders, "the blood which has been in the midst of thee," and all their other sins. Note, God hath sufficiently discovered how angry he is at the wicked courses of his people; and, that they may not say but they have had fair warning, he smites his hand against the sin before he lays his hand upon the sinner. And this is a good reason why we should despise dishonest gain, even the gain of oppressions, and shake our hands from holding of bribes, because these are sins against which God shakes his hands, Isa. xxxiii. 15.

4. Let her know that, as proud and secure as she is, she is no match for God's judgments, ver. 14. 1st. She is assured that the destruction she has deserved will come; "I the Lord have spoken it, and will do it." He that is true to his promises will be true to his threatenings too; for he is not a man that he should repent. 2nd. It is supposed that she thinks herself able to contend with God, and to stand a siege against his judgments; she bids defiance to the day of the Lord, Isa. v. 19. But, 3rd. She is convinced of her utter inability to make her part good with him. "Can thine heart endure, or can thine hand be strong in the days that I shall deal with thee?" Thou thinkest thou hast to do only with men like thyself, but shalt be made to know thou fallest into the hands of a living God. Observe here. First. There is a day coming when God will deal with sinners, a day of visitation. He deals with some to bring them to repentance, and there is no resisting the force of convictions, when he sets them on; he deals with others to bring them to ruin. He deals with sinners in this life, when he brings upon them his sore judgments. But the days of eternity are especially the days in which God will deal with them, when the full vials of God's wrath will be poured out without mixture. Secondly. The wrath of God against sinners, when he comes to deal with them, will be found both intolerable and irresistible. There is no heart stout enough to endure it; it is none of the infirmities which the spirit of a man will sustain. Damned sinners can neither forget nor despise their torments, nor have they any thing wherewith to support themselves under their torments. There are no hands strong enough either to ward off the strokes of God's wrath, or to break the chains with which sinners are bound over to the day of wrath. Who knows the power of God's anger?

5. Let her know that since she has walked in the way of the heathen, and learned their works, she shall have enough of them, ver. 15. I will not only send thee among the heathen, out of thine own land, but I will scatter thee among them, and disperse thee in the countries, to be abused and insulted over by strangers. And since her filthiness and filthy ones continued in her, notwithstanding all the methods God had taken to refine her, (she would not be made clean, Jer. xiii. 27,) he will by his judgments consume her filthiness out of her; he will destroy those that were incurably bad, and reform those that were inclined to be good.

6. Let her know that God has disowned her, and cast her off. He had been her heritage and portion, but now, ver. 16, "Thou shalt take thine inheritance in thyself," shift for thyself, make the best hand thou canst for thyself, for God will no longer undertake for thee. Note, Those that give up themselves to be ruled by their lusts will justly be given up to be portioned by them. They that resolve to be their own masters let them expect no other comfort and happiness but what their own hands can furnish them with; and a miserable portion it will prove. "Verily I say unto you, they have their reward." "Thou in thy lifetime receivedst thy good things." These are the same with this here, "Thou shalt take thine inheritance in thyself," and then, when it is too late, shalt own "in the sight of the heathen that I am the Lord," who alone am a portion sufficient for my people. Note, Those that have lost their interest in God will know how to value it.

17 And the word of the LORD came unto me, saying,
18 Son of man, the house of Israel is to me become dross:
All they are brass, and tin, and iron, and lead, in the midst of the furnace;
They are even the dross of silver.
19 Therefore thus saith the Lord GOD;
Because ye are all become dross, [Jerusalem.
Behold, therefore I will gather you into the midst of 20 As they gather silver, and brass, and iron, and lead, and Into the midst of the furnace, [tin,
To blow the fire upon it, to melt it;
So will I gather you in mine anger and in my fury,
And I will leave you there, and melt you. [my wrath, 21 Yea, I will gather you, and blow upon you in the fire of
And ye shall be melted in the midst thereof.
22 As silver is melted in the midst of the furnace,
So shall ye be melted in the midst thereof;
And ye shall know that I the LORD have poured out my fury upon you.

The same melancholy string is harped upon, and various turns given it to make it affecting, that it may be influencing. The prophet must here shew, or at least it is here shewn him, that the whole house of Israel is become as dross, and as dross they shall be consumed. What David has said concerning the wicked ones of the world is here said concerning the wicked ones of the church, now it is corrupt and degenerate; Ps. cxix. 119, "Thou puttest away all the wicked of the earth like dross."

First. See here how the wretched degeneracy of the house of Israel is described. That state in David's and Solomon's time had been a head of gold; when the kingdoms were divided it was as the arms of silver. But now, 1. It is degenerated into baser metal, of no value in comparison with what it formerly was. "They are all brass, and tin, and iron, and lead;" which some make to signify divers sorts of sinners among them. Their being brass notes the impudence of some in their wickedness, they are brazen-faced, and cannot blush. Their shoes had been iron and brass, Deu. xxxiii. 25, but now their brow is so, Isa. xlviii. 4. Their being tin notes the hypocritical profession of piety with which many of them cover their iniquity. They have a specious shew, but no intrinsic worth. Their being iron notes the cruel disposition of some, and their delight in war, according to the character of the iron age. Their being lead notes their dulness, sottishness, and stupidity; though soft and pliable to evil, yet heavy and not moveable to good. "How is the gold become dross, how is the most fine gold changed!" So is Jerusalem's degeneracy bewailed, Lam. iv. 1. Yet this is not the worst; these metals, though of less value, yet are of good use: but, 2. "The house of Israel is become dross to me." So she is in God's account, whatever she is in her own and her neighbour's account. They were silver, but now they are "even the dross of silver." The word signifies all the dirt and rubbish and worthless stuff that is separated from the silver in the washing, melting, and refining of it. Note, Sinners, and especially degenerate professors, are in God's account as dross, vile and contemptible, and of no account, as the evil figs which could not be eaten, they were so evil. They are useless and fit for nothing; of no consistency with themselves, and no service to man.

Secondly. How the woful destruction of this degenerate house of Israel is foretold. They are all gathered together in Jerusalem; thither people fled from all parts of the country, as to a city of refuge, not only because it was a strong city, but because it was the holy city. Now God tells them that their flocking into Jerusalem, which they intended for their security, should be as the gathering of various sorts of metal into the furnace, or crucible, to be melted down, and to have the dross separated from them. They are in the midst of Jerusalem, surrounded by the forces of the enemy; and, being thus inclosed, 1. The fire of God's wrath shall be kindled upon this furnace, and it shall be blown to make it burn fiercely and strongly, ver. 20, 21. God will gather them in his anger and fury. The blowing of the fire makes a great noise, so will the judgments of God upon Jerusalem. When God stirs up himself to execute judgments upon a provoking people from the consideration of his own glory, and the necessity of making some examples, then he may be said to blow the fire of his wrath against sin and sinners, to heat the furnace seven times hotter. 2. The several sorts of metal gathered in it shall be melted. By a complication of judgments, as by a raging fire, their constitution shall be dissolved, they shall lose all their former shape and strength, and shall be utterly unable to stand before the wrath of God. The various sorts of sinners shall be melted down together, and united in a common overthrow, as brass and lead in the same furnace, as trees are bound in bundles for the fire. They came together into Jerusalem as a place of defence, but God brought them together there as unto a place of execution. 3. God will leave them in the furnace, ver. 20. I will gather you into the furnace, and will leave you there. When God brings his own people into the furnace, he sits by them as the refiner by his gold, to see that they be not continued there any longer than is fitting and needful; but he will bring these people into the furnace, as men throw dross into it, which they design shall be consumed, and therefore are in no care about it, but leave it there: compare with this, Hos. v. 14, "I will tear and go away." 4. Hereby the dross shall be wholly separated, and the good metal purified, the impenitent shall be destroyed, and the penitent reformed and fitted for deliverance. "Take away the dross from the silver, and there shall come forth a vessel for the finer," Pr. xxv. 4. This judgment shall do that in the house of Israel, for the doing of which other methods had been tried in vain; and "reprobate silver shall they no more be called," Jer. vi. 30.

23 And the word of the LORD came unto me, saying,
24 Son of man, say unto her,
Thou art the land that is not cleansed,
Nor rained upon in the day of indignation. [thereof,
25 There is a conspiracy of her prophets in the midst in verse 19. Superstitious ideas were associated with spots where roads intersected or joined, and special divinities were fancied to preside over them. The practice of divination by a king at such places is quite in agreement with ancient custom. Here the arrows are shaken (not "made bright"), in order that the king may decide by their supposed oracular answer what course he shall pursue. The images are consulted with a like intention, but the process is not described. Inspection of an animal's liver, &c., was a form of fortune-telling common among the Greeks and Romans. The result of the divining of the king here is that he will go to Jerusalem.

xxi. 22, 23. Saith the Lord GOD.

Here is, First. A general idea given of the land of Israel, how well it deserved the judgments coming to destroy it, and how much it needed these judgments to refine it. Let the prophet tell her plainly, "Thou art the land that is not cleansed," not refined as metal is, and therefore needest to be again put into the furnace. Means and methods of reformation have been ineffectual; Thou art "not rained upon in the day of indignation." This was one of the judgments which God brought upon them in the day of his wrath, he withheld the rain from them, Jer. xiv. 4. Or, when thou art under the tokens of God's displeasure, even in the day of indignation thou art not rained upon; that is, thou hast not received instruction by the prophets, whose doctrine is said to descend as the rain. Or, when thou art corrected, thou art not cleansed, thy filth is not carried away as that in the streets is by a sweeping rain. Nay, though it be a day of indignation with thee, yet thy filthiness, which should be done away, is become more offensive, as that of a city is in dry weather when it is not rained upon. Or, thou hast nothing to refresh and comfort thyself with in the day of indignation; thou art not rained upon by Divine consolations, as the rich man in torment had not a drop of water, or rain, to cool his tongue.

Secondly. A particular charge drawn up against the several orders and degrees of men among them, which shews that they had all helped to fill the measure of the nation's guilt, but none had done anything towards the emptying of it, they are therefore all alike.

1. They have every one corrupted his way, and those who should have been the brightest examples of virtue were ringleaders in iniquity, and patterns of vice.

1st. The prophets that pretended to make known the mind of God to them were not only deceivers, but devourers, ver. 25, and hardened them in their wickedness, both by their preaching, wherein they promised them impunity and prosperity, and by their conversation, wherein they were as profligate as any. "There is a conspiracy of her prophets" against God and religion, against the true prophets and all good men; they conspired together to be all in one song, as Ahab's prophets were, to assure them of peace in their sinful ways. The unity that is among pretenders to infallibility, and which they so much boast of, is only the result of a secret conspiracy against the truth. Satan is not divided against himself. The prophets are in conspiracy with the murderers and oppressors, to patronise and protect them in their wickedness, and justify what they did with their false prophecies, provided they may come in shares with them in the profits of it. They are like a roaring lion ravening the prey; they thunder out threats against them whose ruin is aimed at, terrify them, or make them odious to the people, and so make themselves masters, First. Of their lives. They have devoured souls, have been accessary to the shedding of the blood of many an innocent person, and so have made many to become sorrowful widows that were comfortable wives. They have persecuted those to death who witnessed against their pretensions to prophecy, and would not be imposed upon by their counterfeit commission. Or, they devoured souls by flattering sinners into a false peace and a vain hope, and seducing them into the paths of sin, which would be their eternal ruin. Note, Those who draw men to wickedness, and encourage them in it, are the devourers and murderers of their souls. Secondly. Of their estates. When Naboth is slain they take possession of his vineyard; "They have seized the treasure and precious things," as forfeited. Some way or other they had of devouring the widows' houses, as the Pharisees, Mat. xxiii. 14. Or, they got his treasure, and all these precious things, as fees for false and flattering prophecies; for "he that puts not into their mouths, they even prepare war against him," Mic. iii. 5. It was sad with Jerusalem when such men as these passed for prophets.

2nd. The priests, who were teachers by office, and had the custody of the sacred things, and should have called the false prophets to account, were as bad as they, ver. 26. First. They violated the law of God which they should have observed, and taught others to observe; they made no conscience of the law of the priesthood, but openly broke it, and with contempt, as Hophni and Phinehas. They did what they had a mind, with an express non obstante to the command of God. And how should they teach the people their duty who lived in contradiction to their own? Secondly. They profaned God's holy things, about which they were to minister, and which they ought to have restrained others from the profanation of. They suffered those to eat of the holy things that were unqualified by the law. The table of the Lord was contemptible with them; by dealing in holy things with such unhallowed hands they did themselves profane them. Thirdly. They did not themselves put a difference, nor did they shew the people how to "put a difference, between the holy and profane, the clean and the unclean," according to the directions and distinctions of the law. They did not exclude those from God's courts that were excluded by the law; nor teach the people to observe the difference the law had made between food clean and unclean, between times and places holy and common, but lived at large themselves, and encouraged the people to do so too. Fourthly. They "hid their eyes from God's sabbaths;" that is, they took no care about them; it was all one to them whether God's sabbaths were kept holy or no. They neither gave countenance to those who observed them nor check to those that profaned them, nor did they themselves shew any regard to them, or veneration for them. They winked at those who did servile works on that day, and looked another way when they should have inspected the behaviour of the people on sabbath days. God's sabbaths have such a beauty and glory put upon them by the Divine institution as may command respect; but they hid their eyes from them, and would not see that excellency in them. Fifthly. By all this God himself was profaned among them; his authority was slighted, his goodness made light of, and the highest affront and contempt imaginable put upon his holiness. Note, The profanation of the honour of the Scriptures, of sabbaths, and sacred things, is a profanation of the honour of God himself, who is interested in them.

3rd. The princes, who should have interposed with their authority to redress these grievances, were as daring transgressors of the law as any other; ver. 17, "They are like wolves ravening the prey;" for such is power without justice and goodness to direct it. All their business was to gratify, First. Their own pride and ambition, by making themselves arbitrary and formidable. Secondly. Their own malice and revenge, by shedding blood, and destroying souls, sacrificing to their cruelty all those that stood in their way, or had in anything disobliged them. Thirdly. Their own avarice. All they aim at is to get dishonest gain, by crushing and oppressing their subjects. Lucri bonus est odor ex re qualibet. Rem, rem, quocunque modo rem,—'Sweet is the odour of gain, from whatever substance it ascends. Money, money, by fairness or by fraud get money.' But, though they had not power sufficient to carry them on in their oppressive courses, yet how could they answer it both to their credit and to their consciences? We are told how (ver. 28) the prophets daubed them with untempered mortar; told them in God's name, (horrid wickedness!) that there was no harm in what they did, they might dispose of the lives and estates of their subjects as they pleased, and could do no wrong; nay, that in prosecuting such and such, whom they had marked out, they did God service; and thus they stopped the mouth of their consciences. They also justified what they did to the people, nay, and magnified it, as if it were all for the public good, and so saved their reputation, and kept their oppressed subjects from murmuring. Note, Daubing prophets are the great supporters of ravening princes, but will prove at last their great deceivers; for they daub with untempered mortar, which will not hold, nor will the wall stand long that is built up with it. They pretend to be seers, but they see vanity; they pretend to be diviners, but they divine lies; they pretend a warrant from heaven for what they say, and that it is all as true as Gospel. They say, "Thus saith the Lord God," but it is all a sham, for "the Lord hath not spoken any such thing."

4th. The people that had any power in their hands learned of their princes to abuse it, ver. 29. They that should have complained of the oppression of the subject, and have put in a claim of rights on behalf of the injured, that should have stood up for liberty and property, were themselves invaders of it; "The people of the land have used oppression, and exercised robbery." The rich oppress the poor, masters their servants, landlords their tenants, and even parents their own children; nay, the buyers and sellers will find some way to oppress one another. This is such a sin as, when it is national, is indeed a national judgment, and is threatened as such; Isa. iii. 5, "The people shall be oppressed every one by his neighbour." It is an aggravation of the sin that they have vexed the poor and needy, whom they should have relieved, and have oppressed the stranger, and deprived him of his right, to whom they ought to have been not only just, but kind. Thus was the apostacy universal, and the disease epidemical.

2. There is none that appears as an intercessor for them; ver. 30, "I sought for a man among them that should stand in the gap, but I found none." Note, 1st. Sin makes a gap in the hedge of protection that is about a people, at which good things run out from them, and evil things pour in upon them; a gap by which God enters to destroy them. 2nd. There is a way of standing in the gap, and making up the breach against the judgments of God, by repentance, and prayer, and reformation. Moses stood in the gap when he made intercession for Israel, to turn away the wrath of God, Ps. cvi. 23. 3rd. When God is coming forth against a sinful people to destroy them he expects some to intercede for them, and inquires if there be but one that doth; so much is it his desire and delight to shew mercy. If there be but a man that stands in the gap, as Abraham for Sodom, he will discover him, and be well pleased with him. 4th. It bodes ill to a people when judgments are breaking in upon them, and the spirit of prayer is restrained, so that not one is found that will either give them a good word or speak a good word for them. 5th. When it is so what can be expected but utter ruin? ver. 31, "Therefore have I poured out mine indignation upon them," have given it full scope that it may come upon them in a full stream; yet, whatever God's wrath inflicts upon a people, it is their own way that is therein recompensed upon their heads, and God deals with them no worse,—look how much better,—than their iniquity deserves.

CHAPTER XXIII.

This long chapter, as before, ch. xvi., xx., is a history of the apostacies of God's people from him, and the aggravations of those apostacies, under the similitude of corporal whoredom and adultery. Here the kingdoms of Israel and Judah, the ten tribes and the two, with their capital cities, Samaria and Jerusalem, are considered distinctly. Here is, I. The apostacy of Israel and Samaria from God, ver. 1—8; and their ruin for it, ver. 9, 10. II. The apostacy of Judah and Jerusalem from God, ver. 11—21; and sentence passed upon them, that they shall in like manner be destroyed for it, ver. 22—35. III. The joint wickedness of them both together, ver. 36—44; and the joint ruin of them both, ver. 45—49. And all that is written for warning against the sins of idolatry, and confidence in an arm of flesh, and sinful leagues and confederacies with wicked people, which are the sins here meant by committing whoredom, is, that others may hear and fear, and not sin after the similitude of the transgressions of Israel and Judah.

derings of some parts have been proposed. Verse 23 means that the Jews who had sworn allegiance to the Babylonians did not believe the result of the divination; but we are reminded that the king of Babylon was a man who did not forget their crimes, and hence they were taken captive.

xxi. 25. The word for "profane" here is the one which is rendered "slain" in verse 14, and has the same meaning, viz., wounded, or "pierced." The reference is to Zedekiah, who was captured and sent a prisoner to Babylon after being blinded, which the monuments show was by having the eyes pierced with a spear.

xxi. 26. For "diadem" we should have "turban" or "mitre," the usual head-dress of the high-priest, and some explain it in that sense here

xxi. 27. We may render this, "I will make it a ruin, a ruin, a ruin: yet this shall not be, until he cometh who hath judgment; and I will give it him."

THE word of the LORD came again unto me, saying,
2 Son of man, there were two women,
The daughters of one mother:
3 And they committed whoredoms in Egypt;
They committed whoredoms in their youth:
There were their breasts pressed,
And there they bruised the teats of their virginity.
4 And the names of them were Aholah the elder, and Aholibah her sister:
And they were mine, and they bare sons and daughters.
Thus were their names; Samaria is Aholah, and Jerusalem Aholibah.
5 And Aholah played the harlot when she was mine;
And she doted on her lovers, on the Assyrians her neighbours,
6 Which were clothed with blue, captains and rulers,
All of them desirable young men, horsemen riding upon horses.
7 Thus she committed her whoredoms with them,
With all them that were the chosen men of Assyria,
And with all on whom she doted:
With all their idols she defiled herself.
8 Neither left she her whoredoms brought from Egypt:
For in her youth they lay with her,
And they bruised the breasts of her virginity,
And poured their whoredom upon her.
9 Wherefore I have delivered her into the hand of her lovers,
Into the hand of the Assyrians, upon whom she doted.

ASSYRIAN.—FROM A ROCK.

10 These discovered her nakedness:
They took her sons and her daughters, and slew her with the sword:
And she became famous among women;
For they had executed judgment upon her.

God had often spoken to Ezekiel, and by him to the people, to this effect, but now his word comes again; for God speaketh the same thing once, yea twice, yea many a time, and all little enough, and too little, for man perceiveth it not. Note, To convince sinners of the evil of sin, and of their misery and danger by reason of it, there is need of line upon line; so loth we are to know the worst by ourselves. The sinners that are here to be exposed are two women, two kingdoms, sister kingdoms, Israel and Judah, daughters of one mother, having been for a long time but one people. Solomon's kingdom was so large, so populous, that immediately after his death it divided into two. Observe,

First. Their character when they were one; ver. 3, "They committed whoredoms in Egypt," for there they were guilty of idolatry, as we read before, ch. xx. 8. The representing of these sins which are most provoking to God, and most ruining to a people, by the sin of whoredom plainly intimates what an exceeding sinful sin uncleanness is, how offensive, how destructive. Doubtless it is itself one of the worst of sins; for other the worst of sins are compared to it here, and often elsewhere, which should increase our detestation and dread of all manner of fleshly lusts, all appearances of them, and approaches to them, as warring against the soul, infatuating sinners, bewitching them, alienating their minds from God and all that is good, debauching conscience, rendering them odious in the eyes of the pure and holy God, and drowning them at last in destruction and perdition.

Secondly. Their names when they became two, ver. 4. The kingdom of Israel is called the elder sister, because that first made the breach, and separated from the family both of kings and priests that God had appointed; the greater sister, so the word is, for ten tribes belonged to that kingdom, and only two to the other. God saith of them both, "They were mine," for they were the seed of Abraham his friend, and of Jacob his chosen: they were in covenant with God, and carried about with them the sign of their circumcision, the seal of the covenant. "They were mine," and therefore their apostacy was the highest injustice; it was alienating God's property, it was the basest ingratitude to the best of benefactors, and a perfidious treacherous violation of the most sacred engagements. Note, Those who have been in profession the people of God, but revolted from him, have a great deal to answer for more than those who never made any such profession. "They were mine;" that is, they were espoused to me, and to me they bare sons and daughters. There were many among them that were devoted to God's honour, and employed in his service, and were the strength and beauty of these kingdoms, as children are of the families they are born in. In this parable Samaria and the kingdom of Israel shall bear the name of Aholah, her own tabernacle; because the places of worship which that kingdom had were of their own devising, their own choosing, and the worship itself their own invention; God never owned it. 'Her tabernacle to herself,' so some render it; let her take it to herself, and make her best of it. Jerusalem and the kingdom of Judah bear the name of Aholibah, 'my tabernacle is in her;' because their temple was the place which God himself had chosen to put his name there. He acknowledged it to be his, and honoured them with the tokens of his presence in it. Note, Of those that stand in relation to God, and make profession of his name, some have greater privileges and advantages than others; and, as those who have greater are rendered the more inexcusable if they revolt from God, so those that have lesser yet will not thereby be rendered excusable.

Thirdly. The treacherous departure of the kingdom of Israel from God; ver. 5, "Aholah played the harlot when she was mine." Though the ten tribes had deserted the house of David, yet God owned them for his still. Though Jeroboam, in setting up the golden calves, sinned and made Israel to sin, yet as long as they worshipped the God of Israel only, though by images, he did not quite cast them off. But the way of sin is down-hill. Aholah played the harlot, brought in the worship of Baal, 1 Kin. xvi. 31; set up that other god, that dunghill god, in competition with Jehovah, 1 Kin. xviii. 21; as a vile adulteress dotes on her lovers, because they are well dressed, and make a figure, because they are young and handsome; ver. 6, "clothed with blue, captains and rulers, desirable young men," genteel, and that pass for men of honour. So she doted upon her neighbours, particularly the Assyrians, who had extended their conquests near them. She admired their idols, and worshipped them, admired the pomp of their courts, and their military strength, and courted alliances with them upon any terms, as if their own God were not sufficient to be depended upon. We find one of the kings of Israel giving a thousand talents to the king of Assyria, to engage him in his interests, 2 Kin. xv. 19. She doted on the chosen men of Assyria, as worthy to be trusted and employed in the service of the state; ver. 7, and "on all their idols with which she defiled herself." Note, Whatever creature we dote upon, pay homage to, and put a confidence in, we make an idol of that creature; and whatever we make an idol of we defile ourselves with. And now again, the conviction looks back as far as the original of their nation; "Neither left she her whoredoms which she brought from Egypt," ver. 9. Their being idolaters in Egypt was a thing never to be forgotten, that they should be in love with Egypt's idols, even when they were continually in fear of Egypt's tyrants and taskmasters; but (as some have observed) therefore at that time, when Satan boasted of his having walked through the earth as all his own, to disprove his pretensions God did not say, Hast thou considered my people Israel in Egypt? for they were become idolaters and were not bragged of; but, "Hast thou considered my servant Job in the land of Uz?" And this corrupt disposition in them, when they were first formed into a people, is an emblem of that original corruption which is born with us, and is woven into our constitution, a strong bias towards the world and the flesh, like that of the Israelites towards idolatry. It was bred in the bone with them, and was charged upon them long after, that they left not their whoredoms brought from Egypt; it would never out of the flesh, though Egypt had been a house of bondage to them. Thus the corrupt affections and inclinations which we brought into the world with us we have not lost nor got clear of, but still retain them, though the iniquity we were born in is the source of all the calamities which human life is liable to.

Fourthly. The destruction of the kingdom of Israel for their apostacy from God, ver. 9, 10, "I have delivered her into the hand of her lovers." God first justly gave her up to her lust, "Ephraim is joined to idols, let him alone;" and then gave her up to "her lovers." The neighbour nations, whose idolatries she had conformed to, and whose friendship she had confided in, and in both had affronted God, are now made use of as the instruments of her destruction. The Assyrians, on whom she doted, soon spied out the nakedness of the land, discovered her blind side on which to attack her, stripped her of all her ornaments, and all her defences, and so uncovered her, and made her naked and bare; carried her sons and daughters into captivity; slew her with the sword, and quite destroyed that kingdom, and put an end to it. We have the story at large, 2 Kin. xvii. 6, &c., where the cause of the ruin of that once flourishing kingdom by the Assyrians is shewed to be their forsaking the God of Israel, "fearing other gods, and walking in the statutes of the heathens." It was for this that God was "very angry with them, and removed them out of his sight," ver. 18; and that the Assyrians, whom they had been so fond of, should be employed in executing judgments upon them, was very remarkable, and shews how God doth often, in a way of righteous judgment, make that a scourge to sinners which they have inordinately set their hearts upon. The devil will for ever be a tormentor to those impenitent sinners who now hearken to him, and comply with him as a tempter.

Thus Samaria became "famous among women," or infamous rather. She 'became a name,' so the word is; not only she came to be the subject of discourse, and much talked of, as the desolations of cities and kingdoms fill the newspapers; but she was thus ruined for her idolatries in terrorem, for warning to all people to take heed of doing likewise; as the public execution of notorious malefactors make them such a name, such an ill name, as may serve to frighten others from those wicked courses which have brought them to a miserable and shameful end; Deu. xxi. 21, "All Israel shall hear and fear."

11 And when her sister Aholibah saw this,
She was more corrupt in her inordinate love than she,
And in her whoredoms more than her sister in her whoredoms 12 She doted upon the Assyrians her neighbours.

xxi. 28. The words "to consume because of the glittering" are variously explained, and it is difficult to determine what their true meaning is.

xxii. 6. The sense seems to be, "Behold, the princes of Israel, each according to his power, were with thee in order to shed blood."

xxii. 16. The margin is more correct than the text: "Thou shalt be profaned in thyself in the eyes of the nations." "Take thine inheritance" is wrong.

xxii. 17—22. It is of course not meant that all the metals named are smelted at once in one furnace. The smelting of the different metals was evidently understood and practised among the Jews, but not to the same extent as in some other nations; probably on a small scale only.

xxii. 27. Wolves are by no means rare even now in Palestine and Syria. Dr. Tristram says, "We found them alike in the forests of Bashan and Gilead, in the ravines of Galilee and Lebanon, and in

Captains and rulers clothed most gorgeously,
Horsemen riding upon horses,
All of them desirable young men
13 Then I saw that she was defiled,
That they took both one way,
14 And that she increased her whoredoms:
For when she saw men pourtrayed upon the wall,
The images of the Chaldeans pourtrayed with vermilion,
15 Girded with girdles upon their loins,
Exceeding in dyed attire upon their heads,
All of them princes to look to,
After the manner of the Babylonians of Chaldea, the land of their nativity: [upon them,
16 And as soon as she saw them with her eyes, she doted
And sent messengers unto them into Chaldea.
17 And the Babylonians came to her into the bed of love,
And they defiled her with their whoredom,
And she was polluted with them, and her mind was alienated from them.
18 So she discovered her whoredoms, and discovered her nakedness:
Then my mind was alienated from her,
Like as my mind was alienated from her sister
19 Yet she multiplied her whoredoms,
In calling to remembrance the days of her youth,
Wherein she had played the harlot in the land of Egypt.
20 For she doted upon their paramours,
Whose flesh is as the flesh of asses,
And whose issue is like the issue of horses.
21 Thus thou calledst to remembrance the lewdness of thy youth,
In bruising thy teats by the Egyptians [youth,
For the paps of thy

ASSYRIANS.—FROM THE ASSYRIAN MARBLES.

The prophet Hosea in his time observed, that the two tribes retained their integrity in a great measure, when the ten tribes had apostatized; Hos. xi. 12, "Ephraim indeed compasseth me about with lies, but Judah yet rules with God, and is faithful with the saints;" and this was justly expected from them, Hos. iv. 15, "Though thou Israel play the harlot, yet let not Judah offend." But this lasted not long; by some unhappy matches made between the house of David and the house of Ahab the worship of Baal had been brought into the kingdom of Judah, but had been by the reforming kings worked out again; and at the time of the captivity of the ten tribes, which was in the reign of Hezekiah, things were in a good posture. But it lasted not long; in the reign of Manasseh, soon after the kingdom of Judah had seen the destruction of the kingdom of Israel, they became more corrupt than Israel had been in their inordinate love of idols, ver. 11. Instead of being made better by the warning which that destruction gave them, they were made worse by it, as if they were displeased "because the Lord had made that breach upon Israel," and for that reason became disaffected to him and to his service. Instead of being made to stand in awe of him as a jealous God, they therefore grew strange to him, and liked those gods better that would admit of partners with him. Note, Those may justly expect God's judgments upon themselves who do not take warning by his judgments upon others, who see in others what is the end of sin, and yet continue to make a light matter of it; but it is bad indeed with those who are made worse by that which should make them better; and have their lusts irritated and exasperated by that which was designed to suppress and subdue them. Jerusalem grew worse in her whoredoms than her sister Samaria had been in her whoredoms. This was observed before, ch. xvi. 51, "Neither hath Samaria committed half of thy sins."

First. Jerusalem, that had been a faithful city, became a harlot, Isa. i. 21. She also doted upon the Assyrians, ver. 12; joined in league with them, joined in worship with them, grew to be in love with their captains and rulers, and cried them up as finer and more accomplished gentlemen than any that ever the land of Israel produced. See how richly, how neatly they are dressed, "clothed most gorgeously;" how well they sit a horse, they are "horsemen riding upon horses;" how charmingly they look, "all of them desirable young men." And thus they grew to affect every thing that was foreign, and to despise their own nation; and even the religion of it was mean and homely, and not to be compared with the curiosity and gaiety that was in the heathen temples. Thus she increased her whoredoms. She fell in love, fell in league, with the Chaldeans. Hezekiah himself was faulty this way when he was proud of the court which the kings of Babylon made to him, and complimented his ambassadors with the sight of all his treasures, Isa. xxxix. 2; and the humour increased, ver. 14. She doted upon the pictures of the Babylonian captains, ver. 15, 16; joined in alliance with that kingdom, invited them to come and settle in Jerusalem, that they might refine the genius of the Jewish nation, and make it more polite; nay, they sent for patterns of their images, altars, and temples, and made use of them in their worship. Thus was she polluted with their whoredoms, ver. 17; and thereby she discovered her own whoredom, ver. 18; that is, her own strong inclination to idolatry. And when she had had enough of the Chaldeans, and grew sick of them, and disposed to break her league with them, as Jehoiakim and Zedekiah did, her mind being alienated from them, she courted the Egyptians, doted upon their paramours, ver. 20; would come into an alliance with them; and, to strengthen their alliance, would join with them in their idolatries, and then depend upon them to be their protectors from all other nations: for so wise, so rich, so strong was the Egyptian nation, and came to such perfection in idolatry, that there is no nation now they can take such satisfaction in as in Egypt. Thus they "called to remembrance the days of their youth," ver. 19: the "lewdness of their youth," ver. 21; that is, 1. They pleased themselves with the remembrance of it. When they began to set their affections upon Egypt, they encouraged themselves to put a confidence in that kingdom, because of the old acquaintance they had with it, as if they still retained the gust and relish of the leeks and onions they ate there; or rather of the idolatrous worship they learned there, and brought up with them from thence. When they began an acquaintance with Egypt they remembered how merrily their fathers worshipped the golden calf, what music and dancing they had at that sport, which they learned in Egypt; and hoped they should now have a fair pretence to come to that again. Thus she multiplied her whoredoms, repeated her former whoredoms, and encouraged herself to close with present temptations, by calling to remembrance the days of her youth. Note, Those who, instead of reflecting upon their former sins with sorrow and shame, reflect upon them with pleasure and pride, contract new guilt, thereby strengthen their own corruptions, and in effect bid defiance to repentance. This is returning with the dog to his vomit. 2. They called it God's remembrance, and provoked him to remember it against them. God had said indeed that he would reckon with them for the golden calf, that idol of Egypt, Ex. xxxii. 34; but such was his patience, that he seemed to have forgotten it, till they, by their league now with the Egyptians against the Chaldeans, did as it were put him in mind of it; and in the day when he visits he will now, as he hath said, visit for that. It is very observable how this adulteress changed her lovers. She dotes first on the Assyrians, then she thought the Chaldeans finer, and courted them. After awhile her mind was alienated from them, and she thought the Egyptians more powerful, ver. 20, and she must contract an intimacy with them, which shews the folly, 1st. Of fleshly lusts. When they are indulged they grow humoursome and fickle, are soon surfeited, but never satisfied; they must have variety, and what is loved one day, is loathed the next; unius adulterium matrimonium vocant,—'one adultery is called marriage,' saith Seneca. 2nd. Of idolatry. Those who think one god too little will not think a hundred enough, but will still be for trying more, as finding all insufficient. 3rd. Of seeking to creatures for help. We go from one to another, but are disappointed in them all, and can never rest till we have made the God of Israel our help

Secondly. The faithful God justly gives a bill of divorce to this now faithless city that is become a harlot. His jealousy soon discovered her lewdness; ver. 13, "I saw that she was defiled," that she was debauched, saw which way her inclination was, that the two sisters both took one way, and that Jerusalem grew worse than Samaria; for "if we stretch out our hand to a strange god, shall not God search this out?" No doubt he shall; and when he has found it can he be pleased with it? No, ver. 18, "Then my mind was alienated from her, as it was from her sister." How could the pure and holy God any longer take delight in such a lewd generation? Note, Sin alienates God's mind from the sinner, and justly, for it is the alienation of the sinner's mind from God; but woe, and a thousand woes, to those from whom God's mind is alienated; for whom he turns from he will turn against.

22 Therefore, O Aholibah, thus saith the Lord GOD;
Behold, I will raise up thy lovers against thee.
From whom thy mind is alienated,
And I will bring them against thee on every side;
23 The Babylonians, and all the Chaldeans, Pekod, and Shoa, and Koa, and all the Assyrians with All of them desirable young men, [them:

the maritime plains." They mostly prey on defenceless flocks and herds.

xxiii. 2—4. This chapter is a parable, the general sense of which is clear enough. The hideous scenes and incidents introduced are of course to be explained according to the known facts of the case. Aholah signifies "a tent," and Aholibah "a tent therein." Some, however, explain Aholah to mean "her tent" or tabernacle, and Aholibah "my tent was in her," or "my tabernacle was in her." Aholah, or Samaria, is the personification of the kingdom of Israel, and Aholibah, or Jerusalem, the kingdom of Judah. Samaria seems to be called the elder, because she was the first to fall into idolatrous ways, as in the related passage (chap. xvi. 46).

xxiii. 6. There is some doubt as to the exact colour here called "blue," but it was one of the Syrian dyes, variously called blue, violet, purple, &c. The words for "captains and rulers" are well-known terms for certain officers, the second being still in use in the Captains and rulers, great lords and renowned,

All of them riding upon horses.
24 And they shall come against thee with chariots, wagons, [and wheels,
And with an assembly of people,
Which shall set against thee buckler and shield and helmet round about:
And I will set judgment before them,
And they shall judge thee according to their judgments.
25 And I will set my jealousy against thee,
And they shall deal furiously with thee:
They shall take away thy nose and thine ears;
And thy remnant shall fall by the sword:
They shall take thy sons and thy daughters;
And thy residue shall be devoured by the fire.
26 They shall also strip thee out of thy clothes,
And take away thy fair jewels.
27 Thus will I make thy lewdness to cease from thee,
And thy whoredom brought from the land of Egypt:
So that thou shalt not lift up thine eyes unto them,
Nor remember Egypt any more.
28 For thus saith the Lord GOD; [thou hatest, Behold, I will deliver thee into the hand of them whom
Into the hand of them from whom thy mind is alienated:
29 And they shall deal with thee hatefully,
And shall take away all thy labour,
And shall leave thee naked and bare:
And the nakedness of thy whoredoms shall be discovered,
Both thy lewdness and thy whoredoms.
30 I will do these things unto thee,
Because thou has gone a whoring after the heathen,
And because thou art polluted with their idols.
31 Thou hast walked in the way of thy sister;
Therefore will I give her cup into thine hand.
32 Thus saith the Lord GOD;
Thou shalt drink of thy sister's cup deep and large:
Thou shalt be laughed to scorn and had in derision; it containeth much.
33 Thou shalt be filled with drunkenness and sorrow,
With the cup of astonishment and desolation,
With the cup of thy sister Samaria.
34 Thou shalt even drink it and suck it out,
And thou shalt break the sherds thereof,
And pluck off thine own breasts:
For I have spoken it, saith the Lord GOD.
35 Therefore thus saith the Lord GOD; [back, Because thou hast forgotten me, and cast me behind thy Therefore bear thou also thy lewdness and thy whoredoms.

Jerusalem stands indicted by the name of Aholibah, for that she was a false traitor to her sovereign Lord the God of heaven, not having his fear before her eyes, but, moved by the instigation of the devil, had revolted from her allegiance to him, and compassed and imagined to shake off his government, had kept up a correspondence, and joined in confederacy with his enemies, and the pretenders to a deity, in contempt of his crown and dignity. To this indictment she has pleaded, Not guilty: "I am not polluted, I have not gone after Baalim." But it is found against her by the notorious evidence of the fact, and she stands convicted of it, nor has any thing material to offer why judgment should not be given, and execution awarded by law. In these verses therefore we have the sentence.

First. Her old confederates must be her executioners; and those whom she had courted to be her leaders in sin are now to be employed as instruments of her punishment; ver. 22, "I will raise up thy lovers against thee," the Chaldeans, whom formerly thou didst so much admire and covet an acquaintance with, but from whom thy mind is since alienated, and with whom thou hast perfidiously broken covenant. They are called "thy lovers," ver. 22; and yet, ver. 28, "them whom thou hatest." Note, It is common for sinful love soon to turn into hatred, as Amnon's to Tamar. Those of headstrong and unreasonable passions are often very hot against those persons and things that a little before they were as hot for. Fools run into extremes; nay, and wise men may see cause to change their sentiments; and therefore, as we should rejoice and weep as if we rejoiced not and wept not, so we should love and hate as if we loved not and hated not; ita ama tanquam osurus,—'love as one who may have cause to feel aversion.'

Secondly. The execution to be done upon her is very terrible; her enemies shall come against her on every side, ver. 22. Those of the several nations that constituted the Chaldean army, ver. 23, all of them great lords and renowned, whose pomp, and grandeur, and splendid appearance, made them look the more amiable, when they came as friends to protect and patronise Jerusalem, but the more formidable when they came to chastise its treachery, and aimed at no less than its ruin. 1. They shall come with a great deal of military forces ver. 24, with chariots and wagons, furnished with all necessary provisions for a camp, with arms and ammunition, bag and baggage, with a vast army, and well armed. 2. They shall have justice on their side; "I will set judgment before them." They shall have right with them as well as might, for the king of Babylon had just cause to make war upon the king of Judah, because he had broken his league with him; and therefore they shall judge thee, not only according to God's judgments, as the instruments of his justice, to punish thee for the indignities done to him, but according to their judgments, according to the law of nations, to punish thee for thy perfidious dealings with them. 3 They shall prosecute the war with a great deal of fury and resentment. Being a war of revenge, "they shall deal with thee hatefully," ver. 29. This will make the execution the more severe, that their swords will be dipped in poison. Thou hatest them, and they shall deal hatefully with thee; those that hate will be hated, and hatefully dealt with. 4. God himself will lead them on, and his anger shall be mingled with theirs; ver. 25, "I will set my jealousy against thee," that shall kindle this fire, and then "they shall deal furiously with thee." If men never so hatefully, never so furiously deal with us, if we have God on our side we need not fear them, they can do us no real hurt; but if men deal furiously with us, and God sets his jealousy against us too, what will become of us?

The particulars of the sentence here passed upon this notorious adulteress are, 1st. That all she has shall be seized on. The clothes and the fair jewels with which she had endeavoured to recommend herself to her lovers, these shall she be stripped of, ver. 26; all those things that were the ornaments of their state shall be taken away. "They shall take away all thy labour," all that thou hast gotten by thy labour, "and shall leave thee naked and bare," ver. 29. Both city and country shall be impoverished, and all the wealth of both swept away. 2nd. That her children shall go into captivity. "They shall take thy sons and thy daughters" and make slaves of them, ver. 25, for they are children of whoredoms, unworthy the dignities and privileges of the Israelites, Hos. ii. 4. 3rd. That she shall be stigmatised and deformed. "They shall take away thy nose and thy ears," shall mark thee for a whore, and render thee for ever odious, ver. 25. This intimates the many cruelties of the Chaldean soldiers towards the Jews that fall into their hands, whom, it is probable, they used barbarously. Some will have this to be used figuratively; and by the nose they think is meant the kingly dignity, and by the ears that of the priesthood. 4th. That she shall be exposed to shame. "Thy lewdness and thy whoredoms shall be discovered," ver. 29, as, when a malefactor is punished, all his crimes are ripped up, and repeated to his disgrace; what was secret then comes to light, and what was done long since is then called to mind. 5th. That she shall be quite cut off and ruined. "The remnant" of thy people that have escaped the famine and pestilence "shall fall by the sword;" "and the residue" of thy houses, that have not been battered down about thy ears, "shall be devoured by fire," ver. 25. And this shall be the end of Jerusalem.

Thirdly. Because she has trod in the steps of Samaria's sins, she must expect no other but Samaria's fate. It is common in giving judgment to have an eye to precedents, so has God in passing this sentence on Jerusalem; ver. 31, &c., "Thou hast walked in the way of thy sister," notwithstanding the warning thou hast had given thee by the fatal consequences of her wickedness; and therefore "I will give her cup," her portion of miseries, "into thy hand." The cup of the Lord's fury, which will be to thee a cup of trembling. Now, 1. This cup is said to be deep and large, and to contain much, ver. 32; abundance of God's wrath, and abundance of miseries, the fruits of that wrath. It is such a cup as that which we read of, Jer. xxv. 15, 16. The cup of Divine vengeance holds a great deal, and so they will find into whose hand it shall be put. 2. They shall be made to drink the very dregs of this cup, as the wicked are said to do, Ps. lxxv. 8, "Thou shalt drink it, and suck it out," not because it is pleasant, but because it is forced upon thee; ver. 34, "Thou shalt break the sherds thereof, and pluck off thine own breasts," for indignation at the extreme bitterness of this cup, being full of the fury of the Lord, Isa. li. 20; as men in great anguish tear their hair, and throw every thing from them. Finding there is no remedy but it must be drank, "For I have spoken it, saith the Lord God," thou shalt have no manner of patience in the drinking of it. 3. They shall be intoxicated by it, made sick, and be at their wits' end, as men in drink are, staggering and stumbling, and ready to fall; ver. 33, "Thou shalt be filled with drunkenness and sorrow." Note, Drunkenness hath sorrow attending it to such a degree, that the utmost confusion and astonishment is here represented by it. Who would think that that which is such a force upon nature, such a scandal to it, which deprives men of their reason, disorders them to the last degree, and is therefore expressive of the greatest misery, should yet be with many a beloved sin; that they should damn their own souls to distemper their own bodies? Who has woe and sorrow like them? Pr. xxiii. 29. 4. Being intoxicated they shall become as drunkards deserve to be, a laughing-stock to all about them, "Thou shalt be laughed to scorn, and had in derision," ver. 32, as acting ridiculously in every thing thou goest about. When God is about to ruin a people he makes their judges fools, and pours contempt on their princes, Job xii. 17, 21.

Fourthly. In all this God will be justified, and by all this they will be reformed, and so the issue even of this will be God's glory and their good. 1. They have been bad, very bad, and that justifies God in all that is brought upon them; ver. 30, "I will do these things unto thee, because thou hast gone a whoring after the heathen;" and, ver. 35, "Because thou hast forgotten me and cast me behind thy back." Note, Forgetfulness of God, and a contempt of him, of his eye upon us, and authority over us, is at the bottom of all our treacherous and adulterous departures from him. Therefore men wander after idols, because they forget God, and their obligations to him; nor could they look with so much desire and delight upon the baits of sin, if they did not first cast God behind their back, as not worthy to be regarded. And those who put such an affront upon God, how can they think but that it should turn upon themselves at last? "Therefore bear thou also thy lewdness and thy whoredoms;" that is, thou shalt suffer the punishment of it, and thou alone must bear the blame. Men need no more to sink them than the weight of their own sins; and they who will not part with their lewdness and their whoredoms must bear them. 2. They shall be better, much better, and this fire, though consuming to many, shall be refining to a remnant; ver. 27, "Thus will I make thy lewdness to cease from thee." The judgments which were brought upon them by their sins parted between them and their sins, and taught them at length to say, "What have we to do any more with idols?" Observe, 1st. How inveterate the disease was. "Thy whoredoms were brought from the land of Egypt." Their disposition to idolatry was early and innate, their practice of it was ancient, and had gained a sort of prescription by long usage. 2nd. How complete the cure was notwithstanding. Though it has taken root, yet it shall be made to cease, so that thou shalt not so much as lift up thine eyes to the idols again, nor remember Egypt with pleasure any more. They shall avoid the occasions of this sin, for they shall not so much as look upon an idol, lest their hearts should unawares walk after their eyes. And they shall abandon all inclinations to it; they shall not remember Egypt; that is, they shall not retain any of that affection for idols which they had from the very infancy of their title of pacha. The reference to the Assyrians as riding on horses quite agrees with all the testimony we have, riding on horseback having been very common in Assyria.

xxiii. 12. The Assyrian nobles and princes wore most costly and elaborate dresses, which were decorated in a very sumptuous style.

xxiii. 14, 15. Here also we have allusions which modern discoverers have shown to be very exact. The Chaldeans, Assyrians, or Babylonians, whichever term we adopt, were wont to have the walls adorned with representations of men and other objects. These were often carved or sculptured, and the vermilion of which the prophet speaks partly remains upon some of them to this day, with other colours.

xxiii. 23. Pekod, Shoa, and Koa were regions or races under the dominion of Assyria, but we have no certain information about them. Some have thought the words were the titles of certain officers; this, however, is very unlikely, and quite unsuited to the context.

nation. They got it through the corruption of nature in their bondage in Egypt, and lost it through the grace of God in their captivity in Babylon, which this was the blessed fruit of, even the taking away of sin, of that sin; so that, whereas before the captivity no nation (all things considered) was more impetuously bent upon idols and idolatry than they were, after that captivity no nation was more vehemently set against idols and idolatry than they were; insomuch that at this day the image-worship which is practised in the church of Rome confirms the Jews as much as any thing in their prejudices against the Christian religion.

36 The LORD said moreover unto me;
Son of man, wilt thou judge Aholah and Aholibah?
Yea, declare unto them their abominations;
37 That they have committed adultery, and blood is in their hands,
And with their idols have they committed adultery,
And have also caused their sons, whom they bare unto me,
To pass for them through the fire, to devour them.
38 Moreover this they have done unto me:
They have defiled my sanctuary in the same day,
And have profaned my sabbaths.
39 For when they had slain their children to their idols,
Then they came the same day into my sanctuary to profane it;
And, lo, thus have they done in the midst of mine house.
40 And furthermore, that ye have sent for men to come from far,
Unto whom a messenger was sent; and, lo, they came:
For whom thou didst wash thyself,
Paintedst thy eyes, and deckedst thyself with ornaments,
41 And satest upon a stately bed, and a table prepared before it,
Whereupon thou hast set mine incense and mine oil.
42 And a voice of a multitude being at ease was with her:
And with the men of the common sort
Were brought Sabeans from the wilderness,
Which put bracelets upon their hands,
And beautiful crowns upon their heads.
43 Then said I unto her that was old in adulteries,
Will they now commit whoredoms with her, and she with them?
44 Yet they went in unto her,
As they go in unto a woman that playeth the harlot:
So went they in unto Aholah and unto Aholibah, the lewd women.
45 And the righteous men, they shall judge them after the manner of adulteresses,
And after the manner of women that shed blood;
Because they are adulteresses, and blood is in their hands.
46 For thus saith the Lord GOD;
I will bring up a company upon them,
And will give them to be removed and spoiled.
47 And the company shall stone them with stones,
And dispatch them with their swords;
They shall slay their sons and their daughters,
And burn up their houses with fire.
48 Thus will I cause lewdness to cease out of the land,
That all women may be taught not to do after your lewdness.
49 And they shall recompense your lewdness upon you,
And ye shall bear the sins of your idols:
And ye shall know that I am the Lord GOD.

After the ten tribes were carried into captivity, and that kingdom was made quite desolate, the remains of it by degrees incorporated with the kingdom of Judah, and gained a settlement (many of them) in Jerusalem, so that the two sisters were in effect become one again; and therefore in these verses the prophet takes those to task jointly who were thus conjoined. "Wilt thou judge Aholah and Aholibah" together? ver. 36. Wilt thou go about to excuse for them? Thou seest the matter is so bad as not to bear an excuse. Or rather, thou shalt now be employed in God's name to judge them, ch. xx. 4. The matter is rather worse than better since the union.

First. Let them be made to see the sins they are guilty of. Declare unto them openly and boldly their abominations.

1. They have been guilty of gross idolatry, here called adultery. "With their idols they have committed adultery," ver. 37; have broken their marriage covenant with God, have lusted after the gratifications of a carnal, sensual mind in the worship of God. This is the first and worst of the abominations he is to charge them with.

2. They have committed the most barbarous murders in sacrificing their children to Moloch, a sin so unnatural that they deserve to hear of it on all occasions. "Blood is in their hands;" innocent blood, the blood of their own children, which they have caused to pass through the fire, ver. 37; not that they might be dedicated to the idols, but that they might be devoured; a sign they loved their idols better than that which was dearest to them in the world.

3. They have profaned the sacred things with which God had dignified and distinguished them. "This they have done unto me," this indignity, this injury, ver. 38. Every contempt put upon that which is holy reflects upon him who is the fountain of holiness, and from a relation to whom whatever is called holy has its denomination. God hath set up his sanctuary among them, but they defiled it by making it a house of merchandise, a den of thieves; nay, and much worse, there they set up their idols and worshipped them, and there they shed the blood of God's prophets. God had revealed to them his holy sabbaths, but they profaned them by doing all manner of servile work therein, or perhaps by sports and recreations on that day, not only practised, but allowed and encouraged by authority. They defiled the sanctuary on the same day that they profaned the sabbath. To defile the sanctuary was bad enough on any day, but to do it on the sabbath day was an aggravation. We used to say, 'The better day the better deed;' but here, the better day the worse deed. God takes notice of the circumstances of sin which add to the guilt. He shews (ver. 39) what was their profanation, both of the sanctuary and of the sabbath. They slew their children, and sacrificed them to their idols, to the great dishonour both of God and of human nature; and then came the same day, their hands imbrued with the blood of their children, and their clothes stained with it, to attend in God's sanctuary, not to ask pardon for what they had done, but to present themselves before him, as other Israelites did, expecting acceptance with him, notwithstanding these villanies they were guilty of, as if God either did not know their wickedness or did not hate it. Thus they profaned the sanctuary, as if that were a protection to the worst of malefactors, for thus they did in the midst of his house. Note, It is a profanation of God's solemn ordinances, when those that are grossly and openly profane and vicious impudently and impenitently so intrude upon the services and privileges of them. "Give not that which is holy unto dogs." "Friend, how camest thou in hither?"

4. They have courted foreign alliances, been proud of them, and reposed a confidence in them. This is also represented by the sin of adultery, for it was a departure from God, not only to whom alone they ought to pay their homage, and not to idols, but in whom alone they ought to put their trust, and not in creatures. Israel was a peculiar people, must dwell alone, and not be reckoned among the nations; and they profane their crown, and lay their honour in the dust, when they covet to be like them, or in league with them. But this they have now done; they have entered into strait alliances with the Assyrians, Chaldeans, and Egyptians, the most renowned and potent kingdoms at that time; but they scorned alliances with the petty kingdoms and states that lay near them, which yet might have been of more real service to them. Note, Affecting an acquaintance and correspondence with great people has often been a snare to good people. Let us see how Jerusalem courts her high allies, thinking thereby to make herself considerable.

1st. She privately requested that a public embassy might be sent to her ver. 40, You sent a messenger "for men to come from far." It seems then the neighbours had no desire to come into a confederacy with Jerusalem, but she thrust herself upon them, and sent underhand to desire them to court her; and, lo, they came. The wisest and best may be drawn unavoidably into company and conversation with profane and wicked people; but it is no sign either of wisdom or goodness to covet an intimacy with such, and to court it.

2nd. Great preparation was made for the reception of these foreign ministers, for their public entry and public audience, which is compared to the pains that an adulteress takes to make herself look handsome. Jezebel-like, thou paintedst thy face, and deckedst thyself with ornaments, ver. 40. The kings and princes made themselves new clothes, fitted up the rooms of state, beautified the furniture, and made it look fresh. Thou "satest upon a stately bed," ver. 41, a stately throne; "a table was prepared whereon thou hast set mine oil and mine incense." That was either, First. A feast for the ambassadors, a noble treat, agreeable to the other preparations. There was incense to perfume the room, and oil to anoint their heads. Or, Secondly. An altar ready furnished for the ambassadors' use in the worship of their idols, to let them know that the Israelites were not so straitlaced but that they could allow foreigners the free exercise of their religion among them, and furnish them with chapels, yea, and compliment them so far as to join with them in their devotions. Though the law of their God was against it, yet they could easily dispense with it themselves to oblige a friend. The oil and incense God calls his, not only because it was the gift of his providence, but because it should have been offered at his altar, which was an aggravation of their sin in serving idols and idolaters with it: see Hos. ii. 8.

3rd. There was great joy at their coming, as if it were such a blessing as never happened to Jerusalem before; ver. 42, "A voice of a multitude being at ease was with her." The people were very easy, for they thought themselves very safe and happy now that they had such powerful allies, and therefore attended the ambassadors with loud huzzas and acclamations of joy. A great confluence of people there was to the court upon this occasion. The men of the common sort were there to grace the solemnity, and to increase the crowd; and "with them were brought Sabeans from the wilderness." The margin reads it, 'Drunkards from the wilderness,' that would drink healths to the prosperity of this grand alliance, and force them upon others, and be most noisy in shouting upon this occasion. Whoever they were, in honour of the ambassadors they put "bracelets on their hands, and beautiful crowns upon their heads," which made the cavalcade appear very splendid.

4th. God, by his prophets, warned them against making these dangerous leagues with foreigners; ver. 43, "Then said I unto her that was old in adulteries," that from the first was fond of leagues with the heathen, of matching with their families, Jud. iii. 6, and afterwards of making alliances with their kingdoms; and though often disappointed herein would never be dissuaded from it. This was the adultery she was old in. I said, "Will they now commit whoredoms with her, and she with them?" Surely experience and observation will by this time have convinced both them and her that an alliance between the nation of the Jews and a heathen nation can never be for the advantage of either. They are iron and clay, that will not mix, nor will God bless it or smile upon it. But it seems her being old in these adulteries, instead of weaning her from them, as one would expect, doth but make her the more impudent and insatiable in them; for, though she was thus admonished of the folly of it, "yet they went in unto her," ver. 44. A bargain was soon clapped up, and a league made first with this and then with the other foreign state. Samaria did so, Jerusalem did so, like lewd women. They could not rest satisfied in the embraces of God's laws and care, and the assurances of protection he gave them; they could not think his covenant with them security enough; but there must be treaties and leagues, politic ones, they thought, and well concerted,—throw themselves into the arms of foreign princes, and put their xxiii. 24. "Chariots, wagons, and wheels" is a questionable rendering. For "chariots" Fürst says we must have battle-axe, and he explains the clause, "And they come upon thee with battle-axe, chariots, and wheeled wagons, and with hosts of people." Others, and preferably, have "weapons" where our version has "chariots." The Assyrians employed chariots in warfare, as well as carts and other vehicles. They also used shields of different forms, and wore helmets of sundry forms and materials, as iron and copper.

xxiii. 25. The mention of removing the nose and ears is an allusion to the notorious cruelty of the Assyrians.

xxiii. 40, 41. The luxuries of the ancient Orientals seem to have been at least equal to those of their descendants, and were in some respects similar. Their sensuous existence, and their life of pride and display, have always been distinguished by their modes of bathing, painting the eyes, wearing jewels and other decorations, and by their voluptuous couches and perfumes.

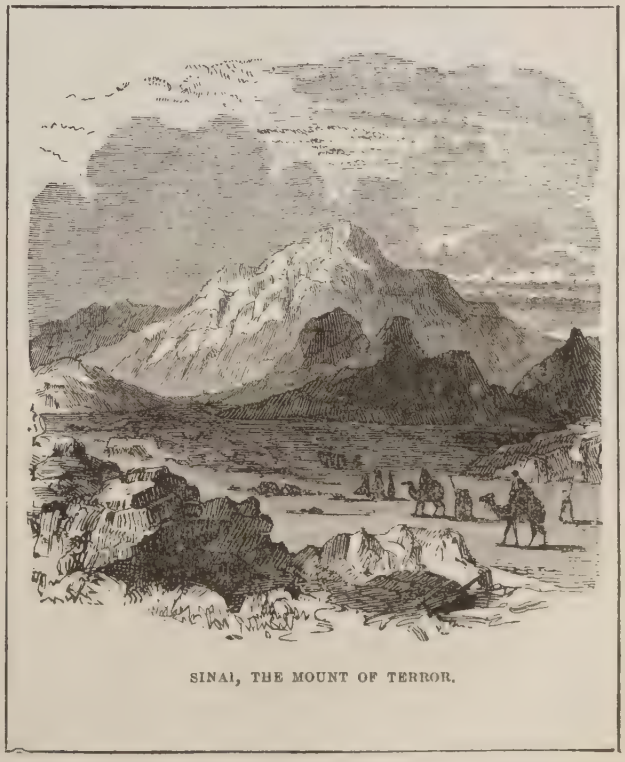
interests under their protection. Note, Those hearts go a whoring from God that take a complacency in the pomp of the world, and put a confidence in its wealth, and in an arm of flesh, Jer. xvii. 5.

Secondly. Let them be made to foresee the judgments that are coming upon them for these sins; ver. 45, "The righteous men, they shall judge them." Some make the instruments of their destruction to be the righteous men that shall judge them; the Assyrians that destroyed Samaria, the Chaldeans that destroyed Jerusalem. Those were comparatively righteous, had a sense of justice between man and man, and justly resented the treachery of the Jewish nation; however, they executed God's judgments, which we are sure are all righteous. Others understand it of the prophets, whose office it was, in God's name, to judge them, and to pass sentence upon them. Or we may take it as an appeal to all righteous men, to all that have a sense of equity; they shall all judge concerning these cities, and agree in their verdict, that forasmuch as they have been notoriously guilty of adultery and murder, and the guilt is national, that therefore they ought to suffer the pains and penalties which by law are inflicted upon women in their personal capacity that shed blood and are adulteresses. Righteous men will say, Why should bloody, filthy cities escape any better than bloody, filthy persons? "Judge, I pray thee," Isa. v. 3.

This judgment being given by the righteous men, the righteous God will award execution. See here, 1. What the execution will be, ver. 46, 47. The same as before, ver. 23, &c., and ver. 28, &c. God will bring a company of enemies upon them who shall be made to serve his holy purposes even then, when they are serving their own sinful appetites and passions. These enemies shall easily prevail, for God will give them into their hands to be removed and spoiled. This company shall stone them with stones as malefactors, shall single them out, and dispatch them with their swords; and, as was sometimes done in severe executions,—witness that of Achan,—they shall "slay their children, and burn their houses." 2. What will be the effects of it. 1st. Thus they shall suffer for their sins. Their "lewdness shall be recompensed upon them," ver. 49, and they shall "bear the sins of their idols," as before, ver. 35. Thus God will assert the honour of his broken law and injured government, and let the world know what a just and jealous God he is. 2nd. Thus they shall be broken off from their sins. "I will cause lewdness to cease out of the land," ver. 48, as before, ver. 27. The destruction of God's city, like the death of God's saints, shall do that for them which ordinances and providences before could not do, it shall quite take away their sin; so that Jerusalem shall rise out of its ashes a new lump, as gold comes out of the furnace purified from its dross. 3rd. Thus other cities and nations will have fair warning given them to keep themselves from idols; that "all women may be taught not to do after your lewdness." This is the end of the punishment of malefactors, that they may be made examples to others, who will see and fear. "Smite the scorner, and the simple will beware." The judgments of God upon some are designed to teach others; and happy they who receive instruction from them not to tread in the steps of sinners, lest they be taken in their snares. And those who would be taught this must know God is the Lord, ver. 49; that he is the governor of the world, a God that judgeth in the earth, and with whom there is no respect of persons.

CHAPTER XXIV.

Here are two sermons in this chapter preached on a particular occasion, and they are both from mount Sinai, the mount of terror; both from mount Ebal, the mount of curses; both speak the approaching fate of Jerusalem. The occasion of them was the king of Babylon's laying siege to Jerusalem; and the design of them is to shew that, in the issue of that siege, he should be not only master of the place, but destroyer of it. I. By the sign of flesh boiling in a pot over the fire is shewed the miseries that Jerusalem should suffer during the siege, and justly, for her filthiness, ver. 1—14. II. By the sign of Ezekiel's not mourning for the death of his wife is shewed that the calamities coming upon Jerusalem were too great to be lamented; so great that they should sink down under them into a silent despair, ver. 15—27.



AGAIN in the ninth year, in the tenth month, in the tenth day of the month, the word of the LORD came unto me, saying, 2 Son of man, write thee the name of the day, even of this same day: the king of Babylon set himself against Jerusalem this same day. 3 And utter a parable unto the rebellious house, and say unto them,

Thus saith the Lord GOD; Set on a pot,
Set it on, and also pour water into it:
4 Gather the pieces thereof into it,
Even every good piece, the thigh, and the shoulder;
Fill it with the choice bones.
5 Take the choice of the flock, and burn also the bones [under it,
And make it boil well, and let them seethe the bones of [it therein.
6 Wherefore thus saith the Lord GOD;
Woe to the bloody city,
To the pot whose scum is therein, and whose scum is not gone out of it!
Bring it out piece by piece; let no lot fall upon it.
7 For her blood is in the midst of her;
She set it upon the top of a rock;
She poured it not upon the ground, to cover it with dust;
8 That it might cause fury to come up to take vengeance;
I have set her blood upon the top of a rock,
That it should not be covered.
9 Therefore thus saith the Lord GOD; [great.
Woe to the bloody city! I will even make the pile for fire
10 Heap on wood, kindle the fire,
Consume the flesh, and spice it well, and let the bones
11 Then set it empty upon the coals thereof, [be burned.
That the brass of it may be hot, and may burn,
And that the filthiness of it may be molten in it,
That the scum of it may be consumed.

SACRIFICIAL SEETHING POTS.

12 She hath wearied herself with lies,
And her great scum went not forth out of her:
Her scum shall be in the fire.
13 In thy filthiness is lewdness:
Because I have purged thee, and thou wast not purged,
Thou shalt not be purged from thy filthiness any more,
Till I have caused my fury to rest upon thee.
14 I the LORD have spoken it:
It shall come to pass, and I will do it; [pent;
I will not go back, neither will I spare, neither will I re-
According to thy ways, and according to thy doings, shall they judge thee,
Saith the Lord GOD.

SINAI, THE MOUNT OF TERROR.

xxiii. 42. The Sabeans are represented as having bracelets on their hands and diadems on their heads. Some regard them as an Arabian tribe, but others maintain that they dwelt in Africa, on the south of Egypt. It has been doubted whether the nation of Sabeans is meant at all here, but we are quite of opinion that the common view is correct, as represented in our translation.

xxiv. 1—14. "These fourteen verses," says Dr. Fairbairn, "contain the first part of the message given to Ezekiel on this occasion. The occasion was a melancholy one, being marked by the actual investiture of Jerusalem by the armies of Nebuchadnezzar. It was the ninth year of Jehoiachin's captivity, and the tenth day of the tenth month. This is noted in other passages (2 Kings xxv. 1; Jer. xxxix. 1) as the day and time on which the siege properly commenced. And that this fact should have been communicated to Ezekiel among the Babylonian exiles, and announced by him immediately after, must have been to afford another proof of his

We have here,

First. The notice God gives to Ezekiel in Babylon of Nebuchadnezzar's laying siege to Jerusalem, just at the time when he was doing it; ver. 2, Son of man take notice, "the king of Babylon," that is now abroad with his army, thou knowest where, "sets himself against Jerusalem this same day." It was many miles, it was many days' journey, from Jerusalem to Babylon; perhaps the last intelligence they had from the army was, that the design was upon Rabbah of the children of Ammon, and that the campaign was to be opened with the siege of that city. But God knew, and could tell the prophet, This day, at this time, Jerusalem is invested, and the Chaldean army is set down before it. Note, As all times, so all places, even the most remote, are present with God, and under his view. He tells it the prophet, that the prophet might tell it the people, that so when it proved to be punctually true, as they would find by the public intelligence in a little time, it might be a confirmation of the prophet's mission, and they might infer that, since he was right in his news, he was so in his predictions, for he owed both to the same correspondence he had with heaven.

Secondly. The notice which he orders him to take of it. He must enter it in his book, Memorandum, that in the ninth year of Jehoiakim's captivity, (for thence Ezekiel dated ch. i. 2, which was also the ninth year of Zedekiah's reign, for he began to reign when Jehoiakim was carried off,) in the tenth month, on the tenth day of the month, the king of Babylon laid siege to Jerusalem; and the date here agrees exactly with the date in the history, 2 Kin. xxv. 1. See how God revealed things to his servants the prophets, especially those things which serve to confirm their word, and so to confirm their own faith. Note, It is good to keep an exact account of the date of remarkable occurrences, which may sometimes contribute to the manifesting of God's glory so much the more in them, and the explaining and confirming of Scripture prophecies. "Known unto God are all his works."

Thirdly. The notice which he orders him to give to the people thereupon, the purport of which is, that this siege of Jerusalem now begun will infallibly end in the ruin of it. This he must say to the rebellious house, to those of them that were in Babylon, to be by them communicated to those who were yet in their own land. A rebellious house will soon be a ruinous house.

1. He must shew them this by a sign, for that stupid people needed to be taught as children are. The comparison made use of is that of a boiling pot. This agrees with Jeremiah's vision many years before, when he first began to be a prophet, and probably was designed to put them in mind of that Jer. i. 13, "I see a seething pot, with the face towards the north;" and the explanation of it, ver. 15, makes it to signify the besieging of Jerusalem by the northern nations. And, as this comparison is intended to confirm Jeremiah's vision, so also to confront the vain confidence of the princes of Jerusalem, who had said, ch. xi. 3, "This city is the caldron, and we are the flesh," meaning, We are as safe here as if we were surrounded with walls of brass. Well, saith God, it shall be so, you shall be boiled in Jerusalem as the flesh in the caldron, boiled to pieces; let the pot be set on with water in it, ver. 4; let it be filled with the flesh of the choice of the flock, ver. 5, with the choice pieces, ver. 6, and the marrow bones; and let the other bones serve for fuel, that one way or other, either in the pot or under it, the whole beast may be made use of. A fire of bones, though it be a slow fire, for the siege was to be long, yet it is a sure and lasting fire; such was God's wrath against them, and not like the crackling of thorns under a pot, which has noise and blaze, but no intense heat. They that from all parts of the country fled into Jerusalem for safety would be sadly disappointed, when the siege laid to it would soon make the place too hot for them; and yet there was no getting out of it, but they must be forced to abide by it, as the flesh in a boiling pot.

2. He must give them a comment upon this sign. It is to be construed as a "woe to the bloody city," ver. 6, and again, ver. 9; being bloody, let it go to pot to be boiled, it is the fittest place for it. Let us here see,

1st. What is the course God takes with it. Jerusalem during the siege is like a pot boiling over the fire, all in a heat, all in a hurry. First. Care is taken to keep a good fire under the pot, which signifies the closeness of the siege, and the many vigorous attacks made upon the city by the besiegers, and especially the continued wrath of God burning against them; ver. 9, "I will make the pile for fire great." Commission is given to the Chaldeans, ver. 10, to "heap on wood, and kindle the fire," make Jerusalem more and more hot to the inhabitants. Note, The fire which God kindles for the consuming of impenitent sinners shall never abate, much less go out for want of fuel. "Tophet has fire and much wood," Isa. xxx. 33. Secondly. The meat as it is boiled is taken out, and given to the Chaldeans for them to feast upon. "Consume the flesh," that is, let it be thoroughly boiled, boiled to rags; spice it well, and make it savoury, for those that will feed sweetly upon it. "Let the bones be burnt," either the bones under the pot, let them be consumed with the other fuel, or, as some think, the bones in the pot; let it boil so furiously as that not only the flesh may be sodden, but even the bones softened. Let all the inhabitants of Jerusalem be, by sickness, sword, and famine, reduced to the extremity of misery; and then, ver. 6, "Bring it out piece by piece," let every man be delivered into the enemy's hand, to be either put to the sword or made a prisoner; let them be an easy prey to them, and let the Chaldeans fall upon them as eagerly as a hungry man doth upon a good dish of meat when it is set before him. "Let no lot fall upon it;" every piece in the pot shall be fetched out and devoured first or last, and therefore it is no matter for casting lots which shall be fetched out first. It was a very severe military execution, when David measured Moab with "two lines to put to death, and one full line to keep alive," 2 Sam. viii. 2; but here is no line, no lot of mercy made use of, all goes one way, and that is to destruction. Thirdly. When all the broth is boiled away, the pot is set empty upon the coals that it may burn too, which signifies the setting the city on fire, ver. 11. The scum of the meat, or, as some translate it, the rust of the metal, is so got into the pot, that there is no making it clean by washing or scouring it, and therefore it must be done by fire; so let the filthiness be burnt out of it, or rather, molten in it, and burnt with it. Let the vipers and their nest be consumed together.

2nd. What is the quarrel God has with it. He would not take these severe methods with Jerusalem but that he is provoked to it; she deserves to be thus dealt with, for,

First. It is a bloody city; ver. 7, 8, "Her blood is in the midst of her." Many a barbarous murder has been committed in the very heart of the city, nay, they have a disposition to cruelty in their hearts; they inwardly delight in bloodshed, and so it is in the midst of them. Nay, they commit their murders in the face of the sun, and openly and impudently avow them, in defiance of the justice both of God and man. She did not pour out the blood she shed upon the ground to cover it with dust, as being ashamed of the sin or afraid of the punishment. She did not look upon it as a filthy thing, fit to be concealed, Deu. xxiii. 13, much less dangerous; nay, she poured out the innocent blood she shed upon a rock where it would not sink in, upon the top of a rock, in despite of Divine views and vengeance. They shed innocent blood under colour of justice, so that they gloried in it, as if they had done God and the country good service; so put it, as it were, on the top of a rock. Or it may refer to the sacrificing of their children on their high places, perhaps on the top of rocks. Now thus they "caused fury to come up and take vengeance," ver. 8. It could not be avoided but that God must in anger visit for these things; his soul must be avenged on such a nation as this. If such impudent murders as these, that even dare Divine vengeance, go unpunished, it will be said that God has forsaken the earth. It is absolutely necessary that such a bloody city as this should have blood given her to drink, for she is worthy, for the vindicating of the honour of Divine justice. And, the crime having been public and notorious, it is fit their punishment should be so too; "I have set their blood on the top of a rock." Jerusalem was to be made an example, and therefore was made a spectacle to the world; God dealt with her according to the law of retaliation. Those that sin before all, it is fit they should be rebuked before all; and that their reputation should not be consulted by the concealment of their punishment, who were so impudent as not to desire the concealment of their sin.

Secondly. It is a filthy city. Great notice is taken of this reddition of the comparison of the scum of this pot, which signifies the sin of Jerusalem working up and appearing when the judgments of God were upon her. It is "the pot whose scum is therein, and is not gone out of it," ver. 6; "the great scum that went not forth out of her," ver. 12; that stuck to the pot when all was boiled away, and was molten in it, ver. 11; some of this runs over into the fire, ver. 12, inflames that, and makes it burn the more furiously, but "it shall all be consumed at last," ver. 11. When the hand of God was gone out against them, instead of humbling themselves under it, repenting and reforming, and accepting the punishment of their iniquity, they grew more impudent and outrageous in sin, quarrelled with God, persecuted his prophets, were fierce to one another, enraged to the last degree against the Chaldeans, snarled at the stone, gnawed their chain, and were like a wild bull in a net. This was their scum; in their distress they trespassed yet more against the Lord, like that king Ahaz, 2 Chr. xxviii. 22. There is little hope of those who are made worse by that which should make them better, whose corruptions are excited and exasperated by those rebukes, both of the word and of the providence of God, which were designed for the suppressing and subduing of them; nor of those whose scum boiled up once in convictions and confessions of sin, as if it would be taken off by reformation, but afterwards returned again in a revolt from their good overtures, and the heart that seemed softened is hardened again.

This was Jerusalem's case; "She was wearied with lies," wearied her God with purposes and promises of amendment which she never stood to, wearied herself with her carnal confidences, which have all deceived her, ver. 12. Note, Those that follow after lying vanities weary themselves with the pursuit. Now see her doom, ver. 13, 14: because she is incurably wicked, she is abandoned to ruin without remedy. 1. Methods and means of reformation had been tried in vain; ver. 13, "In thy filthiness is lewdness," that is, thou art become obstinate and impudent in it; thou hast got a habit of it, which is confirmed by frequent acts. "In thy filthiness" there is a rooted lewdness, as appears by this, "I have purged thee, and thou wast not purged;" I have given thee purging physic, but it has not worked; I have used the means of cleansing thee, but they have been ineffectual, the intention of them has not been answered. Note, It is sad to think how many there are on whom ordinances and providences are all lost. 2. It is therefore resolved that no more such methods shall be used; "Thou shalt not be purged from thy filthiness any more." The fire shall no longer be a refining fire, but a consuming fire, and therefore shall not be mitigated and shortened as it has been, but it shall be continued in extremity, till it has done its destroying work. Note, Those that will not be healed are justly given up, and their case adjudged desperate. There is a day coming when it will be said, "He that is filthy, let him be filthy still." 3. Nothing remains then but to bring them to utter ruin; "I will cause my fury to rest upon thee." This is the same with what is said of the latter Jews, that "wrath is come upon them to the uttermost," 1 Thes. ii. 16. They deserve it: "According to thy doings they shall judge thee," ver. 14; and God will do it. The sentence is bound on with repeated ratifications, that they might be awakened to see how certain their ruin was; "I the Lord have spoken it," who am able to make good what I have spoken; it shall come to pass, nothing shall prevent it, for I will do it myself, I will not go back upon any entreaties; the decree is gone forth, and I will not spare in compassion to them, neither will I repent. He will neither change his mind nor change his way. Hereby the prophet was forbidden to intercede for them, and they were forbidden to flatter themselves with hopes of an escape. God hath said it, and he will do it. Note, The declarations of God's wrath against sinners are as inviolable as the assurances he hath given of favour to his people; and the case of such is sad indeed who have brought it to this issue, that either God must be false or they must be damned.

15 Also the word of the LORD came unto me, saying,
16 Son of man, behold, I take away from thee
The desire of thine eyes with a stroke:
Yet neither shalt thou mourn nor weep,
Neither shall thy tears run down.
17 Forbear to cry, make no mourning for the dead,
Bind the tire of thine head upon thee, and put on thy shoes upon thy feet,
And cover not thy lips, and eat not the bread of men.
18 So I spake unto the people in the morning: and at even my wife died; and I did in the morning as I was commanded. 19 And the people said unto me, Wilt thou not tell us what these things are to us, that thou doest so? 20 Then I answered them, The word of the LORD came unto me, saying,
21 Speak unto the house of Israel,
Thus saith the Lord GOD;
Behold, I will profane my sanctuary, the excellency of your strength,
The desire of your eyes,
And that which your soul pitieth;

true prophetical character." The symbolical action is similar in part of its imagery to the vision of Jeremiah (Jer. i. 13). Compare Ezek. xi. 3.

xxiv. 10. The translation, "consume the flesh, and spice it well," scarcely conveys the force of the original. The words for "consume the flesh" mean that the meat is to be boiled down and thoroughly cooked, and the next words, rendered "spice it well," appear to denote a still further cooking. Mr. Henry very well explains the former of "boiled to rags," and Dr. Fairbairn conveys the idea of the latter by "reduce it to a pulp."

xxiv. 12. For "she hath wearied herself with lies" we may translate "it hath exhausted labours," the sense probably being that the caldron (Jerusalem) had defied all efforts to cleanse it. The scum, or rather the green rust, still remained to poison what was put in, and nothing but fire would take it away.

xxiv. 14. "I will not go back:" these words are variously ren-

And your sons and your daughters whom ye have left shall fall by the sword.
22 And ye shall do as I have done:
Ye shall not cover your lips, nor eat the bread of men 23 And your tires shall be upon your heads, and your shoes upon your feet:
Ye shall not mourn nor weep;
But ye shall pine away for your iniquities,
And mourn one toward another.
24 Thus Ezekiel is unto you a sign:
According to all that he hath done shall ye do:
And when this cometh, ye shall know that I am the Lord
25 Also, thou son of man, shall it not be [GOD.
In the day when I take from them their strength,
The joy of their glory, the desire of their eyes,
And that whereupon they set their minds,
Their sons and their daughters,
26 That he that escapeth in that day shall come unto thee,
To cause thee to hear it with thine ears? [escaped, 27 In that day shall thy mouth be opened to him which is
And thou shalt speak, and be no more dumb:
And thou shalt be a sign unto them;
And they shall know that I am the LORD.

These verses conclude what we have been upon all along from the beginning of this book, to wit, Ezekiel's prophecies of the destruction of Jerusalem; for after this, though he prophesied much concerning other nations, yet he said no more concerning Jerusalem, till he heard of the destruction of it, almost three years after, ch. xxxiii. 21. He had assured them in the former part of this chapter that there was no hope at all of the preventing of the trouble; here he assures them that they should not have the ease of weeping for it. Observe here,

First. The sign by which this was represented to them, and it was a sign that cost the prophet very dear; the more shame for them that, when he by a Divine appointment was at such an expense to affect them with what he had to deliver, yet they were not affected by it.

1. He must lose a good wife, that should suddenly be taken from him by death. God gave him notice of it before, that it might be the less surprise to him; ver. 16, "Behold, I take away from thee the desire of thine eyes with a stroke." Note, 1st. A married state may very well agree with the prophetical office; it is honourable in all, and therefore not sinful in ministers. 2nd. Much of the comfort of human life lies in agreeable relations; no doubt Ezekiel found a prudent, tender yoke-fellow, that shared with him in his griefs and cares, to be a happy companion in his captivity. 3rd. Those in the conjugal relation must be to each other not only a covering of the eyes, (Gen. xx. 16,) to restrain wandering looks after others, but a desire of the eyes, to engage pleasing looks on one another. A beloved wife is the desire of the eyes, which find not any object more grateful. 4th. That is least safe which is most dear; we know not how soon the desire of our eyes may be removed from us, and may become the sorrow of our hearts; which is a good reason why those that have wives should be as though they had none, and those who rejoice in them as though they rejoiced not, 1 Cor. vii. 29, 30. Death is a stroke which the most pious, the most useful, the most amiable, are not exempted from. 5th. When the desire of our eyes is taken away with a stroke, we must see and own the hand of God in it. "I take away the desire of thine eyes." He takes our creature comforts from us when and how he pleaseth; he gave them to us, but reserved to himself a property in them, and may he not do what he will with his own? 6th. Under afflictions of this kind it is good for us to remember that we are sons of men; for so God calls the prophet here. If thou art a son of Adam, thy wife is a daughter of Eve, and therefore a dying creature. It is an affliction which the children of men are liable to, and shall the earth be forsaken for us? According to this prediction he tells us, ver. 18, "I spake unto the people in the morning;" for God sent his prophets rising up early, and sending them then, he thought, if ever, they would be disposed to hearken to him. Observe, First. Though God had given Ezekiel a certain prospect of this affliction coming upon him, yet it did not take him off from his work, but he resolved to go on in that. Secondly. We may the easier bear an affliction if it find us in the way of our duty; for nothing can hurt us, nothing come amiss to us, while we keep ourselves in the love of God.

2. He must deny himself the satisfaction of mourning for his wife, which would have been both an honour to her and an ease to the oppression of his own spirit. He must not use the natural expressions of sorrow, ver. 16; he must not give vent to his passion by weeping, or letting his tears run down; though tears are a tribute due to the dead, and when the body is sown it is fit it should thus be watered. But Ezekiel is not allowed to do this, though he thought he had as much reason to do it as any man, and would perhaps be evil thought of by the people if he did not. Much less might he use the customary formalities of manners; he must dress himself in his usual attire, must bind his turban on him, here called the tire of his head; must put on his shoes, and not go barefoot, as was usual in such cases; he must not cover his lips, nor throw a veil over his face, as mourners were wont to do, Lev. xiii. 45; must not be of a sorrowful countenance, appearing unto men to fast, Mat. vi. 18. He must not eat the bread of men, nor expect that his neighbours and friends should send him in provisions, as usually they did in such cases, presuming the mourners had no heart to provide meat for themselves; but if it were sent he must not eat of it, but go on in his business as at other times. It could not but be sore against the grain to flesh and blood not to lament the death of one he loved so dearly; but so God commands, and "I did in the morning as I was commanded." He appeared in public in his usual habit, and looked as he used to do, without any signs of mourning. 1st. Here there was something peculiar, and Ezekiel, to make himself a sign to the people, must put a force upon himself, and exercise an extraordinary piece of self-denial. Note, Our dispositions must always submit to God's directions, and his command must be obeyed even in that which is most difficult and displeasing to us. 2nd. Though mourning for the dead be a duty, yet it must always be kept under the government of religion and right reason; and we must not sorrow as those that have no hope, nor lament the loss of any creature, even the most valuable, and that which we could worst spare, as if we had lost our God, or as if all our happiness were gone with it; and of this moderation in mourning, ministers, when it is their case, ought to be examples. We must at such a time study to improve the affliction, to accommodate ourselves to it, and to get our acquaintance with the other world increased by the removal of our dear relations, and learn with holy Job to bless the name of the Lord, even when he takes, as well as when he gives.

Secondly. The explication and application of this sign. The people inquired the meaning of it; ver. 19, "Wilt thou not tell us what these things are to us, that thou doest so?" They knew Ezekiel was a loving husband, that the death of his wife was a great affliction to him, and that he would not appear so unconcerned at it but for some good reason, and for instruction to them; and perhaps were in hopes that it had a favourable signification, and gave them an intimation that God would now comfort them again according to the time he had afflicted them, and make them look pleasant again. Note, When we are inquiring concerning the things of God, our inquiry must be what those things are to us. What are we concerned in them? What conviction, what counsel, what comfort do they speak to us? Wherein do they reach our case? Ezekiel gives them an answer verbatim, as he had received it from the Lord, who had told him what he must speak to the house of Israel.

1. Let them know that, as Ezekiel's wife was taken from him by a stroke, so would God take from them all that which was dearest to them, ver. 21. If this were "done to a green tree, what shall be done to the dry?" If a faithful servant of God was thus afflicted only for his trial, shall such a generation of rebels against God go unpunished? By this awakening providence God shewed that he was in earnest in his threatenings, and inexorable. We may suppose Ezekiel prayed that, if it were the will of God, his wife might be spared to him, but God would not hear him; and should he be heard then in his intercessions for this provoking people? No, it is determined; "God will take away the desire of your eyes." Note, The removal of others' comforts should awaken us to think of parting with ours too, for "are we better than they?" We know not how soon the same cup, or a more bitter one, may be put into our hands, and should therefore weep with them that weep, as being ourselves also in the body. God will "take away that which their soul pitieth;" that is, of which they say, what pity is it that it should be cut off and destroyed. That 'for which your souls are afraid,' so some read it; you shall lose that which you most dread the loss of. And what is that? 1st. That which was their public pride, the temple; "I will profane my sanctuary," by giving that into the enemy's hand to be plundered and burnt. This was signified by the death of a wife, a dear wife, to teach us that God's sanctuary should be dearer to us, and more the desire of our eyes, than any creature comfort whatsoever. Christ's church, that is, his spouse, should be ours too. Though this people were very corrupt, and had themselves profaned the sanctuary, yet it is called the desire of their eyes. Note, Many that are destitute of the power of godliness yet are very fond of the form of it; and it is just with God to punish them for their hypocrisy by depriving them of that too. The sanctuary is here called the excellency of their strength; they had many strongholds, and places of defence, but the temple excelled them all. It was the pride of their strength; that is, they prided in it as their strength, that they were the temple of the Lord, Jer. vii. 4. Note, The church privileges that men are proud of are profaned by their sins; and it is just with God to profane them by his judgments. And with these God will take away, 2nd. That which was their family pleasure, which they looked upon with delight; "Your sons and your daughters" (which are the dearer to you because they are but a few left of many, the rest having perished by famine and pestilence,) "shall fall by the sword of the Chaldeans." What a dreadful spectacle would it be to see their own children, pieces, pictures of themselves, whom they had taken such care and pains to bring up, and whom they loved as their souls, sacrificed to the rage of the merciless conquerors! This, this was the punishment of sin.

2. Let them know that, as Ezekiel wept not for his affliction, so neither should they weep for theirs. He must say, "Ye shall do as I have done," ver. 22; "You shall not mourn or weep," ver. 23. Jeremiah had told them the same, that men "shall not lament for the dead, nor cut themselves," Jer. xvi. 6. Not that there shall be any such merciful circumstances without, or any such degrees of wisdom and grace within, as shall mitigate and moderate the sorrow; but they shall not mourn; for, 1st. Their grief shall be so great that they shall be quite overwhelmed with it; their passions shall stifle them, and they shall have no power to ease themselves by giving vent to it. 2nd. Their calamities shall come so fast upon them, one upon the neck of another, that by long custom they shall be hardened in their sorrows, Job vi. 10, and perfectly stupefied, and moped, as we say, with them. 3rd. They shall not dare to express their grief, for fear of being deemed disaffected to the conquerors, who would take their lamentations as an affront and disturbance to their triumphs. 4th. They shall neither have hearts, nor time, nor money, wherewith to put themselves in mourning, and accommodate themselves with the ceremonies of grief. You will be so entirely taken up with solid, substantial grief, that you will have no room for the shadow of it. 5th. Particular mourners shall not need to distinguish themselves by covering their lips, and laying aside their ornaments, and going barefoot; for it is well known every body is a mourner. 6th. There shall be none of that sense of their affliction and sorrow for it which would help to bring them to repentance, but that only which shall drive them to despair; so it follows, "Ye shall pine away for your iniquities," with seared consciences, and reprobate minds. And you shall mourn, not to God in prayer and confession of sin, but one towards another, murmuring and fretting, and complaining of God; thus making their burthen heavier, and their wound more grievous, as impatient people use to do under their afflictions, by mingling their own passions with them.

3. An appeal to the event for the confirmation of all this; ver. 24, "When this cometh," as it is foretold, when Jerusalem, which is this day besieged, is quite destroyed and laid waste, which now you cannot believe will ever be, "then ye shall know that I am the Lord God," who have given you this fair warning of it; then you will remember that Ezekiel was to you a sign. Note, Those who regard not the threatenings of the word when they are preached will be made to remember them when they are executed. Observe,

1st. The great desolation which the siege of Jerusalem should end in; ver. 25, "In that day," that terrible day when the city shall be broken up, "I will take from them," First. That which they depended on; their strength, their walls, their treasures, their fortifications, their men of war,—none shall stand them in stead. Secondly. That which they boasted of; the joy of their glory, that which they looked upon as most their glory, and which they most rejoiced in, the temple of their God, and the palaces of their princes. Thirdly. That which they delighted in; which was the desire of their eyes, and on which they set their minds. Note, Carnal people set their minds upon that on which they can set their eyes; they look at, and dote upon, the things that are seen; and it is their folly to set their minds upon that which they have no assurance of, and which may be taken from them in a moment, Pr. xxiii. 5. Their sons and their daughters were all this, their strength, and joy, and glory, and these shall go into captivity.

dered, "I will not annul," "I will not relax," &c. The sense may be, "I will not release," or let them go.

xxiv. 17. Ezekiel was to show no outward sign of lamentation. He was not to uncover his head and feet, nor to cover his face, nor to eat food such as was usually eaten on such occasions. The last reference may be to the funeral meal, which is thought to be also alluded to in Jer. xvi. 5 (margin, "mourning feast"). It is to be noticed that Ezekiel was a priest, and as such he was not allowed at all to participate in mourning ceremonies, except for his household and near relations, but in this instance even that was prohibited. His "tire" was the priestly mitre or turban.

xxv. 1—7. The proper territory of the Ammonites lay to the east of the Jordan, and north of Moab. The Ammonites rejoiced when the Jews were subjugated, because a formidable rival was brought low. But their turn was to come; the men of the east would occupy the land and feed on it. They would degrade the royal city of

2nd. The notice that should be brought to the prophet, not by revelation, as the notice of the siege was brought him, ver. 2, but in an ordinary way; ver. 26, "He that escapes in that day shall," by a special direction of providence, "come to thee" to bring thee intelligence of it; which we find now done, ch. xxxix. 21. The ill news came slowly, and yet to Ezekiel and his fellow-captives it came too soon.

3rd. The Divine impression which he should be under upon the receiving of that notice, ver. 27. Whereas from this time to that Ezekiel was thus far dumb, that he prophesied no more against the land of Israel, but against the neighbouring nations, as we shall find in the following chapters, then he shall have orders given him to speak again to the children of his people, ch. xxxiii. 23, 24; then his mouth shall be opened. He was suspended from prophesying against them in the meantime, because, Jerusalem being besieged, his prophecies could not be sent into the city; because, when God was speaking so loud by the rod, there was the less need of speaking by the word; and because then the accomplishments of his prophecies would be the full confirmation of his mission, and would the more effectually clear the way for him to begin again. It being referred to that issue, that issue must be waited for. Thus Christ forbade his disciples to preach openly that he was Christ till after his resurrection, because that was to be the full proof of it. But then thou shalt speak with the greater assurance, and the more effectually, either to their conviction or to their confusion. Note, God's prophets are never silenced but for wise and holy ends. And when God gives them the opening of the mouth again, (as he will in due time, for even the witnesses that are slain shall arise,) it shall appear to have been for his glory that they were for awhile silent, that the people may the more certainly and fully know that God is the Lord.

CHAPTER XXV.

Judgment began at the house of God, and therefore with them the prophets began, who were the judges; but it must not end there, and therefore they must not. Ezekiel had finished his testimony which related to the destruction of Jerusalem. As to that, he was ordered to say no more, but stand upon his watch-tower and wait the issue; and yet he must not be silent. There are divers nations bordering upon the land of Israel which he must prophesy against, as Isaiah and Jeremiah had done before; and must proclaim God's controversy with them, chiefly for the injuries and indignities which they had done to the people of God in the day of their calamity. In this chapter we have his prophecy, I. Against the Ammonites, ver. 1—7. II. Against the Moabites, ver. 8—11. III. Against the Edomites, ver. 12—14. IV. Against the Philistines, ver. 15—17. That which is laid to the charge of each of them is their barbarous and insolent carriage towards God's Israel, for which God threatens to put the same cup of trembling into their hand. God's resenting it thus would be an encouragement to Israel to believe that, though he had dealt thus severely with them, yet he had not cast them off, but would still own them, and plead their cause.

THE word of the LORD came again unto me, saying, 2 Son of man, set thy face against the Ammonites, and prophesy against them; 3 And say unto the Ammonites, Hear the word of the Lord GOD;

Thus saith the Lord GOD;
Because thou saidst, Aha,
Against my sanctuary, when it was profaned;
And against the land of Israel, when it was desolate;
And against the house of Judah, when they went into captivity;
4 Behold, therefore I will deliver thee to the men of the east for a possession,
And they shall set their palaces in thee, and make their dwellings in thee:
They shall eat thy fruit, and they shall drink thy milk
5 And I will make Rabbah a stable for camels,
And the Ammonites a couchingplace for flocks:
And ye shall know that I am the LORD.
6 For thus saith the Lord GOD; [the feet,
Because thou hast clapped thine hands, and stamped with
And rejoiced in heart with all thy despite against the land of Israel;
7 Behold, therefore I will stretch out mine hand upon thee,
And will deliver thee for a spoil to the heathen;
And I will cut thee off from the people,
And I will cause thee to perish out of the countries:
I will destroy thee; and thou shalt know that I am the LORD.

Here, First. The prophet is ordered to address himself to the Ammonites in the name of the Lord Jehovah, the God of Israel, who is also the God of the whole earth. But what can Chemosh, the god of the children of Ammon, say in answer to it? He is bidden to set his face against the Ammonites, for he is God's representative as a prophet, and thus he must signify that God set his face against them; for "the face of the Lord is against them that do evil," Ps. xxxiv. 16. He must speak with boldness and assurance, as one that knew whose errand he went upon, and that he should be borne out in delivering it. He must therefore set his face as a flint, Isa. l. 7. He must shew his displeasure against these proud enemies of Israel, and face them down, though they were very impudent; and thus must shew that, though he had prophesied so much and so long against Israel, yet still he was for Israel; and while he witnessed against their corruptions yet adhered to, and gloried in, God's covenant with them. Note, Those are miserable that have the preaching and praying of God's prophets against them,—against whom their faces are set.

Secondly. He is directed what to say to them. Ezekiel is now a captive in Babylon, and has been so many years, and knows little of the state of his own nation, much less of the nations that were about it; but God tells him both what they were doing and what he was about to do with them. And thus by the spirit of prophecy he is enabled to speak as pertinently to their case as if he had been among them.

1. He must upbraid the Ammonites with their insolent and barbarous triumphs over the people of Israel in their calamities, ver. 3. The Ammonites said, when all went against the Jews, "Aha, so would we have it." They were glad to see, 1st. The temple burned, the sanctuary profaned by the victorious Chaldeans. This is put first to intimate what was the cause of the controversy; they had an enmity to the Jews for the sake of their religion, though it was only some poor remains of the profession of it that were to be found among them. 2nd. The nation ruined. They rejoiced when "the land of Israel was made desolate," the cities burnt, and the country wasted, and both depopulated, and when the house of Judah went into captivity. When they had not power to oppress God's Israel themselves, they were pleased to see the Chaldeans oppress them; partly because they envied their wealth and the good land they enjoyed, partly because they feared their growing power, and partly because they hated their religion, and the Divine oracles they were favoured with. It is repeated again; ver. 6, "They clapped with their hands," to irritate the rage of the Chaldeans, and to set them on as dogs upon the game; or, they clapped their hands in triumph, attended this tragedy with their plaudits, thinking it well acted; never was there any thing more diverting or entertaining to them. They stamped with their feet, ready to leap and dance for joy upon this occasion. They not only rejoiced in heart, but they could not forbear shewing it, though every one that had any sense of honour and humanity would cry shame upon them for it; especially considering that they rejoiced thus, not for any thing they got by Israel's fall; if so, they had been the more excusable. Most people are for themselves. But this was purely from a principle of malice and enmity; "Thou hast rejoiced in heart with all thy despite," which signifies both scorn and hatred, "against the land of Israel." Note, The people of God have always had a great deal of ill-will borne them by this wicked world; and their calamities have been their neighbours' entertainments. See to what unnatural instances of malice the enmity that is in the seed of the serpent against the seed of the woman will carry them. The Ammonites, of all people, should not have rejoiced at Jerusalem's ruin, but should rather have trembled, because they themselves had such a narrow escape at the same time; it was but cross or pile which should be besieged first, Rabbah or Jerusalem, ch. xxi. 20; and they had reason to think that the king of Babylon would set upon them next. But thus were their hearts hardened to their ruin, and their insolence against Jerusalem was to them an evident token of perdition, Phil. i. 28. It is a very wicked thing to be glad at the calamities of any, especially of God's people, and a sin that God will surely reckon for; such delight has God in shewing mercy, and so backward is he to punish, that nothing is more pleasing to him than to be stopped in the way of his judgments by intercessions, nor any thing more provoking than to help forward the affliction when he is but a little displeased, Zec. i. 25.

2. He must threaten the Ammonites with utter ruin for this insolence which they were guilty of. God turns away his wrath from Israel against them, as is said, Pr. xxiv. 17, 18. God is jealous for his people's honour, because his own is so nearly interested in it; and therefore they that touch that shall be made to know they touch the apple of his eye. He had before predicted the destruction of the Ammonites, ch. xxi. 28. Had they repented, that had been revoked, but now it is ratified. 1st. A destroying enemy is brought against them. "I will deliver thee to the men of the East; that is, first to the Chaldeans, who came from the north-east, and whose army, under the command of Nebuchadnezzar, destroyed the country of the Ammonites, about five years after the destruction of Jerusalem, (as Josephus relates, Antiq. lib. 10, cap. 11;) and then to the Arabians, who were properly the children of the East, who, when the Chaldeans had made the country desolate, and quitted it, came and took possession of it for themselves, probably with the consent of the conquerors. Shepherds' tents were their palaces; these they set up in the country of the Ammonites, where they made their dwellings, ver. 4. They enjoyed the products of the country; "They shall eat thy fruit and drink thy milk," and the milk from the cattle is the fruit of the ground at second-hand. They made use even of the royal city for their cattle; ver. 5, "I will make Rabbah," that was a nice and splendid city, to be "a stable for camels;" for its new masters, whose wealth lies all in cattle, will not think they can put the palaces of Rabbah to a better use. Rabbah had been a habitation of brutish men; justly, therefore, is it now made a stable for camels, and the country "a couchingplace for flocks," more innocent beasts than those with which it had been before replenished. 2nd. God himself acts as an enemy to them; ver. 7, "I will stretch out mine hand upon thee," a hand that will reach far, and strike home; which there is no resisting the blow of, for it is a mighty hand, nor bearing the weight of, for it is a heavy hand. God's hand stretched out against the Ammonites will not only deliver them "for a spoil to the heathen," so that all their neighbours shall prey upon them, but will "cut them off from the people, and make them perish out of the countries," so that there shall be no remains of them in that place: compare with this Jer. xlix. 1, &c. What can sound more terrible than that resolution, ver. 7, "I will destroy thee?" for the almighty God is able both "to save and to destroy," and it is a fearful thing to fall into his hands. Both the threatenings here, ver. 5 and ver. 7, conclude with this, "Ye shall know that I am the Lord;" for, First. Thus God will maintain his own honour, and will make it to appear that he is the God of Israel, though he suffers them for a time to be captives in Babylon. Secondly. Thus he will bring those that were strangers to him into an acquaintance with him, and it will be a blessed effect of their calamities. Better know God and be poor, than be rich and ignorant of him.

8 Thus saith the Lord GOD;
Because that Moab and Seir do say,
Behold, the house of Judah is like unto all the heathen;
9 Therefore, behold, I will open the side of Moab from the cities,
From his cities which are on his frontiers, the glory of the country,
Beth-jeshimoth, Baal-meon, and Kiriathaim,
10 Unto the men of the east with the Ammonites,
And will give them in possession, [nations.
That the Ammonites may not be remembered among the Rabbah, and in the end the Ammonites were to disappear as a nation. All this has come to pass, and for generations Ammon has been the abode of strangers and ruled by foreigners. Rabbah is a ruin, like the other cities and towns of the province, and the land is lying for the most part uncultivated. The prophecy has been fulfilled almost to the letter. It is well known that the ground is a couching-place for flocks; and Burckhardt, the traveller, reported that on a visit to Rabbah he found that a party of Arabs had stabled their camels among its ruins. These ruins may include some of more ancient date, but are chiefly Roman.

xxv. 8—11. Moab lay to the south of Ammon, and Seir, or Edom, to the south of Moab. The subjection of Moab was to follow that of Ammon, and to be by the same enemies. In the end the Moabites were to cease to be a nation. This also has been accomplished, and the country is occupied chiefly by lawless Arabs, who render travelling there most perilous. Three cities are named in the pre-

.1 And I will execute judgments upon Moab;
And they shall know that I am the LORD.
12 Thus saith the Lord GOD;
Because that Edom hath dealt against the house of Judah by taking vengeance,
And hath greatly offended, and revenged himself upon them;
15 Therefore thus saith the Lord GOD;
I will also stretch out mine hand upon Edom,
And will cut off man and beast from it;
And I will make it desolate from Teman;
And they of Dedan shall fall by the sword.
14 And I will lay my vengeance upon Edom by the hand of my people Israel:
And they shall do in Edom according to mine anger and according to my fury;
And they shall know my vengeance, saith the Lord GOD.
15 Thus saith the Lord GOD;
Because the Philistines have dealt by revenge,
And have taken vengeance with a despiteful heart,
To destroy it for the old hatred;
16 Therefore thus saith the Lord GOD;
Behold, I will stretch out mine hand upon the Philistines,
And I will cut off the Cherethims,
And destroy the remnant of the sea coast.
17 And I will execute great vengeance upon them with furious rebukes;
And they shall know that I am the LORD,
When I shall lay my vengeance upon them.

Three more of Israel's ill-natured neighbours are here arraigned, convicted, and condemned to destruction, for contributing to, and triumphing in, Jerusalem's fall.

First. The Moabites. Seir, which was the seat of the Edomites, is joined with them, ver. 5, because they said the same as the Moabites, but they were afterwards reckoned with by themselves, ver. 12. Now observe,

1. What was the sin of the Moabites. They said, "Behold, the house of Judah is like unto all the heathen." They triumphed, 1st. In the apostacies of Israel; were pleased to see them forsake their God, and worship idols, and hoped in awhile their religion would be quite lost and forgotten, and the house of Judah would be like all the heathen, perfect idolaters. When those that profess religion walk unworthy of their profession, they encourage the enemies of religion to hope that it will in time sink and be run down and quite abandoned; but let the Moabites know that, though there are those of the house of Judah who have made themselves like the heathen, yet there is a remnant that retain their integrity: the religion of the house of Judah shall recover itself, its peculiarities shall be preserved, it shall not lose itself among the heathen, but distinguish itself from them, till it deliver itself honourably into a better institution. 2nd. They triumphed in the calamities of Israel. They said, "The house of Judah is like all the heathen," in as ill a state as they; their God is no more able to deliver them from this overflowing scourge of these parts of the world than the gods of the heathen are to deliver them. Where are the promises they gloried in, and all the wonders which they and their fathers told us of? What the better are they for the covenant of peculiarity, upon which they so much valued themselves? They that looked with so much scorn upon all the heathen are now set upon a level with them, or rather sunk below them. Note, Those who judge only by outward appearance are ready to conclude that the people of God have lost all their privileges when they have lost their worldly prosperity; which doth not follow, for good men, even in affliction, in captivity among the heathen, yet have graces and comforts within sufficient to distinguish them from all the heathen. Though the event seem one to the righteous and wicked, yet, indeed, it is vastly different.

2. What should be the punishment of Moab for this sin. Because they triumphed in the overthrow of Judah, their country shall be in like manner overthrown with that of the Ammonites, who were guilty of the same sin; ver. 9, 10, "I will open the side of Moab," will uncover its shoulder, will take away all its defences, that it may become an easy prey to any that will make a prey of it. 1st. See here how it shall be exposed. The frontier towns, that were its strength and guard, shall be demolished by the Chaldean forces, and laid open. Some of the cities are here named, which are said to be "the glory of the country," which they trusted in, and boasted of as impregnable; these shall decay, be deserted, or betrayed, or fall into the enemy's hands, so that Moab shall lie exposed, and whoever will may penetrate into the heart of the country. Note, Those who glory in any other defence and protection but that of the Divine power, providence, and promise, will, sooner or later, see cause to be ashamed of their glorying. 2nd. See here to whom it shall be exposed. "The men of the East," when they come to take possession of the country of the Ammonites, shall seize that of the Moabites too. God, the Lord of all lands, will give them that land; for the kingdoms of men he giveth to whomsoever he will. The Arabians, that are shepherds, and live quietly, plain men dwelling in tents, shall, by an overruling providence, be put in possession of the land of the Moabites, who are soldiers, men of war, and cunning hunters, that live turbulently. The Chaldeans shall get it by war, and the Arabians shall enjoy it in peace. Concerning the Ammonites it is said, "They shall no more be remembered among the nations," ver. 10, for they had been accessary to the murder of Gedaliah, Jer. xl. 14. But of the Moabites it is said, "I will execute judgments upon Moab." They shall feel the weight of God's displeasure, but perhaps not to that degree that the Ammonites shall; however, so far as that "they shall know that I am the Lord;" that the God of Israel is a God of power, and that his covenant with his people is not broken.

Secondly. The Edomites. The posterity of Esau, betwixt whom and Jacob there had been an old enmity. And here is,

1. The sin of the Edomites, ver. 12. They not only triumphed in the ruin of Judah and Jerusalem, as the Moabites and Ammonites had done, but they took advantage from the present distressed state to which the Jews were reduced to do them some real mischiefs; probably made inroads upon their frontiers, and plundered their country; "Edom has dealt against the house of Judah by taking vengeance." The Edomites had of old been tributary to the Jews, according to the sentence, that the elder should serve the younger. In Jehoram's time they revolted. Amaziah severely chastised them, 2 Kin. xiv. 7, and for this they took vengeance. Now they would pay off all the old scores; and not only incensed the Babylonians against Jerusalem, crying "Rase it, rase it," Ps. cxxxvii. 7, but cut off those that escaped; as we find in the prophecy of Obadiah, which is wholly directed against Edom, ver. 11, 12, &c. It is called here revenging a revenge, which intimated that they were not only eager upon it, but very cruel in it, and recompensed to the Jews more than double. Herein he was greatly offended. Note, It is a great offence to God for us to revenge ourselves upon our brother; for God has said, "Vengeance is mine." We are forbidden to revenge, or to bear a grudge. Suppose Judah had been hard upon Edom formerly, it was a base thing for the Edomites now in revenge for it to smite them secretly. But the Jews had a Divine warrant to reign over the Edomites, for that therefore they ought not to have made reprisals; and it was the more disingenuous for them to retain the old core, when God had particularly commanded his people to forget it; Deu. xxiii. 7, "Thou shalt not abhor an Edomite."

2. The judgments threatened against them for this sin. God will take them to task for it; ver. 13, "I will stretch out my hand upon Edom." Their country shall be desolate from Teman, which lay in the south part of it; and "they shall fall by the sword unto Dedan," which lay north; the desolations of war should go through the nation. 1st. They had taken vengeance, and therefore God will lay his vengeance upon them; ver. 14, "And they shall know my vengeance." They that will not leave it to God to take vengeance for them may expect that he will take vengeance on them; and they that will not believe and fear his vengeance shall be made to know and feel his vengeance; they shall be dealt with according to God's anger, and according to his fury; not according to the weakness of the instruments that are employed in it, but according to the strength of the arm that employs them. 2nd. They had taken vengeance on Israel, and God will lay his vengeance on them by the hand of his people Israel. They suffered much by the Chaldeans, which seems to be referred to, Jer. xlix. 8. But besides that there were saviours to come upon mount Sion, who should judge the mount of Esau, Oba. 21; and Israel's Redeemer comes with dyed garments from Bozrah, Isa. lxiii. 1. This implies a promise that Israel should recover itself again to that degree as to be in a capacity of curbing the insolence of its neighbours. And we find, 1 Mac. v. 3, that "Judas Maccabeus fought against the children of Esau in Idumea, gave them a great overthrow, abated their courage, and took their spoil." And Josephus saith, (Antiq. l. 13, c. 17,) that Hircanus made the Edomites tributaries to Israel. Note, The equity of God's judgments is to be observed when he not only avenges injuries upon those that did them, but by those against whom they were done.

Thirdly. The Philistines. And, 1. Their sin is much the same with that of the Edomites. They have dealt by revenge with the people of Israel, and have "taken vengeance with a despiteful heart;" not to disturb them only, but to destroy them, for "the old hatred," ver. 15, the old grudge they bore them, or, as the margin reads it, 'with perpetual hatred,' a hatred that began long since, and which they resolved to continue. Their anger was implacable; they dealt by revenge, traded in the acts of malice; it was their constant practice, and their heart, their spiteful heart, was upon it. 2. Their punishment likewise is much the same, ver. 16. They that were for destroying God's people shall themselves be cut off and destroyed; and, ver. 17, they that were for avenging themselves God will execute great vengeance upon them. This was fulfilled when that country was wasted by the Chaldean army, not long after the destruction of Jerusalem, which is foretold Jer. xlvii. It was strange that these nations, which bordered upon the land of Israel, were not alarmed by the success of the Chaldean army, and made to tremble in the apprehension of their own danger,—when their neighbour's house was on fire it was time to look to their own; but their impiety and malice made them forget their politics, till God by his judgments convinced them that the cup was going round; and they were the less safe for their being secure.

CHAPTER XXVI.

The prophet had soon done with those four nations that he set his face against in the foregoing chapters; for they were not at that time very considerable in the world, nor would their fall make any great noise among the nations, nor any figure in history. But the city of Tyre is next set to the bar, which, being a place of vast trade, was known all the world over; and therefore here are three whole chapters, this and the two that follow, spent in the prediction of the destruction of Tyre. We have the burden of Tyre, Isa. xxiii. It is but just mentioned in Jeremiah, as sharing with the natives in the common calamity, ch. xxv. 22; xxvii. 3; xlvii. 4; but Ezekiel is ordered to be large upon that head. In this chapter we have, I. The sin charged upon Tyre, which was triumphing in the destruction of Jerusalem, ver. 2. II. The destruction of Tyrus itself foretold. 1. The extremity of this destruction: it shall be utterly ruined, ver. 4—6: and again, ver. 12—14. 2. The instruments of this destruction, many nations, ver. 3: and the king of Babylon by name, with his vast victorious army, ver. 7—11. 3. The great surprise that this should give to the neighbour nations, who would all admire the fall of so great a city, and be alarmed at it, ver. 15—21.

AND it came to pass in the eleventh year, in the first day of the month, that the word of the LORD came unto me, saying,
2 Son of man, because that Tyrus hath said against Jerusalem,
Aha, she is broken that was the gates of the people:
She is turned unto me:
I shall be replenished, now she is laid waste:
3 Therefore thus saith the Lord GOD;
Behold, I am against thee, O Tyrus,
And will cause many nations to come up against thee,
As the sea causeth his waves to come up.

diction. Of these the two latter are mentioned in the celebrated inscription of Mesha, king of Moab. The site of Kiriathaim is supposed to be at Kureiyat, to the east of the Dead Sea, and to the south of Baal-Meon, which seems to have been to the south-east of Beth-Jeshimoth.

XXV. 12—14. The judgment pronounced upon Seir, or Edom, in these verses is as complete as those on Ammon and Moab, and the present condition of the country is similar, as it has been for ages. Teman and Dedan are named, but the passage is not well translated; it should be, "And I will make it desolate from Teman even unto Dedan; they shall fall by the sword." It may be otherwise pointed, "And I will make it desolate; from Teman even unto Dedan they shall fall by the sword." Teman appears to have been a province in the south of Edom. The position of Dedan is more doubtful, but the language implies that it was at a considerable distance from Teman, and yet contiguous to Edom.

4 And they shall destroy the walls of Tyrus,
And break down her towers:

ANCIENT WALLS OF TYRUS.

I will also scrape her dust from her,
And make her like the top of a rock.
5 It shall be a place for the spreading of nets in the midst of the sea:
For I have spoken it, saith the Lord GOD:
And it shall become a spoil to the nations.
6 And her daughters which are in the field shall be slain by the sword;
And they shall know that I am the LORD.
7 For thus saith the Lord GOD;
Behold, I will bring upon Tyrus
Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon,
A king of kings, from the north,
With horses, and with chariots,
And with horsemen, and companies, and much people.
8 He shall slay with the sword thy daughters in the field:
And he shall make a fort against thee,
And cast a mount against thee,
And lift up the buckler against thee.
9 And he shall set engines of war against thy walls,
And with his axes he shall break down thy towers.
10 By reason of the abundance of his horses their dust shall cover thee:
Thy walls shall shake at the noise of the horsemen,
And of the wheels, and of the chariots,
When he shall enter into thy gates,
As men enter into a city wherein is made a breach.
11 With the hoofs of his horses shall he tread down all thy streets:
He shall slay thy people by the sword,
And thy strong garrisons shall go down to the ground.
12 And they shall make a spoil of thy riches,
And make a prey of thy merchandise:
And they shall break down thy walls,
And destroy thy pleasant houses:
And they shall lay thy stones and thy timber and thy dust
In the midst of the water.
13 And I will cause the noise of thy songs to cease;
And the sound of thy harps shall be no more heard.
14 And I will make thee like the top of a rock:
Thou shalt be a place to spread nets upon;
Thou shalt be built no more:
For I the LORD have spoken it, saith the Lord GOD

This prophecy is dated in the eleventh year, which was the year that Jerusalem was taken, and "in the first day of the month;" but it is not said what month. Some think the month in which Jerusalem was taken, which was the fourth month, others the month after; or perhaps it was the first month, and so it was the first day of the year. Observe here,

First. The pleasure with which the Tyrians looked upon the ruins of Jerusalem. Ezekiel was a great way off, in Babylon, but God told him what Tyrus said against Jerusalem; ver. 2, "Aha, she is broken," broken to pieces, "that was the gates of the people," to whom there was a great resort, and where there was a general rendezvous of all nations, some upon one account, and some upon another; and I shall get by it. All the wealth, power, and interest which Jerusalem had, it is hoped, shall be turned to Tyre, and so "now she is laid waste I shall be replenished." We do not find that the Tyrians had such a hatred and enmity to Jerusalem, and the sanctuary, as the Ammonites and Edomites had, nor were so spiteful and mischievous to the Jews; they were men of business, and of large acquaintance and free conversation, and therefore were not so bigoted, and of such a persecuting spirit, as the narrow souls that lived retired and knew not the world. All their care was to get estates and enlarge their trade, and they looked upon Jerusalem not as an enemy, but as a rival. Hiram, king of Tyre, was a good friend to David and Solomon, and we do not read of any quarrels the Jews had with the Tyrians; but Tyre promiseth herself that the fall of Jerusalem will be an advantage to her, in respect of trade and commerce; that now she shall have Jerusalem's customers, and the great men from all parts, that used to come to Jerusalem for the accomplishing of themselves, and to spend their estates there, will now come to Tyre and spend them there; and whereas many, since the Chaldean army became so formidable in those parts, had retired into Jerusalem, and brought their estates thither for safety, as the Rechabites did, now they will come to Tyre, which, being in a manner surrounded by the sea, will be thought a place of greater strength than Jerusalem; and thus the prosperity of Tyre will rise out of the ruins of Jerusalem. Note, To be secretly pleased with the death or decay of others when we are likely to get by it, with their fall when we may thrive upon it, is a sin that doth most easily beset us, but is not thought to be such an ill thing, and so provoking to God, as really it is. We are apt to say, when those who stand in our light, in our way, are removed, when they break or fall into disgrace, we shall be replenished now they are laid waste. But this comes from a selfish, covetous principle, and a desire to be "placed alone in the midst of the earth," as if we grudged that any should live by us. This comes from a want of that love to our neighbour as to ourselves which the law of God so expressly requires, and from that inordinate love of the world as our happiness which the love of God so expressly forbids. And it is just with God to blast the designs and projects of those who thus contrive to raise themselves upon the ruins of others; and we see they are often disappointed.

Secondly. The displeasure of God against them for it. The providence of God had done well for Tyrus; it was a pleasant and wealthy city, and might have continued so, if she had, as she ought to have done, sympathised with Jerusalem in her calamities, and sent her an address of condolence; but when, instead of that, she shewed herself pleased with her neighbour's fall, and perhaps sent an address of congratulation to the conquerors, then God saith, "Behold, I am against thee, O Tyrus," ver. 3. And let her not expect to prosper long if God be against her.

1. God will bring formidable enemies upon her; "Many nations shall come against thee;" that is, an army made up of many nations, or one nation that shall be as strong as many. Those that have God against them may expect all the creatures against them; for what peace can they have with whom God is at war? They shall come pouring in as the waves of the sea, one upon the neck of another with an irresistible force. The person is named that shall bring this army upon them, Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon, a king of kings, that had many kings tributaries to him, and dependents on him, besides those that were his captives, Dan. ii. 37, 38. He is that head of gold. He shall come with a vast army, horses and chariots, &c., all land forces. We do not find he had any naval force, or any thing wherewith he might attack it by sea, which made the attempt the more difficult, as we find ch. xxix. 18, where it is called a "great service which he served against Tyrus." He shall besiege it in form, ver. 8, "make a fort, and cast a mount," and, ver. 9, shall "set engines of war against the walls." His troops shall be so numerous as to raise a dust that shall cover the city, ver. 10. They shall make a noise that shall even shake the walls; and they shall shout at every attack, as soldiers do when they enter a city that is broken up. The horses shall prance with so much fury and violence that they shall even tread down the streets, though never so well paved.

2. They shall do terrible execution. 1st. The enemy shall make themselves masters of all their fortifications, "shall destroy the walls, and break down the towers," ver. 4. For what walls are so strong built as to be fence against the judgment of God? Her "strong garrisons shall go down to the ground," ver. 11; and the walls shall be broken down, ver. 12. The city held out a long siege, but it was taken at last. 2nd. A great deal of blood shall be shed; "Her daughters which are in the field," the cities upon the continent, which were subject to Tyre as the mother city, the inhabitants of them "shall be slain by the sword," ver. 6. The invaders begin with them that come first in their way. And ver. 11, "He shall slay thy people with the sword," not only the soldiers that are found in arms, but the burghers; they shall be put to the sword, the king of Babylon being highly incensed against them for holding out so long. 3rd. The wealth of the city shall all become a spoil to the conqueror; ver. 12, they "shall make a prey of the merchandise." It was in hope of the plunder that the city was set upon with so much vigour. See the vanity of riches, that they are kept for the owners to their hurt; and not only cease to benefit those who took pains for them, and were duly entitled to them, but are made to serve their enemies, who are thereby put into a capacity of doing them so much the more mischief. 4th. The city itself shall be laid in ruins. All the pleasant houses shall be destroyed, ver. 12, that were pleasantly situated, beautified, and furnished; they shall become a heap of rubbish. Let none please themselves too much in their pleasant houses, for they know not how soon they may see the desolation of them. Tyre shall be utterly ruined; the enemy shall not only pull down the houses, but shall carry away "the stones and the timber," which might serve for the rebuilding of it, and shall "lay them in the midst of the water," not to be recovered or ever made use of again. Nay, ver. 4, "I will scrape her dust from her." Not only shall the loose dust be blown away, but the very ground it stands upon shall be torn up by the enraged enemy, carried off and laid "in the midst of the water," ver. 12. The foundation is in the dust; that dust shall be all taken away, then the city must fall of course. When Jerusalem was destroyed it was ploughed like a field, Mic. iii. 12. But the destruction of Tyre is carried farther than so; the very soil of it shall be scraped away, and it shall be made like the top of a rock, ver. 4; and again, ver. 14, pure rock that hath no earth to cover it. It shall only be a place for the spreading of nets, ver. 5; and again, ver. 14, it shall serve fishermen to dry their nets upon, and mend them. 5th. There shall be a full period to all its mirth and joy; ver. 13, "I will cause the noise of thy songs to cease." Tyre had been a joyous city, Isa. xxiii. 7; with her songs she had courted customers to deal with her in a way of trade, but now farewell

xxv. 15—17. The Philistines dwelt chiefly on the coast of the Mediterranean, to the south of the Phœnician territory. Who the Cherethims were has been very much discussed. It appears necessary to treat the word as the name of a people, and many, judging from its form, believe the Cretans are meant. We do not see how this can be correct here, and prefer the opinion that the Cherethims, or Cherethites, were a tribe living on the coast of the Mediterranean, south of the Philistines, and probably a branch of them. This explanation is favoured by what is stated in 1 Sam. xxx. 14, 16, where the Cherethites seem to be reckoned with the Philistines.

xxvi. 1. The expression, "the first of the month," has exercised the ingenuity of critics in vain, as the name of the month is not mentioned, and cannot be guessed.

xxvi. 2. Tyre exults over the fall of Jerusalem, which is described as a door, or rather the doors (not "gates") of nations, because all her profitable commerce and pleasant conversation; Tyre is no more a place either of business or of sport. Lastly, It shall be built no more, ver. 14; not built any more as it had been, with such state and magnificence; nor built any more in the same place within the sea, nor built for a long time; the present inhabitants shall be destroyed or dispersed, so that this Tyre shall be no more; for God hath spoken it, ver. 5, 14: and when what he hath said is accomplished "they shall know" thereby that "he is the Lord, and not a man that he should lie, nor the son of man that he should repent."

15 Thus saith the Lord GOD to Tyrus;
Shall not the isles shake at the sound of thy fall,
When the wounded cry,

The utter ruin of Tyre is here represented in very strong and lively figures, which are mighty affecting.

First. See how high, how great, Tyre had been, how little likely ever to have come to this. The remembrance of men's former grandeur and plenty is a great aggravation of their present disgrace and poverty. Tyre was a renowned city, ver. 17, famous among the nations; the crowned city, so she is called, Isa. xxiii. 8; a city that had crowns in her gift, honoured all she smiled upon, crowned herself, and all about her. She was inhabited of seas; that is, of those that trade at sea, of those who from all parts came thither by sea, bringing with them the abundance of the seas, and the treasures hid in the sand. She was strong on the sea, easy of access to her friends, but to her enemies inaccessible; fortified by a wall of water which made her impregnable. So that she with her pomp, and her inhabitants with their pride, caused their terror to be on all that haunted that city, and upon any account frequented it. It was well fortified, and formidable in the eyes of all that acquainted themselves with it. Everybody stood in awe of the Tyrians, and was afraid of disobliging them. Note, Those who know their strength are too apt to cause terror, to pride themselves in frightening those they are an overmatch for.

Secondly. See how low, how little, Tyre is made, ver. 19, 20. This renowned city is made a desolate city, is no more frequented as it has been; there is no more resort of merchants to it; it is like the cities not inhabited, which are no cities, and having none to keep them in repair will go to decay of themselves. Tyre shall be like a city overflowed by an inundation of waters which cover it, and upon which the deep is brought up. As the waves had formerly been its defence, so now they shall be its destruction. She shall "be brought down with them that descend into the pit," with the cities of the old world that were under water, and with Sodom and Gomorrah, that lie in the bottom of the Dead Sea. Or, she shall be in the condition of those that have been long buried, of the people of old time, that are old inhabitants of the silent grave, who are quite rotted away under ground, and quite forgotten above ground. Such shall Tyre be, "free among the dead, set in the lower parts of the earth," humbled, mortified, reduced. It shall be "like the places desolate of old," as well as like persons dread of old; it shall be like other cities that have formerly been in like manner deserted and destroyed. It shall not be inhabited again; none shall have the courage to attempt the rebuilding of it upon that spot, so that it shall be no more; the Tyrians shall be lost among the nations, so that people will look in vain for Tyre in Tyre: "Thou shalt be sought for, and never found again." New persons may build a new city, upon a new spot of ground hard by, which they may call Tyre, but Tyre, as it is, shall never be any more. Note, The strongest cities in the world, the best fortified and best furnished, are subject to decay, and may in a little time be brought to nothing. In the history of our own island many cities are spoken of as in being when the Romans were here, which now our antiquaries scarce know where to look for, and of which there remains no more evidence but Roman urns and coins digged up there sometimes accidentally. But in the other world we look for a city that shall stand for ever, and flourish in perfection through all the ages of eternity.

Thirdly. See what a distress the inhabitants of Tyre are in; ver. 15, "There is a great slaughter made in the midst of thee," many slain, and great men. It is probable when the city was taken the generality of the inhabitants were put to the sword; then did the wounded cry, and cried in vain, to the pitiless conquerors; they cried quarter, but it would not be given them. The wounded are slain without mercy; or, rather, that is the only mercy that is shewn them, that the second blow shall rid them of their pain.

Fourthly. See what a consternation all the neighbours are in upon the fall of Tyre. This is elegantly expressed here, to shew how astonishing it should be: 1. "The islands shall shake at the sound of thy fall," ver. 15. As, if a great merchant breaks, all that he deals with are shocked by it, and begin to look about them; perhaps they had effects in his hands which they are afraid they shall lose; or, when they see one fail and become bankrupt of a sudden, in debt a great deal more than he is worth, it makes them afraid for themselves, lest they should do so too. Thus the isles, who thought themselves safe in the embraces of the sea, when they see Tyrus fall, shall tremble, and be troubled, saying, What will become of us? And it is well if they make this good use of it, to take warning by it not to be secure, but to stand in awe of God and his judgments. The sudden fall of a great tower shakes the ground round about it. Thus all the islands in the Mediterranean Sea shall feel themselves sensibly touched by the destruction of Tyre, it being a place they had so much knowledge of, such interests in, and such a constant correspondence with. 2. The princes of the sea shall be affected with it, who ruled in those islands; or the rich merchants who live like princes, Isa. xxiii. 8, and the masters of ships who command like princes, these shall condole the fall of Tyre in a most compassionate and pathetical manner; ver. 16, "They shall come down from their thrones," as neglecting the business of their thrones, and despising the pomp of them; they shall lay away their robes of state, their broidered garments, and shall clothe themselves all over with tremblings, with sackcloth that will make them shiver. Or, they shall by their own act and deed make themselves to tremble upon this occasion. They shall sit upon the ground in shame and sorrow; they shall tremble every moment at the thought of what is happened to Tyre, and for fear of what may happen to themselves; for what island is safe if Tyre be not? "They shall take up a lamentation for thee," shall have elegies and mournful poems penned upon the fall of Tyre; ver. 17, "How art thou destroyed!" 1st. It shall be a great surprise to them, and they shall be affected with wonder, that a place so well fortified by nature and art, so famed for politics, and so full of money, which is the sinews of war, and that held out so long and with so much bravery, should be taken at last; ver. 21, "I made thee a terror." Note, Those who make themselves a terror to their neighbours by the abuse of their power, it is just with God to make them a terror to their neighbours by the suddenness and strangeness of their punishment. Tyre had caused her terror, ver. 17, and now is made a terrible example. 2nd. It shall be a great affliction to them, and they shall be affected with sorrow; ver. 17, "They shall take up a lamentation for Tyre," as thinking it a thousand pities that such a rich and splendid city should be thus laid in ruins. When Jerusalem, the holy city, was destroyed, there was no such lamentation for it, it was nothing to them that passed by, Lam. i. 12; but when Tyre the trading city fell it was universally bemoaned. Note, Those who have the world in their hearts lament the loss of great men more than the loss of good men. 3rd. It shall be a loud alarm to them. "They shall tremble in the day of thy fall," because they shall have reason to think that their own turn will be next. If Tyre fall, who can stand? "Howl, fir-trees, if such a cedar be shaken." Note, The fall of others should awaken us out of our security. Others' death and decay in the world is a check to us when we dream that our mountain stands strong, and shall not be moved.

Fifthly. See how the irreparable ruin of Tyre is aggravated by the prospect of the restoration of Israel. Thus shall Tyre sink, "when I shall set glory in the land of the living," ver. 20. Note, 1. The holy land is the land of the living, for none but holy souls are properly living souls. Where living sacrifices are offered to the living God, and where the lively oracles are, there the land of the living is; there David hoped to see the goodness of the Lord, Ps. xxvii. 13. That was a type of heaven, which is indeed the land of the living. 2. Though this land of the living may for a time lie under disgrace, yet God will again set glory in it; the glory that is departed shall return, and the restoration of what they have been deprived of shall be so much the more their glory. God will himself be the glory of the lands that are the lands of the living. 3. It will aggravate the misery of those that have their portion in the land of the dying, of those that are for ever dying, to behold the happiness of those, at the same time, that shall have their everlasting portion in the land of the living. When the rich man was himself in torment, he saw Lazarus in the bosom of Abraham, and glory set for him in the land of the living.

CHAPTER XXVII.

Still we are attending the funeral of Tyre, and the lamentations made for the fall of that renowned city. In this chapter we have, I. A large account of the dignity, wealth and splendour of Tyre, while it was in its strength, the vast trade it drove, and the interest it had among the nations, ver. 1—25, which is designed to make its ruin the more lamentable. II. A prediction of its fall and ruin, and the confusion and consternation which all its neighbours shall thereby be put into, ver. 26—36. And this is intended to stain the pride of all worldly glory; and, by setting the one over against the other, to let us see the vanity and uncertainty of the riches, honours and pleasures of the world, and what little reason we have to place our happiness in them, or to be confident of the continuance of them; so that all this is written for our learning.

THE word of the LORD came again unto me, saying, 2 Now, thou son of man, take up a lamentation for Tyrus;

3 And say unto Tyrus,
O thou that art situate at the entry of the sea,
Which art a merchant of the people for many isles,
Thus saith the Lord GOD;
O Tyrus, thou hast said, I am of perfect beauty.
4 Thy borders are in the midst of the seas,
Thy builders have perfected thy beauty.
5 They have made all thy ship boards of fir trees of Senir frequented by people from various lands. For "she is turned" we may translate "she turns herself," or "she turns" to me. The reading has been called in question, and is peculiar. It possibly involves an allusion to the "doors" which were formerly open to other nations, but are now regarded as opening (turning) to Tyre.

xxvi. 3—6. These verses contain a general summary of the prophecy against Tyre, which was originally a fortified island-rock and a city on the main-land. In course of time the two were united, but for the details reference should be made to some work on the prophecies or to a good Bible dictionary. Some useful references to books will be found in "Cassell's Bible Dictionary," in the article "Tyre."

xxvii. 1, 2. In this chapter there is a vast accumulation of details, and it would require much space to explain and illustrate them. From a purely archæological point of view, the whole prophecy against Tyre is of great interest and value. For the commercial history of the ancient world, it is inestimably precious.

Here, First. The prophet is ordered to take up a lamentation for Tyrus, ver. 2. It was yet in the height of its prosperity, and there appeared not the least symptom of its decay, yet the prophet must lament it, because its prosperity is its snare, is the cause of its pride and security, which will make its fall the more grievous. Even those that live at ease are to be lamented if they were not preparing for trouble. He must lament it, because its ruin is hastening on apace; it is sure, it is near; and though the prophet foretell it, and justify God in it, yet he must lament it. Note, We ought to mourn for the miseries of other nations as well as for our own, out of an affection for mankind in general. It is a part of the honour we owe to all men to bewail their calamities, even those which they have brought upon themselves by their own folly.

Secondly. He is directed what to say, and to say it in the name of the Lord Jehovah, a name not unknown in Tyre, and which shall be better known, ch. xxvi. 6.

1. He must upbraid Tyre with her pride. "O Tyrus, thou hast said, I am of perfect beauty," ver. 3, of universal beauty, so the word is; every way accom-

HELBON—ALEPPO.

xxvii. 7. Egypt was famous for its fine linen and embroidered fabrics. Elishah is usually taken to mean the isles of Greece and the adjacent regions. The art of dyeing was practised by the Greeks; the dyes of Laconia were famous, and Thyatira was long famous for its purple.

xxvii. 8, 9. Arvad was the Aradus of the Greeks, on the Syrian coast. Gebal was a Phœnician town, now in ruins, on the same coast.

xxvii. 10, 11. Foreigners served in the Tyrian army. Lud may be Lydia, but we prefer to think that both Lud and Phut were African tribes. It is probable that the word translated Gammadims means garrisons of soldiers who defended or occupied the forts.

xxvii. 12—14. Tarshish may be the Spanish Tartessus, but both the Latin and Greek explain it of Carthage. Javan is no doubt Greece. Tubal and Meshech are probably tribes in the vicinity of the eastern borders of the Black Sea. Togarmah is very likely Armenia, but the Chaldee says Germany.

plished, and therefore every where admired. Zion, that had the beauty of holiness, is called indeed the perfection of beauty, Ps. l. 2; that is, the beauty of the Lord. But Tyre, because well built, and well filled with money and trade, will set up for a perfect beauty. Note, It is the folly of the children of this world to value themselves by the pomp and pleasure they live in, and to call themselves bearties for the sake of them; and if in these they excel others to think themselves perfect. But God takes notice of the vain conceits men have of themselves in their prosperity, when the mind is lifted up with the condition, and often, for the humbling of the spirit, finds ways to bring down the estate. Let none reckon themselves beautified any farther than they are sanctified, nor say they are of perfect beauty till they come to heaven.

2. He must upbraid Tyre with her prosperity, which was the matter of her pride. In elegies it is usual to insert encomiums of those whose fall we lament. The prophet accordingly praiseth Tyre for that she had that was praiseworthy. He has nothing to say for her religion, her piety, her charity, her being a refuge to the distressed, or using her interest to do good offices among her neighbours; but she lived great, and had a great trade, and all the trading part of mankind made court to her. The prophet must describe her height and magnificence, that God may be the more glorified in her fall, as the God who "looks upon every one that is proud, and abaseth them; hides them in the dust together, and binds their faces in secret," Job xl. 12.

1st. The city of Tyre was advantageously situated "at the entry of the sea," ver. 3, having many commodious harbours each way; not as cities seated on rivers, which the shipping can come but one way to. It stood at the east end of the Mediterranean, very convenient for trade by land into all the Levant parts, so that she became a "merchant of the people for many isles." Lying between Greece and Asia, it became the great emporium or mart town, the rendezvous of merchants from all parts. "Thy borders are in the heart of the seas," ver. 4. It was surrounded by water, which was a great advantage to its trade. The darling of the sea laid in its bosom, in its heart. Note, It is a great convenience upon many accounts to live in an island. Seas are the most ancient landmark, not which our fathers have set us, but the God of our fathers, and which cannot be removed as other landmarks may, nor so easily got over. The people so situated may the easier dwell alone, if they please, as not reckoned among the nations; and yet, if they please, may the easier traffic abroad, and keep a correspondence with the nations. We, therefore, of this island must own that he who determines the bounds of men's habitations has determined well for us.

2nd. It was curiously built, according as the fashion then was; and being a city on a hill it made a glorious show, and tempted the ships that sailed by into her ports; ver. 4, "Thy builders have perfected thy beauty." They have so improved in architecture that nothing appears in the buildings of Tyre that can be found fault with; and yet it wants that perfection of beauty into which the Lord doth and will build up his Jerusalem.

3rd. It had its haven replenished with abundance of gallant ships, Isa. xxxiii. 21. The ship carpenters did their part, as well as the house carpenters theirs. The Tyrians are thought to be the first that invented the art of navigation; however, they improved it, and brought it to as great perfection perhaps as it could be without the loadstone. First. They made the boards, or planks, for the hulk of the ship, of fir-trees fetched from Senir, a mount in the land of Israel, joined with Hermon, Cant. iv. 8. Planks of fir were smooth and light, but not so lasting as our English oak. Secondly. They had cedars from Lebanon, another mountain of Israel, for their masts, ver. 5. Thirdly. They had oaks from Bashan, Isa. ii. 13, to make oars of; for it is probable their ships were mostly galleys, that go with oars. The people of Israel built few ships for themselves, but they furnished the Tyrians with timber for shipping. Thus one country useth what another produceth, and so they are serviceable one to another, and cannot say to each other, "I have no need of thee." Fourthly. Such magnificence did they affect in building their ships, that they made the very benches of ivory, which they fetched from the isles of Chittim, from Italy, or Greece, and had workmen from the Ashurites, or Assyrians, to make them,—so rich would they have their state-rooms in their ships to be. Fifthly. So very prodigal were they, that they made their sails of fine linen fetched from Egypt, and that embroidered too, ver. 7. Or it may be meant of their flags, which they hoisted to notify what city they belonged to, which were very costly. The word signifies a banner as well as a sail. Sixthly. They hung those rooms on shipboard with blue and purple, the richest cloths and richest colours they could get from the isles they traded with; for, though Tyre was itself famous for purple, which is therefore called the Tyrian dye, yet they must have that which was far fetched.

4th. These gallant ships were well manned by men of great ingenuity and industry. The pilots and masters of the ships that had command in their fleets were of their own city, such as they could put a confidence in; ver. 8, "Thy wise men, O Tyrus, that were in thee, were thy pilots." But, for common sailors, they had them from other countries; "The inhabitants of Arvad and Sidon were their mariners." These came from cities near them. Sidon was sister of Tyre, not two leagues off, to the northward; there they bred able seamen, which it is the interest of the maritime powers to support and give all the countenance they can to. They sent to Gebal in Syria for calkers or strengtheners of the clefts or chinks, to stop them when the ships came home after long voyages to be repaired. To do this they had the ancients and wise men, ver. 9; for there is more need of wisdom and prudence to repair what is gone to decay than to build anew. In public matters there is occasion for the ancients and wise men to be "the repairers of the breaches, and the restorers of paths to dwell in." Nay, all the countries they traded with were at their service, and were willing to send men into their pay, or to set their youth apprentices in Tyre, or put them on board their fleets; so that "all the ships in the sea with their mariners were" ready "to occupy thy merchandise." Those that give good wages shall have hands at command.

5th. Their city was guarded by a military force that was very considerable, ver. 10, 11. The Tyrians were themselves wholly given to trade; but it was necessary they should have a good army on foot, and therefore they took those of other states into their pay, such as were fittest for service, though they had them from afar, (which perhaps was their policy,) from Persia, Lud, and Phut. These bore their arms when there was occasion, and in time of peace "hanged up the shield and buckler" in the armoury, as it were to proclaim peace, and let the world know that they had at present no need of them, but that they were ready to be taken down whenever there was occasion for them. Their walls were guarded by the men of Arvad, their towers were garrisoned by the Gammadims, robust men that had a great deal of strength in their arms; yet the Vulgar Latin renders it, pigmies, ten no longer than one's arm. They "hung their shields upon the walls," in their magazines, or places of arms; or hung them out upon the walls of the city, that none might dare to approach them, seeing how well provided they were with all things necessary for their own defence. Thus "they set forth thy comeliness," ver. 10, and "made thy beauty perfect," ver. 11. It contributed as much as any thing to the glory of Tyre that it had those of all nations about in its service, except of the land of Israel, though it lay next them, which furnished them with timber, but we do not find it furnished them with men; that would have trenched upon the liberty and dignity of the Jewish nation 2 Chr. ii. 17, 18. Also that it had such a militia, so fit for service, and in constant pay; and such an armoury, like that in the tower of David, where hung the shields of mighty men, Cant. iv. 4. It is observable that there and here the armouries are said to be furnished with shields and helmets, defensive arms, not with swords and spears, offensive, though it is probable there were such, to intimate that the military force of a people must be intended only for their own protection, and not to invade and annoy their neighbours; to secure their own right, not to encroach upon the rights of others.

6th. They had a vast trade, and a correspondence with all parts of the known world. Some nations they dealt with in one commodity, and some in another, according as either its products or manufactures were, and the fruits of nature or art were with which it was blessed. This is very much enlarged upon here, as that which was the principal glory of Tyre, and that which supported all the rest. We do not find anywhere in Scripture so many nations named together as are here; so that this chapter, some think, gives much light to the first account we have of the settlement of the nations after the flood, Gen. x. The critics have abundance of work here to find out the several places and nations spoken of; and concerning many of them their conjectures are different, and they leave us in the dark, and at much uncertainty. It is well it is not material; modern surveys come short of explaining the ancient geography, and therefore we will not amuse ourselves here with a particular inquiry, either concerning the traders or the goods they traded in; we leave it to the critical expositor, and observe that only which is improvable.

First. We have reason to think that Ezekiel knew little of his own knowledge concerning the trade of Tyre. He was a priest, carried away captive far enough from the neighbourhood of Tyre, we may suppose when he was young, (there he had been eleven years;) and yet he speaks of the particular merchandises of Tyre as nicely as if he had been comptroller of the custom-house there, by which it appears that he was Divinely inspired in what he spoke and wrote. It is God that saith this, ver. 3.

Secondly. This account of the trade of Tyre intimates to us that God's eye is upon men, and he takes cognizance of what they do when they are employed in their worldly business; not only when they are at church praying and hearing, but when they are in the markets and fairs, and upon the exchange, buying and selling, which is a good reason why we should in all our dealings keep a conscience void of offence, and have our eye always upon him whose eye is always upon us.

Thirdly. We may here observe the wisdom of God, and his goodness, as the common Father of mankind, in making one country to abound in one commodity and another in another, and all more or less serviceable either to the necessity or to the comfort and ornament of human life; non omnis fert omnia tellus,—'one land does not supply all the varieties of produce.' Providence dispenseth its gifts variously, some to each, and all to none, that there may be a mutual commerce among those whom God has made of one blood, though they are made to dwell on all the face of the earth, Acts xvii. 21. Let every nation therefore thank God for the product of its country; though they be not so rich as those of others, yet there is use for them in the public service of the world.

Fourthly. See what a blessing trade and merchandise is to mankind, especially when it followed in the fear of God, and with a regard not only to private advantage but to a common benefit. "The earth is full of God's riches," Ps. civ. 24. There is a "multitude of all kind of riches" in it, as it is here, ver. 12, gathered off its surface, and digged out of its bowels. The earth is also full of the fruits of men's ingenuity and industry, according as their genius leads them. Now by exchange and barter these are made more extensively useful. Thus what can be spared is helped off, and what is wanted is fetched in in lieu of it from the most distant countries. Those that are not tradesmen themselves yet have reason to thank God for tradesmen and merchants, by whom the products of other countries are brought to our hands, as those of our own are by our husbandmen.

Fifthly. Besides the necessaries that are here traded in, see what abundance of things are here mentioned that only serve to please fancy, and are valuable only by men's humour and custom; and yet God allows us to use them, and trade in them, and part with those things for them which we can spare that are of an intrinsic worth much beyond them Here are "horns of ivory and ebony," ver. 15, that are "brought for a present," that is, exposed to sale, and offered in exchange; or, as some think, presented to the city, or the great men of it, to obtain their favour. Here are "emeralds, coral, and agate," ver. 16; "all precious stones and gold," ver. 22; which the world could better be without than iron and common stones. Here are, to please the taste and smell, the "chief of all spices," ver. 22; "cassia and calamus," ver. 19; and for ornament, "purple, broidered work, and fine linen," ver. 16; "precious clothes for chariots," ver. 20; "blue clothes," (which Tyre was famous for,) broidered work, and "chests of rich apparel, bound with rich cords, and made of cedar," a sweet wood, to perfume the garments kept in them, ver. 24. Upon the review of this invoice, or bill of parcels, we may justly say, What a great many things are here that we have no need of, and can live very comfortably without!

Sixthly. It is observable that Judah and the land of Israel were merchants in Tyre too. In a way of trade they were allowed converse with the heathen; but they traded mostly in wheat, a substantial commodity, and necessary, "wheat of Minnith and Pannag," two countries in Canaan famous for the best wheat, as some think. The whole land indeed was a land of wheat, Deu. viii. 8; it had "the fat of kidneys of wheat," Deu. xxxiv. 14. Tyre was maintained by corn fetched from the land of Israel. They traded likewise in honey, and oil, and balm, or resin, all useful things, and not serving to pride or luxury; and the land which these were the staple commodities of was that which was "the glory of all lands," which God reserved for his peculiar people, not those that traded in "spices and precious stones;" and the Israel of God must reckon themselves well provided for if they have food convenient, for they that are acquainted with the delights of the children of God will not set their hearts on "the delights of the sons and daughters of men, or the treasures of kings and princes." We find indeed in the New Testament that Babylon trades in such things as Tyre traded in, Rev. xviii. 12, 13; for, notwithstanding its pretensions to sanctity, it is a mere worldly interest.

Seventhly. Though Tyre was a city of great merchandise, and they got abundance by buying and selling, importing commodities from one place, and exporting them to another, yet manufacture-trades were not neglected. The "wares of their own making," and a multitude of such wares, are here spoken of, ver. 16; and again, ver. 18. It is the wisdom of a nation to encourage art and industry, and not to bear hard upon the handicraft tradesmen; for it contributes much to the wealth and honour of a nation to send abroad wares of their own making, which may bring them in the multitude of all riches.

Eighthly. All this made Tyrus very great, and very proud. "The ships of Tarshish did sing of thee in thy market," ver. 25; that is, thou wast admired and cried up by all the nations that had dealings with thee; for "thou wast replenished" in wealth and number of people, wast beautified "and made very glorious in the midst of the seas." Those that grow very rich are cried up as very glorious, for riches are glorious things in the eyes of carnal people. Prov. xxvi. 1.

xxvii. 15. Whatever was the home of the men of Dedan, it appears that they traded with ivory-producing countries. Ebony is brought from Southern India.

xxvii. 16. For Syria (Hebrew, Aram) some copies and versions read Edom, which is perhaps correct, as various commodities mentioned in the verse would be readily accessible to them. Coral was procurable in the Red Sea and the Persian Gulf, and precious stones occur in and near Edom.

xxvii. 17. What is meant by Minnith and Pannag is disputed, but Minnith was a town (Judges xi. 33), where most likely fine wheat was produced. There is more difficulty about Pannag, and many explanations have been proposed. It was perhaps a place famous for its wheat.

xxvii. 18. Damascus was a great emporium, and supplied to Tyre the wine of Helbon, which is the modern Aleppo, the Arabic Haleb.

xxvii. 19. After mention of Judah and Israel, why should Dan be 26 Thy rowers have brought thee into great waters:

The east wind hath broken thee in the midst of the seas.
27 Thy riches, and thy fairs,
Thy merchandise, thy mariners, and thy pilots,
Thy calkers, and the occupiers of thy merchandise,
And all thy men of war, that are in thee,
And in all thy company which is in the midst of thee,
Shall fall into the midst of the seas in the day of thy 28 The suburbs shall shake [ruin.
At the sound of the cry of thy pilots.
29 And all that handle the oar,
The mariners, and all the pilots of the sea,
Shall come down from their ships,
They shall stand upon the land;
30 And shall cause their voice to be heard against thee,
And shall cry bitterly,
And shall cast up dust upon their heads,
They shall wallow themselves in the ashes:
31 And they shall make themselves utterly bald for thee,
And gird them with sackcloth,
And they shall weep for thee with bitterness of heart and bitter wailing.
32 And in their wailing they shall take up a lamentation for
And lament over thee, saying, [thee,
What city is like Tyrus,
Like the destroyed in the midst of the sea?
33 When thy wares went forth out of the seas,
Thou filledst many people;
Thou didst enrich the kings of the earth
With the multitude of thy riches and of thy merchandise.
34 In the time when thou shalt be broken
By the seas in the depths of the waters Thy merchandise and all thy company in the midst of thee shall fall.
35 All the inhabitants of the isles shall be astonished at
And their kings shall be sore afraid, [thee,
They shall be troubled in their countenance.
36 The merchants among the people shall hiss at thee;
Thou shalt be a terror, and never shalt be any more.

We have seen Tyre flourishing, here we have Tyre falling, and great is the fall of it; so much the greater for its having made such a figure in the world. Note, The most mighty and magnificent kingdoms and states, sooner or later, have their day to come down; they have their period, and when they are in their zenith they will begin to decline; but the destruction of Tyre was sudden. Her sun went down at noon; and all her wealth and grandeur, pomp and power, did but aggravate her ruin, and make it the more grievous to herself, and astonishing to all about her. Now observe here,

First. How the ruin of Tyrus will be brought about, ver. 26. She is as a great ship richly laden, that is split or sunk by the indiscretion of her steersmen. "Thy rowers have" themselves "brought thee into great" and dangerous "waters." The governors of the city, and those that had the management of their public affairs, by some mismanagement or other involved them in that war with the Chaldeans which was the ruin of their state. By their insolence, by some affront given to the Chaldeans, or some attempt made upon them in confidence of their own ability to contend with them, they provoked Nebuchadnezzar to make a descent upon them; and by their obstinacy in standing out to the last enraged him to that degree, that he determined the ruin of their state, and "like an east wind broke them in the midst of the seas." Note, It is ill with a people when those that sit at the stern, instead of putting them into the harbour, run them aground.

Secondly. How great and general the ruin will be. All her wealth shall be buried with her, "her riches, her fairs and her merchandise," ver. 27; all that had any dependence upon her, and dealings with her, in trade, in war, in conversation, they shall all "fall with her into the midst of the seas in the day of her ruin." Note, Those who make creatures their confidence, place their happiness in their interest in them, and rest their hopes upon them, will of course fall with them. "Happy" therefore "are they that have the God of Jacob for their help, and whose hope is in the Lord their God," who lives for ever.

Thirdly. What sad lamentation would be made for the destruction of Tyre. The pilots, her princes and governors, when they see how ill they have played their cards, and how much they have contributed to their ruin, shall cry out so loud as to make even the suburbs shake, ver. 28; such a vexation shall it be to them to reflect upon their own ill conduct. The inferior officers, that were as the mariners of the state, shall be forced to come down from their respective posts, ver. 29; and they shall "cry out against thee," as having deceived them, in not proving so well able to hold out as they thought thou hadst been; they shall "cry bitterly" for the common ruin, and their own share in it. They shall use all the most solemn expressions of grief; they shall "cast dust on their heads," in indignation of themselves, shall "wallow themselves in ashes," as having bid a final farewell to all ease and pleasure; they shall 'make themselves bald," ver. 31, with "tearing their hair;" and, according to the custom of great mourners, they shall "gird themselves with sackcloth" who used to wear fine linen, and instead of merry songs they shall "weep with bitterness of heart." Note, Losses and crosses are very grievous and hard to be borne to those that have long been wallowing in pleasure and sleeping in carnal security.

Fourthly. How Tyre should be upbraided with her former honour and prosperity, ver. 32, 33. She that was Tyrus the renowned shall now be called Tyrus the destroyed in the midst of the sea. "What city is like Tyre?" Did ever any city come down from such a height of prosperity to such a depth of adversity? Time was when "thy wares," those of thine own making, and those that passed through thy hands, "went forth out of the seas," and were exported to all parts of the world; then "thou filledst many people, and didst enrich the kings of the earth," and their kingdoms. The Tyrians, though they bare such a sway in trade, yet it seems were fair merchants, and let their neighbours not only live, but thrive by them. All that dealt with them were gainers, they did not cheat or oppress the people, but did enrich them with "the multitude of their merchandise;" but now they that used to be enriched by thee shall be ruined with thee, as is usual in trade; ver. 34, "When thou shalt be broken," and all thou hast is seized on, "all thy company shall fall too." There is an end of Tyre, that made such a noise and bustle in the world; this great blaze goes out in a snuff.

Fifthly. How the fall of Tyre should be a matter of terror to some, and laughter to others, according as they were differently interested and affected. Some shall be sore afraid, and shall be troubled, ver. 35, concluding it will be their own turn to fall next; others shall hiss at her, ver. 36, shall ridicule her pride and vanity, and ill conduct, and think her ruin just. She triumphed in Jerusalem's fall, and there are those that will triumph in hers. When God casts his judgments on the sinner, "men also shall clap their hands at him, and shall hiss him out of his place," Job xxvii. 22, 23; "Is this the city which men call the perfection of beauty."

CHAPTER XXVIII.

In this chapter we have, I. A prediction of the fall and ruin of the king of Tyre, who in the destruction of that city is particularly set up as a mark for God's arrows, ver. 1—10. II. A lamentation for the king of Tyre, when he is thus fallen, though he falls by his own iniquity, ver. 11—19. III. A prophecy of the destruction of Zidon, which was in the neighbourhood of Tyre, and had a dependence upon it, ver. 20—23. IV. A promise of the restoration of the Israel of God, though in the day of their calamity they were insulted over by their neighbours, ver. 24—26.

THE word of the LORD came again unto me, saying, 2 Son of man, say unto the prince of Tyrus,
Thus saith the Lord GOD;
Because thine heart is lifted up, and thou hast said,
I am a God,
I sit in the seat of God, in the midst of the seas;
Yet thou art a man, and not God,
Though thou set thine heart as the heart of God:
3 Behold, thou art wiser than Daniel;
There is no secret that they can hide from thee:
4 With thy wisdom and with thine understanding thou hast gotten thee riches,
And hast gotten gold and silver into thy treasures:
5 By thy great wisdom and by thy traffick hast thou increased thy riches,
And thine heart is lifted up because of thy riches:
6 Therefore thus saith the Lord GOD;
Because thou hast set thine heart as the heart of God;
7 Behold, therefore I will bring strangers upon thee,
The terrible of the nations:
And they shall draw their swords against the beauty of thy wisdom,
And they shall defile thy brightness.
8 They shall bring thee down to the pit,
And thou shalt die the deaths of them
That are slain in the midst of the seas.
9 Wilt thou yet say before him that slayeth thee, I am
But thou shalt be a man, and no God, [God?
In the hand of him that slayeth thee.
10 Thou shalt die the deaths of the uncircumcised by the hand of strangers:
For I have spoken it, saith the Lord GOD.

We have done with Tyrus in the foregoing chapter, but now the prince of Tyrus is to be singled out from the rest. Here is something to be said to him by himself, a message to him from God, which the prophet must send him, whether he will hear or whether he will forbear.

First. He must tell him of his pride. His people were proud, ch. xxvii. 3, and so is he; and they shall both be made to know that God resists the proud. Let us see,

1. What were the expressions of his pride. "His heart was lifted up," ver. 2. He had a great conceit of himself, was blown up with an opinion of his own sufficiency, and looked with disdain upon all about him; and out of the abundance of the pride of his heart he said, "I am a god." He did not only say it in his heart, but had the impudence to speak it out. God has said of princes, introduced? Perhaps a place called Vedan may be meant. The verse raises other difficulties, but it would appear from the commodities mentioned that Oriental trading communities are intended.

xxvii. 20—25. See Supplementary Notes.

xxvii. 36. Sighing, rather than hissing, seems meant here.

xxviii. 2. Josephus gives the following from the records of the Phœnicians:—"Nebuchadnezzar besieged Tyre for thirteen years in the days of Ithobal, their king; after him reigned Baal ten years: after him judges were appointed, and they judged, viz., Ecnibalus, son of Baslachus, two months; Chelbes, the son of Abdæus, ten months; Abbarus, the high priest, three months. Mutgonus and Gerastratus, the sons of Abdelimus, were judges six years, with whom Balatorus reigned one year, and on his death they sent and called Merbalus from Babylon, and he reigned four years. When he died they sent for his brother Iromus, who reigned twenty years. In his time Cyrus ruled the Persians" (Book I., "Against Apion," sec. 21).

They are gods, Ps. lxxxii. 7. But it doth not become them to say so of themselves; it is a high affront to him who is God alone, and will not give his glory to another. He thought the city of Tyre had as necessary a dependence upon him as the world has upon the God that made it, and that he was himself independent as God, and unaccountable to any. He thought himself to have as much wisdom and strength as God himself, and as incontestable authority, and that his prerogatives were as absolute, and his word as much a law as the word of God. He challenged Divine honours, and expected to be praised and admired as a god, and doubted not to be deified among other heroes after his death, as a great benefactor to the world. Thus the king of Babylon said, "I will be like the Most High," Isa. xiv. 14, not like the Most Holy. "I am the strong God," and therefore will not be contradicted, because I cannot be controlled. "I sit in the seat of God." I sit as high as God, my throne equal with his; divisum imperium cum Jove Cæsar habet,—'Cæsar divides dominion with Jove.' I sit as safe as God, as safe in the heart of the seas, and as far out of the reach of danger, as he in the height of heaven. He thinks his guards of men of war about his throne as pompous and potent as the hosts of angels that are about the throne of God. He is put in mind of his meanness and mortality; and since he needs to be told, he shall be told that self-evident truth, "Thou art a man, and not God," a depending creature, a dying creature; thou art flesh, and not spirit, Isa. xxxi. 3. Note, Men must be made to know they are but men, Ps. ix. 20. The greatest wits, the greatest potentates, the greatest saints, are men and not gods; Jesus Christ was both God and man. The king of Tyre, though he has such a mighty influence upon all about him, and with the help of his riches bears a mighty sway, though he has tribute and presents brought to his court with as much devotion as if they were sacrifices to his altar, though he is flattered by his courtiers, and made a god of by his poets, yet after all he is but a man; he knows it, he fears it. But "he sets his heart as the heart of God," hast conceited thyself to be a god, hast compared thyself with God, thinking thyself as wise and strong, and as fit to govern the world as he. It was the ruin of our first parents, and ours in them, that they would be as gods, Gen. iii. 5; and still that corrupt nature which inclines men to set up themselves as their own masters to do what they will, and their own carvers to have what they will, their own end to live to themselves, and their own felicity to enjoy themselves, "sets their hearts as the heart of God," invades his prerogatives, and catches at the flowers of his crown—a presumption that cannot go unpunished.

2. We are told what it was that he was proud of.

1st. His wisdom. It is likely this prince of Tyre was a man of very good natural parts, a philosopher, and well read in all the parts of learning that were then in vogue; however, a politician, and had a great dexterity in managing the affairs of the state; and then he thought himself "wiser than Daniel," ver. 3. We found before, that Daniel, though now but a young man, was celebrated for his prevalency in prayer, ch. xiv. 14; here we find he was famous for his prudence in the management of the affairs of this world, a great scholar and statesman, and withal a great saint; and yet not a prince, but a poor captive. It was strange that under such external disadvantages his lustre should shine forth, so as that he was become wise to a proverb. When the king of Tyre dreams himself to be a god he saith he is "wiser than Daniel." "There is no secret that they can hide from thee." Probably he challenged all about him to prove him with questions, as Solomon was proved, and he had unriddled all their enigmas, had solved all their problems, and none of them all could puzzle him. He had perhaps been successful in discovering plots, and diving into the counsels of the neighbouring princes, and therefore thought himself omniscient, and that no thought could be withholden from him; therefore he said, "I am a god." Note, Knowledge puffeth up; it is hard to know much, and not to know it too well, and to be elevated with it. He that was wiser than Daniel was prouder than Lucifer. Those therefore that are knowing must study to be humble, and to evidence that they are so.

2nd. His wealth. That way his wisdom led him; it is not said that by his wisdom he searched into the arcana, either of nature or government, modelled the state better than it was, or made better laws, or had advanced the interests of the commonwealth of learning; but his wisdom and understanding were of use to him in traffic. As some of the kings of Judah loved husbandry, 2 Chr. xxvi. 10; so the king of Tyre loved merchandise, and by it he got riches, increased his riches, and filled his treasures with gold and silver, ver. 4, 5. See what the wisdom of this world is; those are cried up as the wisest men that know how to get money, and by right or wrong to raise estates, and yet really this their way is their folly, Ps. xlix. 13. It was the folly of the king of Tyre, First. That he attributed the increase of his wealth to himself, and not to the providence of God, forgetting him who gave him power to get wealth, Deu. viii. 17, 18. Secondly. That he therefore thought himself a wise man, because he was a rich man; whereas a fool may have an estate, Eccl. ii. 19; yea, and a fool may get an estate, for the world has often been observed to favour such, when bread is not to the wise, Eccl. ix. 11. Thirdly. That his heart was lifted up because of his riches, for the increase of his wealth, that made him so haughty and secure, so insolent and imperious, and that set his heart as the heart of God. The man of sin, when he had a great deal of worldly pomp and power, shewed himself as a god, 2 Thess. ii. 4. Those who are rich in this world have, therefore, need to charge that upon themselves which the word of God charges upon them, "That they be not high-minded," 1 Tim. vi. 17.

Secondly. Since pride goes before destruction, and a haughty spirit before a fall, he must tell him of that destruction, of that fall, which was now hastening on, as the just punishment of his presumption in setting up himself a rival with God; Because thou hast pretended to be a god, ver. 6, therefore thou shalt not be long a man, ver. 7. Observe here,

1. The instruments of his destruction. "I will bring strangers upon thee," the Chaldeans, whom we do not find mentioned among the many nations and countries that traded with Tyre, ch. xxvii. If any of those nations had been brought against it they would have had some compassion upon it, for old acquaintance sake; but these strangers will have none; they are people of a strange language, which the king of Tyre himself, as wise as he is, perhaps understands not. They are "the terrible of the nations." It was an army made up of many nations, and it was at this day the most formidable, both for strength and fury. These God has at command, and these he will bring upon the king of Tyre.

2. The extremity of the destruction. "They shall draw their swords against the beauty of thy wisdom," ver. 7, that is, against all those things which thou gloriest in as thy beauty and the product of thy wisdom. Note, It is just with God that our enemies should make that their prey which we have made our pride. The king of Tyre's palace, his treasury, his city, his navy, his army, these he glories in as his brightness, these he thinks make him illustrious and glorious as a god on earth. But all these the victorious enemy shall defile, shall deface, shall deform; he thought them sacred, things that none durst touch; but the conquerors shall seize them as common things, and spoil the brightness of them. But whatever comes of what he has, surely his person is sacred. No; ver. 8, "They shall bring thee down to the pit," to the grave; thou shalt die the death. And, 1st. It shall not be an honourable death, but an ignominious one: he shall be so vilified in his death that he may despair of being deified after his death. He shall die "the deaths of them that are slain in the midst of the seas," that have no honour done them at their death, but their dead bodies are immediately thrown overboard, without any ceremony as marks of distinction, to be a feast for the fish. Tyre is like to be destroyed in the midst of the sea, ch. xxvii. 32, and the prince of Tyre shall fare no better than the people. 2nd. It shall not be a happy death, but a miserable one. He shall "die the death of the uncircumcised," ver. 10, of those that are strangers to God and not in covenant with him, and therefore die under his wrath and curse. It is deaths, a double death, temporal and eternal, the death both of the body and soul; he shall die the second death—that is dying miserably indeed. The sentence of death here passed upon the king of Tyre is ratified by a Divine authority; "I have spoken it, saith the Lord God." And what he hath said, he will do; none can gainsay it, nor will he unsay it.

3. The effectual disproof that this will be of all his pretensions to deity; ver. 9, When the conqueror sets his sword to thy breast, and thou seest no way of escape, Wilt thou then say, I am God? Wilt thou then have such a conceit of thyself, and such a confidence in thyself, as thou now hast? No, thy being overpowered by death, and by the fear of it, will force thee to own that thou art not a god, but a weak, timorous, trembling, dying man. "In the hand of him that slayeth thee," in the hand of God, and of the instruments he employed, "thou shalt be a man, and not a god," utterly unable to resist and help thyself. "I have said ye are gods, but ye shall die like men," Ps. lxxxii. 6, 7. Note, Those who pretend to be rivals with God shall be forced one way or other to let fall their claims. Death at farthest, when we come into his hand, will make us know that we are men.

11 Moreover the word of the LORD came unto me, saying,
12 Son of man, take up a lamentation upon the king of [Tyrus,
And say unto him, Thus saith the Lord GOD;
Thou sealest up the sum,
Full of wisdom, and perfect in beauty.
13 Thou hast been in Eden the garden of God;
Every precious stone was thy covering,
The sardius, topaz, and the diamond,
The beryl, the onyx, and the jasper,
The sapphire, the emerald, and the carbuncle, and gold:
The workmanship of thy tabrets and of thy pipes was prepared in thee
In the day that thou wast created.
14 Thou art the anointed cherub that covereth;
And I have set thee so: thou wast upon the holy mountain of God;
Thou hast walked up and down in the midst of the stones of fire. [wast created,
15 Thou wast perfect in thy ways from the day that thou
Till iniquity was found in thee.
16 By the multitude of thy merchandise
They have filled the midst of thee with violence, and thou hast sinned: [of God:
Therefore I will cast thee as profane out of the mountain And I will destroy thee, O covering cherub, from the midst of the stones of fire.
17 Thine heart was lifted up because of thy beauty,
Thou hast corrupted thy wisdom by reason of thy bright
I will cast thee to the ground, [ness:
I will lay thee before kings, that they may behold thee.
18 Thou hast defiled thy sanctuaries by the multitude of
By the iniquity of thy traffick; [thine iniquities,
Therefore will I bring forth a fire from the midst of thee,
It shall devour thee, and I will bring thee to ashes upon
In the sight of all them that behold thee. [the earth 19 All they that know thee among the people shall be astonished at thee:
Thou shalt be a terror, and never shalt thou be any more.

As, after the prediction of the ruin of Tyre, ch. xxvi., followed a pathetical lamentation for it, ch. xxvii., so, after the ruin of the king of Tyre is foretold, it is bewailed. 1. This is commonly understood of the present prince of Tyre spoken to, ver. 2. His name was Ethbaal, or Ithobalus, as Diodorus Siculus calls him that was king of Tyre when Nebuchadnezzar destroyed it. He was, it seems, upon all external accounts, an accomplished man, very great and famous, but his iniquity was his ruin. Many expositors have suggested that besides the literal sense of this lamentation there is an allegory in it, and that it is an allusion to the fall of angels that sinned, who undid themselves by their pride. And, as is usual in texts that have a mystical meaning, some passages here refer primarily to the king of Tyre, as that of his merchandises, others to the angels, as that of being in "the holy mountain of God." But if there be any thing mystical in it, as perhaps there may, I shall rather refer it to the fall of Adam, which seems to be glanced at; ver. 13, "Thou hast been in Eden the garden of God," and that "in the day thou wast created." 2. Some think by the king of Tyre is meant the whole royal family, this including also the foregoing kings, and looking as far back as Hiram, king of Tyre. The present governor is called prince, ver. 2, but he that is here lamented is called king. The court of Tyre and its kings had for many ages been famous, but sin ruins it. Now we may observe two things here:

Josephus adds that Nebuchadnezzar began the siege of Tyre in the seventh year of his reign, and that Cyrus began to reign in the fourteenth year of Irom. The names of Ithobal and Irom are of course the same as the Ethbaal and Hirom of earlier times.

xxviii. 3—5. In these verses the prophet seems to say to the king of Tyre what the monarch was and had done in his own estimation.

xxviii. 8—10. It is plainly declared that King Ithobal shall die a violent death, but we are not aware of any record of the event; and the way in which Josephus adds up the figures given above leads to the conclusion that Ithobal's reign in some manner ended with the siege of Tyre. (See Josephus, "Jewish Antiquities," Book X., chap. xi. 1.) It is stated by some that Ithobal reigned nineteen years in all, and outlived the siege four years. The whole question of Tyrian history at this time is very complicated, and to be properly treated must receive elaborate discussion.

xxviii. 12—14. These verses must be regarded as very strongly

First. What was the renown of the king of Tyre. He is here spoken of as having lived in great splendour, ver. 12—15. He was a man, but it is here owned that he was a very considerable man, and one that made a mighty figure in his day.

1. He far exceeded other men. Hiram and other kings of Tyre had done so in their time; and the present king, perhaps, had not come short of any of them. "Thou sealest up the sum full of wisdom, and perfect in beauty;" both the powers of human nature and the prosperity of human life seemed in him to have been at the highest pitch. He was looked upon to be as wise as the reason of men could make him, and as happy as the wealth of this world and the enjoyment of it could make him; in him you might see the utmost that both could do; and therefore seal up the sum, for nothing can be added. He is a complete man, perfect in suo genere,—'in his kind.'

2. He seemed to be as wise and happy as Adam in innocency; ver. 13, "Thou hast been in Eden," even "in the garden of God." Thou hast lived, as it were, in Paradise all thy days, hast had a full enjoyment of every thing that is good for food or pleasant to the eyes, and an uncontroverted dominion over all about thee, as Adam had. One instance of the magnificence of the king of Tyre is that he outdid all other princes in jewels, which those have the most plenty of that trade most abroad, as he did. Every precious stone was his covering. There is a great variety of precious stones, but he had of every sort and in such plenty, that besides what were treasured up in his cabinet, and were the ornaments of his crown, he had his clothes trimmed with them; they were his covering. Nay, ver. 14, he "walked up and down in the midst of the stones of fire," that is, these precious stones, which glittered and sparkled like fire. His rooms were in a manner set round with jewels, so that he walked in the midst of them, and then fancied himself as glorious as if, like God, he had been surrounded by so many angels, who are compared to a flame of fire. And if he be such an admirer of precious stones as to think them as bright as angels, no wonder he is such an admirer of himself as to think himself as great as God. Nine several sorts of precious stones are here named which were all in the high priest's ephod. Perhaps they are particularly named because he in his pride used to speak particularly of them, and tell those about him, with a great deal of foolish pleasure, This is such a precious stone, of such a value, and so and so are its virtues. Thus he is upbraided with his vanity. Gold is mentioned last, as far inferior in value to those precious stones; and he used to speak of it accordingly. Another thing that made him think his palace a paradise was the curious music he had, the tabrets and pipes, hand instruments and wind instruments; the workmanship of these was extraordinary, and they were prepared for him on purpose; prepared in thee—the pronoun is feminine—in thee, O Tyre; or it notes that the king was effeminate, in doting on such things. They were prepared in the day he was created, that is, either born or created king; they were made on purpose to celebrate the joys either of his birthday or his coronation day. These he prided himself much in, and would have all that came to see his palace take notice of them.

3. He looked like an incarnate angel; ver. 14, "Thou art the anointed cherub that covereth" or protecteth, that is, he looked upon himself as a guardian angel to his people, so bright, so strong, so faithful; appointed to that office, and qualified for it. Anointed kings should be to their subjects as anointed cherubims that cover them with the wings of their power, and when they are such God will own them; their advancement was from him, "I have set thee so." Some think, because mention was made of Eden, that it refers to the cherub set on the east of Eden to cover it, Gen. iii. 24. He thought himself as able to guard his city from all invaders as that angel was for his charge. Or, it may refer to the cherubim in the most holy place, whose wings covered the ark; he thought himself as bright as one of them.

4. He appeared in as much splendour as the high priest, when he was clothed with his garments for glory and beauty; "Thou wast upon the holy mountain of God," as president of the temple built on that holy mountain. Thou didst look as great, and with as much majesty and authority, as ever the high priest did when he walked in the temple, which was garnished with precious stones, 2 Chr. iii. 6, and had his habit on, which had precious stones both in the breast and on the shoulder—in that he seemed to walk in "the midst of the stones of fire." Thus glorious is the king of Tyre—at least he thinks himself so.

Secondly. Let us now see what was the ruin of the king of Tyre, what it was that stained his glory, and laid all this honour in the dust; ver. 15, "Thou wast perfect in thy ways," that is, thou didst prosper in all thy affairs, and every thing went well with thee; thou hadst not only a clear but a bright reputation "from the day thou wast created," the day of thine accession to the throne, "till iniquity was found in thee," and that spoiled all. This may perhaps allude to the deplorable case of the angels that fell, and of our first parents, both which were perfect in their ways till iniquity was found in them. And when iniquity was once found in him, it increased, and he grew worse and worse, as appears ver. 18, "Thou hast defiled thy sanctuaries," that is, thou hast lost the benefit of all that which thou thoughtest sacred, and in which, as in a sanctuary, thou thoughtest to take refuge. These thou hast defiled, and so exposed thyself by the multitude of thine iniquities. Now observe,

1. What the iniquity was that was the ruin of the king of Tyre. 1st. The iniquity of his traffic, so it is called ver. 18, both his and his people's; for their sin is charged upon him because he connived at it, and set them an ill example, ver. 16. By the multitude of thy merchandise they have filled the midst of thee with violence, and thus thou hast sinned. The king had so much to do with his merchandise, and was so wholly intent upon the gains of that, that he took no care to do justice, to right those that suffered wrong, and to protect them from violence. Nay, in the multiplicity of business wrong was done to many by oversight, and in his dealings he made use of his power to invade the rights of those he dealt with. Note, Those that have much to do in the world are in great danger of doing much amiss, and it is hard to deal with many without violence to some. Trades are called mysteries, but too many make them mysteries of iniquity. 2nd. His pride and vainglory; ver. 17, "Thine heart was lifted up because of thy beauty," thou wast in love with thyself and thy own shadow; and thus "thou hast corrupted thy wisdom by reason of the brightness," and the pomp and splendour wherein thou livedst. He gazed so much upon this that he dazzled his eyes, and made him that he could not see his way. He appeared so puffed up with his greatness, that it both lost him his wisdom and lost him the reputation of it. He really became a fool in glorying. Those make a bad bargain for themselves that part with their wisdom for the gratifying of their gaiety, and to please a vain humour lose a real excellency.

2. What the ruin was that this iniquity brought him to. 1st. He was thrown out of his dignity and dislodged from his palace, which he took to be his paradise and temple; ver. 16, "I will cast thee as profane out of the mountain of God." His kingly power was high as a mountain, setting him above others; it was a mountain of God, for the powers that be are ordained of God, and have something in them that is sacred. But having abused his power he is reckoned profane, and is therefore deposed and expelled. He disgraceth the crown he wears, and so hath forfeited it, and shall be destroyed "from the midst of the stones of fire," the precious stones with which his palace was garnished, as the temple was, and they shall be no protection to him. 2nd. He was exposed to contempt and disgrace, and trampled upon by his neighbours. "I will cast thee to the ground," ver. 17, will cast thee among the pavement stones, from the midst of the precious stones, and will lay thee a rueful spectacle "before kings, that they may behold thee," and take warning by thee not to be proud and oppressive. 3rd. He is quite consumed, his city, and he in it. "I will bring forth a fire from the midst of thee." The conquerors, when they have plundered the city, will kindle a fire in the heart of it, which shall lay it, and the palace particularly, in ashes. Or, it may be taken more generally for the fire of God's judgments, which will devour both prince and people, and bring all the glory of both "to ashes upon the earth;" and this fire shall be "brought forth from the midst of thee." All God's judgments upon sinners take rise from themselves; they are devoured by a fire of their own kindling. 4th. He was hereby made a terrible example of Divine vengeance. Thus he is reduced in the sight of all them that behold him, ver. 18; they that know him shall be astonished at him, and shall admire how one that stood so high could be brought so low. The king of Tyre's palace, like the temple at Jerusalem, when it is destroyed shall be an astonishment and a hissing, 2 Chr. vii. 20, 21. So fell the king of Tyre.

20 Again the word of the LORD came unto me, saying, 21 Son of man, set thy face against Zidon, and prophesy against it, 22 And say,

Thus saith the Lord GOD;
Behold, I am against thee, O Zidon;
And I will be glorified in the midst of thee:
And they shall know that I am the LORD,
When I shall have executed judgments in her,
And shall be sanctified in her.

23 For I will send into her pestilence, and blood into her streets;
And the wounded shall be judged in the midst of her
By the sword upon her on every side;
And they shall know that I am the LORD.

24 And there shall be no more a pricking brier unto the house of Israel,
Nor any grieving thorn of all that are round about them, that despised them;
And they shall know that I am the Lord GOD.

25 Thus saith the Lord GOD;
When I shall have gathered the house of Israel
From the people among whom they are scattered,
And shall be sanctified in them in the sight of the heathen,
Then shall they dwell in their land that I have given to my servant Jacob.

26 And they shall dwell safely therein,
And shall build houses, and plant vineyards;
Yea, they shall dwell with confidence,
When I have executed judgments
Upon all those that despise them round about them;
And they shall know that I am the LORD their GOD.

God's glory is his great end, both in all the good and in all the evil which proceedeth out of the mouth of the Most High; so we find in these verses.

First. God will be glorified in the destruction of Zidon, a city that lay near to Tyre; was more ancient, but not so considerable, had a dependence upon it, and stood and fell with it. God saith here, "I am against thee, O Zidon, and I will be glorified in the midst of thee," ver. 22. And again, they that would not know by gentler methods shall be made to know that I am the Lord, and I alone, and that I am a just and jealous God, when "I shall have executed judgments in her," destroying judgments; when I shall have done execution according to justice, and according to the sentence passed, and so shall be sanctified in her. The Zidonians, it should seem, were more addicted to idolatry than the Tyrians were, who being men of business, and large conversation, were less under the power of bigotry and superstition. The Zidonians were noted for the worship of Ashtaroth; Solomon introduced it, 1 Kin. xi. 5. Jezebel was daughter to the king of Zidon, who brought the worship of Baal into Israel, 1 Kin. xvi. 31; so that God had been much dishonoured by the Zidonians. Now, saith he, I will be glorified, I will be sanctified. The Zidonians were borderers upon the land of Israel, where God was known, and where they might have got the knowledge of him, and have learned to glorify him; but, instead of that, they seduced Israel to the worship of their idols. Note, When God is sanctified, he is glorified, for his holiness is his glory. And those whom he is not sanctified and glorified by he will be sanctified and glorified upon, by executing judgments upon them, which speak him a just avenger of his own and his people's injured honour.

The judgments that shall be executed upon Zidon are, war and pestilence, two wasting, depopulating judgments, ver. 23. They are God's messengers which he sends on his errands, and they shall accomplish that for which he sends them. Pestilence and blood shall be sent into her streets; there the dead bodies of those shall lie who perished, some by the plague, occasioned perhaps through ill diet when the city was besieged, and some by the sword of the enemy, most likely the Chaldean armies, when the city is taken and all put to the sword. Thus the wounded shall be judged; when they are dying of their wounds they shall judge themselves, and others shall say they justly fall. Or, as some read it, 'they shall be punished by the sword,' that sword which has commission to destroy on every side. It is God which judgeth, and he will overcome.

Nor is it Tyre and Zidon only on which God would execute judgments, but on all those that despised his people Israel, and triumphed in their calamities, ver. 26; for this was now God's controversy with the nations that were round about them, ver. 26. Note, When God's people are under his correcting hand charged with metaphor. The king had lived in an earthly paradise, surrounded with splendour, and enjoying every possible dignity. There are difficulties of detail in verses 13 and 14. In the former the words rendered "the workmanship of thy tabrets," &c., are by some understood of the service of women who played on musical instruments before the court. Others explain them as a continuation of the previous course of thought, and a reference to the stamping of ornaments in metal and the engraving of gems and such-like.

Without deciding that the last-mentioned explanation is quite correct, we think it points in the right direction. In verses 14 and 16 the king of Tyre is spoken of as a cherub. Without noticing many ingenious attempts to explain this, we observe that the accompanying imagery suggests a very simple one. The king of Tyre is compared to the cherubim of the Tabernacle and of the Temple. As they overshadowed with their wings that which was most sacred and inviolable, so did he. But as the Temple and its most holy things fell for their faults he takes care, as he did concerning malefactors that were scourged, that they shall not seem vile to those that are about them, and therefore takes it ill of those who despise them, and so help forward the affliction when he is but a little displeased, Zec. i. 15. God regards them even in their low estate, and therefore let not men despise them.

Secondly. God will be glorified in the restoration of his people to their former safety and prosperity. God had been dishonoured by the sins of his people, and their sufferings too had given occasion to the enemy to blaspheme, Isa. lii. 5; but God will now both cure them of their sins and ease them of their troubles, and so will be "sanctified in them in the sight of the heathen;" will recover the honour of his holiness, to the satisfaction of all the world, ver. 25. For,

1. They shall return to the possession of their own land again. I will gather the house of Israel out of their dispersions, in answer to that prayer; Ps. cvi. 47, "Save us, O Lord our God, and gather us from among the heathen." And in pursuance of that promise, Deu. xxx. 4, "Thence will the Lord thy God gather thee;" being gathered, they shall be brought in a body to "dwell in the land that I have given to my servant Jacob." God had an eye to the ancient grant, in bringing them back; for that remained in force, and the discontinuance of the possession was not a defeasance of the right. He that gave it will again give it.

2. They shall enjoy great tranquillity there. When those that had been vexatious to them are taken off they shall live in quietness, there shall be no more "a pricking brier or a grieving thorn," ver. 24. They shall have a happy settlement, for they shall build houses and plant vineyards, and they shall enjoy a happy security and serenity there. They shall dwell safely, shall dwell with confidence, and there shall be none to disquiet them, or make them afraid, ver. 26. This never had a full accomplishment in the body of that people, for after their return out of captivity they were ever and anon molested by some ill neighbour or other. Nor has the gospel church been ever quite free from pricking briers and grieving thorns; yet sometimes the church has rest. Believers always dwell safely under the Divine protection, and may be quiet from the fear of evil. But the full accomplishment of this promise is reserved for the heavenly Canaan, when all the saints shall be gathered together, and every thing that offends shall be removed, and all griefs and fears for ever banished.

CHAPTER XXIX.

Three chapters we had concerning Tyre and its king; next follows four chapters concerning Egypt and its king; this is the first of them. Egypt had formerly been a house of bondage to God's people; of late they had had but too friendly a correspondence with it, and had depended too much upon it; and therefore, whether the prediction reached Egypt or no, it would be of use to Israel, to take them off of their confidence in their alliance with it. The prophesies against Egypt, which are all laid together in these four chapters, were of five several dates: the first in the tenth year of the captivity, ver. 1; the second in the twenty-seventh, ver. 17; the third in the eleventh year and the first month, ch. xxx. 20; the fourth in the eleventh year and third month, ch. xxxi. 1; the fifth in the twelth year, ch. xxxii. 1, and another the same year, ver. 17. In this chapter we have, I. The destruction of Pharaoh foretold, for his dealing deceitfully with Israel, ver. 1—7. II. The desolation of the land of Egypt foretold, ver. 8—12. III. A promise of the restoration thereof in part after forty years, ver. 13—16. IV. The possession that should be given to Nebuchadnezzar of the land of Egypt, ver. 17—20. V. A promise of mercy to Israel, ver. 21.

IN the tenth year, in the tenth month, in the twelfth day of the month, the word of the LORD came unto me, saying, 2 Son of man, set thy face against Pharaoh king of Egypt, and prophesy against him, and against all Egypt: 3 Speak, and say,

Thus saith the Lord GOD;
Behold, I am against thee, Pharaoh king of Egypt,
The great dragon that lieth in the midst of his rivers,
Which hath said, My river is mine own, and I have made it for myself.

4 But I will put hooks in thy jaws, [scales,
And I will cause the fish of thy rivers to stick unto thy
And I will bring thee up out of the midst of thy rivers,
And all the fish of thy rivers shall stick unto thy scales.

5 And I will leave thee thrown into the wilderness,
Thee and all the fish of thy rivers:
Thou shalt fall upon the open fields;
Thou shalt not be brought together, nor gathered:
I have given thee for meat to the beasts of the field
And to the fowls of the heaven. [the LORD,

6 And all the inhabitants of Egypt shall know that I am
Because they have been a staff of reed to the house of 7 When they took hold of thee by thy hand, [Israel.

Thou didst break, and rend all their shoulder:
And when they leaned upon thee,
Thou brakest, and madest all their loins to be at a stand.

Here is, First. The date of this prophecy against Egypt. It was in the tenth year of the captivity, and yet it is placed after the prophecy against Tyre, which was delivered in the eleventh year; because, in the accomplishment of the prophecies, the destruction of Tyre happened before the destruction of Egypt; and Nebuchadnezzar's gaining Egypt was the reward of his service against Tyre, and therefore the prophecy against Tyre is put first, that we may the better observe that. But particular notice must be taken of this, that the first prophecy against Egypt was just at the time when the king of Egypt was coming to relieve Jerusalem, and raise the siege, Jer. xxxvii. 5, but did not answer the expectations of the Jews from them. Note, It is good to foresee the failing of all our creature confidences, then when we are most in temptation to depend upon them, that we may cease from man.

Secondly. The scope of this prophecy. It is directed against "Pharaoh king of Egypt, and against all Egypt," ver. 2. The prophecy against Tyre began with the people, and then proceeded against the prince. But this begins with the prince, because it began to have its accomplishment in the insurrections and rebellions of the people against the prince, not long after this.

Thirdly. The prophecy itself. Pharaoh Hophrah (for so was the present Pharaoh surnamed) is here represented by a great dragon, or crocodile that lies "in the midst of his rivers," as leviathan in the waters, to play therein, ver. 3. Nilus, the river of Egypt, was famed for crocodiles. And what is the king of Egypt in God's account but a great dragon, venomous and mischievous. Therefore, saith God, "I am against thee," I am above thee; so it may be read. How high soever the princes and potentates of the earth are, there is a higher than they, Eccl. v. 8; a God above them that can control them. And if they be tyrannical and oppressive, a God is against them that will be free to reckon with them. Observe here,

1. The pride and security of Pharaoh. He "lieth in the midst of his rivers," rolls himself with a great deal of satisfaction in his wealth and pleasures; and he saith, "My river is mine own." He boasts that he is an absolute prince, his subjects are his vassals, Joseph brought them long ago, Gen. xlvii. 23; that he is a sole prince, and has neither partner in the government nor competition for it; that he is out of debt, what he has is his own, and none of his neighbours has any demands upon him; that he is independent, neither tributary nor accountable to any. Note, Worldly, carnal minds please themselves with, and pride themselves in, their property, forgetting that whatever we have we have only the use of it, the property is in God; we ourselves are not our own, but his; our tongues are not our own, Ps. xii. 4. Our river is not our own, for its springs are in God. The most potent prince cannot call what he has his own, for though it be so against all the world, it is not so against God. But Pharaoh's reason for his pretensions is yet more absurd; "My river is mine own," for "I have made it for myself." Here he usurps two of the Divine prerogatives—to be the author and end of his own being and felicity; he only that is the great Creator can say of this world, and of every thing in it, "I have made it for myself." He calls his river his own because he looks not unto the Maker thereof, nor has respect unto him that fashioned it long ago, Isa. xxii. 11. What we have we have received from God, and must use for God; so that we cannot say we made it, much less that we made it for ourselves; and why then do we boast? Note, Self is the great idol that all the world worships, in contempt of God and his sovereignty.

2. The course God will take with this proud man to humble him. He is a great dragon in the waters, and God will accordingly deal with him, ver. 4, 5. 1st. He will draw him out of his rivers; for he has a hook and a cord for this leviathan, with which he can manage him, though none on earth can; Job xii. 1, "I will bring thee up out of the midst of thy rivers," will cast thee out of thy palace, out of thy kingdom, out of all those things in which thou takest such a complacency, and placest such a confidence. Herodotus relates of this Pharaoh, who was now king of Egypt, that he had reigned in great prosperity for twenty-five years, and was so elevated with his successes that he said God himself could not cast him out of his kingdom. But he shall soon be convinced of his mistake, and what he depended on shall be no defence; God can force men out of that in which they are most secure and easy. 2nd. All his fish shall be drawn out with him; his servants, his soldiers, and all that had a dependence on him, as he thought, but really such as he had dependence upon; these shall stick to his scales, adhere to their king, resolving to live and die with him. But, 3rd. The king and his army, the dragon and all the fish that stick to his scales, shall perish together as fish cast upon dry ground, and shall be meat to the beasts and fowls, ver. 5. Now this is supposed to have its accomplishment soon after, when this Pharaoh, in defence of Aricius, king of Libya, who had been expelled his kingdom by the Cyrenians, levied a great army, and went out against the Cyrenians, to re-establish his friend, but was defeated in battle and all his forces put to flight, which gave such disgust to his kingdom that they rose in rebellion against him. Thus was he left "thrown into the wilderness," he and all the fish of the river with him. Thus issue men's pride, and presumption, and carnal security. Thus men justly lose what they might call their own under God, when they call it their own against him.

3. The ground of the controversy God has with the Egyptians. It is because they have cheated his people; they encouraged them to expect relief and assistance from them when they were in distress, but failed them; ver. 6, 7, "Because they have been a staff of reed to the house of Israel." They pretended to be a staff to them to lean upon, but when any stress was laid upon them they were either weak and could not, or treacherous and would not, do that for them that was expected. They broke under them, to their great disappointment and amazement; so that they rent their shoulder, and "madest all their loins to be at a stand." The king of Egypt, it is probable, had encouraged Zedekiah to break his league with the king of Babylon, with a promise that he would stand by him, which, when he failed to do to any purpose, it could not but put them into a great consternation. God had told them long since that the Egyptians were broken reeds, Isa. xx. 6, 7. Rabshakeh had told them so, Isa. xxxvi. 6; and now they found it so. It was indeed the folly of Israel to trust them, and they were well enough served when they were deceived in them; God was righteous in suffering them to be so. But that is no excuse at all for the Egyptians' falsehood and treachery; nor shall it secure them from the judgments of that God who is and will be the avenger of all such wrongs. It is a great si and very provoking to God, as well as unjust, ungrateful, and very dishonoura' and unkind, to put a cheat upon those that put a confidence in us.

8 Therefore thus saith the Lord GOD;
Behold, I will bring a sword upon thee,
And cut off man and beast out of thee.

9 And the land of Egypt shall be desolate and waste;
And they shall know that I am the LORD: [it
Because he hath said, The river is mine, and I have made

10 Behold, therefore I am against thee, and against thy rivers, [desolate,
And I will make the land of Egypt utterly waste and
From the tower of Syene even unto the border of Ethiopia

11 No foot of man shall pass through it,
Nor foot of beast shall pass through it,
Neither shall it be inhabited forty years before the Babylonian forces, so would he. He is called "anointed," because he is a king.

xxviii. 18. No stress need be laid on the word "sanctuaries" here. It means temples, which had been subordinated to personal aims and interests.

xxviii. 21. Zidon, or Sidon, to the north of Tyre, was once the most important, but now inferior. On this account it is very briefly passed over. Its final destruction is not declared; and accordingly it has outlived its great rival, surviving all its misfortunes, and is still an inhabited city.

xxix. 1—7. The Pharaoh here mentioned was called Hophra, the Apries of the Greeks. He was defeated by Nebuchadnezzar. The "dragon" of our version is of course the crocodile, and the "river" is the Nile. The imagery in these verses is altogether Egyptian and quite intelligible.

xxix. 10. Our translators have here partly missed the meaning

12 And I will make the land of Egypt desolate
In the midst of the countries that are desolate,
And her cities among the cities that are laid waste shall be desolate forty years;
And I will scatter the Egyptians among the nations,
And will disperse them through the countries.
13 Yet thus saith the Lord GOD;
At the end of forty years will I gather the Egyptians
From the people whither they were scattered:
14 And I will bring again the captivity of Egypt,
And will cause them to return into the land of Pathros,
Into the land of their habitation;
And they shall be there a base kingdom.
15 It shall be the basest of the kingdoms;
Neither shall it exalt itself any more above the nations:
For I will diminish them, that they shall no more rule over the nations.
16 And it shall be no more the confidence of the house of [Israel,
Which bringeth their iniquity to remembrance,
When they shall look after them:
But they shall know that I am the Lord GOD.

CATARACTS OF THE NILE—THE BOUNDARY OF EGYPT.—ver. 10.

This explains the foregoing prediction, which was figurative, and looks something farther. Here is a prophecy,

First. Of the ruin of Egypt. The threatening of this is very full and particular, and the sin for which this ruin shall be brought upon them is their pride; ver. 9, they said, "The river is mine, and I have made it," therefore their land shall spew them out. 1. God is against them, both against the king and against the people; "against thee, and against thy rivers." Waters signify people and multitude, Rev. xvii. 15. 2. Multitudes of them shall be cut off by the sword of war—a sword which God will bring upon them, to destroy both man and beast, the sword of a civil war. 3. The country shall be depopulated. "The land of Egypt shall be desolate and waste," ver. 9; the country not cultivated, the cities not inhabited; the wealth of both was their pride, and that God will take away. It shall be "utterly waste;" 'wastes of waste,' so the margin reads it, "and desolate," ver. 10; neither men nor beasts shall pass through it, nor shall it be inhabited, ver. 11; it shall be desolate in the midst of the countries that are so, ver. 12. This was the effect not so much of those wars spoken of before, which were made by them, but of the war which the king of Babylon made upon them. It shall be desolate from one end of the land to the other, "from the tower of Syene even to the borders of Ethiopia." The sin of pride is enough to ruin a whole nation. 4. The people shall be dispersed and scattered among the nations, ver. 12; so that they who thought the balance of power was in their hand shall now become a contemptible people. Such a fall doth a haughty spirit go before.

Secondly. Of the restoration of Egypt after awhile, ver. 13. Egypt shall lie desolate forty years, ver. 12, and then "I will bring again the captivity of Egypt," ver. 14. Some date the forty years from Nebuchadnezzar's destroying Egypt, others from the desolation of Egypt some time before; however, they end about the first year of Cyrus, when the seventy years' captivity of Judah ended, or soon after; then this prediction was accomplished. 1. That God will gather the Egyptians out of all the countries into which they were dispersed, and make them to return to "the land of their habitation," and give them a settlement there again, ver. 14. Note, Though God will find out a way to humble the proud, yet he will not contend for ever; no, not with them in this world. 2. That yet they shall not make a figure again as they have done. Egypt shall be a kingdom again, but it shall be the "basest of the kingdoms," ver. 15; it shall have but little wealth and power, and shall not extend its conquests as formerly; shall be the tail of the nations, and not the head. It is a mercy that it shall become a kingdom again, but to humble it, it shall be a despicable kingdom; it shall be a long time before it recover any thing like its ancient lustre. For two reasons it shall be thus mortified. 1st. That it may not domineer over its neighbours, that it may not "exalt itself above the nations," nor "rule over the nations," as it has done, but that it may know what it is to be low and despised. Note, Those who abuse their power will justly be stripped of it, and God, as King of nations, will find out a way to maintain the injured rights and liberties, not only of his own, but other nations. 2nd. That it may not deceive the people of God; ver. 16, "It shall no more be the confidence of the house of Israel." They shall no more be in temptation to trust in it, as they have done, which is a sin that brings their iniquity to remembrance; that is, provokes God to punish them, not for that only, but for all their other sins. Or, it puts them in mind of their idolatries to return to them, when they look to the idolators, to repose a confidence in them. Note, The creatures we confide in are oftentimes therefore ruined, because there is no other way effectually to cure us of our confidence in them. Rather than Israel shall be ensnared again, the whole land of Egypt shall be laid waste. He that once gave Egypt for their ransom, Isa. xliii. 3, will now give Egypt for their cure; and it shall be destroyed rather than Israel shall not in this particular be reformed. God doth not only in justice, but in wisdom and goodness to us, break those creature stays we stay too much upon, and makes them to be no more, that they may be no more our confidence.

17 And it came to pass in the seven and twentieth year, in the first month, in the first day of the month, the word of the LORD came unto me, saying,

18 Son of man, Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon caused his [army
To serve a great service against Tyrus:
Every head was made bald, and every shoulder was [peeled:
Yet had he no wages, nor his army, for Tyrus,
For the service that he had served against it:
19 Therefore thus saith the Lord GOD;
Behold, I will give the land of Egypt
Unto Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon;
And he shall take her multitude,
And take her spoil, and take her prey;
And it shall be the wages for his army.
20 I have given him the land of Egypt
For his labour wherewith he served against it,
Because they wrought for me, saith the Lord GOD.
21 In that day will I cause the horn of the house of Israel to bud forth,
And I will give thee the opening of the mouth in the midst of them;
And they shall know that I am the LORD.

The date of this prophecy is observable; it was in the twenty-seventh year of Ezekiel's captivity, sixteen years after the prophecy in the former part of the chapter, and almost as long after those which follow in the next chapters; but it comes in here for the explication of all that was said against Egypt. After the destruction of Jerusalem, Nebuchadnezzar spent two or three campaigns in the conquest of the Ammonites and Moabites, and making himself master of their countries. Then he spent thirteen years in the siege of Tyre; during all that time the Egyptians were embroiled in war with the Cyreneans, and one with another, by which they were very much weakened and impoverished; and just at the end of the siege of Tyre God delivers this prophecy to Ezekiel, to signify to him that that utter destruction of Egypt, which he had foretold fifteen or sixteen years before, which had been but in part accomplished hitherto, should now be completed by Nebuchadnezzar. The prophecy which begins here, it should seem, is continued to the twentieth verse of the next chapter. And Dr. Lightfoot observes that it is the last prophecy we have of this prophet, and should have been last in the book; but it is laid here, that all the prophecies against Egypt might come together. The particular destruction of Pharaoh Hophrah, foretold in the former part of this chapter, was likewise foretold. Jer. xliv. 30. This general devastation of Egypt by Nebuchadnezzar was foretold, Jer. xliii. 10. Observe,

First. What success God would give to Nebuchadnezzar and his forces against Egypt. God gave him that land, that he might take the spoil and prey of it, ver. 19, 20. It was a cheap and easy prey, he subdued it with very little difficulty. The blood and treasure expended upon the conquest of it was inconsiderable; but it was a rich prey, and he carried off a great deal from it that was of value. Their having been divided among themselves, no doubt, gave a common enemy great advantage against them, who, when they had been so long preying upon one another, soon made a prey of them all. En! quo discordia cives perduxit miseros!—'What wretchedness does civil discord bring!' Jeremiah foretold that Nebuchadnezzar should array himself with the land of Egypt as a shepherd puts on his coat, which intimates what a rich and cheap prey it should be.

Secondly. Upon what considerations God would give Nebuchadnezzar this through taking Migdol as a "tower," and not as a proper name. The sense is, "From Migdol to Syene, even to the border of Cush," or Ethiopia. Migdol was in the very north, and Syene in the extreme south of Egypt, on the Ethiopian frontier. Syene is now called Assouan, and is near the first cataract of the Nile. The site of Migdol is disputed.

xxix. 11—13. It seems impossible to maintain the absolutely literal character of this prediction, either as regards the condition of Egypt or the period of forty years. The facts of history do not fairly justify the literal interpretation, but they justify us in saying that Egypt was greatly afflicted and distressed for a considerable period in and after the reign of Pharaoh-Hophra. Nebuchadnezzar certainly subjected the country.

xxix. 14. Pathros is supposed by Bochart, and various modern writers, to be the south district of Egypt, which, after Thebes, is called the Thebaid.

success against Egypt. It was to be a recompense to him for the hard service with which he had caused his army to serve against Tyre, ver. 18—20. 1. The taking of Tyre was a tedious piece of work, it cost Nebuchadnezzar abundance of blood and treasure; it held out thirteen years. All that time the Chaldean army was hard at it to make themselves masters of it. A large current of the sea, between Tyre and the continent, was filled up with earth, and many other difficulties, which were thought insuperable, they had to struggle with; but so great a prince, having begun such an undertaking, thought himself bound in honour to push it on, whatever it cost him. How many thousand lives have been sacrificed to such points of honour as this was! In prosecuting this siege "every head was made bald, and every shoulder peeled," with carrying burthens, and labouring in the water when they had a strong tide, and a strong town to contend with. Egypt, a large kingdom, being divided within itself, is easily conquered. Tyre, a single city, being unanimous, is hardly subdued. Those that have much to do in the world find some affairs go on a great deal more readily and easily than others. But, 2. In this service God owns that they wrought for him, ver. 20; he set them at work for the humbling of a proud city and its king, though they meant not so, neither did their heart think so, who were employed in it. Note, Even great men and ill men are tools that God makes use of, and are working for him even when they are pursuing their own covetous and ambitious designs; so wonderfully doth God overrule all to his own glory. Yet, 3. For this service he had no wages, nor his army. He was at a vast expense to take Tyre, and when he had it, though it was a very rich city, and he promised himself good plunder for his army from it, he was disappointed. The Tyrians sent away by ship their best effects, and threw the rest into the sea, so that they had nothing but bare walls. Thus are the children of this world ordinarily frustrated in the highest expectations from it. Therefore, 4. He shall have the spoil of Egypt to recompense him for his service against Tyre. Note, God will be behindhand with none for any service they did for him, but, one way or other, will recompense them for it; none shall kindle a fire on his altar for nought. The service done for him by worldly men, with worldly designs, shall be recompensed with a mere worldly reward, which his faithful servants, that have a sincere regard to his will and glory, would not be put off with. This accounts for the prosperity of wicked men in this world. God is in it paying them for some service or other in which he has made use of them. Verily they have their reward—let none envy it them. The conquest of Egypt is spoken of as Nebuchadnezzar's full reward; for that completed his dominion over the then known world, in a manner; that was the last of the kingdoms he subdued. When he was master of that he became the head of gold.

Thirdly. The mercy God had in store for the house of Israel soon after. When the tide is at the highest it will turn, and so it will when it is at the lowest. Nebuchadnezzar was in the zenith of his glory when he had conquered Egypt, but within a year after he ran mad, Dan. iv., was so seven years, and within a year or two after he recovered his senses he resigned his life. When he was at the highest, Israel was at the lowest; then were they at the depth of their captivity, their bones dead and dry; but in that day the horn of the house of Israel shall bud forth, ver. 21. The day of their deliverance shall begin to dawn, and they shall have some little reviving in their bondage, in the honour that shall be done, 1. To their princes. They are the horns of the house of Israel, the seat of their glory and power. These began to bud forth when Daniel and his fellows were highly preferred in Babylon. Daniel sat in the gate of the city, Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego were set over the affairs of the province, Dan. ii. 49; these were all of the king's seed and of the princes, Dan. i. 3. And it was within a year after the conquest of Egypt that they were thus preferred, and soon after three of them were made famous by the honour God put upon them in bringing them alive out of the burning fiery furnace. This might very well be called the budding forth of the horn of the house of Israel. And some years after this promise had a farther accomplishment in the enlargement and elevation of Jehoiachin, king of Judah, Jer. lii. 31, 32. They were both tokens of God's favour to Israel, and happy omens, 2. To their prophets; And "I will give thee the opening of the mouth." Though none of Ezekiel's prophecies after this are recorded, yet we have reason to think he went on prophesying, and with more liberty and boldness when Daniel and his followers were in power, and would be ready to protect him, not only from the Babylonians, but from the wicked ones of his own people. Note, It bodes well to a people when God enlargeth the liberties of his ministers, and they are countenanced and encouraged in their work.

CHAPTER XXX.

In this chapter we have, I. A continuation of the prophecy against Egypt, which we had in the latter part of the foregoing chapter, just before the desolation of that once flourishing kingdom was completed by Nebuchadnezzar; in which is foretold the destruction of all her allies and confederates, all her interests and concerns, and the several steps which the king of Babylon should take in pushing on this destruction, ver. 1—19. II. A repetition of a former prophecy against Egypt just before the desolation of it began by their own ill conduct, which gradually weakened them, and prepared the way for the king of Babylon, ver. 20—26. It is all much to the same purpose with what we had before.

THE word of the LORD came again unto me, saying, 2 Son of man, prophesy and say,
Thus saith the Lord GOD;
Howl ye, Woe worth the day!
3 For the day is near,
Even the day of the LORD is near, a cloudy day;
It shall be the time of the heathen.
4 And the sword shall come upon Egypt,
And great pain shall be in Ethiopia,
When the slain shall fall in Egypt,
And they shall take away her multitude,
And her foundations shall be broken down.
5 Ethiopia, and Libya, and Lydia,
And all the mingled people, and Chub,
And the men of the land that is in league,
Shall fall with them by the sword.
6 Thus saith the LORD;
They also that uphold Egypt shall fall;
And the pride of her power shall come down:
From the tower of Syene shall they fall in it by the sword,
Saith the Lord GOD.

SYENE.

7 And they shall be desolate in the midst of the countries that are desolate,
And her cities shall be in the midst of the cities that are wasted.
8 And they shall know that I am the LORD,
When I have set a fire in Egypt,
And when all her helpers shall be destroyed.
9 In that day shall messengers go forth from me in ships
To make the careless Ethiopians afraid,
And great pain shall come upon them, as in the day of Egypt:
For, lo, it cometh.
10 Thus saith the Lord GOD;
I will also make the multitude of Egypt to cease
By the hand of Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon.
11 He and his people with him, the terrible of the nations,
Shall be brought to destroy the land:
And they shall draw their swords against Egypt,
And fill the land with the slain
12 And I will make the rivers dry,
And sell the land into the hand of the wicked:
And I will make the land waste, and all that is therein,

RUINS AT KARNACK.—ver. 7.

xxix. 17, 18. The date given to this prophecy shows that it was given after the siege of Tyre, and that verse 18 is therefore a fragment of true history. According to some it justifies their opinion that Nebuchadnezzar did not capture Tyre, or that he did not plunder it. We all know that after suffering every horror which a siege can bring, a city may capitulate on such conditions that both itself and its credit may be maintained, yet with regard to the claims of the conqueror. The defeat of Tyre did not repay Nebuchadnezzar.

xxx. 5, 6. For Ethiopia, Libya, and Lydia the Hebrew has Cush, Phut, and Lud, and these ought to have remained. All three point to regions adjacent to Egypt, and it is especially wrong to give the name of Lydia in Asia Minor to Lud in Africa. Chub is also an unknown African tribe or region in alliance with Egypt. "The tower of Syene" should be "from Migdol to Syene," as in ch. xxix. 10.

xxx. 9. Whether the Egyptians would send vessels on the Nile to Ethiopia, or by way of the Red Sea, or both, is open to conjecture

By the hand of strangers:
I the LORD have spoken it.
13 Thus saith the Lord GOD;
I will also destroy the idols,
And I will cause their images to cease out of Noph;
And there shall be no more a prince of the land of
And I will put a fear in the land of Egypt. [Egypt:
14 And I will make Pathros desolate,
And will set fire in Zoan,
And will execute judgments in No.
15 And I will pour my fury upon Sin, the strength of
And I will cut off the multitude of No [Egypt;
16 And I will set fire in Egypt:
Sin shall have great pain,
And No shall be rent asunder,
And Noph shall have distresses daily.

18 At Tehaphnehes also the day shall be darkened,
When I shall break there the yokes of Egypt:
And the pomp of her strength shall cease in her:
As for her, a cloud shall cover her,
And her daughters shall go into captivity
19 Thus will I execute judgments in Egypt:
And they shall know that I am the LORD.

The prophecy of the destruction of Egypt is here very full and particular, as well as in the general very frightful. What can protect a provoking people when a righteous God comes forth to contend with them?

First. It shall be a very lamentable destruction, and such as shall occasion great sorrow; ver. 2, 3, "Howl ye," you may justly shriek now it is coming, for you will be made to shriek and make hideous outcries when it comes. Cry out, "Woe worth the day!" Or, 'Oh the day! alas, because of the day!' the terrible day, woe and alas! "for the day is near;" the day we have so long dreaded, so long deserved; it is the "day of the Lord," the day in which he will manifest himself as a God of vengeance. You have your day now, when you carry all before you, and trample on all about you; but God will have his day now shortly, the day of the revelation of his righteous judgment, Ps. xxxvii. 13. It will be a cloudy day, that is, dark and dismal, without the shining forth of any comfort; and it shall threaten a storm, fire and brimstone, and a horrible tempest. It shall be the time of the heathen, that is, of reckoning with the heathen for all their heathenish practices; that time which David spoke of when God would pour out his fury upon the heathen, Ps. lxxix. 6; when they should sink, Ps. ix. 15.

Secondly. It shall be the destruction of Egypt, and of all the states and countries in confederacy with her, and in her neighbourhood. 1. Egypt herself shall fall; ver. 4, "The sword shall come upon Egypt," the sword of the Chaldeans, and it shall be a victorious sword, for the slain shall fall in Egypt, fall by it, fall before it. Is the country populous? they shall take away her multitude. Is it strong and well fixed? "Her foundations shall be broken down," and then the fabric, though built never so fine, never so high, will fall of course. 2. Her neighbours and inmates shall fall with her. When the slain fall so thick in Egypt "great pain shall be in Ethiopia," both that in Africa, which is on the neighbourhood of Egypt on one side, and that in Asia, which is near to it on the other side. When their neighbour's house was on fire they could not but apprehend their own in danger. Nor were their fears groundless, for they shall all "fall with them by the sword," ver. 5. Ethiopia and Libya, Chush and Phut, so the Hebrew names are, two of the sons of Ham who are mentioned, and Mizraim, that is, Egypt, between them, Gen. x. 6. The Lydians, that were famous archers, are spoken of as confederates with Egypt, Jer. xlvi. 9. These shall fall with Egypt and Chub—the Chaldeans, the inhabitants of the inner Libya. These and others were the mingled people; there were those of all these and other countries that, upon some account or other, resided in Egypt, as did also the men of the land that is in league,—some of the remains of the people of Israel and Judah, the children of the covenant, or league, as they are called, Acts iii. 25; the children of the promise, Gal. iv. 28. These sojourned in Egypt, contrary to God's command, and these shall fall with them. Note Those that will take their lot with God's enemies shall have their lot with them; yea, though they be in profession the men of the land that is in league with God.

Thirdly. All that pretend to support the sinking interests of Egypt shall come down under her, shall come down with her, ver. 6. They that uphold Egypt shall fall, and then Egypt must fall of course. See the justice of God; Egypt pretended to uphold Jerusalem when that was tottering, but proved a deceitful reed, and now they that pretended to uphold Egypt shall prove no better. Those that deceive others are commonly paid in their own coin, they are themselves deceived. 1. Doth Egypt think herself upheld by the absolute authority and dominion of her king? the pride of her power shall come down, ver. 6. The power of the king of Egypt was his pride; but that shall be broken and humbled. 2. Is the multitude of her people her support? these shall fall by the sword, even from the tower of Syene, which is in the utmost corner of the land, from that side of it by which the enemy shall enter. Both the countries and the cities, the husbandmen and the merchants, shall be desolate, ver. 7, as before, ch. xxix. 12. Even "the multitude of Egypt" shall be made to cease, ver. 10; that populous country shall be depopulated. The land shall be even "filled with the slain," ver. 11. 3. Is the river Nile her support, and the several channels of it a defence to her? I will make the rivers dry, ver. 12, so that those natural fortifications which were thought impregnable, because impassable, shall stand them in no stead. 4. Are her idols a support to her? Those shall be destroyed, those imaginary upholders shall appear more than ever to be imaginary, for so images are when they pretend to be deliverers and strongholds; ver. 13, "I will cause their images to cease out of Noph." 5. Is her royal family her support? "There shall be no more a prince in the land of Egypt." The royal family shall be extirpated and extinguished, which had continued so long. 6. Is her courage her support? and doth she think to uphold herself by the bravery of her men of war, who have now of late been inured to service? That shall fail; "I will put a fear in the land of Egypt." 7. Is the rising generation her support? Is she upheld by her children? And doth she think herself happy because she hath her quiver full of them? Alas! "the young men shall fall by the sword," ver. 17, and "the daughters shall go into captivity," ver. 18, and so she shall be robbed of all her hopes.

Fourthly. God shall inflict these desolating judgments on Egypt; ver. 8, "They shall know that I am the Lord," and greater than all gods, than all their gods, when I have "set a fire in Egypt." The fire that consumes nations is of God's kindling, and when he sets fire to a people "all their helpers shall be destroyed;" those that go about to quench the fire shall themselves be devoured by it, for who can stand before him when he is angry? When he pours out his fury upon a place, when he sets fire to it, ver. 15, 16, neither its strength nor its multitude can stand it in any stead.

Fifthly. The king of Babylon and his army shall be employed as instruments of this destruction. "The multitude of Egypt shall be made to cease," and be quite cut off, "by the hand of the king of Babylon," ver. 10. They that undertook to protect Israel from the king of Babylon shall not be able to protect themselves. It is said of the Chaldeans who should destroy Egypt, 1. That they are strangers, ver. 12, who therefore shall shew no compassion for old acquaintance sake, but shall carry it strangely towards them. 2. That they are "the terrible of the nations," ver. 11, both in respect of force and in respect of fierceness; and being terrible, they shall make terrible work. 3. That they are the wicked, who will not be restrained by reason and conscience, the laws of nature or the laws of nations, for they are without law. "I will sell the land into the hand of the wicked." They do violence unjustly,—wicked as they are, yet, as far as they are instruments in God's hand of executing his judgments, it is on his part justly done. Note, God often makes one wicked man a scourge to another, and even wicked men acquire a title to prey, jure belli,—'by the laws of war,' for God "sells it into their hands."

Sixthly. No place in the land of Egypt shall be exempted from the fury of the Chaldean army, not the strongest, not the remotest; "The sword shall go through the land." Divers places are here named—Pathros, Zoan, and No, ver. 14; Sin and Noph, ver. 15, 16; Aven and Pi-beseth, ver. 17; Tehaphnehes, ver. 18. These shall be made desolate, shall be fired, and God's judgments shall be executed upon them, and his fury poured out upon them. Their strength and multitude shall be cut off; they shall have great pain, shall be rent asunder with fear, and shall have distresses daily; their day shall be darkened, their honours, comforts, and hopes shall be extinguished; their yokes shall be broken, so that they shall no more oppress and tyrannize as they have done; the "pomp of their strength shall cease," and "a cloud shall cover them," a cloud so thick that through it they shall not see any hopes, nor shall their glory be seen or shine farther. And, lastly, the Ethiopians that are at a distance from them, as well as those that are mingled with them, shall share in their pain and terror; God will by his providence spread the rumour, and the careless Ethiopians shall be made afraid, ver. 9. Note, God can strike a terror upon those that are most secure. Fearfulness shall, when he pleases, surprize the most presumptuous hypocrites.

The close of this prediction leaves, 1. The land of Egypt mortified. "Thus will I execute judgment on Egypt," ver. 19. The destruction of Egypt is the executing of judgments, which intimates not only that it is done justly for its sins, but that it is done regularly and legally, by a judicial sentence. All the executions God doth are according to his judgments. 2. The God of Israel herein glorified; "They shall know that I am the Lord." The Egyptians shall be made to know it, and the people of God shall be made to know it better. "The Lord is known by the judgments which he executeth."

20 And it came to pass in the eleventh year, in the first month, in the seventh day of the month, that the word of the LORD came unto me, saying,
21 Son of man, I have broken the arm of Pharaoh king of Egypt;
And, lo, it shall not be bound up to be healed,
To put a roller to bind it, to make it strong to hold the 22 Therefore thus saith the Lord GOD; [sword
Behold, I am against Pharaoh king of Egypt,
And will break his arms, the strong, and that which was broken;
And I will cause the sword to fall out of his hand.

xxx. 13—18. The places mentioned here are mostly named in other portions of Holy Writ. Noph is Memphis, a royal city, once of great magnitude and importance, near the modern Cairo. For Pathros, see chap. xxix. 14. Zoan was the Tanis of the Greeks, a large city in the north-east of Egypt, towards the Mediterranean, and now called San. Sin is regarded as identical with Pelusium, in the same direction as Zoan. No, or No-Ammon, was a city in the district of Pathros. It is named along with Zoan very likely in order to show how places far asunder would be involved in common calamity. Aven is understood to be On, or Heliopolis; and Pi-beseth is evidently Bubastis, both well-known names in Egyptian literature. The other name, Tehaphnehes, is variously spelt, but it is probably a place near Pelusium, and which was called Daphne by the Greeks, who imitated the sound of the original name.

xxx. 20—26. The date of this prophecy in the "eleventh year" shows that it was given sixteen years before that in chap. xxix. 17, &c.

23 And I will scatter the Egyptians among the nations,
And will disperse them through the countries.
24 And I will strengthen the arms of the king of Babylon,
And put my sword in his hand:
But I will break Pharaoh's arms,
And he shall groan before him with the groanings of a deadly wounded man.
25 But I will strengthen the arms of the king of Babylon,
And the arms of Pharaoh shall fall down;
And they shall know that I am the LORD,
When I shall put my sword into the hand of the king of Babylon,
And he shall stretch it out upon the land of Egypt.
26 And I will scatter the Egyptians among the nations,
And disperse them among the countries;
And they shall know that I am the LORD.

This short prophecy of the weakening the power of Egypt was delivered about the time that the army of the Egyptians which attempted to raise the siege of Jerusalem were frustrated in their enterprise, and returned re infecta, —'without accomplishing their purpose;' whereupon the king of Babylon renewed the siege, and carried his point. The kingdom of Egypt was very ancient, and had been many ages considerable; that of Babylon was but lately arrived to its great pomp and power, being built upon the ruins of the kingdom of Assyria. Now it is with them as it is with families and states, some are growing up, others are declining and going back; one must increase, and the other must of course decrease.

First. It is here foretold that the kingdom of Egypt shall grow weaker and weaker. The extent of his territories shall be abridged, his wealth and power shall be diminished, and he shall become less able than ever to help either himself or his friend. 1. This was in part done already; ver. 21, "I have broken the arm of Pharaoh" some time ago. One arm of that kingdom might well be reckoned broken when the king of Babylon routed the forces of Pharaoh-necho at Carchemish, Jer. xlvi. 2, and made himself master of "all that pertained to Egypt from the river of Egypt to Euphrates," 2 Kin. xxiv. 7. Egypt had been long in gathering strength and extending its dominions; and, therefore, that there may be a proportion observed in providence, it loseth its strength slowly and by degrees. It was soon after the king of Egypt slew good king Josiah, and in the same reign, that its arm was thus broken, and it received that fatal blow which it never recovered. Before Egypt's heart and neck were broken its arm was. God's judgments come upon a people by steps, that they may meet him repenting. When the arm of Egypt is broken, "it shall not be bound up to be healed," for none can heal the wounds that God gives but he himself. Those whom he disarms, whom he disables, cannot again hold the sword. 2. This was to be done again. One arm was broken before, and something was done towards the setting of it, towards the healing of the deadly wound that was given to the beast. But now, ver. 22, "I am against Pharaoh, and will break" both "his arms;" both the strong, and that which was broken and set again. Note, If lesser judgments do not prevail to humble and reform sinners, God will send greater. Now God will "cause the sword to fall out of his hand," which he caught hold of, as thinking himself strong enough to hold it. It is repeated, ver. 24, "I will break Pharaoh's arms." He had been a cruel oppressor to the people of God formerly, and of late the staff of a broken rod to them; and now God, by breaking his arms, reckons with him for both. God justly breaks that power which is abused, either to put wrongs upon people or to put cheats upon them. But this is not all. 1st. The king of Egypt shall be dispirited when he finds himself in danger of the king of Babylon's forces, he "shall groan before him with the groaning of a deadly wounded man." Note, It is common for those that are most elevated in their prosperity to be most dejected and disheartened in their adversity. Pharoah, even before the sword toucheth him, shall groan as if he had received his death wound. 2nd. The people of Egypt shall be dispersed, ver. 23; and again, ver. 26, "I will scatter them among the nations." Other nations had mingled with them, ver. 5; now they shall be mingled with other nations, and seek shelter in them, and so be made to know that the Lord is righteous.

Secondly. It is here foretold that the kingdom of Babylon shall grow stronger and stronger, ver. 24, 25. It is said, and repeated, that God will, 1. Put strength into the king of Babylon's arms, that he may be able to go through the service he is designed for. 2. That he will put a sword, his sword, into the king of Babylon's hand, which signified his giving him a commission, and furnishing him with arms for carrying on a war, particularly against Egypt. Note, As judges on the bench, like Pilate, Jno. xix. 11, so generals in the field, like Nebuchadnezzar, have no power but what is given them from above.

CHAPTER XXXI.

The prophecy of this chapter, as the two chapters before, is against Egypt, and designed for the humbling and mortifying of Pharaoh. In passing sentence upon great criminals it is usual to consult precedents, and to see what has been done to others in the like case, which serves both to direct and justify the proceedings. Pharaoh stands indicted at the bar of Divine justice for his pride and haughtiness, and the injuries he had done to God's people; but he thinks himself so high, so great, as not to be accountable to any authority; so strong, and so well guarded, as not to be conquerable by any force. The prophet is therefore directed to make a report to him of the case of the king of Assyria, whose head city was Nineveh. I. He must shew him how great a monarch the king of Assyria had been, what a vast empire he had, what a mighty sway he bore; the king of Egypt, as great as he was, could not go beyond him, ver. 3—9. II. He must then shew him how like he was to the king of Assyria, in pride and carnal security, ver. 10. III. He must next read him the history of the fall and ruin of the king of Assyria, what a noise it made among the nations, and what a warning it gave to all potent princes to take heed of pride, ver. 11—17. IV. He must leave the king of Egypt to apply all this to himself, to see his own face in the looking-glass of the king of Assyria's sin, and to foresee his own fall through the perspective glass of his ruin, ver. 18.

AND it came to pass in the eleventh year, in the third month, in the first day of the month, that the word of the LORD came unto me, saying,
2 Son of man, speak unto Pharaoh king of Egypt, and to his multitude;
Whom art thou like in thy greatness?
3 Behold, the Assyrian was a cedar in Lebanon with fair [branches,
And with a shadowing shroud, and of an high stature;
And his top was among the thick boughs.
4 The waters made him great, the deep set him up on high
With her rivers running round about his plants,
And sent out her little rivers unto all the trees of the [field.
5 Therefore his height was exalted above all the trees of the field,
And his boughs were multiplied, and his branches became [long
Because of the multitude of waters, when he shot forth.
6 All the fowls of heaven made their nests in his boughs,
And under his branches did all the beasts of the field bring forth their young,
And under his shadow dwelt all great nations
7 Thus was he fair in his greatness,
In the length of his branches:
For his root was by great waters.
8 The cedars in the garden of God could not hide him:
The fir trees were not like his boughs,
And the chesnut trees were not like his branches;
Nor any tree in the garden of God was like unto him in his beauty.
9 I have made him fair by the multitude of his branches:
So that all the trees of Eden, that were in the garden of God, envied him.

This prophecy bears date the month before Jerusalem was taken, as that in the close of the foregoing chapter about four months before. When God's people were in the depth of their distress it would be some comfort to them, as it would serve likewise for a check to the pride and malice of their neighbours that insulted over them, to be told from heaven that the cup was going round, even the cup of trembling; that it would shortly be taken out of the hands of God's people and put into the hands of those that hated them, Isa. li. 22, 23. In this prophecy,

First. The prophet is directed to put Pharaoh upon searching the records for a case parallel to his own; ver. 2, Speak to Pharaoh, and to his multitude, to the multitude of his attendants, that contributed so much to his magnificence, and the multitude of his armies, that contributed so much to his strength. These he was proud of, these he put a confidence in, and they were as proud of him, and trusted as much in him. Now ask him, "Whom art thou like in thy greatness?" We are apt to judge of ourselves by comparison. Those that think highly of themselves fancy themselves as great and as good as such and such that have been mightily celebrated. The flatterers of princes tell them whom they equal in pomp and grandeur. Well, saith God, let him pitch upon the most famous potentate that ever was, and it shall be allowed that he is like him in greatness, and no way inferior to him; but, let him pitch upon whom he will, he will find that his day came to fall; he will see there was an end of all his perfection, and must therefore expect the end of his own in like manner. Note, The falls of others both into sin and ruin are intended as admonitions to us not to be secure or high-minded, nor to think we stand out of danger.

Secondly. He is directed to shew him an instance of one whom he resembled in greatness, and that was the Assyrian, ver. 3, whose monarchy had continued from Nimrod. Sennacherib was one of the mighty princes of that monarchy, but it sunk down soon after him, and the monarchy of Nebuchadnezzar was built upon its ruins, or rather grafted upon its stock. Let us now see what a flourishing prince the king of Assyria was. He is here compared to a stately cedar, ver. 3. The glory of the house of David is illustrated by the same similitude, ch. xvii. 3. The olive-tree, the fig-tree, and the vine, which were all fruit-trees, had refused to be promoted over the trees because they would not leave their fruitfulness, Jud. ix. 8. And therefore the choice falls upon the cedar, that is stately and strong, and casts a great shadow, but bears no fruit.

1. The Assyrian monarch was a tall cedar, such as the cedars in Lebanon generally were, of a high stature, and "his top among the thick boughs;" he was attended by other princes that were tributaries to him, and was surrounded by a life-guard of brave men. He surpassed all the princes in his neighbourhood, they were all shrubs to him; ver. 5, "His height was exalted above all the trees of the field," they were many of them very high, but he overtopped them all, ver. 8. The cedars, even those in the garden of Eden, which we may suppose were the best of the kind, "would not hide him," but his top branches outshot theirs.

2. He was a spreading cedar. His branches did not only run up in height, but run out in breadth, noting that this mighty prince was not only exalted to dignity and honour, and had a name above the names of the great men of the earth but that he obtained great dominion and power; his territories were large, and he extended his conquests far, and his influence much farther. This cedar, like a vine, sent forth "his branches to the sea, to the river," Ps. lxxx. 11; "His boughs were multiplied, his branches became long," ver. 5, so that "he had a shadowing shroud," ver. 3. This contributed very much to his beauty, that he grew proportionably large as well as high. He was "fair in his greatness, in the length of his branches," ver. 7, very comely as well as very stately, "fair by the multitude of his branches," ver. 9. His large dominions were well managed, like a spreading tree that is kept in shape and good order by the skill of the gardener, so as to be very beautiful to the eye. His government was as amiable in the eyes of the wise men as it was admirable in the eyes of all men. The fir-trees were not like his boughs, so straight, so green, so regular, nor xxxi. 1, 2. This prediction is curious. After indicating that its object is Pharaoh, it proceeds to compare the glory of the Egyptian monarch with that of the Assyrian, and to intimate that as they were alike in grandeur, they would be alike in ruin. It is to be borne in mind that the Assyrian empire had already fallen, having been supplanted by the Babylonian.

xxxi. 8, 9. The expression, "garden of God," and the word "Eden," several times occurring in Ezekiel, are very properly regarded as allusions to the primeval paradise. What are here called "fir-trees" may, as elsewhere, be almost any tree belonging to the pine and fir tribes. The word for chesnuts is only found here and in Gen. xxx. 37, and rather signifies a maple or plane-tree than a chesnut. As a fact, the plane-tree is common and flourishes much in Palestine, where chesnut-trees are rare.

were the branches of chesnut-trees like his branches, so thick, so spreading; in short, "no tree in the garden of God," in Eden, in Babylon, for that stood where Paradise was planted. There where there was every tree that was pleasant to the sight, Gen. ii. 9, there was none like "to this cedar in beauty;" that is, in all the nations about there was no prince so much admired, so much courted, and whom everybody was so much in love with, as the king of Assyria. Many of them did virtuously, but he excelled them all, outshone them all. "All the trees of Eden envied him," ver. 9. When they found they could not compare with him they were angry and grieved that he so far outdid them, and secretly grudged him the praise due to him. Note, It is the unhappiness of those who in any thing excel others that thereby they make themselves the objects of envy; and "who can stand before envy?"

3. He was serviceable, as far as a standing, growing cedar could be, and that was only by his shadow; ver. 6, "All the fowls of heaven," some of all sorts, "made their nests in his boughs," where they were sheltered from the injuries of the weather. The beasts of the field put themselves under the protection of his branches; there they were levant and couchant, there they brought forth their young, for they had there a natural covert from the heat and from the storm. The meaning of all is, "Under his shadow dwelt all great nations;" they all fled to him for safety, and were willing to swear allegiance to him if he would undertake to protect them, as travellers in a shower come under thick trees for shelter. Note, Those who have power ought to use it for the protection and comfort of those whom they have power over, for to that end they are intrusted with power. Even the bramble, if he be anointed king, invites the trees to come and trust in his shadow, Jud. ix. 15. But the utmost security that any creature, even the king of Assyria himself, can give, is but like the shadow of a tree, which is but a scanty and slender protection, and leaves a man many ways exposed. Let us, therefore, flee to God for protection, and he will take us under the shadow of his wings, where we shall be warmer and safer than under the shadow of the strongest and stateliest cedar. Ps. xvii. 8; xci. 4.

4. He seemed to be settled and established in his greatness and power. For, 1st. It was God that made him fair, ver. 9; for by him kings reign. He was comely with the comeliness that God put upon him. Note, God's hand must be eyed and owned in the advancement of the great men of the earth, and therefore we must not envy them; yet will not that secure the continuance of their prosperity, for he that gave them their beauty, if they be deprived of it, knows how to turn it into deformity. 2nd. He seemed to have a good bottom. This cedar was not like the "heath in the desert, made to inhabit the parched places," Jer. xvii. 6; it was not a "root in a dry ground," Isa. liii. 2. No, he had abundance of wealth to support his power and grandeur; ver. 4, "The waters made him great;" he had vast treasures, large stores and magazines, which were as "the deep that set him up on high;" constant revenues coming in by taxes, customs, and crown rents, which were "as rivers running round about his plants." These enabled him to strengthen and secure his interests everywhere; for he "sent out his little rivers," or conduits, "to all the trees of the field" to water them; and when they had "maintenance from the king's palace," Ezr. iv. 14, and "their country was nourished by the king's country," Acts xii. 20, they would be serviceable and faithful to him. Those that have wealth flowing upon them in great riches find themselves obliged to send it out again in little rivers; for, "as goods are increased they are increased that eat them," and the more men have the more occasion they have for it; yea, and still the more they have occasion for. The branches of this cedar became long, because of the multitude of waters which fed them, ver. 5; and ver. 7, "his root was by great waters," which seems to secure it that its "leaf should never wither," Ps. i. 3; that it should not "see when heat comes," Jer. xvii. 8. Note, Worldly people may seem to have an established prosperity, yet it only seems so, Job v. 7; Ps. xxxvii. 35.

10 Therefore thus saith the Lord GOD;
Because thou hast lifted up thyself in height,
And he hath shot up his top among the thick boughs,
And his heart is lifted up in his height;
11 I have therefore delivered him into the hand of the mighty one of the heathen;
He shall surely deal with him:
I have driven him out for his wickedness.
12 And strangers, the terrible of the nations, have cut him off,
And have left him:
Upon the mountains and in all the valleys his branches are fallen,
And his boughs are broken by all the rivers of the land;
And all the people of the earth are gone down from his shadow,
And have left him.
13 Upon his ruin shall all the fowls of the heaven remain,
And all the beasts of the field shall be upon his branches:
14 To the end
That none of all the trees by the waters exalt themselves for their height,
Neither shoot up their top among the thick boughs,
Neither their trees stand up in their height, all that drink water:
For they are all delivered unto death,
To the nether parts of the earth,
In the midst of the children of men,
With them that go down to the pit.
15 Thus saith the Lord GOD;
In the day when he went down to the grave I caused a mourning:
I covered the deep for him,
And I restrained the floods thereof, and the great waters were stayed:
And I caused Lebanon to mourn for him,
And all the trees of the field fainted for him.
16 I made the nations to shake at the sound of his fall
When I cast him down to hell with them that descend into the pit:
And all the trees of Eden, the choice and best of Lebanon, all that drink water,
Shall be comforted in the nether parts of the earth.
17 They also went down into hell with him
Unto them that be slain with the sword;
And they that were his arm, that dwelt under his shadow
In the midst of the heathen
18 To whom art thou thus like in glory
And in greatness among the trees of Eden?
Yet shalt thou be brought down with the trees of Eden
Unto the nether parts of the earth:
Thou shalt lie in the midst of the uncircumcised
With them that be slain by the sword. [GOD
This is Pharaoh and all his multitude, saith the Lord

We have seen the king of Egypt resembling the king of Assyria in pomp, and power, and prosperity, how like he was to him in his greatness. Now here we see,

First. How he doth likewise resemble him in his pride, ver. 10; for as face answers to face in a glass so doth one corrupt carnal heart to another, and the same temptations of a prosperous state by which some are overcome are fatal to many others too. "Thou," O king of Egypt, "hast lifted up thyself in height," hast been proud of thy wealth and power, ch. xxix. 3. And just so "he," that is, the king of Assyria, when he had "shot up his top among the thick boughs," his heart was presently "lifted up in his height," and he grew insolent and imperious, set God himself at defiance, and trampled upon his people. Witness the messages and letter which the great king, the king of Assyria, sent to Hezekiah, Isa. xxxvi. 4. How haughtily doth he speak of himself and his own achievements, how scornfully of that great and good man! There were other sins in which the Egyptians and the Assyrians did concur, particularly that of oppressing God's people. It is charged upon them both together, Isa. lii. 4; but here that sin is run up to its cause, and that was pride, for it is the contempt of the proud that they are filled with. Note, When men's outward condition riseth their minds commonly rise with it; and it is very rare to find an humble spirit in the midst of great advancements.

Secondly. How he shall therefore resemble him in his fall. And for the opening of this part of the comparison,

1. Here is a history of the fall of the king of Assyria. For his part, saith God, ver. 11, "I have therefore," because he was thus lifted up, "delivered him into the hand of the mighty one of the heathen." Cyaxares, king of the Medes, in the twenty-sixth year of his reign, in conjunction with Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, in the first year of his reign, destroyed Nineveh, and with it the Assyrian empire. Nebuchadnezzar, though he was not then, yet afterwards became, very emphatically the mighty one of the heathen; most mighty among them, and most mighty over them to prevail against them. 1st. It is God himself that orders his ruin. "I have delivered him into the hand" of the executioner, "I have driven him out." Note, God is the judge who puts down one and sets up another, Ps. lxxvi. 7; and, when he pleaseth, he can extirpate and expel those who think themselves, and seem to others, to have taken deepest root. And the mightiest ones of the heathen could not gain their point against those they contended with, if the Almighty himself did not deliver them into their hands. 2nd. It is his own sin that procures his ruin. "I have driven him out for his wickedness." None are driven out from their honour, power, and possessions, but it is "for their wickedness." None of our comforts are ever lost but what have been a thousand times forfeited. If the wicked are driven away, it is in their wickedness. 3rd. It is a "mighty one of the heathen" that shall be the instrument of his ruin; for God often employs one wicked man in punishing another. "He shall surely deal with him," shall know how to manage him, as great as he is. Note, Proud imperious men will, sooner or later, meet with their match. Now, in this history of the fall of the Assyrian, observe,

First. A continuation of the similitude of the cedar. He grew very high, and extended his boughs very far; but his day comes to fall. 1*st.* This stately cedar was cropped; "The terrible of the nations cut him off." Soldiers who, being both armed and commissioned to kill and slay, and to destroy, may well be reckoned among "the terrible of the nations," they have lopped off his branches first, have seized upon some parts of his dominion and forced them out of his hands; so that in all mountains and valleys of the nations about, in the highlands and lowlands, and by all the rivers, there were cities or countries that were broken off from the Assyrian monarchy, that had been subjected to it, but were either revolted or recovered from it. Its feathers were borrowed, and when every bird had fetched back its own it was naked like the stump of a tree. 2*nd.* It was deserted. "All the people of the earth," that had fled to him for shelter, are "gone down from his shadow, and have left him." When he was disabled to give them protection they thought they no longer owed him allegiance. Let not great men be proud of the number of those that attend them, and have a dependence upon them; it is only for what they can get. When providence frowns upon them their retinue is soon dispersed and scattered from them. 3*rd.* It was insulted over, and its fall triumphed in; ver. 13, "Upon his ruin shall all the fowls of the heaven remain," to tread upon the broken branches of this cedar. Its fall is triumphed in by the other trees, who were angry to see themselves overtopped so much; "all the trees of Eden" that were cut down and fallen before him, all that drank water of the rain of heaven, as the stump of the tree that is left in the south is said to be "wet with the dew of heaven," Dan. iv. 23, and to bud "through the scent of water," Job. xiv. 9. They shall be comforted in the nether parts of the earth, when they see this proud cedar brought as low as themselves. Solamen miseris socios habuisse doloris,—'To have companions in woe is a solace to those who suffer.' But, on the contrary, the trees of Lebanon, that are yet standing in their height and strength, "mourned for him," and "the trees of the field fainted for him," because they could not but read their own destiny in his fall. "Howl, fir-trees, if the cedar be shaken," for they cannot expect to stand long, Zec. xi. 2.

xxxi. 11. The first clause is not well rendered. The Hebrew is, "And I gave him into the hand of the god of the nations." The "nations" are no doubt Gentile or heathen nations, but who is the "god," or "El," as the original has it? Various names have been suggested, as Cyrus, Nabopolassar, and Nebuchadnezzar. As the founders of the Babylonian empire must be meant, we prefer the opinion of those who suppose the "god" is either Nabopolassar, the conqueror of Assyria, or Nebuchadnezzar, who succeeded him.

xxxi. 15. This verse is very vivid in its imagery:—"Thus saith the Lord Adonai, On the day when he went down to Sheol I caused a mourning: I covered the deep because of him, and restrained its floods, and the many waters were restrained; and Lebanon lamented because of him, and all the trees of the field are faint because of him." It is the fall of the Assyrian that is referred to.

xxxi. 16, 17. These verses may be made plainer by a new translation:—"At the sound of his fall I made the nations tremble, when

Secondly. A reddition of the similitude of the cedar. By the cutting down of this cedar is signified the slaughter of this mighty monarch, and all his adherents and supporters, they are all "delivered to death," to fall by the sword, as the cedar by the axe. He and his princes, who, he said, were altogether kings, go down to the grave, "to the nether parts of the earth, in the midst of the children of men," as common persons of no quality or distinction; they "die like men," Ps. lxxxii. 7; they were carried away with "them that go down to the pit," and their pomp did neither protect them nor "descend after them." Again, ver. 16, he was "cast down to hell with them that descend into the pit." He went into the state of the dead, and was buried as others are, in obscurity and oblivion. Again, ver. 17, "They all that were his arm," on whom he stayed, by whom he acted and exerted his power, all "that dwelt under his shadow," his subjects and allies, and all that had any dependence on him, they all went down into ruin, down into the grave "with him, unto them that were slain with the sword," to those that were cut off by untimely deaths before them, under the load of guilt and shame. When great men fall, a great many fall with them, as a great many in like manner have fallen before them.

Thirdly. What God designed and aimed at in bringing down this mighty monarch and his monarchy. He designed thereby, 1*st.* To give an alarm to the nations about; to put them all to a stand, to put them all to a gaze; ver. 16, "I made the nations to shake at the sound of his fall." They were all struck with astonishment to see so mighty a prince brought down thus; it gave a shock to all their confidences, every one thinking his turn would be next, "when he went down to the grave;" ver. 15, "I caused a mourning," a general lamentation, as the whole kingdom goes into mourning at the death of the king. In token of this general grief "I covered the deep for him," put that into black, gave a stop to business in complaisance to this universal mourning: "I restrained the floods, and the great waters were stayed," that they might run in another channel, that of lamentation. Lebanon particularly, the kingdom of Syria, that was sometimes in confederacy with the Assyrian, mourned for him, as the ally of Babylon, Rev. xviii. 9. 2*nd.* To give an admonition to the nations about, and to their kings; ver. 14, "to the end that none of all the trees by the waters," though never so advantageously situated, "may exalt themselves for their height," may be proud and conceited of themselves, and "shoot up their top among the thick boughs," looking disdainfully upon others, nor "stand upon themselves for their height," confiding in their own policies and powers, as if they could never be brought down. Let them all take warning by the Assyrian, for he once held up his head as high, and thought he kept his footing as firm, as any of them; but his pride went before his destruction, and his confidence failed him. Note, The fall of proud, presumptuous men is intended for a warning to others to keep humble. It had been well for Nebuchadnezzar, who was himself active is bringing down the Assyrian, if he had taken the admonition.

2. Here is a prophecy of the fall of the king of Egypt in like manner, ver. 18. He thought himself like the "Assyrian in glory and greatness," overtopping "all the trees of Eden," as the cypress doth the shrubs. But thou also "shalt be brought down," with other the trees that are pleasant to the sight, as those in Eden. Thou shalt be brought to the grave, to the nether or lower parts of the earth, thou shalt "lie in the midst of the uncircumcised," that die in their uncleanness, die ingloriously, die under a curse, and at a distance from God. Then shall those whom he has trampled upon triumph over him, saying, "This is Pharaoh, and all his multitude." See how mean he looks, how low he lies; see what all his pomp and pride is come to; here is all that is left of him. Note, Great men and great multitudes, with the great figure and great noise they make in the world, when God comes to contend with them will soon become little, less than nothing, such as Pharaoh and all his multitude.

CHAPTER XXXII.

Still we are upon the destruction of Pharaoh and Egypt, which is wonderfully enlarged upon, and with a great deal of emphasis. When we read so very much of Egypt's ruin, no less than six several prophecies at divers times delivered concerning it, we are ready to think, surely there is some special reason for it. And, I. Perhaps it may look as far back as the book of Genesis, where we find, ch. xv. 14, that God determined to judge Egypt for oppressing his people; and though that was in part fulfilled in the plagues of Egypt, and the drowning of Pharaoh, yet in this destruction here foretold these old scores were reckoned for, and that was to have its full accomplishment. II. Perhaps it may look as far forward as the book of the Revelation, where we find that the great enemy of the gospel church, that makes war with the Lamb, is spiritually called Egypt, Rev. xi. 8; and if so, the destruction of Egypt, and its Pharaoh, was a type of the destruction of that proud enemy; and betwixt this prophecy of the ruin of Egypt and the prophecy of the destruction of the antichristian generation there is some analogy. We have two distinct prophecies in this chapter relating to Egypt; both in the same month, one on the first day, the other that day fortnight, probably both on the sabbath-day. They are both lamentations, not only to signify how lamentable the fall of Egypt should be, but to intimate how much the prophet himself should lament it, from a generous principle of love to mankind. The destruction of Egypt is here represented under two similitudes. 1. The killing of a lion or a whale, or some such devouring creature, ver. 1—16; 2. The funeral of a great commander or captain-general, ver. 17—32. The two prophecies of this chapter are much of the same length.

AND it came to pass in the twelfth year, in the twelfth month, in the first day of the month, that the word of the LORD came unto me, saying,

2 Son of man, take up a lamentation for Pharaoh king of Egypt, and say unto him,

Thou art like a young lion of the nations,
And thou art as a whale in the seas:
And thou camest forth with thy rivers,
And troubledst the waters with thy feet, and fouledst their

3 Thus saith the Lord GOD; [rivers.
I will therefore spread out my net over thee with a company of many people;
And they shall bring thee up in my net.

4 Then will I leave thee upon the land,
I will cast thee forth upon the open field, [thee,
And will cause all the fowls of the heaven to remain upon
And I will fill the beasts of the whole earth with thee.

5 And I will lay thy flesh upon the mountains,
And fill the valleys with thy height.

6 I will also water with thy blood the land wherein thou
Even to the mountains; [swim.mest,
And the rivers shall be full of thee.

7 And when I shall put thee out,
I will cover the heaven, and make the stars thereof dark;
I will cover the sun with a cloud, and the moon shall not give her light.

8 All the bright lights of heaven will I make dark over thee,
And set darkness upon thy land, saith the Lord GOD.

9 I will also vex the hearts of many people,
When I shall bring thy destruction among the nations,
Into the countries which thou hast not known.

10 Yea, I will make many people amazed at thee,
And their kings shall be horribly afraid for thee,
When I shall brandish my sword before them;
And they shall tremble at every moment,
Every man for his own life, in the day of thy fall

11 For thus saith the Lord GOD;
The sword of the king of Babylon shall come upon thee

12 By the swords of the mighty will I cause thy multitude
The terrible of the nations, all of them: [to fall,
And they shall spoil the pomp of Egypt,
And all the multitude thereof shall be destroyed.

13 I will destroy also all the beasts thereof from beside the great waters;
Neither shall the foot of man trouble them any more,
Nor the hoofs of beasts trouble them.

14 Then will I make their waters deep,
And cause their rivers to run like oil, saith the Lord GOD.

15 When I shall make the land of Egypt desolate,
And the country shall be destitute of that whereof it was full,
When I shall smite all them that dwell therein,
Then shall they know that I am the LORD.

16 This is the lamentation wherewith they shall lament her:
The daughters of the nations shall lament her:
They shall lament for her, even for Egypt,
And for all her multitude, saith the Lord GOD.

Here, First. The prophet is ordered to "take up a lamentation for Pharaoh king of Egypt," ver. 2. It concerns ministers to be much of a serious spirit, and in order thereunto to be frequent in taking up lamentations for the fall and ruin of sinners, as those that have not desired, but dreaded, the woful day. Note, Ministers that would affect others with the things of God must make it appear that they are themselves affected with the miseries that sinners bring upon themselves by their sins. It becomes us to weep and tremble for those that will not weep and tremble for themselves, to try if thereby we may set them a weeping, set them a trembling.

Secondly. He is ordered to shew cause for that lamentation.

1. Pharaoh has been a troubler of the nations, even of his own nation, which he should have procured the repose of. He is "like a young lion of the nations," ver. 2, loud and noisy, hectoring and threatening as a lion when he roars. Great potentates, if they be tyrannical and oppressive, are in God's account no better than beasts of prey. He is like "a whale" or dragon, like a crocodile, so some; "in the seas," very turbulent and vexatious, as the leviathan that "makes the deep to boil like a pot," Job xli. 31. When Pharaoh engaged in an unnecessary war with the Cyrenians he "came forth with his rivers," with his armies, "troubled the waters," disturbed his own kingdom, and the neighbour nations, "fouled the rivers," and made them muddy. Note, A great deal of disquiet is often given to the world by the restless ambition and implacable resentments of proud princes. Ahab is he that troubles Israel, and not Elijah.

2. He that has troubled others must expect to be himself troubled; for the Lord is righteous, Jos. vii. 25.

1st. This is set forth here by a comparison. Is Pharaoh like a great whale, which, when it comes up the river, gives great disturbance, a leviathan which Job cannot draw out with a hook, Job xli. 1, yet God has a net for him which is large enough to inclose him, and strong enough to secure him; ver. 3, "I will spread my net over thee," even the army of the Chaldeans, a "company of many people." They shall force him out of his fastness, dislodge him out of his possessions, throw him like a great fish upon dry ground, upon the open field, ver. 4; where, being out of his element, he must die of course, and be a prey to the birds and beasts, as was foretold, ch. xxix. 5. What can the strongest fish do to help itself when it is out of the water, and lies gasping? The flesh of this great whale shall be "laid upon the mountains," ver. 5; and the valleys shall be "filled with his height." Such numbers of Pharaoh's soldiers shall be slain that the dead bodies shall be scattered upon the hills, and there shall be heaps of them piled up in the valleys. Blood shall be shed in such abundance as to swell the rivers in the valleys. Or, such shall be the bulk, such the height, of this leviathan that, when he is laid upon the ground, he shall fill a valley.

I brought him down to Sheol, with them that go down to the pit; and all the trees of Eden, the choicest and best of Lebanon, all which drink water, were comforted in the lower land. They also with him went down to Sheol, to them that were pierced with the sword, and his arm, who had dwelt under his shadow among the nations." The obscurity of the closing words partly defies ingenuity, but the general idea seems to be that the Assyrian was not alone in his fall; that as he went to the victims, so he was attended by his friends, who had lived under his protection. Such we take to be the leading thought, though the details are not all plain.

xxxii. 1—10. It has been observed that here images are crowded together, that the metaphors are somewhat mixed, and that the language is very hyperbolical. As usually explained, the king is compared with a lion and a crocodile in one and the same verse. That what is called a "whale" in our English text, and a "dragon" in the margin, is a crocodile cannot be doubted. That a king, as such vast quantities of blood shall issue from this leviathan as shall "water the land of Egypt," the land wherein now he swims, now he sports himself, ver. 6. It shall reach "to the mountains," and the waters of Egypt shall again be "turned into blood;" by this means the "rivers shall be full of thee." The judgments executed upon Pharaoh of old are expressed by the "breaking of the heads of the leviathan in the waters," Ps. lxxiv. 13, 14. But now they go further; this old serpent has now not only his head bruised, but is all crushed to pieces.

2nd. It is set forth by a prophecy of the deep impression which the destruction of Egypt should make upon the neighbour nations; it would put them all into a consternation, as the fall of the Assyrian monarchy did, ch. xxxi. 15, 16. When Pharaoh, that had been like a blazing, burning torch, is put out and extinguished, it shall make all about him look black, ver. 7; the heavens shall be hung with black, the stars darkened, the sun eclipsed, and the moon be deprived of her borrowed light. It is from the upper world that this lower receives its light; and therefore, ver. 8, when the bright lights of heaven are made dark above, darkness by consequence is set upon the land, upon the earth—so it shall be on the land of Egypt. Here the plague of darkness, which was upon Egypt of old for three days, seems to be alluded to as before, the turning of the waters into blood. For when former judgments are forgotten it is just they should be repeated. When their privy councillors and statesmen, and those that have the conduct of the public affairs, are deprived of wisdom, and made fools, and the things that belong to their peace are hid from their eyes, then their lights are darkened, and the land is in a mist. This is foretold, Isa. xix. 13, "The princes of Zoan are become fools." Now upon the spreading of the report of the fall of Egypt, and the bringing of the news to remote countries, "countries which they had not known," ver. 9, people shall be much affected, and shall feel themselves sensibly touched by it. First. It shall fill them with vexation to see such an ancient, wealthy, potent kingdom thus humbled and brought down, and the pride of worldly glory, which they have such a value for, stained. The hearts of many people will be vexed to see the word of the God of Israel fulfilled in the destruction of Egypt, and that all the gods of Egypt were not able to relieve it. Note, The destruction of some wicked people is a vexation to others. Secondly. It shall fill them with admiration, ver. 10; they shall be amazed at thee, shall wonder to see so great riches and power come to nothing, Rev. xviii. 17. Note, They that admire with complacency the pomp of this world will admire with consternation the ruin of that pomp, which, to those that know the vanity of all things here below, is no surprise at all. Thirdly. It shall fill them with fear; even their kings, that think it their prerogative to be secure, shall be horribly afraid for thee, concluding their own house to be in danger when their neighbour's is on fire. "When I shall brandish my sword before them they shall tremble every man for his own life." Note, When the sword of God's justice is drawn against some to cut them off, it is thereby brandished before others to give them warning; and those that will not be admonished by it, and made to reform, yet shall be frightened by it, and made to tremble; "They shall tremble every moment because of thy fall." When others are ruined by sin we have reason to quake for fear, as knowing ourselves guilty and obnoxious. "Who is able to stand before this holy Lord God?"

3rd. It is set forth by a plain and express prediction of the desolation itself that should come upon Egypt. First, The instruments of the desolation appear here very formidable. It is the sword of the king of Babylon, that warlike, that victorious prince, that shall come upon thee, ver. 11; "The swords of the mighty," even the "terrible of the nations, all of them," ver. 12; an army that there is no standing before. Note, Those that delight in war, and are upon all occasions entering into contention, may expect, some time or other, to be engaged with those that will prove too hard for them. Pharaoh had been forward to quarrel with his neighbour, and to come forth with his rivers, with his armies, ver. 2; but God will now give him enough of it. Secondly. The instances of the desolation appear here very frightful, much the same with what we had before, ch. xxix. 10—12; xxx. 7. 1*st.* The multitude of Egypt shall be destroyed; not decimated, some picked out to be made examples, but all cut off. Note, The numbers of sinners, though they be a multitude, will neither secure them against God's power nor entitle them to his pity. 2*nd.* The pomp of Egypt shall be spoiled; the pomp of their court, what they have been proud of. Note, In renouncing the pomps of this world we did ourselves a great kindness, for they are things that are soon spoiled, and cheat their admirers. 3*rd.* The cattle of Egypt, that used to feed by the rivers, shall be destroyed, ver. 13; neither cut off by the sword nor carried off for a prey. Egypt was famous for horses, which would be an acceptable booty to the Chaldeans. The rivers shall be no more frequented as they have been by man and beast that came hither to drink. 4*th.* The waters of Egypt that used to flow briskly shall now grow deep, and slow, and heavy, and shall run like oil, ver. 14; a figurative expression, signifying that there should be such an universal sadness and heaviness upon the whole nation, that even the rivers should go softly and silently like mourners, and quite forget their rapid motion. 5*th.* The whole country of Egypt shall be stripped of its wealth; it shall be "destitute of that whereof it was full," ver. 15; corn and cattle, and all the pleasant fruits of the earth. When those are "smitten that dwell therein," the ground is untilled, and that which is gathered becomes an easy prey to the invader. Note, God can soon empty those of this world's goods that have the greatest fulness of those things and are full of them, that enjoy most and have their hearts set upon those enjoyments. The Egyptians were full of their pleasant and plentiful country, and the rich products of it. Every one that talked with them might perceive how much it filled them; but God can soon make their "country destitute of that whereof it is full;" it is therefore our wisdom to be full of treasures in heaven. When the country is made destitute, (1.) It shall be an instruction to them; "Then shall they know that I am the Lord." A sensible conviction of the vanity of the world, and the fading, perishing nature of all things in it, will contribute much to our right knowledge of God as our portion and happiness. (2.) It shall be a lamentation to all about them. "The daughters of the nations shall lament her," ver. 16, either because, being in alliance with her, they share in her grievances, and suffer with her; or, being admirers of her, they at least share in her grief, and sympathise with her. They shall lament "for Egypt and all her multitude;" it shall grieve them to see so great a devastation made. By enlarging the matters of our joy we increase the occasions of our sorrow.

17 It came to pass also in the twelfth year, in the fifteenth day of the month, that the word of the LORD came unto me, saying,

18 Son of man, wail for the multitude of Egypt, and cast them down,
Even her, and the daughters of the famous nations,
Unto the nether parts of the earth, with them that go down into the pit.

19 Whom dost thou pass in beauty?
Go down, and be thou laid with the uncircumcised.

20 They shall fall in the midst of them that are slain by the sword:
She is delivered to the sword: [sword:
Draw her and all her multitudes.

21 The strong among the mighty shall speak to him
Out of the midst of hell with them that help him:
They are gone down, they lie uncircumcised, slain by the sword. [about him:

22 Asshur is there and all her company: his graves are
All of them slain, fallen by the sword:

23 Whose graves are set in the sides of the pit,
And her company is round about her grave:
All of them slain, fallen by the sword,
Which caused terror in the land of the living. [grave,

24 There is Elam and all her multitude round about her
All of them slain, fallen by the sword,
Which are gone down uncircumcised into the nether parts of the earth,
Which caused their terror in the land of the living;
Yet have they borne their shame with them that go down to the pit.

25 They have set her a bed in the midst of the slain
With all her multitude: her graves are round about him:
All of them uncircumcised, slain by the sword:
Though their terror was caused in the land of the living,
Yet have they borne their shame with them that go down to the pit:
He is put in the midst of them that be slain.

SCYTHIAN BARROWS.

26 There is Meshech, Tubal,
And all her multitude: her graves are round about him:
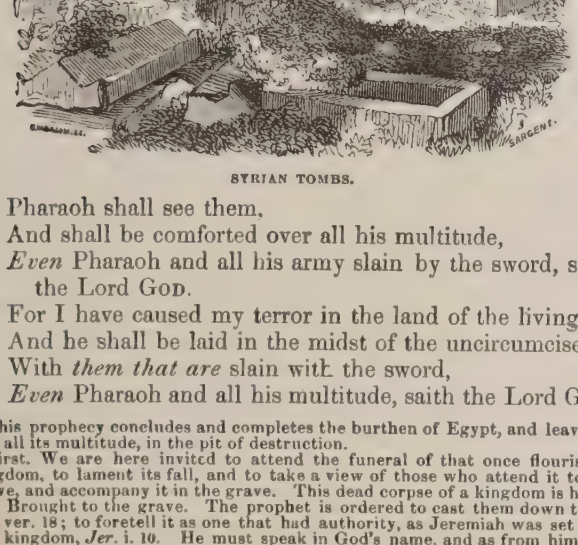
All of them uncircumcised, slain by the sword,
Though they caused their terror in the land of the living.

27 And they shall not lie with the mighty that are fallen of the uncircumcised,
Which are gone down to hell with their weapons of war:
And they have laid their swords under their heads,



LARGE TOMBS IN EDOM.—ver. 26.

such, was sometimes called a lion has been truly said, but here at least "lion" and not "ruler" must stand in the translation, because the king is said to resemble a lion. The "crocodile" was to be taken in a net; but it does not follow that the animal was usually so taken in Egypt; rather, we may infer, the contrary, because the whole passage is intended to show how helpless Pharaoh would be in the hands of Providence.

xxxii. 17—32. This finely poetic passage is one upon which much might be written. Egypt is not the only nation doomed to ruin, but it shares the common lot of great godless kingdoms. Of those which pass before the prophetic vision, some had already fallen, and the rest were under an irrevocable sentence. The Babylonians had subjugated some of the powers enumerated, as Assyria and probably Elam, the northern swarms of Meshech and Tubal, while Edom and the Zidonians were destined to follow. Egypt had this comfort only, that it was not alone. All are viewed as having already passed

But their iniquities shall be upon their bones,
Though they were the terror of the mighty in the land of the living, [cised,
28 Yea, thou shalt be broken in the midst of the uncircum-
And shalt lie with them that are slain with the sword.
29 There is Edom, her kings, and all her princes,
Which with their might are laid by them that were slain by the sword:
They shall lie with the uncircumcised,
And with them that go down to the pit.
30 There be the princes of the north, all of them,
And all the Zidonians, which are gone down with the slain;
With their terror they are ashamed of their might;
And they lie uncircumcised with them that be slain by the sword,
And bear their shame with them that go down to the pit.

SYRIAN TOMBS.

31 Pharaoh shall see them,
And shall be comforted over all his multitude,
Even Pharaoh and all his army slain by the sword, saith the Lord GOD.
32 For I have caused my terror in the land of the living:
And he shall be laid in the midst of the uncircumcised
With them that are slain with the sword,
Even Pharaoh and all his multitude, saith the Lord GOD.

This prophecy concludes and completes the burthen of Egypt, and leaves it, and all its multitude, in the pit of destruction.

First. We are here invited to attend the funeral of that once flourishing kingdom, to lament its fall, and to take a view of those who attend it to the grave, and accompany it in the grave. This dead corpse of a kingdom is here,

1. Brought to the grave. The prophet is ordered to cast them down to the pit, ver. 18; to foretell it as one that had authority, as Jeremiah was set over the kingdom, Jer. i. 10. He must speak in God's name, and as from him who will cast them down; yet he must foretell it as one that had an affectionate concern for them; he must wail for the multitude of Egypt, even when he casts them down. When Egypt is slain, let her have an honourable funeral befitting her quality; let her be buried with the daughters of the famous nations, in their burying-places, and with the same ceremony. It is but a poor allay to the reproach and terror of death to be buried with those that were famous; yet this is all that is allowed to Egypt. Shall Egypt think to exempt herself from the common fate of proud and imperious nations? No; she must take her lot with them; ver. 19, "Whom dost thou pass in beauty?" Art thou so much fairer than any other nation that thou shouldest expect therefore to be excused? No; others, as fair as thou, are sunk into the pit. Go down, therefore, and be thou laid with the uncircumcised; thou art like them, and art likely to lie among them. The multitude of Egypt shall all "fall in the midst of them that are slain with the sword." Now there is a general slaughter made among the nations, Egypt, with the rest, must drink of the bloody cup, and therefore she is delivered to the sword, to the sword of war; but in God's hand the sword of justice is delivered to be publicly executed. Draw her and all her multitude; either draw them as the dead bodies of great men are drawn in honour to the grave in a hearse, or as malefactors are drawn in disgrace to the place of execution on a sledge; draw them to the pit, and let them be made a spectacle to the world.

2. This corpse of a kingdom is bid welcome to the grave, and Pharaoh is made free of the congregation of the dead, and admitted into their regions, not without some pomp and ceremony, as Isa. xiv. 9, &c. The surprising fall of the king of Babylon is thus illustrated, "Hell from beneath is moved for thee to meet thee at thy coming," and to introduce thee into those mansions of darkness; so here, ver. 20, "They shall speak to him out of the midst of hell," as it were congratulating his arrival, and calling him to join with them in acknowledging that name which neither he nor they would be brought to own, when they were in their pomp and pride,—that it is in vain to think of contesting with God, and none ever hardened their hearts against him and prospered. They shall say to him, and to him that pretended to help him, Where are ye now? What have you brought your attempts to at last? Divers nations are here mentioned as gone down to the grave before Egypt, that are ready to give her a scornful reception, and upbraid her with coming to them at last. These nations here spoken of were probably such as had been of late years ruined and wasted by the king of Babylon, and their princes cut off; let Egypt know that she has neighbours' fare. When she goes to the grave she doth but migrare ad plures,—'migrate to the majority;' there are innumerable before her. But it is observable that, though Judah and Jerusalem were just about this time, or a little before, utterly ruined and laid waste, yet they are not mentioned here among the nations that welcome Egypt to the pit; for though they suffered the same things that this nation suffered, and by the same hand, yet the kind intentions of their affliction, and its happy issue at last, and the mercy God had yet in reserve for them, altered the property of it: it was not to them a going down to the pit, as it was to the heathen; they were not smitten as others were, nor "slain according to the slaughter of other nations," Isa. xxvii. 7. But let us see who they are that are gone to the grave before Egypt, that "lie uncircumcised, slain by the sword," with whom she must now take up her lodging.

1st. There lies the Assyrian empire, and all the princes and mighty men of that monarchy; ver. 22, "Asshur is there and all her company;" all the countries that were tributaries to, and had dependence upon, that crown. That mighty potentate, that used to lie in state with his guards and grandees about him, now lies in obscurity, with his graves about him, and his soldiers in them, unable any longer to do him service or honour; they are "all of them slain, fallen by the sword." The number of their months was cut off in the midst, and, being bloody and deceitful men, they were not suffered to live out half their days. Their "graves were set in the sides of the pit," all in a row, like beds in a common chamber, ver. 23. All their company is such as were slain, fallen by the sword; a vast congregation there is of such, who had caused terror in the land of the living. But, as the death of those to whom they were a terror put an end to their fears, (in the grave the "prisoners rest together," and hear not the "voice of the oppressor," Job iii. 18,) so the death of these mighty men puts an end to their terrors. Who is afraid of a dead lion? Note, Death will be a king of terrors to those who, instead of making themselves blessings, made themselves terrors in their generation.

2nd. There lies the kingdom of Persia, which, perhaps within the memory of man at that time, had been wasted and brought down. "There is Elam and all her multitude," the king of Elam and his numerous armies, ver. 24, 25; they also had caused their terror in the land of the living, had made a fearful noise and bluster among the nations in their day. But Elam has now a grave by herself, and the graves of the common people round about her, fallen by the sword; she has her bed in the midst of the slain that went down uncircumcised, unsanctified, unholy, and not in covenant with God. They have "borne their shame with them that go down to the pit;" that is, they are fallen under the common disgrace and mortification of mankind, that they die and are buried; nay, they die under particular marks of ignominy which God and man put upon them. Note, They who cause their terror shall, sooner or later, bear their shame, and be made a terror to themselves. The king of Elam is "put in the midst of them that be slain." All the honour he can pretend to is to be buried in the chief sepulchre.

3rd. There lies the Scythian power, which about this time was busy in the world. Meshech and Tubal, those barbarous northern nations, had lately made a descent upon the Medes, and caused their terror among them, lived among them upon free quarter for some years, making every thing their own they could lay their hands on; but at length Cyaxares, king of the Medes, drew them by a wile into his power, cut off abundance of them, and obliged them to quit his country, ver. 26. There lie Meshech and Tubal, and all their multitude; there is a burying-place for them, with their chief commander in the midst of them, "all of them uncircumcised, slain by the sword." These Scythians, dying ingloriously, as they lived, are not laid as the other nations spoken of before, in the bed of honour; ver. 27, "They shall not lie with the mighty," shall not be buried in state as those are, even by consent of the enemy, that are slain in the field of battle, that go down to their grave with their weapons of war carried before the hearse, or trailed after it, that have particularly "their swords laid under their heads," as if they could sleep sweeter in the grave when they laid their heads on such a pillow. These Scythians are not buried with these marks of honour, but "their iniquities shall be upon their sons;" they shall for their iniquity be left unburied, though they were the terror even of the mighty in the land of the living.

4th. There lies the kingdom of Edom, which had flourished long, but about this time, at least before the destruction of Egypt, was made quite desolate, as was foretold, ch. xxv. 13. Among the sepulchres of the nations there is Edom, ver. 29. There lie, not dignified with monuments or inscriptions, but mingled with common dust, "her kings and all her princes," her wise statesmen, (which Edom was famous for,) and her brave soldiers; these, "with their might, are laid by them that were slain by the sword." Their might could not prevent it, nay, their might helped to procure it, for that both encouraged them to engage in war and incensed their neighbours against them, who thought it necessary to curb their growing greatness. A deal of pains they took to ruin themselves, as many do, who with their might, with all their might, are laid by them that are slain with the sword. The Edomites retained circumcision, being of the seed of Abraham; but that shall stand them in no stead, they shall lie with the uncircumcised.

5th. There lie the "princes of the north," and all the Sidonians. These were as well acquainted with maritime affairs as the Egyptians were, who relied much upon that part of their strength; but they are gone down with the slain, ver. 30, down to the pit. Now they are ashamed of their might, ashamed to think how much they boasted of it and trusted to it; and, as the Edomites with their might, so these with their terror, are laid with them that are slain by the sword, and are forced to take their lot with them. They "bear their shame with them that go down to the pit," die in as much disgrace as those that are cut off by the hand of public justice.

6th. All this is applied to Pharaoh and the Egyptians, who have no reason to flatter themselves with hope of tranquillity, when they see how the wisest, and wealthiest, and strongest of their neighbours have been laid waste; ver. 28, "Yea, thou shalt be broken in the midst of the uncircumcised." When God is pulling down the unhumbled and unreformed nations, thou must expect to come down with them. First. It will be some extenuation of the miseries of Egypt to observe that it has been the case of so many great and mighty nations before; ver. 31, "Pharaoh shall see them and be comforted." It will be some ease to his mind that he is not the first king that has been slain in battle, his not the first army that has been routed, his not the first kingdom that has been made desolate. Mr. Greenhill observes here, 'that the comfort which wicked ones have after death is poor comfort, not real, but imaginary.' They will find little satisfaction in having so many fellow-sufferers; the rich man in hell dreaded it. It is only in point of honour that Pharaoh can "see and be comforted." Secondly. But nothing will be an exemption from these miseries; for, ver. 33, "I have caused my terror in the land of the living." Great men have caused their terror, have studied how to make every body fear them; Oderint dum metuant,—'Let them hate, so that they do but fear.' But now the grace of God under the destroying scourge of war, and reckoned with the dwellers in the unseen world.

xxxiii. 1—9. Some of the expressions in these verses are also contained in chap. iii. 17—21 of this book. The general sense is plain, and there is no serious critical difficulty in the words. "A man of their coasts" is "a man within their borders," or, as some explain it, "a man from their borders." In those times the only precaution possible against invasion was in many cases the one here described. The expressions, "his blood shall be upon his own head," and the like, mean of course that he will be responsible for his own death So, to require the blood of one man at the hand of another is to regard the latter as guilty of causing the death of the former, or as practically a murderer. What is said of temporal dangers and the consequences of men's conduct therein is applicable to spiritual dangers. There is an analogy which is here indicated in forcible language. The object is to define men's duty and responsibility.

lath "caused his terror in the land of the living," and therefore he laughs at theirs, because he sees that his day is coming, Ps. xxxvii. 13. In this day of terror "Pharaoh and all his multitude" shall be "laid with them that are slain with the sword."

Secondly. The view which this prophecy gives us of ruined states may shew us something, 1. Of this present world and the empire of death in it. Come and see the calamitous state of human life, see what a dying world this is; the strong die, the mighty die, "Pharaoh and all his multitude." See what a killing world this is, they are "all slain with the sword." As if men did not die fast enough of themselves, men are ingenious at finding out ways to destroy one another. It is not only a great pit, but a great cock-pit. 2. Of the other world. Though it is the destruction of nations as such that is perhaps principally intended here, yet here is a plain allusion to the final and everlasting ruin of impenitent sinners, of those that are uncircumcised in heart: they are slain by the sword of Divine justice; their iniquity is upon them, and with it they bear their shame. Those of Christ's enemies that would not have him to reign over them shall be brought forth and slain before him, though they be as pompous, though they be as numerous, as "Pharaoh and all his multitude."

CHAPTER XXXIII.

The prophet is now come off his circuit, which he went, as judge in God's name, to try and pass sentence upon the neighbour nations; and having finished with them, and read them all their doom in the eight chapters foregoing, he now returns to the children of his people, and receives farther instructions what to say to them. I. He must let them know what office he was in among them as a prophet; that he was a watchman, and had received a charge concerning them, for which he was accountable, ver. 1—9; the substance of this they had before, ch. iii. 17, &c. II. He must let them know upon what terms they stand with God; that they were upon their trial, upon their good behaviour, that if a wicked man repent he shall not perish, but if a righteous man apostatize he shall perish, ver. 10—20. III. Here is a particular message sent to those who yet remained in the land of Israel, and (which is very strange) grew secure there, and confident that they should take root there again, to tell them that their hopes would fail them, because they persisted in their sins, ver. 21—29. IV. Here is a rebuke to those who personally attended Ezekiel's ministry, but were not sincere in their professions of devotion, ver. 30—33.

AGAIN the word of the LORD came unto me, saying, 2 Son of man, speak to the children of thy people, and say unto them,

When I bring the sword upon a land,
If the people of the land take a man of their coasts,
And set him for their watchman:
3 If when he seeth the sword come upon the land,
He blow the trumpet, and warn the people;
4 Then whosoever heareth the sound of the trumpet, and taketh not warning;
If the sword come, and take him away,
His blood shall be upon his own head.
5 He heard the sound of the trumpet, and took not warning;
His blood shall be upon him.
But he that taketh warning shall deliver his soul.
6 But if the watchman see the sword come,
And blow not the trumpet, and the people be not warned;
If the sword come, and take any person from among them,
He is taken away in his iniquity;
But his blood will I require at the watchman's hand.
7 So thou, O son of man,
I have set thee a watchman unto the house of Israel;
Therefore thou shalt hear the word at my mouth, and warn them from me. [surely die;
8 When I say unto the wicked, O wicked man, thou shalt
If thou dost not speak to warn the wicked from his way,
That wicked man shall die in his iniquity;
But his blood will I require at thine hand.
9 Nevertheless, if thou warn the wicked of his way to turn from it; [quity;
If he do not turn from his way, he shall die in his ini-
But thou hast delivered thy soul

The prophet had been by express order from God taken off from prophesying to the Jews, just then when the news came that Jerusalem was invested, and close siege laid to it, ch. xxiv. 27. But now Jerusalem is taken, two years after, he is appointed again to direct his speech to them; and here his commission is renewed. If God had abandoned them quite he would not have sent prophets to them; nor, if he had not had mercy in store for them, would he have "shewed them such things as these." In these verses we have,

First. The office of a watchman laid down, the trust reposed in him, the charge given him, and the conditions adjusted between him and those that employ him, ver. 2—6.

1. It is supposed to be a public danger that gives occasion for the appointing of a watchman, when "God brings the sword upon a land," ver. 2. The sword of war, whenever it comes upon a land, is of God's bringing; it is "the sword of the Lord," of his justice, how unjustly soever men draw it. At such a time, when a country is in fear of a foreign invasion, that they may be informed of all the motions of the enemy, may not be surprised with an attack, but may have early notice of it, in order to their being at their arms, and in readiness to give the invader a warm reception, they "set a man of their coast," some likely person that lives upon the borders of their country, where the threatened danger is expected, and is therefore well acquainted with all the avenues of it, and make him their watchman. Thus wise are the "children of this world in their generation." Note, One man may be of public service to a whole country. Princes and statesmen are the watchmen of a kingdom, that are continually to employ themselves, and, if occasion be, as watchmen, to expose themselves for the public safety.

2. It is supposed to be a public trust that is lodged in the watchman, and that he is accountable to the public for the discharge of it. His business is, 1st. To discover the approaches and advances of the enemy, and therefore he must not be blind or asleep, for then he cannot see the sword coming. 2nd. To give notice of them immediately by sound of trumpet, or, as sentinels among us, by the discharge of a gun, as a signal of danger. A special trust and confidence is reposed in him by those that set him to be their watchman, that he will faithfully do these two things, and they venture their lives upon his fidelity. Now, First. If he do his part, if he be betimes aware of all the dangers that fall within his cognizance, and give warning of them, he has discharged his trust, and has not only delivered his soul but earned his wages. If the people do not take warning, if they either will not believe the notice he gives them, will not believe the danger to be so great or so near as really it is, or will not regard it, and so are surprised by the enemy in their security, it is their own fault; the blame is not to be laid upon the watchman, but their blood is upon their own heads. If any person goes presumptuously into the mouth of danger, though he heard the sound of the trumpet, and was told by it where the danger was, and so the sword comes and takes him away in his folly, he is felo de se, a foolish man, he has destroyed himself. But, Secondly. If the watchman do not do his duty, if he might have seen the danger and did not, but was asleep, or heedless, or looking another way, or if he did see the danger, (for so the case is put here,) and shifted only for his own safety, and "blew not the trumpet" to "warn the people," so that some are surprised and cut off "in their iniquity," ver. 6, cut off suddenly, without having time to cry, Lord, have mercy upon me, time to repent and make their peace with God, which makes the matter much the worse, that the poor creature is "taken away in his iniquity," his blood shall be required at the watchman's hands; he shall be found guilty of his death, because he did not give him warning of his danger. But if the watchman do his part, and the people do theirs, all is well; both he that gives warning and he that takes warning has delivered his soul.

Secondly. The application of this to the prophet, ver. 7—9.

1. He is "a watchman to the house of Israel." He had occasionally given warning to the nations about, but to the house of Israel he was a watchman by office, for they were the children of the prophets and the covenant. They did not set him for a watchman, as the people of the land did, ver. 2; for they were not so wise for their souls to secure the welfare of them as they would have been for the protection of their temporal interests; but God did it for them.—he appointed them a watchman.

2. His business, as a watchman, is to give warning to sinners of their misery and danger by reason of sin. This is the word he must "hear from God's mouth," and speak to them. 1st. God hath said that the wicked man shall surely die, he shall be miserable; unless he repent he shall be cut off from God, and all comfort and hope in him, shall be cut off from all good. He shall fall and lie for ever under the wrath of God, which is the death of the soul, as his favour is its life. The righteous God hath said it, and will never unsay it, nor can all the world gainsay it, that "the wages of sin is death; sin, when it is finished, brings forth death." The wrath of God is revealed from heaven, not only against wicked nations, speaking ruin to them as nations, but against wicked persons, speaking ruin to them in their personal capacities, their personal interests, which pass into the other world and last to eternity, as national interests do not. 2nd. It is the will of God that the wicked man should be warned of this. "Warn them from me," which intimates that there is a possibility of preventing it, else it were a jest to give warning of it; nay, and that God is desirous it should be prevented. Sinners are therefore warned of the wrath to come, that they may flee from it, Mat. iii. 7. 3rd. It is the work of ministers to give them warning, to say to the wicked, "It shall be ill with them," Isa. iii. 11. God saith in general, "The soul that sinneth it shall die." The minister's business is to apply this to particular persons, and to say, "O wicked man, thou shalt surely die," whoever thou art; if thou go on still in thy trespasses they will inevitably prove thy ruin. O adulterer, O robber, O drunkard, O swearer, O sabbath-breaker, "thou shalt surely die!" And he must say this, not in passion, to provoke the sinner, but in compassion, to "warn the wicked from his way," warn him to turn from it, that he may live. This is to be done by the faithful preaching of the word in public, and by personal application to those whose sins are open.

3. If souls perish through his neglect of his duty, he brings guilt upon himself. If the prophet do not warn the wicked of the ruin that is at the end of his wicked way, that "wicked man shall die in his iniquity;" for, though the watchman did not do his part, yet the sinner might have taken warning from the written word, from his own conscience, and from God's judgments upon others, by which his mouth shall be stopped, and God will be justified in his destruction. Note, It will not serve impenitent sinners to plead in the great day that their watchman did not give them warning, that they were careless and unfaithful; for, though they were so, it will be made to appear that "God left not himself without witness." But he shall not perish alone in his iniquity, the watchman also shall be called to an account; "His blood will I require at thy hand." The blind leader shall fall with the blind follower into the ditch. See what a desire God has of the salvation of sinners, in that he resents it so ill if those concerned do not what they can to prevent their destruction. And see what a great deal those ministers have to answer for another day who palliate sin and flatter sinners in their evil way, and by their wicked lives countenance and harden them in their wickedness, and encourage them to believe they shall have peace though they go on.

4. If he do his duty he may take the comfort of it, though he do not see the success of it; ver. 9, "If thou warn the wicked of his way," if thou tell him faithfully what will be the end thereof, and call him earnestly to turn from it, and he do not turn, but persist in it, "he shall die in his iniquity," and the fair warning given him will be an aggravation of his sin and ruin; "but thou hast delivered thy soul." Note, It is a comfort to ministers that they may, through grace, save themselves, though they cannot be instrumental to save so many as they wish of those that hear them.

10 Therefore, O thou son of man, speak unto the house of Thus ye speak, saying, [Israel;
If our transgressions and our sins be upon us, and we pine away in them,
How should we then live?

xxxiii. 10—20. Perhaps it was not unnatural, though it was illogical, for the Jews to regard themselves as neglected by God. They seem to have looked on the promises given them as unconditional and absolute, whereas they were conditional, and left men personally responsible. The Israelites were not to be pious by fits and starts, but constantly, or they ran the risks of disobedience. On the other hand, mercy was promised to the wicked on their sincere repentance.

xxxiii. 21, 22. At this juncture fugitives from Jerusalem announce the fall of the city. As the city fell in the eleventh year and the fifth month, seventeen months had elapsed, a time so long that various conjectures have been devised to account for it. Probably for "one that had escaped" we must understand a much larger number, who, owing to the difficulties in their way, had been unable to arrive sooner. The prophet was now permitted to resume the theme concerning which silence had been imposed upon him, as we

These verses are the substance of what we had before, ch. xviii. 20, &c., and they are so full and express a declaration of the terms on which people stand with God, as the former were of the terms on which ministers stand, that it is no wonder they are here repeated, as those were, though we had the substance of them before. Observe here,

First. The cavils of the people against God's proceedings with them. God was now, in his providence, contending with them, but their uncircumcised hearts were not as yet humbled; for they were industrious to justify themselves, though thereby they reflected on God. Two things are insisted upon in their reproaches of God, and in both they added iniquity to their sin, and misery to their punishment.

1. They quarrelled with his promises and favours, as having no kindness or sincerity in them, ver. 10. God had "set life before them," but they plead that he had set it out of their reach, and therefore did but mock them with the mention of it. The prophet had said some time ago, ch. xxiv. 23, "Ye shall pine away for your iniquities;" with that word he concluded his threatenings against Judah and Jerusalem, and this they now upbraided him with, as if it had been spoken absolutely to drive them to despair, whereas it was spoken conditionally, to bring them to repentance. Thus are the sayings of God's ministers perverted by men of corrupt minds, who are minded to pick quarrels. He puts them in hopes of life and happiness, and herein they would make him contradict himself; for (say they) "If our transgressions and our sins be upon us," as thou hast often told us they are; and if we must, as thou sayest, pine away in them, and wear out a miserable captivity in a fruitless repentance, "how shall we then live?" If this be our doom there is no remedy; we die, we perish, we all perish. Note, It is very common for those that have been hardened with presumption, when they are warned against sin, to sink into despair when they are called to repent, and to conclude there is no hope of life for them.

2. They quarrelled with his threatenings and judgments, as having no justice or equity in them. They said, "The way of the Lord is not equal," ver. 17, and again ver. 20; suggesting that God was partial in his proceedings, and that with him there was respect of persons, and he was more severe against sin and sinners than there was cause.

Secondly. Here is a satisfactory answer given to both these cavils.

1. Those that despaired of finding mercy with God are here answered with a solemn declaration of God's readiness to shew mercy, ver. 11. When they spoke of pining away in their iniquity, God sends the prophet to them with all speed to tell them that, though their case was sad, yet it was not desperate, but there was yet hope in Israel. 1st. It is certain that God has no delight in the ruin of sinners, nor doth he desire it. If they will destroy themselves he will glorify himself in it, but he has no pleasure in it, but would rather they should turn and live: for his goodness is that attribute of his which is most his glory, which is most his delight. He would rather sinners should turn and live than go on and die. He hath said it, he hath sworn it, that by these two immutable things, in both which it is impossible for God to lie, we might have strong consolation. We have his word and his oath; and, since he could swear by no greater, he swears by himself, "As I live." They question whether they should live, though they did repent and reform; Yea, saith God, as sure as I live true penitents shall live also; for their life is hid with Christ in God. 2nd. It is certain that God is sincere and in earnest in the calls he gives sinners to repent; "Turn ye, turn ye from your evil way." To repent is to turn from our evil way. This God requires sinners to do, this he urgeth them to do, by repeated, pressing instances, "Turn ye, turn ye." O that they would be prevailed with to turn, to turn quickly without delay! This he will enable them to do, if they will but "frame their doings to turn to the Lord," Hos. v. 4; for he hath said, "I will pour out my Spirit unto you," Pr. i. 23. And in this he will accept of them, for it is not only what he commands, but what he courts them to. 3rd. It is certain that if sinners perish in their impenitency it is owing to themselves. They die because they will die; and herein they act most absurdly and unreasonably; "Why will ye die, O house of Israel?" God would have heard them, and they would not be heard.

2. Those that despaired of finding justice with God are here answered with a solemn declaration of the rule of judgment which God would go by in dealing with the children of men, which carries along with it the evidence of his own equity; he that runs may read the justice of it. The Jewish nation, as a nation, was now dead, it was ruined to all intents and purposes. The prophet must therefore deal with particular persons, and the rule of judging concerning them is much like that concerning a nation, Jer. xviii. 7—10. If God speak concerning it to build and to plant, if it do wickedly he will recall his favours, and leave it to ruin; but if he speak concerning it to pluck up and destroy, and it repent, he will revoke the sentence, and deliver it: so it is here. In short, the most plausible professors, if they apostatize, shall certainly perish for ever in their apostacy from God; and the most notorious sinners, if they repent, shall certainly be happy for ever in their return to God. This is here repeated again and again, because it ought to be again and again considered, and preached over to our own hearts. This was necessary to be inculcated upon this senseless, stupid people, that said, "The way of the Lord is not equal;" for these rules of judgment are so plainly just that they need no other confirmation of them but the repetition of them.

1st. If those that have made a great profession of religion throw off their profession, quit the good ways of God, and grow loose, and carnal, and sensual, and worldly, the profession they made, and all the religious performances with which they had for a great while kept up the credit of their profession, shall stand them in no stead, but they shall certainly perish in their iniquity, ver. 12, 13, 18. First. God doth say to the righteous man that he shall surely live, ver. 13. He saith it by his word, by his ministers. He that lives regularly, his own heart tells him, his neighbours tell him, he shall live. Sure such a man as this cannot but be happy. And it is certain, if he proceed and persevere in his righteousness, and if in order to that he be upright and sincere in it, if he be really as good as he seems to be, he shall live; he shall continue in the love of God, and be for ever happy in that love. Secondly. Righteous men that have very good hopes of themselves, and that others have a very good opinion of, yet are in danger of turning to iniquity by trusting to their righteousness. So the case is put here: "If he trust to his own righteousness, and commit iniquity," and come to make a trade of sin; if he not only take a false step, but turn aside into a false way, and persist in it. This may possibly be the case of a righteous man, and it is the effect of his trusting to his own righteousness. Note, Many eminent professors have been ruined by a proud conceitedness of themselves, and confidence in themselves. He trusts to the merit of his own righteousness, and thinks he has already made God so much his debtor that now he may venture to commit iniquity, for he has righteousness enough in stock to make amends for it; he fancies that, whatever ill deeds he may do hereafter, he can be in no danger by them, having so many good deeds beforehand to balance them. Or, he trusts to the strength of his own righteousness, thinks himself now so well established in a course of virtue, that he may thrust himself into any temptation and it cannot overcome him; and so, by presuming on his own sufficiency, he is brought to commit iniquity. By making bold on the confines of sin he is drawn at length into the depths of hell. This ruined the Pharisees; they trusted to themselves that they were righteous, and that their long prayers, and fasting twice in the week, would atone for their devouring widows' houses. Thirdly. If righteous men turn to iniquity, and return not to their righteousness, they shall certainly perish in their iniquity, and all the righteousness they have formerly done, all their prayers, and all their alms, shall be forgotten; no mention shall be made, no remembrance had, of their good deeds, they shall be overlooked as they had never been. The righteousness of the righteous shall not deliver him from the wrath of God and the curse of the law in the day of his transgression. When he becomes a traitor and a rebel, and takes up arms against his rightful sovereign, it will not serve for him to plead in his own defence that formerly he was a loyal subject, and did many good services to the government. No, "he shall not be able to live;" the remembrance of his former righteousness shall be no satisfaction either to God's justice or his own conscience, in the day that he sinneth; but rather shall both highly aggravate the sin and folly of his apostacy. And therefore "for his iniquity that he committed he shall die," ver. 13; and again, ver. 18, "He shall even die thereby," and it is owing to himself.

2nd. If those that have lived a wicked life repent and reform, forsake their wicked ways, and become religious, their sins shall be pardoned, and they shall be justified and saved, if they persevere in their reformation. First. God saith to the wicked, "Thou shalt surely die;" the way that thou art in leads to destruction; the wages of thy sin is death, and thine iniquity will shortly be thy ruin. It was said to the righteous man, "Thou shalt surely live," for his encouragement to proceed and persevere in the way of righteousness, but he made an ill use of it, and was emboldened by it to commit iniquity. It was said to the wicked man, "Thou shalt surely die," for warning to him not to persist in his wicked ways; and he makes a good use of it, and is quickened thereby to return to God and duty. Thus even the threatenings of the word are to some, by the grace of God, a savour of life unto life; while even the promises of the word become to others, by their own corruption, a savour of death unto death. When God said to the wicked man, "Thou shalt surely die," die eternally, it is not to frighten him out of his wits, but to frighten him out of his sins. Secondly. There is many a wicked man that was hastening apace to his own destruction, who yet is wrought upon by the grace of God to return and repent, and live a holy life. He turns from his sin, ver. 14, and is resolved he will have no more to do with it; and, as an evidence of his repentance for wrong done, he restores the pledge, ver. 15, which he had taken uncharitably from the poor; he gives again that which he had robbed and taken unjustly from the rich. Nor doth he only cease to do evil, but he learns to do well; he "doth that which is lawful and right," and makes conscience of his duty both to God and man. A great change, since awhile ago he neither feared God nor regarded man! But many such amazing changes, and blessed ones, have been wrought by the power of Divine grace. He that was going on in the paths of death and the destroyer now walks in the statutes of life, in the way of God's learn from chap. xxiv. 26, 27. It appears that the message in verses 1—20 immediately preceded the arrival of the fugitives.

xxxiii. 25. The expression rendered "ye eat with the blood" is somewhat peculiar in the Hebrew, and has been variously explained. The ordinary interpretation is that eating the blood with the flesh is meant. Some, however, say the words refer to the practice of eating over or near the blood of animals slain in connection with magical rites. Others, again, suppose that blood-guiltiness or some such idea is intended: "you murder that you may eat." On the whole, it seems best to retain the ordinary explanation: they broke the law which forbade them to eat blood.

xxxiii. 26. To stand upon the sword is to rely on the sword. Instead of trusting in God and proper means, they looked to their weapons for safety.

xxxiii. 30. The members of the Scottish Mission of Inquiry say, "We marked how frequently the villagers at evening sit in social commandments, which has both life in it, Pr. xii. 28, and life at the end of it, Mat. xix. 17. And in this good way he perseveres without committing iniquity; though not free from remaining infirmity, yet under the dominion of no iniquity. He repents not of his repentance, nor returns to the commission of those gross sins he before allowed himself in. Thirdly. He that doth thus repent and turn shall escape the ruin he was running into, and his former sins shall be no prejudice to his acceptance with God. Let him not pine away in his iniquity, for if he confess and forsake it he shall find mercy; "He shall surely live, he shall not die," ver. 15; again, ver. 16, "He shall surely live;" again, ver. 19, "He hath done that which is lawful and right," and "he shall live thereby." But will not his wickednesses be remembered against him? No, he shall not be punished for them; ver. 12, "As for the wickedness of the wicked," though it was very heinous, yet "he shall not fall thereby, in the day that he turneth from his wickedness." Now it is become his grief it shall not be his ruin. Now there is a settled separation between him and sin, there shall be no longer a separation between him and God. Nay, he shall not be so much as upbraided with them; ver. 16, "None of his sins that he hath committed shall be mentioned unto him," either as a clog to his pardon, or an allay to the comfort of it, or any blemish or diminution to the glory that is prepared for him.

Now lay all this together, and then judge whether "the way of the Lord be not equal;" whether this will not justify God in the destruction of sinners, and glorify him in the salvation of penitents. The conclusion of the whole matter is, ver. 20, O ye house of Israel, though you are all involved now in the common calamity, yet there shall be a distinction of persons made in the spiritual and eternal state, and "I will judge you every one after his ways." Though they were sent into captivity by the lump, good fish and bad inclosed in the same net, yet there he will separate between the precious and the vile, and will "render to every man according to his works." Therefore God's way is equal and unexceptionable; but as for the children of my people God turns them over to the prophet, as he did to Moses, Ex. xxxii. 7, They are thy people; I can scarce own them for mine; as for them, their way is unequal. This way they have got of quarrelling with God and his prophet is absurd and unreasonable. In all disputes between God and his creatures it will certainly be found that he is in the right and they in the wrong.

21 And it came to pass in the twelfth year of our captivity, in the tenth month, in the fifth day of the month, that one that had escaped out of Jerusalem came unto me, saying, The city is smitten. 22 Now the hand of the LORD was upon me in the evening, afore he that was escaped came; and had opened my mouth, until he came to me in the morning; and my mouth was opened, and I was no more dumb. 23 Then the word of the LORD came unto me, saying, 24 Son of man, they that inhabit those wastes of the land of Israel speak, saying, Abraham was one, and he inherited the land: but we are many; the land is given us for inheritance.

25 Wherefore say unto them,
Thus saith the Lord GOD;
Ye eat with the blood,
And lift up your eyes toward your idols, and shed blood:
And shall ye possess the land?
26 Ye stand upon your sword, [bour's wife:
Ye work abomination, and ye defile every one his neigh-
And shall ye possess the land?
27 Say thou thus unto them, Thus saith the Lord GOD,
As I live, surely they that are in the wastes shall fall by the sword,
And him that is in the open field will I give to the beasts to be devoured,
And they that be in the forts and in the caves shall die of the pestilence.
28 For I will lay the land most desolate,
And the pomp of her strength shall cease;
And the mountains of Israel shall be desolate, that none shall pass through.
29 Then shall they know that I am the LORD,
When I have laid the land most desolate [mitted.
Because of all their abominations which they have com-

Here is, First. The tidings brought to Ezekiel of the burning of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans. The city was burned in the eleventh year of the captivity, and in the fifth month, Jer. lii. 12, 13. Tidings hereof were brought to the prophet, by one that was an eye-witness of the destruction, in the twelfth year and the tenth month, ver. 21, which was a year and almost five months after the thing was done. We may well suppose that, there being a constant correspondence, at this time more than ever, kept up between Jerusalem and Babylon, he had heard the news long before; but this was the first time he had an account of it from a refugee, from one that escaped, who could be particular, and would be pathetical, in the narration of it. And the sign given him was the coming of such a one to him as had himself narrowly escaped the flames; ch. xxiv. 26, "He that escapeth in that day shall come unto thee," to "cause thee to hear it with thine ears," to hear it more distinctly than ever from one that could say, Quæque ipse miserrima vidi,—'These miserable scenes I saw.'

Secondly. The Divine impressions and influences he was under, to prepare him for those heavy tidings; ver. 22, "The hand of the Lord was upon me before he came, and had opened my mouth," to speak to the house of Israel what he had in the former part of this chapter; and now he was no more dumb, he prophesied now with more freedom and boldness, being by the event proved a true prophet, to the confusion of those that contradicted him. All the prophesies from chapter twenty-four to this chapter having relation purely to the nations about, it is probable the prophet, when he received them from the Lord, did not deliver them by word of mouth, but in writing; for he could not otherwise say to the Ammonites, say unto Tyrus, say unto Pharaoh, &c., so and so, but by letters directed to the persons concerned; like Zacharias, when he could not speak he wrote, and herein he was as truly executing his prophetical office as ever. Note, Even silenced ministers may be doing a great deal of good by writing letters and making visits. But now the prophet's mouth is opened, that he may "speak to the children of his people." It is probable he had, during these three years, been continually speaking to them as a friend, putting them in mind of what he had formerly delivered to them, but never spoke to them as a prophet by inspiration, till now, when the hand of the Lord came upon him, renewed his commission, gave him fresh instructions, and "opened his mouth," furnished him with power to speak to the people "as he ought to speak."

Thirdly. The particular message he was intrusted with, relating to those Jews that yet remained in the land of Israel, and inhabited the wastes of that land, ver. 24. See what work sin had made; the cities of Israel were now become the wastes of Israel, for they lay all in ruins; some few that had escaped the sword and captivity still continued there, and began to think of re-settling This was so long after the destruction of Jerusalem, that it was some time before this that Gedaliah (a modest humble man) and his friends were slain; but probably at this time Johanan, and the proud men that joined with him, were at the height, Jer. xliii. 2; and before they came to a resolution to go into Egypt, wherein Jeremiah comforted them, it is probable the project was to establish themselves in the wastes of the land of Israel, in which Ezekiel here comforted them, and probably despatched the message away by the person that brought him the news of Jerusalem's destruction. Or, perhaps those here prophesied against might be some other party of Jews that remained in the land, hoped to take root there, and to be sole masters of it after Johanan and his forces were gone into Egypt. Now here we have,

1. An account of the pride of these remaining Jews who dwell in "the wastes of the land of Israel." Though the providence of God concerning them had been very humbling, and still was very threatening, yet they were intolerably haughty and secure, and promised themselves peace. He that brought the news to the prophet that Jerusalem was smitten, could not tell (it is likely) what these people said, but God tells him, "They say the land is given us for inheritance," ver. 24. Our partners being gone, it is now all our own by survivorship; or, for want of heirs, it comes to us as occupants: we shall now be placed alone in the midst of the earth, and have it all to ourselves. This argues great stupidity under the weighty hand of God, and a reigning selfishness and a narrow-spiritedness. They pleased themselves in the ruin of their country as long as they hoped to find their own account in it; cared not though it were all waste, so that they might have the sole property,—a poor inheritance to be proud of! They have the impudence to compare their case with Abraham's, glorying in this, that we have Abraham to our father. Abraham, say they, was one, one family, and he inherited the land, and lived many years in the peaceable enjoyment of it; but we are many, many families, more numerous than he,—the land is given us for inheritance. First. They think they can make out as good a title from God to this land as Abraham could. If God gave this land to him that was but one worshipper of him, as a reward of his service, much more will he give it to us who are many worshippers of him, as the reward of our service. And this speaks the great conceit they had of their own merits, as if they were greater than those of Abraham their father, who yet was not justified by works. Secondly. They think they can make good the possession of this land against the Chaldeans, and all other invaders, as well as Abraham could against those that were competitors with him for it. If he that was but one could hold it, much more shall we, that are many, and have many more at command than his three hundred trained servants. This speaks the confidence they had in their own might; they had got possession and were resolved to keep it.

2. A check to this pride. Since God's providences did neither humble them nor terrify them, he sends them a message sufficient to do both.

1st. To humble them, he tells them of the wickedness they still persisted in, which rendered them utterly unworthy to possess this land, so that they could not expect God should give it them. They had been followed by one judgment after another, but they had not profited by those means of grace as might be expected; they were still unreformed, and how could they expect that they should possess the land? "Shall ye possess the land?" What, such wicked people as ye are! "How shall I put thee among the children, and give thee a pleasant land?" Jer. iii. 19. Surely you never reflect upon yourselves, else you would rather wonder that you are in the land of the living than expect to possess this land. For do you not know how bad you are? First. You make no conscience of forbidden fruit, forbidden food; you eat with the blood, directly contrary to one of the precepts given to Noah and his sons, then when God gave them possession of the earth, Gen. ix. 4. Secondly. Idolatry, that covenant-breaking sin, that sin which the jealous God has been in a particular manner provoked by to lay your country waste, is still the sin that most easily besets you, and which you have a strong inclination to. "You lift up your eyes towards your idols," which is a sign that, though perhaps you do not bow your knee to them so much as you have done, yet you set your hearts upon them, and hanker after them. Thirdly. You are as fierce, and cruel, and barbarous as ever; you shed blood, innocent blood. Fourthly. You confide in your own strength, your own arm, your own bow, and have no dependence on, or regard to, God and his providence. "Ye stand upon your sword," ver. 26; you think to carry all before you, and make all your own by force of arms. How can they expect the inheritance of Isaac, as these did, who are of Ishmael's disposition, that had "his hand against every man," Gen. xvi. 12; and Esau's resolution to "live by his sword?" Gen. xxvii. 40. We met with those, ch. xxxii. 27, who when they died, thought they could not lie easy under-ground unless they had their swords under their heads. Here we meet with those who, while they live, think they cannot stand firm above-ground unless they have their swords under their feet; as if swords were both the softest pillows and the strongest pillars, though it was sin, it was sin, that first drew the sword. But, blessed be God, there are those who know better things, that stand upon the support of the Divine power and promise, and lay their heads in the bosom of Divine love, not trusting in their own sword, Ps. xliv. 3. Fifthly. You are guilty of all manner of abominations, and particularly "ye defile every one his neighbour's wife," which is an abomination of the first magnitude; "and shall ye possess the companies to enjoy the evening air before the door of their dwellings. This is the custom referred to by Ezekiel." It may be so, but possibly the reference is to the porch or to the inner court of an Eastern house, which was a good place for such conversation. Dr. Kitto says, "While residing in Oriental towns, and particularly in Mesopotamia, where Ezekiel was, we had constant occasion to observe this practice. We never went out in fine weather without observing frequent groups of men conferring together, or solacing themselves at the doors of houses, or seated on the ground, under the shade of the walls, in the broader streets and public places." Harmer calls attention to similar practices, and observes that the better houses have porches with benches on each side, where the master of the family receives visits and dispatches business. It is to gossip in such places that Ezekiel refers.

xxxiii. 32. The combination of music with singing is traceable to the remotest period, and prevails in the East to this day. But the land?" What! such vile miscreants as you? Note, They cannot expect to possess the land, nor to enjoy any true comfort or happiness, here or hereafter, that live in rebellion against the Lord.

2nd. To terrify them. he tells them of the farther judgments God had in store for them, which should make them utterly unable to possess this land, so that they could not stand it out against the enemy. Do they say they shall possess the land? No; God hath said it, he hath sworn it. As I live, saith the Lord. Though he has sworn that he delights not in the death of sinners, yet he hath sworn also, that those who persist in impenitency and unbelief "shall not enter into his rest." First. They that are in the cities, here called the "wastes," shall "fall by the sword;" either by the sword of the Chaldeans, who come to avenge the murder of Gedaliah, or by one another's swords in their intestine broils. Secondly. They that are in the open field shall be devoured by wild beasts, which swarmed of course in the country when it was dispeopled, and there were none to master them, and keep them under, Ex. xxiii. 29. When the army of the enemy had quitted the country yet still there was no safety in it. Noisome beasts was one of the four sore judgments, ch. xiv. 15. Thirdly. They that be in the forts, and in the caves, that think themselves safe in artificial or natural fastnesses, because men's eyes cannot discover them, nor men's darts reach them, there the arrows of the Almighty shall find them out; they "shall die of the pestilence." Fourthly. The whole land, even the land of Israel, that had been the glory of all lands, shall be most desolate, ver. 28. It shall be desolation, desolation, all over as desolate as desolation itself can make it. The mountains of Israel, the fruitful mountains, Zion itself, the holy mountain not excepted, "shall be desolate," the roads unfrequented, the houses uninhabited, that "none shall pass through," as it was threatened, Deu. xxviii. 62, "Ye shall be left few in number." Fifthly. The "pomp of her strength," whatever she glories in as her pomp, and trusts to as her strength, it shall be made to cease. Sixthly. The cause of all this was very bad; it is for "all their abominations which they have committed." It is sin that doth all this mischief, that makes nations desolate, and therefore we ought to call it an abomination. Seventhly. Yet the effect of all this will be very good. "Then shall they know that I am the Lord," am their Lord, and shall return to their allegiance, "when I have made the land most desolate." Those are untractable, unteachable indeed, that are not made to know their dependence upon God when all their creature comforts fail them and are made desolate.

30 Also, thou son of man,
The children of thy people still are talking against thee
By the walls and in the doors of the houses,
And speak one to another, every one to his brother, saying,
Come, I pray you, and hear what is the word
That cometh forth from the LORD.
31 And they come unto thee as the people cometh,
And they sit before thee as my people,
And they hear thy words, but they will not do them:
For with their mouth they shew much love,
But their heart goeth after their covetousness.
32 And, lo, thou art unto them as a very lovely song
Of one that hath a pleasant voice, and can play well on an instrument:
For they hear thy words, but they do them not.
33 And when this cometh to pass, (lo, it will come,)
Then shall they know that a prophet hath been among them.

The foregoing verses spoke conviction to the Jews who remained in the land of Israel, who were monuments of sparing mercy and yet returned not to the Lord. In these verses those are reproved who are now in captivity in Babylon, under Divine rebukes, and yet were not reformed by them. They are not indeed charged with the same gross enormities that the others are charged with. They made some show of religion and devotion, but their hearts were not right with God. The thing they are accused of is, mocking the messengers of the Lord, one of their measure-filling sins, which brought this ruin upon them, and yet they were not cured of it. Two ways they mocked the prophet Ezekiel.

First. By invidious, ill-natured reflections upon him, privately among themselves, endeavouring, by all means possible, to render him despicable. The prophet did not know it, but charitably thought that they who spoke so well to him to his face, with so much seeming respect and deference, surely would not speak ill of him behind his back. But God comes and tells him, "The children of thy people still are talking against thee," ver. 20, or talking no good of thee, I doubt. Note, Public persons are a common theme or subject of discourse, every one takes a liberty to censure them at pleasure; and faithful ministers know not how much ill is said of them every day. It is well they do not; for, if they did, it might prove a discouragement to them in their work not to be easily got over. But God takes notice of all that is said against his ministers,—not only what is decreed against them, or sworn against them,—not only what is written against them, or spoken with solemnity and deliberation,—but what is said against them in common talk among neighbours when they meet in an evening, "by the walls, and in the doors of their houses," where, whatever freedom of speech they use, if they reproach and slander any of God's ministers, God will reckon with them for it; his prophets shall not be made the song of the drunkards always. They had no crime to lay to the prophet's charge, but they loved to talk of him in a careless, scornful, bantering way; they said jokingly, "Come, and let us hear what is the word that cometh forth from the Lord." Perhaps it will be somewhat new, and will entertain us, and furnish us with matter of discourse. Note, Those have arrived to a great pitch of profaneness that can make so great a privilege, and so great a duty, as the preaching and hearing of the word of God a matter of sport and ridicule; yea, though it be not done publicly, but in private conversation among themselves. Serious things should be spoken of seriously.

Secondly. By dissembling with him in their attendance upon his ministry. Hypocrites mock God, and mock his prophets; but their hypocrisy is open before God, and the day is coming when, as here, it will be laid open. Observe here,

1. The plausible profession which these people made, and the speciousness of their pretensions. They are like those, Mat. xv. 8, who "draw nigh to God with their mouths, and honour him with their lips, but their hearts are far from him." 1st. They were diligent and constant in their attendance upon the means of grace. "They come unto thee as the people cometh." In Babylon they had no temple or synagogue, but they went to the prophet's house, ch. viii. 1, and there, it is probable, they spent their new moons and their sabbaths in religious exercises, 2 Kin. iv. 23. When the prophet was bound, the word of the Lord was not bound; and the people, when they had not the help for their souls they wished for, were thankful for what they had,—it was a reviving in their bondage. Now these hypocrites came "according to the coming of the people," as duly and as early as any of the prophet's hearers. Their being said to come as the people came seems to intimate that the reason why they came was, because other people came. They did not come out of conscience towards God, but only for company, for fashion sake, and because it was now the custom of their countrymen. Note, Those that have no inward principle of love to God's ordinances may yet be found much in the external observation of them. Cain brought his sacrifice as well as Abel, and the Pharisee went up to the temple to pray as well as the publican. 2nd. They behaved themselves very decently and reverently in the public assembly. There were none of them whispering, or laughing, or gazing about them, or sleeping; but "They sit before thee as my people," with all the shows of gravity, and sereneness, and composure of mind; they sit out the time without weariness, or wishing the sermon done. 3rd. They were very attentive to the word preached. They are not thinking of something else, but they "hear thy words," and take notice of what thou sayest. 4th. They pretended to have a great kindness and respect for the prophet. Though behind his back they could not give him a good word, yet to his face they shewed much love to him and his doctrine; they pretended to have a great concern lest he should spend himself too much in preaching, or expose himself to the Chaldeans, for they would be thought to be some of his best friends, and well-wishers. 5th. They took a great deal of pleasure in the word. They "delighted to know God's word," Isa. lviii. 2. (Herod heard John Baptist gladly, Mar. vi. 20.) "Thou art unto them as a very lovely song." Ezekiel's matter was surprising, his language fine, his expressions elegant, his similitudes apt, his voice tuneable, and his delivery graceful; so that they could sit with as much pleasure to hear him preach, as (if I may speak in the language of our times) to see a play or an opera, or to hear a concert of music. Ezekiel was to them as one that had a pleasant voice, and could sing well, or play well on an instrument. Note, It is possible men may have their fancies pleased by the word, and yet not have their consciences touched, nor their hearts changed; the itching ear gratified, and yet not the corrupt nature sanctified.

2. The hypocrisy of these professions and pretensions. It is all a sham, it is all a jest. 1st. They have no cordial affection for the word of God. While they shew much love, it is only with the mouth, from the teeth outward, but "their heart goeth after their covetousness;" they are as much set upon the world as ever, as much in love and league with it as ever. Hearing the word is only their diversion and recreation, a pretty amusement now and then for an hour or two. But still their main business is with their farm and merchandise, the bent and bias of their souls is towards them, and their inward thoughts are employed in projects about them. Note, Covetousness is the ruining sin of multitudes that make a great profession of religion; it is the love of the world that secretly eats the love of God out of their hearts. The cares of this world, and the deceitfulness of riches, are the thorns that choke the seed, and choke the soul too. And those neither please God nor profit themselves, who, when they are hearing the word of God, are musing upon their worldly affairs. God has his eye on the hearts that do so. 2nd. They yield no subjection to it. They hear thy words, but it is only a hearing they give thee, for they will not do them, ver. 31; and again, ver. 32, they do them not. They will not be persuaded by all the prophet can say, either by authority or argument, to cross themselves in any instance, to part with any one beloved sin, or apply themselves to any one duty that is against the grain to flesh and blood. Note, There are many who take pleasure in hearing the word, but make no conscience of doing it; and so they build upon the sand, and deceive themselves.

Lastly. Let us see what will be in the end hereof. Shall their unbelief and carelessness "make the word of God of none effect?" By no means. 1st. God will confirm the prophet's word, though they contemn it, and make light of it, ver. 33. What he saith will come to pass, and not one jot or one tittle shall fall to the ground. Note, The curses of the law, though they may be bantered by profane wits, yet they cannot be baffled. 2nd. They themselves shall rue their folly when it is too late. When it comes to pass they shall know, shall know to their cost, know to their confusion, that "a prophet hath been among them," though they made no more of him than as one that had a pleasant voice. Note, Those who will not consider that a prophet is among them, and improve not the day of their visitation while it is continued, will be made to remember that a prophet has been among them, when the things that belong to their peace are hid from their eyes. The day is coming when vain and worldly men will have other thoughts of things than now they have, and will feel a weight in that which they made light of. They shall know "a prophet hath been among them," when they see the event exactly answer the prediction, and the prophet himself shall be a witness against them that they had fair warning given them, but would not take it. When Ezekiel is gone, whom now they speak against, and there is no more any prophet, nor any to shew them how long, then they will remember that once they had a prophet, but knew not how to use him well. Note, Those that will not know the worth of mercies by the improvement of them, will justly be made to know the worth of them by the want of them; as they who should desire to see one of the days of the Son of man, which now they slighted, and might not see it.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

The iniquities and calamities of God's Israel had been largely and pathetically lamented before in this book. Now in this chapter the shepherds of Israel, their rulers both in church and state, are called to an account, as having been very much accessary to the sin and ruin of Israel, by their neglect to do the duty of their place. Here is, I. a high charge exhibited against them for their negligence, their unskilfuiness, and unfaithfulness in the management of public affairs, ver. 1—6; and again, ver. 8. II. Their discharge from their trust for their insufficiency and treachery, ver. 7—10. III. A gracious promise that God would take care of his flock, though they did not, and that it should not always suffer as it had done by their maladministrations, ver. 11—16. IV. Another charge exhibited against those of the flock that were fat and strong, for the injuries they did to those that were weak and feeble, ver. 17—22. V. Another promise, that God would in the fulness of time send the Messiah to be the great and good Shepherd of the sheep, who would redress all grievances, and set every thing to rights with the flock, ver. 23—31.

AND the word of the LORD came unto me, saying, 2 Son of man, prophesy against the shepherds of Israel, prophesy, and say unto them, lovely song, and the pleasant voice, and the skilful playing belong to the past. Oriental music and singing is monotonous and dreary.

xxxiv. 1. Junius says this portion of the book sets forth prophecies relating to the people of God, from the carrying away to Babylon to the first coming of Christ. The reproofs of chap. xxxiii. are directed mostly against the people, while here their rulers are rebuked.

xxxiv. 2. Shepherds here are the rulers and directors of the people, whether civil or ecclesiastical. To limit the word to any particular section of the public authorities is to weaken its force; but if it must be limited, priests and not princes are to be excluded. A dissertation might be written about the varied occupations and peculiarities of the shepherds of the East. The word rendered shepherd in most cases includes the care of domestic animals generally, and not of sheep in particular. In its metaphorical applications it means the care of nations, and therefore rulers, or

Thus saith the Lord GOD unto the shepherds;
Woe be to the shepherds of Israel that do feed them-
Should not the shepherds feed the flocks? [selves!
3 Ye eat the fat, and ye clothe you with the wool,
Ye kill them that are fed: but ye feed not the flock.
4 The diseased have ye not strengthened,
Neither have ye healed that which was sick,
Neither have ye bound up that which was broken,
Neither have ye brought again that which was driven away,
Neither have ye sought that which was lost;
But with force and with cruelty have ye ruled them
5 And they were scattered, because there is no shepherd:
And they became meat to all the beasts of the field, when they were scattered.
6 My sheep wandered through all the mountains, and upon every high hill:
Yea, my flock was scattered upon all the face of the earth,
And none did search or seek after them.

The prophecy of this chapter is not dated, nor any of those that follow it, till ch. xl. It is most probable it was delivered after the completing of Jerusalem's destruction, when it would be very seasonable to inquire into the cause of it.

First. The prophet is ordered to "prophesy against the shepherds of Israel." The princes and magistrates, the priests and Levites, the great Sanhedrim, or council of state, or whoever they were that had the conduct of public affairs in a higher or lower sphere; the kings especially, for there were two of them now captives in Babylon, who, as well as the people, must have their transgressions shewed them that they might repent, as Manasseh in his captivity. God has something to say to the shepherds, for they are but under-shepherds, accountable to him who is the great Shepherd of Israel, Ps. lxxx. 1. And that which he saith is "Woe to the shepherds of Israel!" Though they are shepherds, and shepherds of Israel, yet he must not spare them, must not flatter them. Note, If men's dignity and power doth not, as it ought, keep them from sin, it will not serve to exempt them from reproof, to excuse their repentance, or to secure them from the judgments of God, if they do not repent. We had a "Woe to the pastors," Jer. xxiii. 1. God will in a particular manner reckon with them if they be false to their trust.

Secondly. He is here directed what to charge the shepherds with in God's name, as the ground of God's controversy with them; for it is not a causeless quarrel. Two things they are charged with:

1. That all their care was to advance and enrich themselves, and to make themselves great. Their business was to take care of those that were committed to their charge. "Should not the shepherds feed the flock?" No doubt they should, they betray their trust if they do not. Not that they are to put the meat into their mouths, but to provide it for them, and to bring them to it; but these shepherds made this the least of their care; they fed themselves, contrived every thing to gratify and indulge their own appetite, and to make themselves rich and great, fat and easy. They made sure the profits of their places, they did eat the fat, the cream, so some; for he that feeds a flock eats of the milk of it, 1 Cor. ix. 7; and they made sure the best of the milk. They made sure the fleece, and clothed themselves with the wool, getting into their hands as much as they could of the estates of their subjects; yea, and killed them that were well fed, that what they had might be fed upon, as Naboth was put to death for his vineyard. Note, There is a woe to those that are in public trust but consult only their own private interest, and are more inquisitive about the benefice than about the office—what money is to be got than what good to be done. It is an old complaint; all seek their own, and too many more than their own.

2. That they took no care for the benefit and welfare of those that were committed to their charge; "Ye feed not the flock." They neither knew how to do it, so ignorant were they, nor would they take any pains to do it, so lazy and slothful were they; nay, they never desired or designed it, so treacherous and unfaithful were they. 1st. They did not do their duty to those of the flock that were distempered; did not strengthen them or heal them, or bind them up, ver. 4. When any of the flock were sick or hurt, worried or wounded, it was all one to them whether they lived or died, they never looked after them. The princes and judges took no care to right those that suffered wrong, or to shelter injured innocency. They took no care of the poor to see them provided for—they might starve for them. The priests took no care to instruct the ignorant, to rectify the mistakes of those that were in error, to warn the unruly, or to comfort the feeble-minded. The ministers of state took no care to check the growing distempers of the kingdom, which threatened the vitals of it. Things were amiss and out of course every where, and nothing was done to rectify them. 2nd. They did not do their duty to those of the flock that were dispersed, that were driven away by the enemies that invaded the country, and were forced to seek for shelter where they could find a place, or that wandered of choice upon the mountains and hills, ver. 6, where they were exposed to the beasts of prey, and became meat to them, ver. 5; every one is ready to seize a waif and stray. Some went abroad and begged, some went abroad and traded; and thus the country waxed thin of inhabitants, and was weakened and impoverished, and wanted hands both in the fields of corn and in the fields of battle, both in harvest and in war. "My flock was scattered upon all the face of the earth," ver. 6, and they were never inquired after, were never encouraged to return to their own country; none did search or seek after them. Nay, with force and cruelty they ruled them, which drove more away, and discouraged those that were driven away from all thoughts of returning. Their case is bad who have reason to expect better treatment among strangers than in their own country. It may be meant of those of the flock that went astray from God and their duty; and the priests, that should have taught the good knowledge of the Lord, used no means to convince and reclaim them, so that they became an easy prey to seducers. Thus were "they scattered, because there was no shepherd," ver. 5. There were those that called themselves shepherds, but really they were not. Note, Those that do not do the work of the shepherds are unworthy of the name; and, if those that undertake to be shepherds are foolish shepherds, Zec. xi. 15, if they are proud and above their business, idle, and do not love their business, or faithless and unconcerned about it, the case of the flock is as bad as if it were without a shepherd. Better no shepherd than such shepherds. Christ complains that his flock were as sheep having no shepherd, when yet the scribes and Pharisees sat in Moses' seat, Mat. ix. 36. It is ill with the patient when his physician is his worst disease, ill with the flock when the shepherds drive them away and disperse them, by ruling them with force.

7 Therefore, ye shepherds, hear the word of the LORD;
8 As I live, saith the Lord GOD,
Surely because my flock became a prey,
And my flock became meat to every beast of the field,
Because there was no shepherd, neither did my shep herds search for my flock,
But the shepherds fed themselves, and fed not my flock;
9 Therefore, O ye shepherds, hear the word of the LORD;
10 Thus saith the Lord GOD;
Behold, I am against the shepherds;
And I will require my flock at their hand,
And cause them to cease from feeding the flock;
Neither shall the shepherds feed themselves any more;
For I will deliver my flock from their mouth,
That they may not be meat for them.
11 For thus saith the Lord GOD;
Behold, I, even I, will both search my sheep, and seek them out.
12 As a shepherd seeketh out his flock
In the day that he is among his sheep that are scattered:
So will I seek out my sheep,
And will deliver them out of all places where they have been scattered
In the cloudy and dark day.
13 And I will bring them out from the people,
And gather them from the countries,
And will bring them to their own land,
And feed them upon the mountains of Israel
By the rivers, and in all the inhabited places of the country.
14 I will feed them in a good pasture,
And upon the high mountains of Israel shall their fold be:
There shall they lie in a good fold,
And in a fat pasture shall they feed upon the mountains of Israel.
15 I will feed my flock, and I will cause them to lie down.
Saith the Lord GOD.
16 I will seek that which was lost,
And bring again that which was driven away,
And will bind up that which was broken,
And will strengthen that which was sick:
But I will destroy the fat and the strong;
I will feed them with judgment.

Upon reading the foregoing articles of impeachment drawn up in God's name, against the shepherds of Israel, we cannot but look upon the shepherds with a just indignation, and upon the flock with a tender compassion. God, by the prophet, here expresseth both in a high degree; and the shepherds are called upon, ver. 7, and again, ver. 9, to "hear the word of the Lord," to hear this word. Let them hear how little he regards them who made much of themselves, and how much he regards the flock which they made nothing of; both will be humbling to them. Those that will not hear the word of the Lord, giving them their direction, shall be made to hear the word of the Lord reading them their doom. Now see here,

First. How much displeased God is at the shepherds. Their crimes are repeated, ver. 8. God's flock became a prey to the deceivers first that drew them to idolatry, and then to the destroyers that carried them into captivity; and these shepherds took no care to prevent either the one or the other, but were as if there had been no shepherds; and therefore God saith it, ver. 10, and confirms it with an oath, ver. 8, "I am against the shepherds." They had a commission from God to feed the flock, and made use of his name in what they did, expecting he would stand by them. No, saith God, so far from that, I am against them. Note, It is not our having the name and authority of shepherds that will engage God for us, if we do not the work enjoined us, and be not faithful to the trust reposed in us. God is against them, and they shall know it; for, 1. They shall be called to an account how they have discharged their trust; "I will require my flock at their hands," and charge it upon them that so many of them are missing. Note, Those will have a great deal to answer for in the judgment-day who take upon them the care of souls and yet take no care of them. Ministers must watch and work as those that must give account, Heb. xiii. 17. 2. They shall be deprived officio et beneficio,—'they shall be turned out both from the work and from the wages of their place.' "They shall cease from feeding the flock," that is, from pretending to feed it. Note, It is just with God to take out of men's hands that power which they have abused, and that trust which they have betrayed. But if this were all their punishment they could bear it well enough; therefore it is added, "Neither it may be still further limited to local magistrates and teachers. With reference to the original intention of the word, it may be noted that at present the pastors of Arabia and neighbouring lands are occupied especially with the care of sheep and goats, oxen, horses, asses, and camels. The sheikh who owns all these is not beyond taking a personal interest in them, and helping with his servants in looking after them. The office of a common shepherd was in these countries, and still is, more arduous and difficult than with us. Not only must the shepherd find pasture for his flocks, but he must regularly take them to water, must protect them from robbers and wild beasts, and all dangers, must search for them if gone astray, and must take special care of the young and feeble. The flocks are taken from place to place until they are far away from the spot they regard as home, not only in seasons of special drought, but every summer. Wilson mentions a place where there were upwards of 20,000 camels and more than 50,000 goats grazing-shall the shepherds feed themselves any more," for "I will deliver my flock from their mouth," which, instead of protecting, they had made a prey of. Note, Those that are enriching themselves with the spoils of the public cannot expect that they shall always be suffered to do so. Nor will God always permit his people to be trampled upon by those that should support them, but will find a time to deliver them from the shepherds their false friends, as well as from the lions their open enemies.

Secondly. How much concerned God is for the flock. He speaks as if he were the more concerned for them because he saw them thus neglected, for with him the fatherless find mercy. Precious promises are made here upon the occasion, which were to have their accomplishment in the return of the Jews out of their captivity, and their re-establishment in their own land. Let the shepherds "hear this word of the Lord," and know that they have no part or lot in the matter; but let the poor sheep hear it, and take the comfort of it. Note, Though magistrates and ministers fail in doing their part for the good of the church, yet God will not fail in doing his; he will take the flock into his own hand, rather than the church shall come short of any kindness he has designed for it. The under-shepherds may prove careless, but the chief Shepherd neither slumbers nor sleeps. They may be false, but God abides faithful.

1. God will gather his sheep together that were scattered, and bring them back to the fold that had wandered from it. I, even I, who alone can do it, will do it, and will have all the glory of it. "I will both search my sheep and seek them out," ver. 11, as a shepherd doth, ver. 12, and bring them back, as he doth the stray sheep, upon his shoulders, "from all the places where they have been scattered in the cloudy and dark day." There are cloudy and dark days, windy and stormy ones, which scatter God's sheep, which send them hither and thither, to divers and distant places, in quest of secresy and safety. But, 1st. Wherever they are the eye of God will find them out, for his eyes run to and fro through the earth in favour of them. "I will seek out my sheep," and not one that belongs to the fold, though driven ever so far off, shall be lost. The Lord knows them that are his, he knows their work, and where they dwell, Rev. ii. 13, and where they are hidden. 2nd. When his time is come his arms will fetch them home; ver. 13, "I will bring them out from the people." God will both incline their hearts to come by his grace, and will by his providence open a door for them, and remove every difficulty that lies in the way. They shall not return one by one, clandestinely stealing away, but they shall return in a body. I will "gather them from the countries" into which they are dispersed; not only the most considerable families of them, but every particular person; ver. 16, "I will seek that which was lost, and bring again that which was driven away." This was done when so many thousand Jews returned triumphantly out of Babylon, under the conduct of Zerubbabel, Ezra, and others. When those that have gone astray from God into the paths of sin are brought back by repentance; when those that erred come to the acknowledgment of the truth; when God's outcasts are gathered and restored, and religious assemblies that were dispersed rally again upon the ceasing of persecution, and when the churches have rest and liberty, then this promise has a farther accomplishment.

2. God will feed his people as the sheep of his pasture, that had been famished. God will bring the returning captives safe to their own land; ver. 13, "will feed them upon the mountains of Israel," and that is a good pasture, and a fat pasture, ver. 14; there shall their feeding be, and there shall be their fold, and it is a good fold. There God will not only feed them, but "cause them to lie down," ver. 15, which notes a comfortable rest, after they had tired themselves with their wanderings, and a constant, continuing residence; they shall not be driven out again from these green pastures, as they have been, nor shall they be disturbed, but shall lie down in a sweet repose, and there shall be none to make them afraid; Ps. xxiii. 2, "He maketh me to lie down in green pastures." Compare this with the like promise, Jer. xxiii. 3, 4, when God restored them, not only to the milk and honey of their own land, to the enjoyment of the fruits of it, but to the privileges of his sanctuary on mount Zion, the chief of the mountains of Israel; when they had an altar and a temple again, and the benefit of a settled priesthood, then they were fed in a good pasture.

3. He will succour those that are hurt, will "bind up that which was broken, and strengthen that which was sick," will comfort those that mourn in Zion, and with Zion. If ministers, that should speak peace to those that are of a sorrowful spirit, neglect their duty, yet the Holy Ghost the Comforter will be faithful to his office. But, as it follows, the fat and the strong shall be destroyed. He that hath rest for disquieted saints hath terror to speak to presumptuous sinners. As "every valley shall be filled," so "every mountain and hill shall be brought low," Lu. iii. 5.

17 And as for you, O my flock, thus saith the Lord GOD;
Behold, I judge between cattle and cattle, between the rams and the he goats.
18 Seemeth it a small thing unto you to have eaten up the good pasture,
But ye must tread down with your feet the residue of your pastures?
And to have drunk of the deep waters,
But ye must foul the residue with your feet?
9 And as for my flock, they eat that which ye have trodden with your feet;
And they drink that which ye have fouled with your feet.
20 Therefore thus saith the Lord GOD unto them;
Behold, I, even I, will judge between the fat cattle and between the lean cattle.
21 Because ye have thrust with side and with shoulder,
And pushed all the diseased with your horns,
Till ye have scattered them abroad;
22 Therefore will I save my flock, and they shall no more be a prey;
And I will judge between cattle and cattle.
23 And I will see up one shepherd over them, and he shall feed them,
Even my servant David;
He shall feed them, and he shall be their shepherd.
24 And I the LORD will be their God,
And my servant David a prince among them;
I the LORD have spoken it.
25 And I will make with them a covenant of peace,
And will cause the evil beasts to cease out of the land:
And they shall dwell safely in the wilderness, and sleep in the woods.
26 And I will make them and the places round about my hill a blessing;
And I will cause the shower to come down in his season;
There shall be showers of blessing.
27 And the tree of the field shall yield her fruit,
And the earth shall yield her increase,
And they shall be safe in their land, and shall know that I am the LORD,
When I have broken the bands of their yoke,
And delivered them out of the hand of those that served themselves of them.
28 And they shall no more be a prey to the heathen,
Neither shall the beast of the land devour them;
But they shall dwell safely, and none shall make them afraid.
29 And I will raise up for them a plant of renown,
And they shall be no more consumed with hunger in the land,
Neither bear the shame of the heathen any more.
30 Thus shall they know that I the LORD their God am with them,
And that they, even the house of Israel, are my people,
Saith the Lord GOD.
31 And ye my flock, the flock of my pasture, are men,
And I am your God, saith the Lord GOD.

The prophet has no more to say to the shepherds, but he has now a message to deliver to the flock; God has ordered him to speak tenderly to them, and to assure them of the mercy he had in store for them. But here he is ordered to make a difference between some and others of them, to separate between the precious and the vile, and then to give them a promise of the Messiah, by whom this distinction should be effectually made, partly at his first coming, (for for judgment he came into this world, Jno. ix. 39, to fill the hungry with good things, and to send the rich empty away, Lu. i. 53,) but completely at his second coming, when he shall, as it is here said, "judge between cattle and cattle," "as a shepherd divides between the sheep and the goats, and shall set the sheep on his right hand and the goats on his left," Mat. xxv. 32, 33, which seems to have reference to this here. We have here,

First. Conviction spoken to those of the flock that were fat and strong, "the rams and the he-goats," ver. 17. Those that, though they had not power as shepherds and rulers to oppress with, yet, being rich and wealthy, made use of the opportunity which this gave them to bear hard upon their poor neighbours. Those that have much would have more; and if they set to it will have more, so many ways have they of encroaching upon their poor neighbours, and forcing from them the one ewe lamb, 2 Sam. xii. 14. Do not the rich oppress the poor merely with the help of their riches, and draw them before the judgment seats? Jas. ii. 6. Poor servants and tenants are hardly used by their rich lords and masters. The rams and the he-goats not only kept all the good pasture to themselves, eat the fat and drank the sweet, but they would not let the poor of the flock have any comfortable enjoyment of the little that was left them; they trod down the residue of the pastures, and fouled the residue of the waters, so that the flock was fain to eat that which they had trodden into the dirt, and drink that which they had muddied, ver. 18, 19. This intimates that the great men not only by extortion and oppression made and kept their neighbours poor, and scarce left them enough to subsist on, but were so vexatious to them, that what little coarse fare they had was embittered to them. And this seemed a small thing to them; they thought there was no harm in it, as if it were the privilege of their quality to be injurious to all their neighbours. Note, Many that live in pomp and at ease themselves care not what straits those about them are reduced to, so they may but have every thing to their mind. Those that are at ease, and the proud, grudge that any body should live by them with any comfort.

But this was not all; they not only robbed the poor, to make them poorer, but were troublesome to the sick and weak of the flock; ver. 21, they "thrust with side and shoulder" those that were feeble, for the weakest go to the wall, and pushed the diseased with their horns, because they knew they could be too hard for them, when they durst not meddle with their match. It has been observed concerning sheep, that, if one of the flock be sick and faint, the rest will secure it as they can, and shelter it from the scorching heat of the sun, but these, on the contrary, were most injurious to the diseased. Those that they could not serve themselves of they did what they could to rid the country of them, and so scattered them abroad, as if the poor, whom Christ saith we must always have with us, were public nuisances, not to be relieved, but sent far enough. Note, It is a barbarous thing to add affliction to the afflicted. Perhaps these rams and he goats are designed to represent the scribes and Pharisees; for they are such troublers of the church as Christ himself must come to deliver it from, ver. 23. They devoured widows' houses, took away the key of knowledge, corrupted the pure water of Divine truths, and xxxiv. 14. Irby and Mangles, the travellers, say, "It was a pleasing sight to see them (the Arabs) bring in their flocks at night, which always slept close to the tents of their owners, several Arabs, together with numerous dogs, remaining outside as guards. The lambs were placed inside the tents, in a small fenced place, to screen them from the inclemency of the night air, which was nearly as cold as you would experience it in England at that season, always freezing hard."

xxxiv. 24. David cannot be literally meant, as he was dead and buried. It has been suggested that the word should be translated "beloved," and the clause rendered "my beloved servant," an ingenious but needless device, and of no value, because the prophetic personal element remains as vigorous as before. It has also been suggested that by David should be understood a descendant of his, viz., either Zerubbabel or Christ. The ancient Jews regarded the Messiah as meant, and this is the explanation generally approved.

oppressed the consciences of men with the traditions of the elders, besides that they were continually vexations and injurious "to the poor of the flock that waited" on the Lord, Zec. xi. 11. Note, It is no new thing for the flock of God to receive a great deal of damage and mischief from those that are themselves of the flock, and in eminent station in it.—Acts xx. 30.

Secondly. Comfort spoken to those of the flock that are poor and feeble, and wait for the consolation of Israel; ver. 22, "I will save my flock," and they shall no more be spoiled as they have been by the beasts of prey, by their own shepherds, or by the rams and he-goats among themselves. Upon this occasion, as is usual in the prophets, comes in a prediction of the coming of the Messiah, and the setting up of his kingdom, and the exceeding great and precious benefits which the church should enjoy under the protection and influence of that kingdom. Observe,

1. What is here foretold concerning the Messiah himself. 1st. He shall have his commission from God himself; I will set him up, ver. 23; I will raise him up, ver. 29. He sanctified and sealed him, appointed and anointed him. 2nd. He shall be the great Shepherd of the sheep, who shall do that for his flock which no one else could do. He is the one Shepherd under whom Jews and Gentiles should be one fold. 3rd. He is God's servant, employed by him and for him, and doing all in obedience to his will, with an eye to his glory; his servant to re-establish his kingdom among men, and advance the interests of that kingdom. 4th. He is David, one after God's own heart, set as his king upon the holy hill of Sion, made the head of the corner, with whom the covenant of royalty is made, and to whom God would give the throne of his father David. He is both the root and offspring of David. 5th. He is the "plant of renown," because a "righteous branch," Jer. xxiii. 5,—a branch of the Lord that is beautiful and glorious, Isa. iv. 2. He has a name above every name, a throne above every throne, and may therefore well be called a branch of renown. Some understand it of the church, the "planting of the Lord," Isa. lxi. 3. "Its name shall be remembered," Ps. xlv. 17, and Christ's in it.

2. Concerning the great charter, by which the Messiah should be incorporated, and upon which it should be founded; ver. 25, "I will make with them a covenant of peace." The covenant of grace is a covenant of peace; in it God is at peace with us, speaks peace to us, and assures us of peace, of all good,—all the good we need to make us happy. The tenor of this covenant is, "I the Lord will be their God," a God all-sufficient to them. ver. 24, will own them, and will be owned by them. In order to this, my servant David shall be a prince among them, to reduce them to their allegiance, to receive their homage, and to reign over them, in them, and for them. Note, Those, and those only, that have the Lord Jesus for their prince have the Lord Jehovah for their God. And then they, even the house of Israel, shall be my people. If we take God to be our God, he will take us to be his people. From this covenant between God and Israel there results communion; "I the Lord their God am with them," to converse with them; and they shall know it, and have the comfort of it.

3. Concerning the privileges of those that are the faithful subjects of this kingdom of the Messiah, and interested in the covenant of peace. These are here set forth figuratively, as the blessings of the flock; but we have a key to it, ver. 31. They that belong to this flock, though they are spoken of as sheep, are really men,—men that have the Lord for their God, and are in covenant with him. Now to them it is promised,

1st. That they shall enjoy a holy security under the Divine protection. Christ, our good Shepherd, has caused "the evil beasts to cease out of the land," ver. 25, having vanquished all our spiritual enemies, broken their power, and triumphed over them; the roaring lion is not a roaring, devouring lion to them. "They shall no more be a prey to the heathen," nor the heathen a terror to them; "neither shall the beasts of the land devour them." Sin and Satan, death and hell, are conquered. And then "they shall dwell safely," not only in the folds but in the fields, in the wilderness, in the woods, where the beasts of prey are. They shall not only dwell there, but they shall sleep there, which notes not only that, the beasts being made to cease, there shall be no danger, but, their consciences being purified and pacified, they shall be in no apprehension of danger; not only safe from evil, but quiet from the fear of evil. Note, Those may lay them down and sleep securely, sleep at ease, that have Christ for their prince; for he will be their protector, and make them to dwell in safety. None shall hurt them, nay, "none shall make them afraid." If God be for us who can be against us? "Therefore will not we fear though the earth be removed." Through Christ God delivers his people, not only from the things they have reason to fear, but from their fear even of death itself, from all that fear that has torment. This safety from evil is promised, ver. 27, "They shall be safe in their land," in no danger of being invaded and enslaved, though their great plenty be a temptation to their neighbours to desire their land; and that which shall make them think themselves safe is, their confidence in the wisdom, power, and goodness of God; "They shall know that I am the Lord." All our disquieting fears arise from our ignorance of God, and mistakes concerning him. And their experience of his particular care concerning them encourageth their confidence in him; "I have broken the bonds of their yoke," with which they have been brought and held down under oppression, and have "delivered them out of the hand of those that served themselves of them;" from whence they shall argue, He that has delivered doth and will, therefore will we dwell safely. This is explained and applied to our gospel state; Lu. i. 74, "That we being delivered out of the hand of our enemies might serve him without fear," as those may do that serve him in faith.

2nd. That they shall enjoy a spiritual plenty of all good things—the best things—for their comfort and happiness. "They shall no more be consumed with hunger in the land," ver. 29. Famine and scarcity, when Israel was punished with that judgment, turned as much to their reproach among the heathen as any other, because the fruitfulness of Canaan was so much talked of. But now "They shall not bear that shame of the heathen any more;" for "the showers shall come down in their season," even "showers of blessings," ver. 26. Christ is a Shepherd that will feed his people; and they shall go in and out and find pasture. First. They shall not be consumed with hunger; for they shall not be put off with the world for a portion, which is not bread, which satisfies not, and which those that are put off with cannot but be "consumed with hunger." The ordinances of the ceremonial law are called beggarly elements; for there was little in them compared with the Christian institutes, "wherewith the mower fills his hand and he that bindeth sheaves his bosom." They that "hunger and thirst after righteousness" shall not be consumed with that hunger, for "they shall be filled;" and he that drinks of the water that Christ gives him, the still waters by which he leads his sheep, shall never thirst. Secondly. "Showers of blessings" shall come upon them, ver. 26, 27. The heavens shall yield their dews, the trees of the field also shall yield her fruit. The seat of this plenty is God's hill, his holy hill of Zion; for on that mountain, in the gospel church, it is that God has "made to all nations a feast," so that those must join themselves that would partake of gospel benefits. The cause of this plenty is the showers that come down in their season, that descend upon the mountains of Zion, the graces of Christ, his doctrine that drops as the dew, the graces of Christ, and the gifts and comforts of his Spirit, by which we are made fruitful in the fruits of righteousness. The instances of this plenty are the blessings of heaven poured down upon us, and the products of grace brought forth by us, our comfort in God's favour, and God's glory in our fruit-bearing. The extent of this plenty is very large, to all the "places round about my hill;" for "out of Sion shall go forth the law," shall go forth light to a dark world, and the river that shall water a dry and desert world; all that are in the neighbourhood of Sion shall fare better for it, and the nearer the church the nearer its God. And, lastly, the effect of this plenty is, "I will make them a blessing," eminently and exemplarily blessed, patterns of happiness, Isa. xix. 24. Or, they shall be blessings to all about them, diffusively useful. Note, Those that are the blessed of the Lord must study to make themselves blessings to the world. He that is good, let him do good; he that has received the gift, the grace, let him minister the same.

Now this promise of the Messiah and his kingdom spoke much comfort to those to whom it was then made, for they might be sure God would not utterly destroy their nation, how low soever it might be brought, as long as that blessing was in the womb of it, Isa. lxv. 8. But it speaks much more comfort to us to whom it is fulfilled, who are the sheep of this good Shepherd, are fed in his pastures, and blessed with all spiritual blessings in heavenly things by him.

CHAPTER XXXV.

It was promised in the foregoing chapter, that when the time to favour Zion, yea, the set time, should come, especially the time for sending the Messiah, and setting up his kingdom in the world, God would cause the enemies of the church to cease, and the blessings and comforts of the church to abound. This chapter enlargeth upon the former promise, concerning the destruction of the enemies of the church; the next chapter upon the latter promise, the replenishing of the church with blessings. Mount Seir, that is, Edom, is the enemy prophesied against in this chapter, but fitly put here, as in the prophesy of Obadiah, for all the enemies of the church; for, as they all walked in the way of Cain that hated Abel, so they all walked in the way of Esau that hated Jacob, but over whom Jacob, by virtue of a particular blessing, was to have dominion. Now here we have, I. The sin charged upon the Edomites, and that was their spite and malice to Israel, ver. 5, 10—13. II. The ruin threatened that should come upon them for this sin: God will be against them, ver. 3; and then their country shall be laid waste, ver. 4; depopulated, and made quite desolate, ver. 6—9; and left so when other nations that had been wasted should recover themselves, ver. 14, 15.

MOREOVER the word of the LORD came unto me, saying, 2 Son of man, set thy face against mount Seir, and prophesy against it, 3 And say unto it,

Thus saith the Lord GOD;
Behold, O mount Seir, I am against thee,
And I will stretch out mine hand against thee,
And I will make thee most desolate.

4 I will lay thy cities waste, and thou shalt be desolate,
And thou shalt know that I am the LORD.

5 Because thou hast had a perpetual hatred,
And hast shed the blood of the children of Israel by the force of the sword
In the time of their calamity, in the time that their iniquity had an end:

6 Therefore, as I live, saith the Lord GOD, [thee:
I will prepare thee unto blood, and blood shall pursue Sith thou hast not hated blood, even blood shall pursue

7 Thus will I make mount Seir most desolate, [thee.
And cut off from it him that passeth out and him that returneth.

MOUNT SEIR.

xxxv. 2. Some of the older expositors, with Junius, thought that under the name of Seir or Edom all the enemies of the Church were intended, because the Edomites were very near to the Jews, very well known, and very hostile. Such a view is highly objectionable, for although certain fundamental principles are involved in this prediction, there is no evidence whatever to show that others are implied when Edom (Seir) alone is expressed. This principle is to be utterly condemned, as at once false and dangerous, as it opens the door to all kinds of fancies and prejudices, and has been used or abused to justify the application to the Pope of Rome of texts like Jer. i. 10 and Matt. xvi. 18, 19. Dr. Fairbairn says, "The heathen at large are represented in Edom, and hence, by parity of reason, the whole elect family of God in Israel." We prefer to think that Edom and Israel alone are primarily intended, though we admit the special cases as illustrating truths applicable to all the friends and enemies of the Lord. The material desolation of Edom is foretold,

8 And I will fill his mountains with his slain men:
In thy hills, and in thy valleys, and in all thy rivers,
Shall they fall that are slain with the sword.
9 I will make thee perpetual desolations, and thy cities shall not return:
And ye shall know that I am the LORD.

Mount Seir was mentioned as partner with Moab in one of the threatenings we had before, ch. xxv. 8; but here it is convicted and condemned by itself, and has woes of its own. The prophet must boldly set his face against Edom, and prophesy particularly against it; for the God of Israel hath said, "O mount Seir, I am against thee!" Note, Those that have God against them have the word of God against them, and the face of his ministers; neither dare they prophesy any good of them, but evil. The prophet must tell the Edomites that God has a controversy with them, and let them know,

First. What is the cause and ground of that controversy, ver. 5. God espouseth his people's cause, and will plead it; takes what is done against them as done against himself, and will reckon for it; and it is upon their account that God now contends with the Edomites. 1. Because of the enmity they had against the people of God, that was rooted in the heart; Thou hast had a perpetual hatred to them, to the very name of an Israelite. The Edomites kept up an hereditary malice against Israel, the same that Esau bore to Jacob, because he got the birthright and the blessing. Esau had been reconciled to Jacob, had embraced and kissed him, Gen. xxxiii.; and we do not find that ever he quarrelled with him again; but the posterity of Esau would never be reconciled to the seed of Jacob, but hated them with a perpetual hatred. Note, Children will be more apt to imitate the vices than the virtues of their parents, and to tread in the steps of their sin than in the steps of their repentance. Parents should therefore be careful not to set their children any bad example; for, though through the grace of God they may return and prevent the mischief of what they have done amiss to themselves, they may not be able to obviate the ill influence of it upon their children. It is strange how deeply rooted national antipathies sometimes are, and how long they last, but not to be wondered at that profane Edomites hate pious Israelites, since the old enmity that was put between the seed of the woman and the seed of the serpent (Gen iii. 15) will continue to the end. "Marvel not if the world hate you." 2. Because of the injuries they had done to the people of God. They shed their blood "by the force of the sword, in the time of their calamity." They did not attack them as fair and open enemies, but laid wait for them, to cut off those of them that had escaped, Oba. 14. Or, they drove them back upon the swords of the pursuers, by which they fell. It was cowardly as well as barbarous to take advantage of their distress, and for neighbours with whom they had lived peaceably to smite them secretly when strangers openly invaded them. It was in the time that their iniquity had an end, that is, when the measure of it was full, and destruction came. Note, Even those that suffer justly, and for their sins, yet are to be pitied, and not trampled upon. If the father corrects one child, he expects the rest should tremble at it, not triumph in it.

Secondly. What should be the effect and issue of that controversy. If God stretch out his hand against the country of Edom, he will make it "most desolate," ver. 3,—desolation and desolation. 1. The inhabitants shall be slain with the sword; ver. 6, "I will prepare thee unto blood." Edom shall be gradually weakened, and so be the more easily conquered, and the enemy shall gather strength the more effectually to subdue it. Thus preparation is in the making a great while before for this destruction. "Thou hast not hated blood;" it implies, thou hast delighted in it, and thirsted after it. Those that do not keep a rooted hatred of sin, when a temptation to it is very strong will be in danger of yielding to it. Some read it, 'Unless thou hatest blood,' that is, unless thou dost repent, and put off this bloody disposition, "blood shall pursue thee." And then it is an intimation that the judgment may yet be prevented by a thorough reformation. "If he turn not, he will whet his sword," Ps. vii. 12; but if he turn, he will lay it by. "Blood shall pursue thee," that is, the guilt of the blood which thou hast shed, or the judgment of blood; thy bloodthirsty enemies shall pursue thee, which way soever thou seekest to make thy escape. A great and general slaughter shall be made of the Idumeans, such as had been foretold, Isa. xxxiv. 6; the mountains and hills, the valleys and rivers, shall be filled with the slain, ver. 8. The pursuers shall overtake those that flee, and shall give no quarter, but put them all to the sword. Note, When God comes to make inquisition for blood, those that have shed the blood of his Israel shall have blood given them to drink, for they are worthy. Satia te sanguine quem sitisti,—'Glut thyself with blood, after which thou hast thirsted.' 2. The country shall be laid waste. The cities shall be destroyed, ver. 4; the country made "most desolate," ver. 7; for God will cut off both him that passeth out and him that returneth; and, when the inhabitants are cut off that should keep the cities in repair, they will decay and go into ruins; and those that should till the land, that will soon be overrun with briers and thorns, and become a wilderness. Note, Those who help forward the desolations of Israel may expect to be themselves made desolate. And that which completes the judgment is, that Edom shall be made "perpetual desolations," ver. 9; and the cities shall never return to their former state, nor the inhabitants of them come back from their captivity and dispersion. Note, Those that have a perpetual enmity to God and his people, as the carnal mind has, can expect no other but to be made a perpetual desolation. Implacable malice will justly be punished with irreparable ruin.

10 Because thou hast said, [mine,
These two nations and these two countries shall be
And we will possess it;
Whereas the LORD was there:
11 Therefore, as I live, saith the Lord GOD,
I will even do according to thine anger, and according to thine envy
Which thou hast used out of thy hatred against them;
And I will make myself known among them, when I have judged thee.
12 And thou shalt know that I am the LORD,
And that I have heard all thy blasphemies which thou hast spoken
Against the mountains of Israel, saying,
They are laid desolate, they are given us to consume.
13 Thus with your mouth ye have boasted against me,
And have multiplied your words against me: I have [heard them.
14 Thus saith the Lord GOD;
When the whole earth rejoiceth, I will make thee desolate.
15 As thou didst rejoice at the inheritance of the house of Israel,
Because it was desolate,
So will I do unto thee:
Thou shalt be desolate, O mount Seir, and all Idumea, even all of it:
And they shall know that I am the LORD

Here is, First. A farther account of the Edomites, and their ill carriage towards the people of God. We find the church complaining of them for setting on the Babylonians, and irritating them against Jerusalem, saying, "Rase it, rase it," down with it, down with it, Ps. cxxxvii. 7, inflaming a rage that needed no spur; here it is farther charged upon them that they triumphed in Jerusalem's ruin, and in the desolations of the country. Many blasphemies they spoke against "the mountains of Israel," saying, with pride and pleasure, "They are laid desolate," ver. 12. Note, The troubles of God's church, as they give proofs of the constancy and fidelity of its friends, so they discover and draw out the corruptions of its enemies, in whom there then appears more brutish malice than one would have thought of. Now their triumphing in Jerusalem's ruin is here said to proceed,

1. From a sinful passion against the people of Israel; from anger and envy, and "hatred against them," ver. 11, and that "perpetual hatred" spoken of, ver. 5. Though they were not a match for them, and therefore could not do them a mischief themselves, yet they were glad when the Chaldeans did them a mischief.

2. From a sinful appetite to the land of Israel. They pleased themselves with hopes that when the people of Israel were destroyed they should be let into the possession of their country, which they had so often grudged and envied them. They thought they could make out something of a title to it, ob defectum sanguinis,—'for want of other heirs.' If Jacob's issue fail, they think they are next in the entail, and that the remainder will be to his brother's issue; "These two nations" of Judah and Israel "shall be mine;" now is the time for me to put in for them. However, they hope to come in as first occupants, being near neighbours; We will possess it, when it is deserted. Ceditur occupanti,—'Let us get possession, and that will be title enough.' Note, Those have the spirit of Edomites who desire the deaths of others because they hope to get by them, or are pleased with others failing because they expect to come into their business. When we see the vanity of the world in the disappointments, losses, and crosses that others meet with in it, instead of shewing ourselves upon such an occasion greedy of it we should rather be made thereby to sit more loose to it, and both take our affections off it and lower our expectations from it. But, in this case of the Edomites coveting the land of Israel, and gaping for it, there was a particular affront to God, when they said, These lands are given us to devour, and we shall have our bellies full of their riches. God saith, "You have boasted against me, and have multiplied your words against me;" for they expected possession upon a vacancy, because Israel was driven out, "whereas the Lord was still there," ver. 10. His temple indeed was burnt, and other the tokens of his presence gone; but his promise to give that land to the seed of Jacob for an inheritance was not made void, but remained in full force and virtue; and by that promise he did in effect still keep possession for Israel till they should in due time be restored to it. That was Immanuel's land, Isa. viii. 8; in that land he was to be born, and therefore that people shall continue in it of whom he is to be born till he has passed his time in it, and then let who will take it. "The Lord is there," that is, the Lord Jesus is to be there; and therefore Israel's discontinuance of possession is no defeasance of their right, but it shall be kept for them; and they shall have, hold, and enjoy it, by virtue of the Divine grant, till the promise of this Canaan shall by the Messiah be changed into the promise of a far better. Note, It is a piece of presumption highly offensive to God for Edomites to lay claim to those privileges and comforts that are peculiar to God's chosen Israel, and are reserved for them. It is blasphemy against the mountains of Israel, the holy mountains, (as they are here called, ver. 12,) to say, because they are for the present made a prey of, and "trodden under foot of the Gentiles," Rev. xi. 2, even the holy city itself, that therefore the Lord has forsaken them, their God has forgotten them. The apostle will by no means admit such a thought as this, that "God hath cast away his people," Rom. xi. 1. No; though they are cast down for a time, they are not cast off for ever. Those reproach the Lord who say they are.

Secondly. The notice God took of the barbarous insolence of the Edomites, and the doom passed upon them for it. "I have heard all thy blasphemies," ver. 12; and again, ver. 13, "You have multiplied your words against me," and I have heard them, I have observed them, I have kept an account of them. Note, In the multitude of words none escape God's cognizance; let men speak never so much, never so fast, though they multiply words which they themselves regard not, but forget immediately, yet none of them are lost in the crowd, not the most idle words; but God hears them, and will be able to charge the sinner with them. All the haughty and hard speeches particularly which are spoken against the God of Israel, the words that are magnified, as it is in the margin, ver. 13, as well as the words that are multiplied, God takes notice of. For, as the trifling words are not below his cognizance, so the daring are not above his rebuke; "I have heard all thy blasphemies." This is good reason why we should bear reproach as if we heard it not, because God will hear, Ps. xxxviii. 13, 15, God has heard the Edomites' blasphemy, let them therefore hear their doom, ver. 14, 15. It was a national sin; the blasphemies charged upon them were the sense and language of all the Edomites, and therefore shall be punished with a national desolation. And, 1. It shall be a distinguishing punishment. As God has peculiar favours for Israelites, so he has peculiar plagues for Edomites; so that "when the whole earth rejoiceth I will make thee desolate," when other nations have their desolations repaired to their joy, thine shall be perpetual, ver. 9. 2. The punishment shall answer the sin. As thou didst rejoice in the desolation of the house of Israel, God will give thee enough of desolation; since thou art so fond of it, thou shalt be desolate, I will make thee so. Note, Those who, instead of weeping with the mourners, make a jest of their grievances, may justly be made to weep like the mourners, and themselves to feel the weight, to feel the smart of those grievances they set so light by. Some read ver. 14 so as to complete the resemblance between the sin and the punishment, 'The whole earth shall and it has been fulfilled. The legitimate inference is that persecution and impiety will be punished.

xxxv. 5. For "shed the blood of the children of Israel by the force of the sword," we may render more literally, "hast delivered the children of Israel to the hands of the sword." Numerous other explanations have been proposed, though the general sense is clear.

xxxv. 6. The last clause is variously rendered; some, with Fairbairn, take it to mean, "surely thou dost hate blood, and blood shall pursue thee," which may mean, "that shall pursue thee which thou dost abhor." But the Edomites seem to have had a liking for blood, and hence the version of our translators is generally acquiesced in. To this it is answered that the Edomites were anxious to preserve their own lives, and that is meant by their hating blood. The answer is not conclusive, and another interpretation has been devised, viz., "thou hast hated blood," i.e., kindred, the descendants of Esau's brother Jacob, "therefore blood," or bloodshed, "shall pursue thee."

rejoice when I make thee desolate, as thou didst rejoice when Israel was made desolate.' Those that are glad at the death and fall of others may expect that others will be glad of their death, of their fall.

Thirdly. In the destruction of the enemies of the church God designs his own glory, and we may be sure he will not come short of his design. 1. That which he intends is to manifest himself, as a just and jealous God, firm to his covenant, and faithful to his people and their injured cause; ver. 11, "I will make myself known among them when I have judged thee." The Lord is and will be known by the judgments which he executeth. 2. His intention shall be fully answered, not only his own people shall be made to know it to their comfort, but even the Edomites themselves, and all other the enemies of his name and people, shall know that he is the Lord, ver. 4, 9, 15. As the works of creation and common providence demonstrate that there is a God, so the care taken of Israel shews that Jehovah the God of Israel is that God alone, the true and living God.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

We have done with mount Seir, and left it desolate, and likely to continue so, and must now turn ourselves with the prophet to the mountains of Israel, which we find desolate too, but hope before we have done with the chapter to leave in better plight. Here are two distinct prophecies in this chapter, I. Here is one that seems chiefly to relate to the temporal estate of the Jews, wherein their present deplorable condition is described, and the triumphs of their neighbours in it; but it is promised that their grievances shall be all redressed, and that in due time they should be settled again in their own land in the midst of peace and plenty, ver. 1—15. II. Here is another that seems chiefly to concern their spiritual estate; wherein they are minded of their former sins, and God's judgments upon them, to humble them for their sins and under God's mighty hand, ver. 16—20. But it is promised, 1. That God would glorify himself in shewing mercy to them, ver. 21—24; 2. That he would sanctify them by giving them his grace, and fitting them for his service, and this for his own name's sake, and in answer to their prayers, ver. 25—38.

ALSO, thou son of man, prophesy unto the mountains of Israel, and say,
Ye mountains of Israel, hear the word of the LORD:
2 Thus saith the Lord GOD;
Because the enemy hath said against you,
Aha, even the ancient high places are our's in possession:
3 Therefore prophesy and say, Thus saith the Lord GOD;
Because they have made you desolate, and swallowed you up on every side, [heathen,
That ye might be a possession unto the residue of the
And ye are taken up in the lips of talkers,
And are an infamy of the people:
4 Therefore, ye mountains of Israel, hear the word of the Lord GOD;
Thus saith the Lord GOD to the mountains, and to the

Which became a prey and derision
To the residue of the heathen that are round about;

Surely in the fire of my jealousy have I spoken
Against the residue of the heathen, and against all Idumea,
Which have appointed my land into their possession
With the joy of all their heart,
With despiteful minds, to cast it out for a prey.
6 Prophesy therefore concerning the land of Israel,
And say unto the mountains, and to the hills,
To the rivers, and to the valleys,
Thus saith the Lord GOD;
Behold, I have spoken in my jealousy and in my fury,
Because ye have borne the shame of the heathen:
7 Therefore thus saith the Lord GOD; I have lifted up mine hand,
Surely the heathen that are about you, they shall bear their shame.
8 But ye, O mountains of Israel, ye shall shoot forth your branches,
And yield your fruit to my people of Israel;
For they are at hand to come.
9 For, behold, I am for you, and I will turn unto you,
And ye shall be tilled and sown:
10 And I will multiply men upon you,
All the house of Israel, even all of it: [builded.
And the cities shall be inhabited, and the wastes shall be

And they shall increase and bring fruit:
And I will settle you after your old estates,
And will do better unto you than at your beginnings:
And ye shall know that I am the LORD. [Israel;
12 Yea, I will cause men to walk upon you, even my people
And they shall possess thee, and thou shalt be their inheritance,
And thou shalt no more henceforth bereave them of men.

Neither bereave thy nations any more, saith the Lord GOD.
15 Neither will I cause men to hear in thee the shame of the heathen any more, [more,

CITADEL OF EDOM.—ver. 5.

The prophet had been ordered to set his face towards the mountains of Israel, and prophesy against them, ch. vi. 2. Then God was coming forth to contend with his people; but, now God is returning in mercy to them, he must speak good words and comfortable words to these mountains, ver. 1. And again, ver. 4, "Ye mountains of Israel, hear the word of the Lord:" and what he saith to them, he saith "to the hills, to the rivers, to the valleys, to the desolate wastes" in the country, "and to the cities that are forsaken," ver. 4; and again, ver. 6. The people were gone, some one way, and some another; nothing remained there to be spoken to but the places, the mountains and valleys. These the Chaldeans could not carry with them; the earth abideth for ever. Now, to shew the mercy God had in reserve for the people, he is to speak of him as having a dormant kindness for the place, which, if the Lord had been pleased for ever to abandon, he would not have called upon it to hear the word of the Lord, nor would, as at this time, have shewed it such things as these. Here is,

First. The compassionate notice God takes of the present deplorable condition of the land of Israel; it is become both a "prey and a derision to the

If the words which Dr. Fairbairn translates in the usual manner, "surely thou dost hate blood," are ironical, there is no further difficulty.

xxxv. 10. Another curious construction, but causing no special obscurity. The two lands are usually explained of Israel and Judah.

xxxv. 14. It has been often noticed that the word "earth" here does not mean the world, but the land of Israel, as implied in verses 12 and 15 of this chapter.

xxxvi. 2. The "ancient high places" should rather be the "ancient heights," or "everlasting hills," those of Northern Israel or Lebanon being principally intended. The enemy, who is not specified, might be the Babylonian, but is rather the Edomite (see verse 5).

xxxvi. 3. Thus rendered by Dr. Fairbairn: "Therefore prophesy and say, Thus saith the Lord Jehovah, Because, because of their breathing and snuffing after you round about, in order that you might be an inheritance to the remnant of the heathen, and ye have been taken heathen that are round about," ver. 4. 1. It is become a prey to them; and they are all enriched with the plunder of it. When the Chaldeans had conquered them, all their neighbours flew to the spoil, as to a shipwreck, every one thinking all his own that he could lay his hands on; ver. 3, "They have made you desolate, and swallowed you up on every side, that ye might be a possession to the heathen;" to the residue of them, even such as had themselves narrowly escaped the like desolation. No one thought it any crime to strip an Israelite; turba Romæ sequitur fortunam ut semper,—'the mob of Rome still praise the elevated, and despise the fallen.' It is the common cry, when a man is down, Down with him. 2. It is become a derision to them. They took all they had, and laughed at them when they had done; the enemy said, "Aha, even the ancient high places are ours in possession," ver. 2. Neither the antiquity, nor the dignity, nor the sanctity, nor the fortifications of the land of Israel are its security; but we are become masters of it all. The more honours that land had been adorned with, and the greater figure it had made among the nations, the more pride and pleasure did they take in making a spoil of it, which is an instance of a base and sordid spirit, for the more glorious the prosperity was the more piteous is the adversity. God takes notice of it here as an aggravation of the present calamity of Israel; "Ye are taken up in the lips of talkers, and are an infamy of the people," ver. 3. All the talk of the country about was concerning the overthrow of the Jewish nation, and every one that spoke of it had some peevish, ill-natured reflection or other upon them. They were "the scorning of them that were at ease, and the contempt of the proud," Ps. cxxiii. 4. There the some that are noted for talkers, that have something to say of everybody, but cannot find in their hearts to speak well of anybody; God's people, among such people, were sure to be a reproach, when the crown was fallen from their head. Thus it was the lot of Christianity in its suffering days to be everywhere spoken against.

Secondly. The expressions of God's just displeasure against those who triumphed in the desolations of the land of Israel, as many of its neighbours did, even the residue of the heathen, and Idumea particularly. Let us see,

1. How they dealt with the Israel of God. They carved out larger possessions to themselves out of the land, out of God's land, for so indeed it was. "They have appointed my land into their possession," ver. 5; and so not only invaded their neighbours' property but intrenched upon God's prerogative. It was the holy land which they laid their sacrilegious hands upon. They did not own any dependence upon God, as the God of that land, nor acknowledge any remaining interest that Israel had in it, but cast it out for a prey, as if they had won it in a lawful war. And this they did without any dread of God and his judgments, and without any compassion for Israel and their calamities, but with the "joy of all their hearts;" because they got by it, and with despiteful minds to Israel that lost by it. Increasing wealth, by right or wrong, is all the joy of a worldly heart, and the calamities of God's people all the joy of a despiteful mind; and those that had not an opportunity of making a prey of God's people made a reproach of them, so that they were "the shame of the heathen," ver. 6. Everybody ridiculed them and made a jest of them; and the truth is they had, by their own sin, made themselves vile, so that God was righteous herein, but men were unrighteous and very barbarous.

2. How God would deal with them who were thus in word and deed abusive to his people. He hath spoken against the heathen, that is, he hath passed sentence upon them, he hath determined to reckon with them for it, and this in the fire of his jealousy, both for his own honour and for the honour of his people, ver. 5. Having a love for both strong as death, he hath a jealousy for both cruel as the grave. They spoke in their malice against God's people, and he will speak in his jealousy against them; and it is easy to say which will speak most powerfully. God will speak in his jealousy and in his fury, ver. 6. Fury is not in God, but he will exert his power against them, and handle them as severely as men do when they are in a fury. He will so speak to them in his wrath as to vex them in his sore displeasure. What he saith he will stand to, for it is backed with an oath; he hath lifted up his hand, and sworn by himself, hath sworn, and will not repent. And what is it that is said with so much heat, and yet with so much deliberation? It is this, ver. 7, "Surely the heathen that are about you, they shall bear their shame." Note, The righteous God, to whom vengeance belongs, will render shame for shame. Those that put contempt and reproach upon God's people sooner or later will have it turned upon themselves; perhaps in this world, either their follies or their calamities, their miscarriages or their mischances, shall be their reproach—at least in that day when all the impenitent shall rise to shame and everlasting contempt.

3. The promises of God's favour to his Israel, and assurances given of great mercy God had in store for them. God takes occasion from the outrage and insolence of their enemies to shew himself so much the more concerned for them, and ready to do them good, as David hoped that God would recompense him good for Shimei's cursing him: "Let them curse, but bless thou." In this way, as well as others, the enemies of God's people do them real service, even by the injuries they do them, against their will, and beyond their intention. We shall have no reason to complain, if, the more unkind men are, the more kind God is—if the more kindly he speaks to us by his word and Spirit, and the more kindly he acts for us in his providence. The prophet must say to the mountains of Israel, which were now desolate and despised, that God is for them, and will turn to them, ver. 9. As the curse of God reacheth the ground for man's sake, so doth the blessing. Now that which is promised is,

1st. That their rightful owners should return to the possession of them. "My people Israel are at hand to come," ver. 8. Though they are at a great distance from their own country, though they are dispersed in many countries, and though they are detained by the power of their enemies, yet they "shall come again to their own border," Jer. xxxi. 17. The time is at hand for their return. Though there were about forty years of the seventy (perhaps fifty) yet remaining, it is spoken of as near, because it is sure, and there were some among them that should live to see it. A thousand years are with God but as one day. The mountains of Israel are now desolate; but God will cause men to walk upon them again, even his people Israel, not as travellers passing over them, but as inhabitants, not tenants, but freeholders; They shall possess thee, not for term of life, but for themselves and their heirs; thou shalt be their inheritance. It was a type of the heavenly Canaan, to which all God's children are heirs, every Israelite indeed, and into which they shall shortly be all brought together, out of the countries where they are now scattered.

2nd. That they should afford a plentiful comfortable maintenance for their owners at their return. When the land had enjoyed her sabbaths for so many years, it should be so much the more fruitful afterwards, as we should be after rest, especially a sabbath rest; "Ye shall be tilled and sown," ver. 9; and shall "yield your fruit to my people Israel," ver. 8. Note, It is a blessing to the earth to be made serviceable to men, especially to good men, that will serve God with cheerfulness in the use of those good things which the earth serves up to them.

3rd. That the people of Israel should have not only a comfortable sustenance, but a comfortable settlement in their own land. "The cities shall be inhabited, the wastes shall be builded," ver. 10; and "I will settle you after your old estates," ver. 11. Their own sin had unsettled them, but now God's favour shall resettle them. When the prodigal son is become a penitent he is settled again in his father's house according to his former estate; "Bring hither the best robe, and put it on him." Nay, "I will do better unto you" now "than at your beginnings." There is more joy for the sheep that is brought back than there would have been if it had never gone astray. And God sometimes multiplies his people's comforts in proportion to the time that he has afflicted them. Thus God blessed the latter end of Job more than his beginning, and doubled to him all he had.

4th. That the people after their return should be fruitful and multiply, and replenish this land, so that it should not only be inhabited again, but as thickly inhabited and as well peopled as ever. God will bring back to it all the house of Israel, even all of it, (observe what an emphasis is laid upon that, ver. 10;) all whose spirits God stirred up to return, and those only were reckoned of the house of Israel, the rest had cut themselves off from it. Or, though but few in comparison returned at first, yet afterwards, at divers times, they all returned; and then (saith God) "I will multiply these men," ver. 10; "multiply man and beast, and they shall increase," ver. 11. Note, God's kingdom in the world is a growing kingdom; and his church, though for a time it may be diminished, yet shall recover itself and be again replenished.

5th. That the reproach long since cast upon the land of Israel by the evil spies, and of late revived, that it was a land that eat up the inhabitants of it, by famine, sickness, and the sword, should be quite rolled away, and there should never be any more occasion for it. Canaan was got into an ill name; it had of old "spewed out the inhabitants," Lev. xviii. 28, the natives, the aborigines, which was turned to its reproach by those that should have put another construction upon it, Num. xiii. 32. It had of late devoured the Israelites and spewed them out too; so that it was commonly said of it, It is a land that, instead of supporting its nations or tribes that inhabited it, bereaves them, overthows them, and causes them to fall. It is a tenement that breaks all the tenants that come upon it. This character it had got among the neighbours, but God now promiseth it shall be so no more; "Thou shalt no more bereave them of men," ver. 12; shalt "devour men no more," ver. 14. But the inhabitants shall live to a good old age, and not have the number of their months cut off in the midst: compare this with that promise, Zec. viii. 4. Note, God will take away the reproach of his people, by taking away that which was the occasion of it; when the nation is made to flourish in peace, plenty, and power, then they hear no more the shame of the heathen, ver. 15, especially when it is reformed. When sin, which is the reproach of any people, particularly of God's professing people, is taken away, then they hear no more the reproach of the people. Note, When God returns in mercy to a people that return to him in duty, all their grievances will be soon redressed, and their honour retrieved.

16 Moreover the word of the LORD came unto me, saying, 17 Son of man, when the house of Israel dwelt in their own land,

They defiled it by their own way and by their doings:
Their way was before me as the uncleanness of a removed [woman.
18 Wherefore I poured my fury upon them
For the blood that they had shed upon the land,
And for their idols wherewith they had polluted it:
19 And I scattered them among the heathen,
And they were dispersed through the countries:
According to their way and according to their doings I judged them 20 And when they entered unto the heathen, whither they [went,
They profaned my holy name, when they said to them,
These are the people of the LORD, and are gone forth out of his land.
21 But I had pity for mine holy name, which the house of Israel had profaned
Among the heathen, whither they went.
22 Therefore say unto the house of Israel,
Thus saith the Lord GOD;
I do not this for your sakes, O house of Israel,
But for mine holy name's sake, which ye have profaned
Among the heathen, whither ye went.
23 And I will sanctify my great name, which was profaned among the heathen,
Which ye have profaned in the midst of them;
And the heathen shall know that I am the LORD,
Saith the Lord GOD, when I shall be sanctified in you before their eyes.
24 For I will take you from among the heathen,
And gather you out of all countries,
And will bring you into your own land.

When God promised the poor captives a glorious return in due time to their own land, it was a great discouragement to their hopes that they were unworthy, utterly unworthy, of such a favour; therefore, to remove that discouragement, God here shews them that he would do it for them purely for his own name's sake, that he might be glorified in them and by them, that he might manifest and magnify his mercy and goodness, that attribute which of all others is most his glory; and, the restoration of that people being typical of our redemption by Christ, this here is intended farther to shew that the ultimate end aimed at in our salvation, to which all the steps of it were made subservient, was the glory of God. To this end Christ directed all up (literally, and are gone up) in the lips of talkers, and are an infamy of the people; therefore," &c. This very nearly expresses the sense of the original Hebrew.

xxxvi. 5. The rendering of the last words of this verse may be amended. For "to cast it out for a prey," read, "in order to plunder its produce." So Fürst, &c.

xxxvi. 7. To lift up the hand was the sign of a solemn oath; hence "I have lifted up mine hand" means here, "I have sworn."

xxxvi. 14. There is a various reading here, and instead of "bereave thy nations," some render "cause thy nations to fall," or "to stumble."

xxxvi. 21. The first clause is diversely translated, "I had pity for my holy name," "I felt pity for my holy name." It either means, "I exercised compassion on account of my holy name," i.e., "for my name's sake," as Grotius and others explain; or, "I had compassion on my holy name," i.e., "vindicated the honour of my character."

as did in that short prayer, "Father, glorify thy name;" and God declared it was his end in all he did in the immediate answer given to that prayer, by a voice from heaven, "I have glorified it, and I will glorify it yet again," Jno. xii. 28. Now observe here,

First. How God's name had suffered, both by the sins and by the miseries of Israel; and this was more to be regretted than all their sorrow, which they had brought upon themselves, for the honour of God lies nearer the hearts of good men than any interests of their own.

1. God's glory had been injured by the sin of Israel when they were in their own land, ver. 17. It was a good land, a holy land, a land that had the eye of God upon it; but "they defiled it by their own way," their wicked way; that is, our own way, the way of our own choice, and we ourselves must bear the blame and shame of it. The sin of a people defiles their land, renders it abominable to God, and uncomfortable to themselves, so that they cannot have any holy communion with him, or with one another. What was unclean might not be made use of: by the abuse of the gifts of God's bounty to us we forfeit the use of them, and, the mind and conscience being defiled with guilt, no comfort is allowed us, nothing is pure to us. Their way in the eye of God was like the pollution of a woman during the days of her separation, which shut her out from the sanctuary, and made every thing she touched ceremonially unclean, Lev. xv. 19. Sin is that abominable thing which the Lord hates, and which he cannot endure to look upon. They shed blood, and worshipped idols, ver. 18; and with those sins defiled the land. For this God poured out his fury upon them, scattered them among the heathen; their own land was sick of them, and they were sent into other lands. Herein God was righteous, and was justified in what he did; none could say that he did them any wrong; nay, he did justice to his own honour, for he judged them "according to their way, and according to their doings," ver. 19; and yet, the matter being not rightly understood, he was not glorified in it, for the enemies did say, as Moses pleaded the Egyptians would say, if he had destroyed them in the wilderness, that for mischief he brought them forth. Their neighbours considered them rather as a holy people than as a sinful people, and therefore took occasion from the calamities they were in, instead of glorifying God, as they might justly have done, to reproach him, and put contempt upon him; and God's name was "continually every day blasphemed" by their oppressors, Isa. lii. 5.

2. When they entered into the land of the heathen God had no glory by them there; but, on the contrary, his holy name was profaned, ver. 20. 1st. It was profaned by the sins of Israel. They were no credit to their profession, wherever they went, but, on the contrary, a reproach to it; the name of God and his holy religion was blasphemed through them, Rom. ii. 24. When those that pretended to be in relation to God, in covenant and communion with him, were found corrupt in their morals, slaves to their appetites and passions, dishonest in their dealings, and false to their words and the trusts reposed in them, the enemies of the Lord had thereby great occasion given them to blasphemy, especially when they quarrelled with their God for correcting them, than which nothing could be more scandalous. 2nd. It was profaned by the sufferings of Israel; for from them the enemies of God took occasion to reproach God, as unable to protect his own worshippers, and to make good his own grants. They said in scorn, "These are the people of the land," these wicked people,—you see he could not keep them in their obedience to his precepts; these miserable people,—you see he could not keep them in the enjoyment of his favours. These are the people that came out of Jehovah's land; they are the very scum of the nations. Are these they that had statutes so righteous, whose lives are so unrighteous? Is this a nation that is so much celebrated for a wise and understanding people? and that is said to have God so nigh unto them? Do these belong to that brave, that holy nation, that appear here so vile, so abject? Thus God sold his people, and did not "increase his wealth by their price," Ps. xliv. 12. The reproach they were under reflected upon him.

Secondly. Let us now see how God will retrieve his honour, secure it, and advance it, by working a great reformation upon them, and then working a great salvation for them. He would have scattered them among the heathen, were it not that he "feared the wrath of the enemy," Deu. xxxii. 26, 27; but, though they were unworthy of his compassion, yet he had pity for his own holy name, and a thousand pities it was that that should be trampled upon and abused. He looked with compassion on his own honour, which lay bleeding among the heathen, on that jewel which was trodden into the dirt, which the house of Israel, even in the land of their captivity, had profaned, ver. 21. In pity to that God brought them out from the heathen, because their sins were more scandalous there than they had been in their own land; therefore, "I will gather you out of all countries, and bring you into your own land," ver. 24. Not "for your sakes," because you are worthy of such a favour, for you are most unworthy, but "for my holy name's sake," ver. 22; that "I may sanctify my great name," ver. 23. Observe, by the way, God's holy name is his great name, his holiness is his greatness; so he reckons it himself. Nor doth any thing make a man truly great but being truly good, and partaking of God's holiness. God will magnify his name as a holy name, for he will sanctify it; I will sanctify my name which you have profaned. When God performs that which he hath sworn by his holiness, then he sanctifies his name. The effect of this shall be very happy. "The heathen shall know that I am the Lord, when I shall be sanctified in you before their eyes" and yours. When God proves his own holy name, and his saints praise it, then he is sanctified in them, and this contributes to the propagating of the knowledge of him. Observe, 1. God's reasons of mercy are all fetched from within himself. He will bring his people out of Babylon, not for their sakes but for his own name's sake, because he will be glorified. 2. God's goodness takes occasion from man's badness to appear so much the more illustrious; therefore he will sanctify his name by the pardon of sin, because it has been profaned by the commission of sin.

25 Then will I sprinkle clean water upon you, and ye shall be clean:
From all your filthiness, and from all your idols, will I cleanse you.
26 A new heart also will I give you,
And a new spirit will I put within you:
And I will take away the stony heart out of your flesh,
And I will give you an heart of flesh
27 And I will put my spirit within you,
And cause you to walk in my statutes,
And ye shall keep my judgments, and do them.
28 And ye shall dwell in the land that I gave to your fathers;
And ye shall be my people, and I will be your God.
29 I will also save you from all your uncleannesses:
And I will call for the corn, and will increase it,
And lay no famine upon you.
30 And I will multiply the fruit of the tree, and the increase of the field,
That ye shall receive no more reproach of famine among the heathen.
31 Then shall ye remember your own evil ways,
And your doings that were not good,
And shall lothe yourselves in your own sight
For your iniquities and for your abominations.
32 Not for your sakes do I this, saith the Lord GOD,
Be it known unto you:
Be ashamed and confounded for your own ways, O house of Israel.
33 Thus saith the Lord GOD;
In the day that I shall have cleansed you from all your iniquities
I will also cause you to dwell in the cities,
And the wastes shall be builded.
34 And the desolate land shall be tilled,
Whereas it lay desolate in the sight of all that passed by.
35 And they shall say, This land that was desolate is become like the garden of Eden;
And the waste and desolate and ruined cities are become And are inhabited. [fenced, 36 Then the heathen that are left round about you shall know That I the LORD build the ruined places, and plant that that was desolate:
I the LORD have spoken it, and I will do it.
37 Thus saith the Lord GOD;
I will yet for this be enquired of by the house of Israel, to do it for them;
I will increase them with men like a flock.
38 As the holy flock, as the flock of Jerusalem in her solemn feasts;
So shall the waste cities be filled with flocks of men:
And they shall know that I am the LORD

The people of God might be discouraged in their hopes of a restoration, by the sense not only of their unworthiness of such a favour, (which was answered in the foregoing verses with this, that God in doing it would have an eye to his own glory, not to their worthiness,) but their unfitness for such a favour, being still corrupt and sinful; and that is answered in these verses, with a promise that God would by his grace prepare and qualify them for the mercy, and then bestow it on them; and this was in part fulfilled in that wonderful effect which the captivity in Babylon had upon the Jews there, that it effectually cured them of their inclination to idolatry. But it is farther intended as a draught of the covenant of grace, and a specimen of those spiritual blessings with which we are blessed in heavenly things by that covenant. As, ch. xxxiv., after a promise of their return, the prophecy insensibly slid into a promise of the coming of Christ, the great Shepherd, so here it insensibly slides into a promise of the Spirit, and his gracious influences and operations, which we have as much need of for our sanctification, as we have of Christ's merit for our justification.

First. God here promiseth that he will work a good work in them, to qualify them for the good work he intended to bring about for them, ver. 25—27. We had promises to the same purpose, ch. xi. 18—20.

1. That God would cleanse them from the pollutions of sin; ver. 25, "I will sprinkle clean water upon you," which signifies both the blood of Christ sprinkled upon the conscience to purify that and to take away the sense of guilt, as those that were sprinkled with the water of purification were thereby discharged from their ceremonial uncleanness, and the grace of the Spirit sprinkled on the whole soul to purify it from all corrupt inclinations and dispositions, as Naaman was cleansed from his leprosy by dipping in Jordan. Christ was himself clean, else his blood could not have been cleansing to us; and it is a Holy Spirit that makes us holy. "From all your filthiness, and from all your idols, will I cleanse you," and, ver. 29, "I will save you from all your uncleannesses." Sin is defiling, idolatry particularly is so; it renders sinners odious to God, and burthensome to themselves. When guilt is pardoned, and the corrupt nature sanctified, then we are cleansed from our filthiness, and there is no other way of being saved from it. This God promiseth his people here, in order to his being sanctified in them, ver. 23. We cannot sanctify God's name unless he sanctify our hearts; nor live to his glory, but by his grace.

2. That God would give them a new heart, a disposition of mind excellent in itself, and vastly different from what it was before. God will work an inward change in order to an universal change. Note, All that have an interest in the new covenant, and a title to the new Jerusalem, have a new heart and a new spirit, and that is necessary in order to their walking in newness of life. This is that Divine nature which believers are, by the promises, made partakers of.

3. That instead of a heart of stone, insensible and inflexible, unapt to receive any Divine impressions, and to return any devout affections, God would give a

Either gives good sense, but on the whole the second idea is to be preferred.

xxxvi. 23. In the Hebrew the closing words are not "their eyes" but "your eyes." God would honour himself in Israel visibly or manifestly.

xxxvi. 27. The phrase "my spirit" may be understood of a godly spirit and temper, or of the Holy Spirit. Grotius thinks prophets are meant.

xxxvi. 33. Both here and in verse 10 ruins are signified by the word "wastes," and the translation should be amended accordingly.

xxxvi. 35. The cities which are ruined, deserted, and waste are fortified. This, and not fenced and inhabited, is the sense. The Hebrew words at the close might be rendered "abide in fortifications," which would be a literally correct expression.

xxxvii. 1. There is no doubt that the removal here spoken of was a vision. The transaction did not occur in the outer world, but was heart of flesh, a soft and tender heart, that has spiritual senses exercised, conscious to itself of spiritual pains and pleasures, and complying in every thing with the will of God. Note, Renewing grace works as great a change in the soul as the turning of a dead stone into living flesh

4. That since, besides our inclination to sin, we complain of an inability to do our duty, God will cause them to walk in his statutes, will not only shew them the way of his statutes before them, but incline them to walk in it, and thoroughly furnish them with wisdom, and wik, and active powers for every good work. In order to this he will put his Spirit within them, as a teacher, guide, and sanctifier. Note, God doth not force men to walk in his statutes by external violence, but causes them to walk in his statutes by an internal principle. And observe what use we ought to make of this gracious power and principle promised us, and put within us, "Ye shall keep my judgments." If God will do his part according to the promise, we must do ours according to the precept. Note, The promise of God's grace to enable us for our duty should engage and quicken our constant care and endeavour to do our duty. God's promises must drive us to his precepts as our rule, and then his precepts must send us back to his promises for strength, for without his grace we can do nothing.

Secondly, God here promiseth that he will take them into covenant with himself. The sum of the covenant of grace we have, ver. 28, "Ye shall be my people, and I will be your God." It is not, If you will be my people I will be your God, though it is very true that we cannot expect to have God to be to us a God unless we be to him a people; but he hath chosen us and loved us first, not we him. Therefore the condition is of grace, is by promise, as well as the reward; not of merit, not of works; "Ye shall be my people," I will make you so; I will give you the nature and spirit of my people, and then I will be your God. And this is the foundation and topstone of a believer's happiness; it is heaven itself. Rev. xxi. 3, 7.

Thirdly. He promiseth that he will bring about all that good for them which the exigence of their case calls for. When they are thus prepared for mercy,

1. Then they shall return to their possessions, and be settled again in them; ver. 28, "Ye shall dwell in the land that I gave to your fathers." God will, in bringing them back to it, have an eye not to any merit of theirs, but to the promise made to the fathers; for therefore he gave it them at first, Deu. vii. 7, 8. Therefore he is gracious, because he hath said he will be so. This shall follow upon the blessed reformation God would work among them; ver. 33, "In the day that I shall have cleansed you from all your iniquities," and so shall have made you meet for the inheritance, I will cause you to dwell in the cities, and so put you in possession of the inheritance. This is God's method of mercy indeed, first to part men from their sins, and then restore them to their comforts.

2. Then they shall enjoy a plenty of all good things, when they are saved from their uncleanness, from their sins which kept good things from them; then "I will call for the corn, and will increase it," ver. 29. Plenty comes at God's call, and the plenty he calls for shall be still growing; and when he speaks the word the fruit both of the tree and of the field shall multiply. As the inhabitants multiply, the products shall multiply for their maintenance, for he that sends mouths will send meat. Famine was one of the judgments which they had laboured under, and it had been as much as any other a reproach to them that they should be starved in a land so famed for fruitfulness. But now I will "lay no famine upon you." And none are under that rod but it is God that lays it on. Then they "shall receive no more reproach of famine," shall never be again upbraided with that; nor shall it ever be said that God is a Master that keeps his servants to short allowance; nay, they shall not only be cleared from the reproach of famine, but they shall have the credit of abundance. The land that had long lain desolate in the sight of all that passed by, that looked upon it, some with contempt and some with compassion, shall again be tilled, ver. 34, and, having long lain fallow, it will now be the more fruitful. Observe, God will call for the corn, and yet they must till the ground for it. Note, Even promised mercies must be laboured for, for the promise is not to supersede, but to quicken and encourage, our industry and endeavours. And such a blessing will God command on the hand of the diligent that all who pass by shall take notice of it with wonder, ver. 35. They shall say, See what a blessed change here is, how "this land that was desolate is become like the garden of Eden," this desert turned again into a paradise. Note, God has honours in reserve for his people to be crowned with sufficient to balance the contempt they are now loaded with, and in them he will be honoured. This wonderful increase, both of the people of the land and of its products, is compared, ver. 38, to the large flocks of cattle that are brought to Jerusalem to be sacrificed at one of the solemn feasts. Even the cities that now lie waste shall be filled with flocks of men, not like the flocks with which the pastures are covered over, Ps. lxv. 13, but like the holy flock which is brought to the courts of the Lord's house. Note, Then the increase of the numbers of a people is honourable and comfortable indeed when they are all dedicated to God as a holy flock, to be presented to him for living sacrifices. Crowds are a lovely sight in God's temple.

Fourthly. He shews what shall be the happy effects of this blessed change.

1. It shall have a happy effect upon the people of God themselves, for it shall bring them to an ingenuous repentance of their sins; ver. 31, "Then shall ye remember your own evil ways, and shall loathe yourselves." See here what sin is; it is an abomination, a loathsome thing, that abominable thing which the Lord hates. See what is the first step towards repentance; it is remembering our own evil ways, reflecting seriously upon the sins we have committed, and being particular in recapitulating them. We must remember against ourselves not only our gross enormities, our own evil ways, but our defects and infirmities, our doings that were not good, not so good as they should have been; not only our direct violations of the law, but our coming short of it. See what is evermore a companion of true repentance, and that is self-loathing, a holy shame and confusion of face; You shall loathe yourselves in your own sight, seeing how loathsome you have made yourselves in the sight of God. Self-love is at the bottom of sin, which we cannot but blush to see the absurdity of, but our quarrelling with ourselves is in order to our being upon good grounds reconciled to ourselves. And, lastly, see what is the most powerful inducement to an evangelical repentance, and that is, a sense of the mercy of God; when God settles them in the midst of plenty then they shall loathe themselves for their iniquities. Note, The goodness of God should overcome our badness, and lead us to repentance. The more we see of God's readiness to receive into favour upon our repentance, the more reason we shall see to be ashamed of ourselves that we could ever sin against so much love. That heart is hard indeed that will not be thus melted.

2. It shall have a happy effect upon their neighbours, for it shall bring them to a more clear knowledge of God; ver. 36, "Then the heathen that are left round about you," that spoke ignorantly of God (for so all those do that speak ill of him) when they saw the land of Israel desolate, shall begin to know better things, and to speak more intelligently of God, being convinced that he is able to rebuild the most desolate cities and to replant the most desolate countries; and that, though the course of his favours to his people may be obstructed for a time, they shall not be cut off for ever. They shall be made to know the truth of Divine revelation by the exact agreement which they shall discern between God's word which he has spoken to Israel, and his works which he hath done for them; "I the Lord have spoken it, and I will do it." With us saying and doing are two things, but they are not so with God.

Fifthly. He proposeth these things to them, not as the recompense of their merits, but as the return of their prayers.

1. Let them not think that they have deserved it; "Not for your sakes do I this, be it known to you," ver. 32; as before, ver. 22. No; be you "ashamed and confounded for your own ways." God is doing this, all this which he hath promised; it is as sure to be done as if it were done already, and present events have a tendency towards it. But then, 1st. They must renounce the merit of their own good works, and be brought to acknowledge that it is not for the r sakes that it is done. So, when God brought Israel into Canaan the first time, an express cavent was entered against this thought, Deu. ix. 4—6, It is "not for thy righteousness." It is not for the sake of any of their good qualities or good deeds, not because God had any need of them, or expected any benefit by them; no, in shewing mercy he acts by prerogative, not for our deserts but his own honour. See how emphatically this is expressed, "Be it known to you," it is "not for your sakes," which intimates that we are apt to entertain a good conceit of our own merits, and are hardly persuaded to disclaim a confidence in them. But one way or other God will make all his favourites to know and own that it is his grace, and not their goodness,—his mercy, and not their merit,—that made them so; and that, therefore, not unto them, not unto them, but unto him is all the glory due. 2nd. They must repent of the sin, of their own evil ways. They must own that the mercies they receive from God are not only not merited, but they are a thousand times forfeited, and therefore they must be so far from boasting of their good works, that they must be ashamed and confounded for their evil ways, and then they are best prepared for mercy.

2. Yet let them know that they must desire and expect it; ver. 37, "I will yet for this be enquired of by the house of Israel." God hath spoken, and he will do it, and he will be sought unto for it, that is, he requires that his people should seek unto him, and he will incline their hearts to do it, when he is coming towards them in the ways of mercy. 1st. They must pray for it, for by prayer God is sought unto, and inquired after. What is the matter of God's promises must be the matter of our prayers. By asking for the mercy promised we must give glory to the donor, express a value for the gift, own our dependence, and put honour upon prayer, which God has put honour upon. Christ himself must ask, and then God will "give him the heathen for his inheritance;" must "pray the Father," and then he will "send the Comforter," much more must we ask that we may receive. 2nd. They must consult the oracles of God, and thus also God is sought unto and inquired after. The mercy must not be an act of providence only, but a child of promise, and therefore the promise must be looked at, and prayer made for it with an eye of faith fastened upon the promise, which must be both the guide and the ground of our expectations. Both these ways we find God inquired of by Daniel, in the name of the house of Israel, when he was about to do those great things for them; he consulted the oracles of God, for he understood by books, the book of the prophet Jeremiah, both what was to be expected and when; and then he set his face to seek God by prayer, Dan. ix. 2, 3. Note, Our communion with God must be kept up by the word and prayer in all the operation of his providence concerning us, and in both he must be inquired of.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

The threatenings of the destruction of Judah and Jerusalem for their sins, which we had in the former part of this book, were not so terrible, but the promises of their restoration and deliverance for the glory of God, which we have here in the latter part of the book, are as comfortable; and, as those were illustrated with many visions and similitudes for the awakening of a holy fear, so are these for the encouraging of an humble faith. God had assured them, in the foregoing chapter, that he would gather the house of Israel, even all of it, and would bring them out of their captivity, and return them to their own land; but there were two things that rendered this very unlikely. I. That they were so dispersed among their enemies, so destitute of all helps and advantages which might favour or further their return, and so dispirited likewise in their own minds; upon all these accounts they are here in vision compared to a valley full of the dry bones of dead men, which should be brought together, and raised to life. The vision of this we have, ver. 1—10; and the explication of it, with its application to the present case, ver. 11—14. II. That they were so divided among themselves; too much of the old core between Judah and Ephraim remaining, even in their captivity. But as to this, by a sign of two sticks made one in the hand of the prophet, is foreshewed the happy coalition that should be at their return between the two nations of Israel and Judah, ver. 15—22; in which there was a type of the uniting of Jews and Gentiles, Jews and Samaritans, in Christ and his church. And so the prophet slides into a prediction of the kingdom of Christ, which should be set up in the world with God's tabernacle in it, and of the glories and graces of that kingdom, ver. 23—28.

THE hand of the LORD was upon me, and carried me out in the spirit of the LORD, and set me down in the midst of the valley which was full of bones, 2 And caused me to pass by them round about: and, behold, there were very many in the open valley; and, lo, they were very dry. 3 And he said unto me, Son of man, can these bones live? And I answered, O Lord GOD, thou knowest. 4 Again he said unto me, Prophesy upon these bones, and say unto them, O ye dry bones, hear the word of the LORD. 5 Thus saith the Lord GOD unto these bones; Behold, I will cause breath to enter into you, and ye shall live: 6 And I will lay sinews upon you, and will bring up flesh upon you, and cover you with skin, and put breath in you, and ve shall live; and ye shall know that I am the LORD. 7 So I prophesied as I was commanded: and as I a manifestation made to the prophet's mind by the Spirit of God. Therefore, when Ezekiel speaks of "the valley," we are not to suppose some valley actually existing is meant, but the valley where the scene of the following vision is laid. It has, however, been suggested that the valley or plain is to be interpreted of Mesopotamia, where the Jews, who are here compared to dry bones, were scattered.

xxxvii. 10. The translation, "an exceeding great army," has been called in question. The Hebrew word for army is literally "force," and it has the same two meanings as the English word "force"—power, and an army. In this passage there is scarcely any room for doubt that a vast body of men is intended.

xxxvii. 11. The common rendering, "we are cut off for our parts," is at least obscure, though it is probably meant to signify "for our parts," or, "as for us, we are cut off." The sense is, "it is all over with us;" hence Gesenius gives "we are lost." The hope of the people was gone, and their condition desperate. That the passage as prophesied, there was a noise, and behold a shaking, and the bones came together, bone to his bone. 8 And when I beheld, lo, the sinews and the flesh came up upon them, and the skin covered them above: but there was no breath in them. 9 Then said he unto me, Prophesy unto the wind, prophesy, son of man, and say to the wind, Thus saith the Lord GOD; Come from the four winds, O breath, and breathe upon these slain, that they may live. 10 So I prophesied as he commanded me, and the breath came into them, and they lived, and stood up upon their feet, an exceeding great army. 11 Then he said unto me, Son of man, these bones are the whole house of Israel: behold, they say, Our bones are dried, and our hope is lost: we are cut off for our parts. 12 Therefore prophesy and say unto them,

Thus saith the Lord GOD;
Behold, O my people, I will open your graves,
And cause you to come up out of your graves,
And bring you into the land of Israel.
13 And ye shall know that I am the LORD,
When I have opened your graves, O my people,
And brought you up out of your graves,
14 And shall put my spirit in you, and ye shall live,
And I shall place you in your own land:
Then shall ye know that I the LORD have spoken it,
and performed it,
Saith the LORD.

Here is, First. The vision of a resurrection from death to life, and it is a glorious resurrection. This is a thing so utterly unknown to nature, and so contrary to its principles, (a privatione ad habitum non datur regressus,—'from privation to possession there is no return,') that we could have no thought of it but by the word of the Lord; and that it is certain by that word that there shall be a general resurrection of the dead some have urged from this vision; for, say they, otherwise it would not probably be made a sign for the confirming of their faith in the promise of their deliverance out of Babylon, as the coming of the Messiah is mentioned for the confirming of their faith, touching a former deliverance, Isa. vii. 14. But, whether it be a confirmation or no, it is without doubt a most lively representation of a threefold resurrection, besides that which it is primarily intended to be the sign of. 1st. The resurrection of souls from the death of sin to the life of righteousness, to a holy, heavenly, spiritual, and Divine life, by the power of Divine grace going along with the word of Christ, Jno. v. 24, 25. 2nd. The resurrection of the gospel church, or any part of it, from an afflicted, persecuted state, especially under the yoke of the New Testament Babylon, to liberty and peace. 3rd. The resurrection of the body at the great day, especially the bodies of believers that shall rise to life eternal. Let us observe the particulars of this vision.

1. The deplorable condition of these dead bones. The prophet was made, 1st. To take an exact view of them. By a prophetical impulse and a Divine power he was in vision carried out and set "in the midst of a valley," probably that plain spoken of ch. iii. 22, where God then talked with him, and it was full of bones, of dead men's bones; not piled up on a heap, as in a charnel-house, but scattered upon the face of the ground, as if some bloody battle had been fought there, and the slain left unburied, till all the flesh was devoured or putrefied, and nothing left but the bones, and those disjointed from one another and dispersed. He passed "by them round about," and he observed not only that they were very many, (for there are multitudes gone to the congregation of the dead,) but that "lo, they were very dry," having been long exposed to the sun and wind. The bones that had been "moistened with marrow," Job xxi. 24, when they have been any while dead lose all their moisture, and are dry as dust; the body is now fenced with bones, Job x. 11, but then they will themselves be defenceless. The Jews in Babylon were like those dead and dry bones, unlikely ever to come together, to be so much as a skeleton, less likely to be formed into a body, and least of all to be a living body. However, they lay unburied in the open valley, which encouraged the hopes of their resurrection, as of the two witnesses, Rev. xi. 8, 9. The bones of Gog and Magog shall be buried, ch. xxxix. 12, 15, for their destruction is final, but the bones of Israel are in the open valley, under the eye of heaven, for there is hope in the end. 2nd. He was made to own their case deplorable, and not to be helped by any power less than that of God himself; ver. 3, "Son of man, can these bones live?" Is it a thing likely? Canst thou devise how it should be done? Can thy philosophy reach to put life into dry bones, or thy politics to restore a captive nation? No, saith the prophet, I know not how it should be done, but thou knowest. He doth not say they cannot live, lest he should seem to limit the Holy One of Israel; but, Lord, thou knowest whether they can and whether they shall; and if thou dost not put life into them for certain they cannot live. Note, God is perfectly acquainted with his own power and his own purposes, and will have us to refer all to them, and to see and own that his wondrous works are such as could not be effected by any counsel or power but his own.

2. The means used for the bringing of these dispersed bones together, and these dead and dry bones to life. It must be done by prophecy. Ezekiel is ordered to prophesy upon these bones, ver. 4, and again, ver. 9, "Prophesy to the wind;" so he prophesied as he was commanded, ver. 7, and again, ver. 10. 1st. He must preach, and he did so, and the dead bones lived by a power that went along with the word of God which he preached. 2nd. He must pray, and he did so, and the dead bones were made to live in answer to prayer, for a spirit of life entered into them. See the efficacy of the word and prayer, and the necessity of both for the raising of dead souls. God bids his ministers, "prophesy upon the dry bones," say unto them, Live, yea, say unto them, Live; and they do as they are commanded, calling to them again and again, "O ye dry bones, hear the word of the Lord." But we call in vain, still they are dead, still they are very dry; we must therefore be earnest with God in prayer for the working of the Spirit with the word; "Come, O breath," and breathe upon them. God's grace can save souls without our preaching, but our preaching cannot save them without God's grace, and that grace must be sought by prayer. Note, Ministers must faithfully and diligently use the means of grace, even with those that there seems little probability of gaining upon. To prophesy upon dry bones seems as great a penance as to water a dry stick; and yet, whether they will hear or forbear, we must discharge our trust, must prophesy as we are commanded, in the name of him who raiseth the dead and is the fountain of life.

3. The wonderful effect of these means. Those that do as they are commanded, as they are commissioned, in the face of the greatest discouragements, need not doubt of success, for God will own and enrich his own appointments.

1st. Ezekiel looked down, and prophesied upon the bones in the valley, and they became human bodies. First. That which he had to say to them was, that God would infallibly raise them to life: "Thus saith the Lord God unto those bones, Ye shall live," ver. 5, and again, "Ye shall live," ver. 6; and he that speaks the word will thereby do the work; he that saith they shall live will make them alive. He will clothe them with skin and flesh, ver. 6, as he did at first, Job x. 11. He that made us so fearfully and wonderfully, and curiously wrought us, can in like manner new-make us, for his arm is not shortened. Secondly. That which was presently done for them was, that they were moulded anew into shape. We may well suppose it was with great liveliness and vigour that the prophet prophesied, especially when he found what he said begin to take effect. Note, The opening, sealing, and applying of the promises, are the ordinary means of our participation in a new and Divine nature. As Ezekiel prophesied in this vision there was a noise, a word of command from heaven, seconding what he said; or, it signified the motion of the angels that were to be employed as the ministers of the Divine providence in the deliverance of the Jews, and we read of the noise of their wings, Eze. i. 24, and the sound of their going, 2 Sam. v. 24. And behold a shaking or commotion among the bones; even dead and dry bones begin to move when they are called to hear the word of the Lord. This was fulfilled upon Cyrus's proclamation of liberty; those whose spirits God had stirred up began to think of making use of that liberty, and getting ready to be gone. When there was a noise, behold a shaking. When David heard the sound of the going on the tops of the mulberry trees, then he bestirred himself, then there was a shaking. When Paul heard the voice saying, "Why persecutest thou me?" behold a shaking of the dry bones; he trembled, and was astonished. But this was not all: "the bones came together, bone to his bone," under a Divine direction; and, though there are in man a multitude of bones, yet of all the bones of all those numerous slain not one was missing, not one missed its way, not one missed its place, but, as it were by instinct, each knew and found its fellow. The dispersed bones came together, and the displaced bones were knit together; the Divine power supplying that to these dry bones which in a living body every joint supplies. Thus shall it be in the resurrection of the dead, the scattered atoms shall be ranged and marshalled in their proper place and order, and "every bone come to his bone," by the same wisdom and power by which the bones were first formed in the womb of her that is with child. Thus it was in the return of the Jews; they that were scattered in several parts of the province of Babylon came to their respective families, and all, as it were by consent, to the general rendezvous, in order to their return. By degrees sinews and flesh came upon these bones, and the "skin covered them," ver. 8. This was fulfilled when the captives got their effects about them, and the men of their place helped them with silver and gold, and whatever they needed for their remove, Ezr. i. 4. But still there was no breath in them; they wanted spirit and courage for such a difficult and hazardous enterprise as this was of returning to their own land.

2nd. Ezekiel then looked up, and prophesied to the wind, or breath, or spirit, and said, "Come, O breath, and breathe upon these slain." As good have been still dry bones as dead bodies. But as for God his work is perfect; he is not the God of the dead but of the living, therefore, "breathe upon them that they may live." In answer to this request the breath presently came into them, ver. 10. Note, The spirit of life is from God: he at first in the creation breathed into man the breath of life, and so he will at last in the resurrection. The dispirited despairing captives were wonderfully animated with resolution to break through all the discouragements that lay in the way of their return, and applied themselves to it with all imaginable vigour; and then they "stood up upon their feet an exceeding great army," not only living men, but effective men, fit for service in the wars, and formidable to all that gave them any opposition. Note, With God nothing is impossible; he can out of "stones raise up children unto Abraham," and out of dead and dry bones levy an exceeding great army, to fight his battles, and plead his cause.

Secondly. The application of this vision to the present calamitous condition of the Jews in captivity. "These bones are the whole house of Israel," both the ten tribes and the two. See in this what they are and what they shall be.

1. The depth of despair to which they are now reduced, ver. 11. They all give up themselves for lost and gone; they say, Our bones are dried, our strength exhausted, our spirits gone, our hope is all lost, every thing we looked for succour and relief from fails us, and "we are cut off from our parts;" let who will cherish some hope, we see no ground for any. Note, When troubles continue long, hopes have been often frustrated, and all creature confidences fail, it is not strange if the spirits sink; and nothing but an active faith in the power, promise, and providence of God will keep them from dying away quite.

2. The height of prosperity to which, notwithstanding this, they shall be advanced. Therefore, because things are come thus to the last extremity, prophesy to them, and tell them, now is God's time to appear for them: Jehovah Jireh, in the mount of the Lord it shall be seen, ver. 12—14. Tell them, 1st. That they shall be brought out of the land of their enemies, where they are, as it were, buried alive; "I will open your graves." Those shall be restored, not only whose bones are scattered at the grave's mouth, Ps. cxli. 7 but who are buried in the grave. Though the power of the enemy is like the bars of the pit, which one would think it impossible to break through, strong as death, and cruel as the grave, yet it shall be conquered. God can bring his people up from the depths of the earth, Ps. lxxi. 20. 2nd. That they shall be brought into their own land, where they shall live in prosperity. "I will bring you into the land of Israel," ver. 12, and place you there, ver. 14, and will "put my spirit in you," and then "ye shall live." Note, Then God puts spirit in us to good purpose, and so that we shall indeed live, when he puts his Spirit in us. And, 3rd. In all this God will be glorified: "Ye shall know that I am the Lord," ver. 13; that I have "spoken it, and performed it," ver. 14.

a whole refers to the national life of the Hebrews cannot be doubted, whatever higher application may be made of it.

xxxvii. 16, 17. What our translators call a "stick" has been explained by some of a wooden writing tablet, and by others of a rod, staff, or sceptre. The Hebrew word means wood or a tree, and the natural interpretation is "a piece of wood." In Num. xvii. 2—10, of which we are at once reminded, the "rod" is unquestionably a staff, and the Hebrew word for it is not the one used here, nor can we find a single case in which the word 'ets really signifies a staff. It is well known that strips of wood have been used for writing upon in divers ages and lands. The writing tablets of the ancient Greeks, Romans, Egyptians, &c., were very commonly of wood, though often coated with wax. At present, in many Eastern countries, strips of wood, palm-leaves, &c., are used for writing upon. Antiquaries remind us of clog almanacks, Runic staves, and Exchequer tallies, as illustrating this passage.

Note, God's quickening the dead redounds more than anything to his honour, and to the honour of his word, which he has magnified above all his name, and will magnify more and more by the punctual accomplishment of every tittle of it.

15 The word of the LORD came again unto me, saying, 16 Moreover, thou son of man, take thee one stick, and write upon it, For Judah, and for the children of Israel his companions: then take another stick, and write upon it, For Joseph, the stick of Ephraim, and for all the house of Israel his companions: 17 And join them one to another into one stick; and they shall become one in thine hand. 18 And when the children of thy people shall speak unto thee, saying, Wilt thou not shew us what thou meanest by these? 19 Say unto them, Thus saith the Lord GOD; Behold, I will take the stick of Joseph, which is in the hand of Ephraim, and the tribes of Israel his fellows, and will put them with him, even with the stick of Judah, and make them one stick, and they shall be one in mine hand. 20 And the sticks whereon thou writest shall be in thine hand before their eyes. 21 And say unto them,

Thus saith the Lord GOD;
Behold, I will take the children of Israel
From among the heathen, whither they be gone,
And will gather them on every side,
And bring them into their own land:
22 And I will make them one nation in the land upon the mountains of Israel;
And one king shall be king to them all:
And they shall be no more two nations,
Neither shall they be divided into two kingdoms any more at all:
23 Neither shall they defile themselves any more with their idols,
Nor with their detestable things,
Nor with any of their transgressions:
But I will save them out of all their dwellingplaces, wherein they have sinned,
And will cleanse them:
So shall they be my people, and I will be their God.
24 And David my servant shall be king over them;
And they all shall have one shepherd:
They shall also walk in my judgments,
And observe my statutes, and do them.
25 And they shall dwell in the land that I have given unto Jacob my servant,
Wherein your fathers have dwelt;
And they shall dwell therein,
Even they, and their children, and their children's children for ever:
And my servant David shall be their prince for ever.
26 Moreover I will make a covenant of peace with them;
It shall be an everlasting covenant with them:
And I will place them, and multiply them, and will set my sanctuary in the midst of them for evermore.
27 My tabernacle also shall be with them:
Yea, I will be their God, and they shall be my people.
28 And the heathen shall know that I the LORD do sanctify Israel, when my sanctuary shall be in the midst of them for evermore.

Here are more exceeding great and precious promises made of the happy state of the Jews after their return to their own land; but they have a farther reference to the kingdom of the Messiah, and the glories of gospel times.

First. It is here promised that Ephraim and Judah shall be happily united in brotherly love and mutual serviceableness; so that, whereas ever since the desertion of the ten tribes from the house of David, under Jeroboam, there had been continual feuds and animosities between the two kingdoms of Israel and Judah,—and it is to be feared there had been some clashings between them even in the land of their captivity,—Ephraim upon all occasions envying Judah, and Judah vexing Israel, that now it should be no longer, but there shall be a coalition between them, and, notwithstanding the old differences that had been between them, they should agree to love one another, and to do one another all good offices. This is here illustrated by a sign: the prophet was to take two sticks, and write upon one for Judah, including Benjamin, those of the children of Israel that were his companions; upon the other for Joseph, including the rest of the tribes, ver. 16. These two sticks must be so framed as to fall into one hand, ver. 17. The people took notice of this, and desired him to tell them the meaning of it, for they knew he did not play with sticks for his diversion, as children do. Those that would know the meaning should ask the meaning of the word of God, which they read and hear, and of the instituted signs by which spiritual and Divine things are represented to us; the ministers' lips should keep the knowledge hereof, and the people should ask it at their mouth, Mal. ii. 7. It is a necessary question for grown people, as well as children, to ask, "What mean ye by this service," by this sign? Ex. xii. 26. The meaning was, that Judah and Israel should become one in the hand of God, ver. 19.

1. They shall be one, one nation, ver. 22. They shall have no separate interests, and consequently no divided affections. There shall be no mutual jealousies and animosities, no remembrance, no remains of their former discord. But there shall be a perfect harmony between them, a good understanding one of another, a good disposition one to another, and a readiness to all good offices and services for one another's credit and comfort. They had been two sticks crossing and thwarting one another, nay, beating and bruising one another; but now they shall become one, supporting and strengthening one another; vis unita fortior,—'force added to force is proportionally more efficient.' "Behold how good and how pleasant a thing it is" to see Judah and Israel, that had long been at variance, now "dwelling together in unity." Then they shall become acceptable to their God, amicable to their friends, and formidable to their enemies, Isa. xi. 13, 14.

2. They shall be one in God's hand. By his power they shall be united; and, being by his hand brought together, his hand shall keep them together, so that they shall not fly off to be separated again. They shall be one in his hand, for his glory shall be the centre of their unity, and his grace the cement of it. In him, in a regard to him, and in his service and worship, they shall unite, and so shall become one. Both sides shall agree to put themselves into his hand, and so they shall be one: qui conveniunt in aliquo tertio inter se conveniunt,—'those who agree with a third agree with each other.' Note, Those are best united that are one in God's hand, whose union with each other results from their union with Christ and their communion with God through him, Eph. i. 10; one in us, Jno. xvii. 21.

3. They shall be one in their return out of captivity; ver. 21, "I will take them from among the heathen, and gather them on every side," and bring them together incorporated into one body to their own land. They shall be one in their separation from the heathen, with whom they had mingled themselves. They shall both agree to part from them, and take their affections off from them, and no longer comply with their usages; and then they will soon agree to join together in walking according to the rule of God's word. Their having been joint sufferers will contribute to this blessed comprehension, when they begin to come to themselves, and to consider things. Put many pieces of metal together into the furnace, and when they are melted they will run all together. It was time for them to strengthen one another when their oppressors were so busy to weaken and ruin them all. Likewise, their being joint sharers in the favour of God, and the great and common deliverance wrought out for them all, should help to unite them. God's loving them all was a good reason why they should love one another. Times of common joy, as well as times of common suffering, should be healing, loving times.

4. They shall all be the subjects of one king, and so they shall become one. The Jews after their return were under one government, and not divided as formerly. But this certainly looks farther, to the kingdom of Christ: he is that one King, in allegiance to whom all God's spiritual Israel shall cheerfully unite, and under whose protection they shall all be gathered. All believers unite in one Lord, one faith, and one baptism; and the uniting of Jews and Gentiles in the gospel church, their becoming one fold under Christ, the one great Shepherd, is doubtless the union that is chiefly looked at in this prophecy. By Christ the partition-wall between them was taken down, and the enmity slain, and of them twain was made "one new man," Eph. ii. 14, 15.

Secondly. It is here promised that the Jews shall by their captivity be cured of their inclination to idolatry. This shall be the happy fruit of that affliction, even the taking away of their sin; ver. 23, "Neither shall they defile themselves any more with their idols," those detestable, defiling things; no, nor with any of their former transgressions. Note, When one sin is sincerely parted with, all sin is abandoned too, for he that hates sin as sin will hate all sin. And those that are cured of their spiritual idolatry, their inordinate affection to the world and the flesh, that no longer make a god of their money or their belly, have a happy blow given to the root of all their transgressions. Two ways God will take to cure them of their idolatry: 1. By bringing them out of the way of temptation to it; "I will save them out of all their dwelling-places wherein they have sinned," because there they met with the occasion of sin, and allurements to it. Note, It is our wisdom to avoid the places where we have been overcome by temptations to sin, not to remain in them, or return to them, but to save ourselves out of them, as we would out of infected places: see Zec. ii. 7; Rev. xviii. 4. And it is a great mercy when God in his providence xxxvii. 21—28. The restoration and re-union of the tribes is here predicted in the plainest terms. Yet there are three very different expositions of the prophecy:—1. That it relates to the return from the Babylonian captivity, and the re-establishment of Israel under the leadership of Zerubbabel, here called "David," and a "king." 2. That it refers to a future restoration of Israel in the land of Palestine, when all the tribes will be recovered, and a kingdom set up with a descendant of David at its head. 3. That it is figurative and spiritual, and concerns the true Israel, the Church of God, the establishment of which under Christ, the son and Lord of David, and its prevailing power, are intended. Some have combined two or more of the above theories, and escaped the difficulties attaching to the exclusive adoption of any one. Without expressing a confident opinion, we cannot exclude the Messianic element.

xxxviii. 2, 3. Several points are to be noted here. The word rendered "chief" is by some taken for a proper name, Rosh. We saves us out of the dwelling-places where we have sinned, and keeps us from harm by keeping us out of harm's way—in answer to our prayer, "Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil." 2. By changing the disposition of their mind; "I will cleanse them," that is, (ver. 28,) I will sanctify them, will work in them an aversion to the pollutions of sin, and a complacency in the pleasures of holiness; and then you may be sure they will not defile themselves any more with their idols. Whom God hath cleansed he will keep clean.

Thirdly. It is here promised that they shall be the people of God, as their God, and the subjects and sheep of Christ their King and Shepherd. These promises we had before, and they are here repeated, ver. 23, 24, for the encouragement of the faith of Israel. "They shall be my people," to serve me, and "I will be their God," to serve them, and to make them happy. "David my servant shall be king over them," to fight their battles, to protect them from injury, and to rule them, and overrule all things that concern them for their good. He shall be their shepherd to guide them, and to provide for them. Christ is this David, Israel's king of old; and those whom he subdues to himself, and makes willing in the day of his power, he makes them to walk in his judgments and to keep his statutes.

Fourthly. It is here promised that they shall dwell comfortably, ver. 25, 26. They shall dwell in the land of Israel; for where else should Israelites dwell? And many things will concur to make their dwelling agreeable. 1. They shall have it by covenant, they shall come in again upon their old title by virtue of the grant made unto Jacob, God's servant. As Christ was David, God's servant, so the church is Jacob, his servant too; and the members of the church shall come in for a share, as born in God's house. He will make a covenant of peace with them, ver. 26; and in pursuance of that covenant he will place them, and multiply them. Note, Temporal mercies are then doubly sweet when they come from the promise of the covenant, and not merely from common providence. 2. They shall come to it by prescription. It is "the land wherein your fathers have dwelt," and for that reason you cannot but have a special kindness for it, which God will graciously gratify. It was the inheritance of their ancestors, and therefore shall be theirs; they are beloved for the fathers' sakes. 3. They shall have it entailed upon them and the heirs of their body, and shall have their families built up, so that it shall not be lost for want of heirs. They shall dwell therein all their time, and never be turned out of possession; and they shall leave it for an inheritance to "their children, and their children's children for ever," who shall enjoy it when they are gone—the prospect of which will be a satisfaction to them. 4. They shall live under a good government, which will contribute very much to the comfort of their lives; "My servant David shall be their prince for ever." This can be no other than Christ, of whom it was said, when he was brought into the world, "He shall reign over the house of Jacob for ever," Lu. i. 33. Note, It is the unspeakable comfort of all Christ's faithful subjects that, as his kingdom is everlasting, so he is an everlasting king, he lives to reign for ever; and as sure, and as long, as he lives and reigns they shall live and reign also. 5. The charter by which they hold all their privileges is indefeasible. God's covenant with them shall be an everlasting covenant; so the covenant of grace is, for it secures to us an everlasting happiness.

Fifthly. It is here promised that God will dwell among them, and this will make them dwell comfortably indeed. I "will set my sanctuary in the midst of them for evermore; my tabernacle also shall be with them," ver. 26, 27. 1. They shall have the tokens of God's special presence with them, and his gracious residence among them. God will in very deed dwell with them upon the earth, for where his sanctuary is he is. When they profaned his sanctuary he took it from them, Isa. lxiv. 11; but now they are purified God will dwell with them again. 2. They shall have an opportunity of conversing with God, of hearing from him, speaking to him, and so keeping up communion with him, which will be the comfort of their lives. 3. They shall have the means of grace. By the oracles of God in his tabernacle they shall be made wiser and better, and all their children shall be taught of the Lord. 4. Thus their covenant relation to God shall be improved, and the bond of it strengthened; "I will be their God, and they shall be my people," and they shall know it by having my sanctuary among them, and shall have the comfort of it.

Sixthly. Both God and Israel shall have the honour of this among the heathen, ver. 26. Now the heathen observe how Israel had profaned their own crown by their sins, and God had profaned it by his judgments; but then, when Israel is reformed, and God is returned in mercy to them, the very heathen shall be made to know that "the Lord doth sanctify Israel," has a title to them, and an interest in them, more than any other people, because his sanctuary is and shall be in the midst of them. Note, God designs the sanctification of those among whom he sets up his sanctuary; and blessed and holy are they who, enjoying the privileges of the sanctuary, give such proofs and evidences of their sanctification as that the heathen may know it is no less than the almighty grace of God that sanctifies them. Such have God's sanctuary in the midst of them, the kingdom of God with them, in the principles of the spiritual life, and shall have it so for evermore in the enjoyments of an eternal life.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

This chapter and that which follows it are concerning Gog and Magog, a powerful enemy to the people of Israel, that should make a formidable descent upon them, and put them into a mighty fright, but their army should be routed, and their design defeated; and this prophecy, it is most probable, had its accomplishment some time after the return of the people of Israel out of their captivity; whether in the struggles they had with the kings of Syria, especially Antiochus Epiphanes, or perhaps in some other way not recorded, we cannot tell. If the sacred history of the Old Testament had reached as far as the prophecy, we should have been better able to understand these chapters; but for the want of that key we are locked out of the meaning of them. God had, by the prophet, assured his people of happy times after their return to their own land; but, lest they should mistake the promises which related to the kingdom of the Messiah, and the spiritual privileges of that kingdom, as if from them they might promise themselves an uninterrupted temporal prosperity, he here tells them, as Christ told his disciples, to prevent the like mistake, that in the world they shall have tribulation, but they may be of good cheer, for they shall be victorious at last. This prophecy here of Gog and Magog is without doubt alluded to in that prophecy which relates to the latter days, and which seems to be yet unfulfilled, Rev. xx. 8, that Gog and Magog shall be gathered to battle against the camp of the saints, as the Old Testament prophecies of the destruction of Babylon are alluded to, Rev. xviii. But in both the Old Testament prophecies had their accomplishment in the Jewish church, as the New Testament prophecies shall have, when the time comes, in the Christian church. In this chapter we have intermixed, I. The attempts that Gog and Magog should make upon the land of Israel, the vast army they should bring into the field, and their vast preparations, ver. 4—7; their project and design in it, ver. 8—13; God's hand in it, ver. 4. II. The great terror that this should strike upon the land of Israel, ver. 15, 16, 18—20. III. The Divine restraint that these enemies should be under, and the Divine protection that Israel should be under, ver. 2—4; and again, ver. 14. IV. The defeat that should be given to those enemies by the immediate hand of God, ver. 21—23; which we shall hear more of in the next chapter.

AND the word of the LORD came unto me, saying, 2 Son of man, set thy face against Gog, the land of Magog, the chief prince of Meshech and Tubal, and prophesy against him, 3 And say,

Thus saith the Lord GOD;
Behold, I am against thee, O Gog,
The chief prince of Meshech and Tubal:
4 And I will turn thee back,
And put hooks into thy jaws, and I will bring thee forth,

All of them handling swords:

That is brought back from the sword,
And is gathered out of many people,

10 Thus saith the Lord GOD;
It shall also come to pass,
That at the same time shall things come into thy mind,
And thou shalt think an evil thought: [villages;

may, and probably ought also to read, "Gog, of the land of Magog," although in Rev. xx. 8 Gog and Magog are given as the names of two peoples. In this place Gog has been taken as the real name of a ruler, but it is more probably a personification. The ambiguity and obscurity attaching to the names used in this chapter have led to the suggestion of many different explanations, more or less reasonable. Magog, it will be remembered, was a son of Japhet (Gen. x. 2), and is here apparently represented by his descendants, who may summarily be called Scythians. With regard to the other names, Rosh (A.V. "chief") has been applied to the Russians, Meshech is identified with the Moschi, while the Tibareni are represented by Tubal. They were all northern tribes, and at that time warlike, wandering, and barbarous.

xxxviii. 5, 6. Persia, Ethiopia, and other nations are now introduced. Persia requires no explanation. Ethiopia, or Cush, and Phut are African races. Gomer is identified with the Cimmerians, a

To carry away silver and gold,
To take away cattle and goods, to take a great spoil?

The critical expositors have enough to do here to inquire out Gog and Magog; we cannot pretend either to add to their observations, or to determine their controversies. Gog seems to be the king, and Magog the kingdom; so that Gog and Magog are like Pharaoh and the Egyptians. Some think they find them afar off, in Scythia, Tartary, and Russia. Others think they find them nearer the land of Israel, in Syria and Asia the Less. Ezekiel is appointed to prophesy against Gog, and to tell him that God is against him, ver. 2, 3. Note, God doth not only see those that are now the enemies of his church, and set himself against them, but he foresees those that will be so, and lets them know by his word that he is against them too, and yet is pleased to make use of them to serve his own purposes, for the glory of his own name; surely their wrath shall praise him, and the "remainder thereof he will restrain," Ps. lxxvi. 10. Let us observe here,

First. The confusion which God designed to put this enemy to. It is remarkable that this is put first in the prophecy; before it is foretold that God will bring him forth against Israel, it is foretold that God will put hooks into his jaws, and turn him back, ver. 4, that they might have assurance of their deliverance before they had the prospect given them of their danger. Thus tender is God of the comfort of his people, thus careful that they may not be frightened; even before the trouble begins he tells them it will end well.

Secondly. The undertaking which he designed to engage him in, in order to this defeat and disappointment.

1. The nations that shall be confederate in this enterprise against Israel are many, and great, and mighty, ver. 5, 6, Persia, Ethiopia, &c. Antiochus had an army made up of all the nations here named, and many others. These people had been at variance with one another, and yet in combination against Israel. How are they increased that trouble God's people!

2. They are well furnished with arms and ammunition, bring a good train of artillery into the field, horses and horsemen, ver. 4, bravely equipped with all sorts of armour, bucklers, and shields for defence, and all handling swords for offence. Orders are given to make all imaginable preparation for this expedition; ver. 7, "Be thou prepared," and do thou prepare. See what warlike preparations thou hast already in store, and, lest that should not suffice, make farther preparation, thou and all thy company. Let Gog himself be a guard to the rest of the confederates; as commander-in-chief let him engage to take care of them and their safety; let him pass his word for their security, and take them under his particular protection. The leaders of an army, instead of exposing their soldiers needlessly and presumptuously, and throwing away their lives upon desperate undertakings, should study to be a guard to them; and whenever they send them forth in danger, should contrive to support and cover them. This call to prepare seems to be ironical; Do thy worst, but I will turn thee back, like that, Isa. viii. 9, "Gird yourselves, and ye shall be broken in pieces."

3. Their design is against the mountains of Israel; ver. 8, against "the land that is brought back from the sword." It is not long since it was harassed with the sword of war, and it has been always wasted, more or less, with one judgment or other; it is but newly gathered out of many people, and brought forth out of the nations; it has enjoyed, comparatively, but a short breathing time, has scarce recovered any strength since it was brought down by war and captivity, and therefore its neighbours need not fear its being too great; nay, and therefore it is very barbarous to pick a quarrel with it so soon; it is a people that "dwells safely, all of them" in "unwalled villages," very secure, and "having neither bars nor gates," ver. 11. It is a certain sign they intend no mischief to their neighbours, for they fear no mischief from them. It cannot be thought they will offend others who do not take care to defend themselves, and it aggravates the sin of these invaders. It is base and barbarous to devise "evil against thy neighbour" while he "dwells securely by thee," and has no distrust of thee, Pr. iii. 29. But see here how the clouds return after the rain in this world, and what little reason we have ever to be secure till we come to heaven It is not long since Israel was brought back from the sword of one enemy, and behold the sword of another is drawn against it. Former troubles will not excuse us from farther troubles; but when we think we have put off the harness, at least for some time, by a fresh and sudden alarm we may be called to gird it on again, and therefore we must never boast, or be off our guard.

4. That which the enemy has in view in forming this project is to enrich himself, and to make himself master, not of the country, but of the wealth of it; to spoil and plunder it, and make a prey of it. At the same time that God intends to bring this matter about, things shall come into the mind of this enemy, and he shall "think an evil thought," ver. 10. Note, All the mischief men do, and particularly the mischief they do to the church of God, ariseth from evil thoughts that come into their mind—ambitious thoughts, covetous thoughts, spiteful thoughts to those that are good, for the sake of their goodness. It came into Antiochus's mind what a singular people these religious Jews were, and how their worship witnessed against, and condemned, the idolatries of their neighbours, and therefore in enmity to their religion he would plague them. It came into his mind what a wealthy people they were, that they had "gotten cattle and goods in the midst of the land," ver. 12; and withal how weak they were, and how unable to make any resistance, and how easy it would be to carry off what they had, and how much glory this rapine would add to his victorious sword. These things coming into his mind, and one evil thought drawing on another, he came at last to this resolve, ver. 11, 12, "I will go up to the land of unwalled villages," yea, that I will; it will cost me nothing to make them all my own. I will go and disturb them that are at rest, without giving them any notice; not to crush their growing greatness, or chastise their insolence, or make reprisals upon them for any wrong they have done us, (they had none of these pretences to make war upon them,) but purely "to take a spoil, and to take a prey," ver. 12, in open defiance to all the laws of justice and equity, as much as the highwayman's killing the traveller that he may take his money. These were the thoughts that came into the mind of this wicked prince, and God knew them; nay, he knew them before they came into his mind, for he "understandeth our thoughts afar off," Ps. cxxxix. 2.

5. According to the project thus formed he pours in all his forces upon the land of Israel, and finds those that are ready to come in to his assistance upon the same prospects; ver. 9, "Thou shalt ascend, and come like a storm," with all the force, and fury, and fierceness imaginable, and thou shalt be "like a cloud to cover the land," to darken it, and to threaten it; thou, and not only all thy bands, all the force thou canst bring into the field, but many people with thee, such as are spoken of ver. 13; Sheba and Dedan, the Arabians and Edomites, and the merchants of Tarshish, of Tyre and Sidon, and other maritime cities, they and their young lions, that are greedy of spoil, and live upon it, they shall say, "Art thou come to take the spoil" of this land? Yes, he is; and therefore they wish him success; or perhaps they envy him, or grudge it him. Art thou come for riches, who art thyself so rich already? Or, knowing that God was on Israel's side, they thus ridicule his attempts, foreseeing they would be baffled, and that he would be disappointed of the prey he promised himself. Or, if he be come to take the prey, they will come and join with him, and add to his forces. When Lysias, that was general of Antiochus's army, came against the Jews, the neighbour nations joined with him, 1 Mac. iii. 24, to share in the guilt, in hopes to share in the prey. "When thou sawest a thief then thou consentedst with him."

14 Therefore, son of man, prophesy and say unto Gog,
Thus saith the Lord GOD;
In that day when my people of Israel dwelleth safely,
Shalt thou not know it?
15 And thou shalt come from thy place out of the north parts,
Thou, and many people with thee, all of them riding upon horses,
A great company, and a mighty army:
16 And thou shalt come up against my people of Israel,
As a cloud to cover the land;
It shall be in the latter days,
And I will bring thee against my land,
That the heathen may know me, when I shall be sanctified in thee,
O Gog, before their eyes.
17 Thus saith the Lord GOD;
Art thou he of whom I have spoken in old time
By my servants the prophets of Israel,
Which prophesied in those days many years
That I would bring thee against them?
18 And it shall come to pass at the same time
When Gog shall come against the land of Israel, saith the Lord GOD,
That my fury shall come up in my face. [spoken,
19 For in my jealousy and in the fire of my wrath have I
Surely in that day there shall be a great shaking in the land of Israel;
20 So that the fishes of the sea, and the fowls of the heaven,
And the beasts of the field, and all creeping things that creep upon the earth,
And all the men that are upon the face of the earth,
Shall shake at my presence,
And the mountains shall be thrown down,
And the steep places shall fall,
And every wall shall fall to the ground.
21 And I will call for a sword against him
Throughout all my mountains, saith the Lord GOD:
Every man's sword shall be against his brother.
22 And I will plead against him with pestilence and with blood;
And I will rain upon him, and upon his bands,
And upon the many people that are with him,
An overflowing rain, and great hailstones, fire, and brimstone.
23 Thus will I magnify myself, and sanctify myself;
And I will be known in the eyes of many nations,
And they shall know that I am the LORD.

This latter part of the chapter is a repetition of the former. The dream is doubled, for the thing is certain, and to be very carefully regarded.

First. It is here again foretold that this spiteful enemy should make a formidable descent upon the land of Israel; ver. 15, "Thou shalt come out of the north parts (Syria lay on the north of Canaan) with a mighty army," shalt come like a cloud, and "cover the land of my people Israel," ver. 16. These words, ver. 14, "When my people of Israel dwell safely, shalt thou not know it?" may be taken two ways; either,

1. As speaking his inducements to this attempt. Thou shalt have intelligence brought thee how securely, and therefore how carelessly, the people of Israel dwell, which shall give rise to thy project against them; for when thou knowest not only what a rich, but what an easy prey they are likely to be, thou wilt soon determine to fall upon them. Note, God's providence is to be acknowledged in the occasion, the small occasion perhaps that is given, and that not designedly neither, to those first thoughts from which great enterprises take their original. God, to bring about his own purposes, lets men know that which yet he knows they will make an ill use of, as here. Or,

2. As speaking his disappointment in this attempt, which here, as before, the prophecy begins with. "When my people Israel dwell safely," not in their own apprehension only, but in reality, forasmuch as they dwell safely under the Divine protection, shall not thou be made to know it by the fruitlessness of thine endeavours to destroy them; thou shalt soon find that there is no enchantment against Jacob, that no weapon formed against them shall prosper. Thou shalt know to thy cost, shalt know to thy shame, that though they have no walls, nor bars, nor gates, they have God himself, a wall of fire round about them, and he that toucheth them toucheth the apple of his eye. Whosoever xxxviii. 8. This verse intimates that the land of Israel is to be the scene of the impending conflict with the invaders. The words, "after many days thou shalt be visited," are variously explained. Some take them to mean "visited with punishment," and others, very differently, understand them of receiving the command. The verb "thou shalt be visited" certainly has the two senses, to be punished, and to be appointed, and also that of missing or lacking; hence its exact meaning in special cases must be ascertained by the scope and context. It is apparent that the natural order of the ideas favours the sense of command: "After many days thou shalt take the command, at the end of the years thou shalt come to a land remote from the sword," &c. Israel, which dwelt securely, should be invaded by the foe.

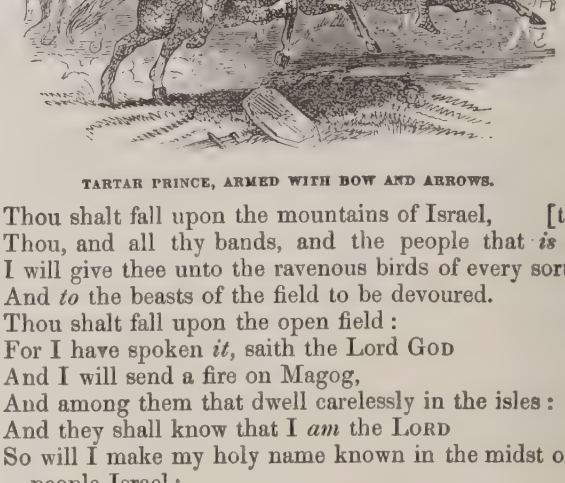
meddles with them meddles to his own hurt; and it is for the demonstrating of this to all the world that God will bring this mighty enemy against his people. They that gathered themselves against Israel said, Let us take the spoil, and take the prey; but they "knew not the thoughts of the Lord," Mic. iv. 11, 12. "I will bring thee against my land." This is strange news, that God will not only permit his enemies to come against his own children, but will himself bring them. But if we understand what he aims at we shall be well reconciled even to this; it is, "That the heathen may know me" to be the only living and true God, "when I shall be sanctified in thee," O Gog; that is, in thy defeat and destruction "before their eyes," that all the nations may see and say, "There is none like unto the God of Jeshurun, that rides on the heavens for the help of his people." Note, God therefore brings his people into danger and distress that he may have the honour of bringing about their deliverance; and therefore suffers the enemies of his church to prevail awhile, though they profane his name by their sin, that he may have the honour of prevailing at last, and sanctifying his own name in their ruin. Now it is said this shall be in the latter days, namely, in the latter days of the Old Testament church; so the mischief Antiochus did to Israel was; but in the latter days of the New Testament church another like enemy should arise, that should in like manner be defeated. Note, Effectual securities are treasured up in the word of God against the troubles and dangers the church may be brought into a great while hence, even in the latter days.

Secondly. Reference is herein had to the predictions of the former prophets; ver. 17, "Art thou he of whom I have spoken in old times," of whom Moses spoke in his prophecy of the latter days, Deu. xxxii. 43, "He will render vengeance to his adversaries;" and David, Ps. ix. 15, "The heathen are sunk down in the pit that they made;" and often elsewhere in the Psalms. This is the leviathan of whom Isaiah spake, Isa. xxvii. 1; that congress of the nations of which Joel spake, Joel iii. 1. Many of the prophets had perhaps spoken particularly of this event, though it be not written, as they all had spoken and written too that which is applicable to it. Note, There is an amiable, admirable harmony and agreement between the Lord's prophets, though they lived in several ages; for they were all guided by one and the same Spirit.

Thirdly. It is here foretold that this furious, formidable enemy should be utterly cut off in this attempt upon Israel, and it should issue in his own ruin. This is supposed by many to have its accomplishment in the many defeats given by the Maccabees to the forces of Antiochus, and the remarkable judgments of God executed upon his own person, for he died of sore diseases; but these things are here foretold, as usual, in figurative expressions, which we are not to look for the literal accomplishment of, and yet they might be fulfilled nearer the letter than we know of.

1. God will be highly displeased with this bold invader. When he comes up in pride and anger against the land of Israel, and thinks to carry all before him with a high hand, then God's fury shall come up in his face, which is an allusion to the manner of men whose colour riseth in their faces when some high affront is offered them, and they are resolved to shew their resentment of it, ver. 18; God will speak against them, in his jealousy for his people, and in the fire of his wrath, against his and their enemies, ver. 19. See how God's permitting sin, his laying occasions of sin before men, and his making use of it to serve his own purposes, is very well consistent with his hatred of sin, and his displeasure against it. God brings this enemy against his land, letting him know what an easy prey it might be, and determining thereby to glorify himself, and yet, when he comes against the land, God's fury comes up, and he speaks to him in the fire of his wrath. If any ask, Why doth he thus find fault, for who hath resisted his will? it is easy to answer, "Nay, but, O man, who art thou that repliest against God?"

2. His forces shall be put into the greatest confusion and consternation imaginable; ver. 19, "There shall be a great shaking" of them "in the land of Israel," an universal concussion, ver. 20, such as shall affect the fishes and fowls, the beasts and creeping things, and much more "the men that are upon the face of the earth," who sooner receive impressions of fear. There shall be such an earthquake as shall throw down the mountains, those natural heights, and the steep places, towers, and walls, those artificial heights; they shall all fall to the ground. Some understand this of the fright which the land of Israel should be put into by the fury of the enemy; but it is rather to be understood of the fright which the enemy should be put into by the wrath of God. All those things which they both raise themselves and stay themselves upon shall be shaken down, and their hearts shall fail them.



3. He shall be routed, and utterly ruined; both earth and heaven shall be armed against him. 1st. The earth shall muster up its forces to destroy him. If the people of Israel have not strength and courage to resist him, God will "call for a sword against him," ver. 21; and he hath swords always at command, that are "bathed in heaven," Isa. xxxv. 5. Throughout all the mountains of Israel, where he hoped to meet with spoil to enrich him, he shall meet with swords to destroy him; and, rather than fail, "every man's sword shall be against his brother," as in the day of Midian, Ps. lxxxiii. 9. The great men of Syria shall undermine and overthrow one another, shall accuse one another, shall fight duels with one another. Note, God can, and often doth, make the destroyers of his people to be their own destroyers, and the destroyers of one another. However, he will himself be their destroyer, will take the work into his own hand, that it may be done thoroughly; ver. 22, "I will plead against him with pestilence and blood." Note, Whom God acts against he pleads against; he shews them the ground of his controversy with them, that their mouths may be stopped, and he may be clear when he judgeth. 2nd. The artillery of heaven shall also be drawn out against them; "I will rain upon him an overflowing rain," ver. 22. He comes like a storm upon Israel, ver. 9; but God will come like a storm upon him, will rain upon him great hailstones, as upon the Canaanites, Jos. x. 11; fire and brimstone, as upon Sodom, and a horrible tempest, Ps. xi. 6. Thus the Gog and Magog in the New Testament shall be devoured with fire from heaven, and cast into the lake of brimstone, Rev. xx. 9, 10. That will be the everlasting portion of the impenitent, implacable enemies of God's church and people.

4. God in all this will be glorified; the end he aimed at (ver. 16) shall be accomplished; ver. 23, "Thus will I magnify myself, and sanctify myself." Note, In the destruction of sinners God makes it to appear that he is a great and holy God, and will do so to eternity; and if men do not magnify and sanctify him as they ought, he will magnify himself, and sanctify himself. And this we should desire and pray for daily, "Father, glorify thy own name."

CHAPTER XXXIX.

This chapter continues and concludes the prophecy against Gog and Magog, in whose destruction God crowns his favour to his people Israel, which shines very bright after the scattering of that black cloud in the close of this chapter. Here is, I. An express prediction of the utter destruction of Gog and Magog, agreeing with what we had before, ver. 1—7. II. An illustration of the vastness of that destruction, in three consequences of it, the burning of their weapons, ver. 8—10; the burying of their slain, ver. 11—16; and the feasting of the fowls with the dead bodies of those that were unburied, ver. 17—22. III. A declaration of God's gracious purposes concerning his people Israel, in this and other his providences concerning them, and a promise of farther mercy he had yet in store for them, ver. 23—29.

THEREFORE, thou son of man, prophesy against Gog, and say,
Thus saith the Lord GOD;
Behold, I am against thee, O Gog,
The chief prince of Meshech and Tubal:
2 And I will turn thee back, and leave but the sixth part [of thee,
And will cause thee to come up from the north parts,
And will bring thee upon the mountains of Israel:
3 And I will smite thy bow out of thy left hand,
And will cause thine arrows to fall out of thy right hand.

TARTAR PRINCE, ARMED WITH BOW AND ARROWS.

4 Thou shalt fall upon the mountains of Israel, [thee:
Thou, and all thy bands, and the people that is with
I will give thee unto the ravenous birds of every sort,
And to the beasts of the field to be devoured.
5 Thou shalt fall upon the open field:
For I have spoken it, saith the Lord GOD
6 And I will send a fire on Magog,
And among them that dwell carelessly in the isles:
And they shall know that I am the LORD
7 So will I make my holy name known in the midst of my people Israel;
And I will not let them pollute my holy name any more:
And the heathen shall know that I am the LORD, the Holy One in Israel.

This prophecy begins as that before, ch. xxxviii. 3, 4, "I am against thee, and I will turn thee back;" for there is need of line upon line, both for the conviction of Israel's enemies and the comfort of Israel's friends. Here, as there, it is foretold that God will bring this enemy "from the north parts," as formerly the Chaldeans were fetched from the north, Jer. i. 14, (omne malum ab aquilone, —'every evil comes from the north,') and, long after, the Roman empire was overrun by the northern nations; that he will bring him "upon the mountains of Israel," ver. 2, first, as a place of temptation, where the measure of his iniquity shall be filled up, and then as a place of execution, where his ruin shall be completed. And that is it that is here enlarged upon.

First. His soldiers shall be disarmed, and so disabled to carry on their enterprise. Though the men of might may find their hands, yet to what purpose, when they find it is put out of their power to do mischief; when God shall smite their bow out of their left hand, and their arrow out of their right? ver. 3. Note, The weapons formed against Zion shall not prosper.

Secondly. He and the greatest part of his army shall be slain in the field of battle; ver. 4, "Thou shalt fall upon the mountains of Israel;" there they sinned, and there they shall perish, even upon the holy mountains of Israel; for "there brake he the arrows of the bow," Ps. lxxvi. 3. The mountains of Israel shall be moistened and fattened, and made fruitful with the blood of the enemies. "Thou shalt fall upon the open field," ver. 5, and shalt not be able even there to make thy escape; even upon the mountains he shall not find a pass that he shall be able to maintain, and upon the open field he shall not find a road that he shall be able to make his escape by. He and his bands, his regular troops, and the people that are with him, that follow the camp to share in the plunder, these shall all fall with him. Note, Those that cast in their lot among wicked people, (Pr. i. 14,) that they may have one purse with them, must expect to take their lot with them, and fare as they fare, taking the worse with the better. There shall be such a general slaughter made that but a sixth part shall be left, ver. 2; the other five shall all be cut off. Never was army so totally routed as this. And, for its greater infamy and reproach, their bodies shall be a feast to the birds of prey, ver. 5; compare with ver. 17, "Thou shalt fall, for I have spoken it." Note, Rather shall the most illustrious princes, (Antiochus was called Epiphanes, the illustrious) and the most numerous armies, fall to the ground, than any word of God; for he that hath spoken will make it good.

Thirdly. His country also shall be made desolate. "I will send a fire on Magog," ver. 6, and "among them that dwell carelessly," or confidently, in the isles, that is, the nations of the Gentiles. He designed to destroy the land of Israel, but shall not only be defeated in that design, but shall have his own xxxviii. 13. Sheba, Dedan, and the merchants of Tarshish seem to ask these questions of Gog less for the sake of information than to express their surprise. But there is nothing in their words to indicate their disapproval of the invasion. The contrary seems implied in the fact that they address themselves to the enemy instead of rallying to the help of Israel their neighbour. The merchants of Tarshish are most likely the Phœnicians of Tyre and Sidon, whose "lions" are their rulers, in accordance with a well-known figure.

xxxviii. 17. It must be inferred from this verse that the combination of hostile forces under Gog had been previously predicted, although the name of Gog and other features now appeared for the first time. Passages in Jeremiah, Daniel, Isaiah, Joel, &c., have been referred to in illustration of this text, and it is well known that God's people expected surprising calamities in the distant future.

xxxviii. 21. For "every man's sword shall be against his brother" some would translate "one sword shall be against another." Both destroyed by some fire, some consuming judgment or other. Note, Those who invade other people's rights justly lose their own.

Fourthly. God will by all this advance the honour of his own name, 1. Among his people Israel. They shall hereby know more of God's name, of his power and goodness; his care of them, his faithfulness to them, his providence concerning them, shall lead them into a better acquaintance with him. Every providence should do so, as well as every ordinance. "I will make my holy name known in the midst of my people." In Judah is God known; but those that know much of God should know more of him; we should especially increase in the knowledge of his name, as a holy name; know him as a God of perfect rectitude and that hates all sin. And then it follows, "I will not let them pollute my holy name any more." Note, Those that rightly know God's holy name will not dare to profane it; for it is through ignorance of it that men make light of it, and make bold with it. And this is God's method of dealing with men, first to enlighten their understandings, and by that means to influence the whole man. He first makes us to know his holy name, and so keeps us from polluting it, and engageth us to honour it. And this is here the blessed effect of God's glorious appearances on the behalf of his people. Thus he completes his favours, thus he sanctifies them, thus he makes them blessings indeed; by them he instructs his people and reforms them. "When the Almighty scattered kings for her, she was white as snow in Salmon," Ps. lxviii. 14. 2. Among the heathen. Those that never knew it, or would not own it, shall "know that I am the Lord, the Holy One in Israel." They shall be made to know by dear-bought experience that he is a God of power, and his people's God and Saviour; and it is in vain for the greatest potentates to contend with him; none ever hardened their heart against him and prospered.

8 Behold, it is come, and it is done, saith the Lord GOD;
This is the day whereof I have spoken.
9 And they that dwell in the cities of Israel shall go forth,
And shall set on fire and burn the weapons,
Both the shields and the bucklers,
The bows and the arrows, and the handstaves, and the spears,
And they shall burn them with fire seven years:
10 So that they shall take no wood out of the field,
Neither cut down any out of the forests;
For they shall burn the weapons with fire:
And they shall spoil those that spoiled them,
And rob those that robbed them, saith the Lord GOD.
11 And it shall come to pass in that day, that I will give unto Gog a place there of graves in Israel, the valley of the passengers on the east of the sea: and it shall stop the noses of the passengers: and there shall they bury Gog and all his multitude: and they shall call it The valley of Hamon-gog. 12 And seven months shall the house of Israel be burying of them, that they may cleanse the land. 13 Yea, all the people of the land shall bury them; and it shall be to them a renown the day that I shall be glorified, saith the Lord GOD. 14 And they shall sever out men of continual employment, passing through the land to bury with the passengers those that remain upon the face of the earth, to cleanse it: after the end of seven months shall they search. 15 And the passengers that pass through the land, when any seeth a man's bone, then shall he set up a sign by it, till the buriers have buried it in the valley of Hamon-gog. 16 And also the name of the city shall be Hamonah. Thus shall they cleanse the land.
17 And, thou son of man, thus saith the Lord GOD; Speak unto every feathered fowl, and to every beast of the field,
Assemble yourselves, and come;
Gather yourselves on every side to my sacrifice that I do sacrifice for you,
Even a great sacrifice upon the mountains of Israel,
That ye may eat flesh, and drink blood
18 Ye shall eat the flesh of the mighty,
And drink the blood of the princes of the earth,
Of rams, of lambs, and of goats, of bullocks,
All of them fatlings of Bashan
19 And ye shall eat fat till ye be full,
And drink blood till ye be drunken,
Of my sacrifice which I have sacrificed for you.
20 Thus ye shall be filled at my table with horses and [chariots,
With mighty men, and with all men of war,
Saith the Lord GOD.
21 And I will set my glory among the heathen,
And all the heathen shall see my judgment that I have executed,
And my hand that I have laid upon them.
22 So the house of Israel shall know that I am the LORD their God
From that day and forward.

Though this prophecy was to have its accomplishment in the latter days, yet it is here spoken of as if it were already accomplished, because it is certain; ver. 8, "Behold, it is come, and it is done," it is as sure to be done, when the time is come, as if it were done already. "This is the day, whereof I have" long and often "spoken," and though it has been long in coming, yet at length it is come. Thus it was said unto John, Rev. xxi. 6, "It is done." To represent the routing of the army of Gog as very great, here are three things instanced as the consequences of it. It was God himself that gave them the defeat, we do not find that the people of Israel drew a sword, or struck a stroke. But,

First. They shall burn their weapons, their bows and arrows, which fell out of their hands, ver. 3, their shields and bucklers, their javelins, spears, their leading staves, truncheons, and half-pikes, every thing that is combustible. They shall not lay them up in their armouries, or reserve them for their own use, lest they should be tempted to put a confidence in them, but burn them. Not all at once for a bonfire—to what purpose would be that waste? but as they had occasion to use them, for fuel in their houses, instead of other firewood, so that they should have no occasion to take wood out of the field or forests for seven years together, ver. 10; such vast quantities of weapons shall there be left upon the open field, where the enemy fell, and in the roads which they passed in their flight. The weapons were dry and fitter for fuel than green wood; and by saving the wood in their coppices and forests they gave it time to grow. Though the mountains of Israel produce plenty of good things, yet it becomes the people of Israel to be good husbands of their plenty, and to save what they can for the benefit of those that come after them, as Providence shall give them opportunity to do so. We may suppose, when they that dwelt in the cities of Israel came forth to "spoil those that spoiled them," and make reprisals upon them, they found upon them silver, and gold, and ornaments; yet no mention is made of any thing particularly that they converted to their own use, but the wood of the weapons for fuel, which is one of the necessaries of human life, to teach us to think it enough if we be well supplied with those, though we have but little of the delights and gaieties of it, and of those things which we may very well live without. And every time they put fuel to the fire, and warmed themselves at it, they would be put in mind of the number and strength of their enemies, and the imminent peril they were in of falling into their hands, which would help to enlarge their hearts in thankfulness to that God who had so wonderfully, so seasonably, delivered them. As they sat by the fire with their children about them, (their fireside,) they might from it take occasion to tell them what great things God had done for them.

Secondly. They shall bury their dead. Usually, after a battle, when many are slain, the enemy desire time to bury their own dead; but here the slaughter shall be so general that there shall not be enough of the enemies left alive to bury the dead; and besides, the slain lie so dispersed on the mountains of Israel that it would be a work of time to find them out; and therefore it is left to the house of Israel to bury them, as a piece of triumph in their overthrow.

1. A place shall be appointed on purpose for the burying of them, namely, "the valley of the passengers, on the east of the sea," either the Salt sea, or the sea of Tiberias,—a valley through which there was great passing and repassing of travellers between Egypt and Chaldea. There shall be such a multitude of dead bodies putrefying above ground, with such a loathsome stench, that the travellers that go that way shall be forced to stop their noses. See what vile bodies ours are: when the soul has been a little while from them the smell of them becomes offensive, no smell more nauseous or more noxious. There, therefore, where the greatest number lay slain, shall the burying-place be appointed. In the place where the tree falls there let it lie. And it shall be called, "The valley of Hamon-gog;" that is, of the multitude, for that was the thing which was in a particular manner to be had in remembrance,—how numerous the forces of the enemies were which God defeated and destroyed for the defence of his people Israel.

2. A considerable time shall be spent in burying them—no less than seven months, ver. 22, which is a farther intimation that the slain of the Lord in this action should be many, and that great care should be taken by the house of Israel to leave none unburied, that so they may cleanse the land from the ceremonial pollution it contracted by the lying of so many dead corpses unburied in it, for the prevention of which it was appointed that those who were hanged on a tree should be speedily taken down and buried, Deu. xxi. 23. This is an intimation that times of eminent deliverances should be times of reformation. The more God has done for the saving of a land from ruin, the more the inhabitants should do for the cleansing of the land from sin.

3. Great numbers shall be employed in this work. All the people of the land shall be ready to lend a helping hand to it, ver. 13. Note, Every one should contribute the utmost he can in his place towards the cleansing of the land from the pollutions of it, and from every thing that is a reproach to it. Sin is a common enemy, which every man should take up arms against. In publico discrimine unusquisque homo miles est,—'In the season of public danger every man becomes a soldier;' and whoever shall assist in this work, "it shall be to them a renown." Though the office of grave-makers, or common scavengers of the country, seem but mean, yet, when it is for the cleansing and purifying of the land from dead works, it shall be mentioned to their honour. Note, Acts of humanity add much to the renown of God's Israel. It is a credit to religion when those that profess it are ready to every good work, and a good work it is to bury the dead, yea, though they be strangers and enemies to the commonwealth of Israel, for even they shall rise again. It shall be a renown to them in the day when God will be glorified. Note, It is for the glory of God when his Israel do that which adorns their profession; others will "see their good works, and glorify their Father," Mat. v. 16. And when God is honoured he will put honour upon his people. His glory is their renown.

renderings are justifiable, but it is very doubtful whether the last would be first thought of, for the Hebrew seems to mean on the face of it, "the sword of a man shall be against his (or its) brother." Owing, however, to a peculiar idiom, we may take the words to signify, "sword shall be against sword," i.e., hostility will be resisted force by force.

xxxix. 2. The Hebrew for "leave but the sixth part of thee" has much perplexed interpreters, and our own translators have put in the margin, "or, strike thee with six plagues; or, draw thee back with a hook of six teeth." It is only guess-work to introduce any idea connected with "six," and the ancient versions and modern philology do not favour it. Gesenius says, "The signification of leading is clear enough from the context;" and this is the notion predominant in the old translations, though it is variously applied. The expression which precedes may be rendered, "I will bring thee back," the rest of the verse showing where to, viz., to Israel.

4. Some particular persons shall make it their business to search out the dead bodies, or any part of them, that should remain unburied. The people of the land will soon grow weary of burying the pollutions of the country, and therefore they shall appoint "men of continual employment," that should apply themselves to it, and do nothing else till the land was thoroughly cleansed; for otherwise that which is every one's work would soon become nobody's work. Note, Those that are engaged in public work, especially for the cleansing and reforming a land, ought to be "men of continual employment," men that will stick to what they undertake, and go through with it, men that will apply themselves to it; and those that will do good according to their opportunities will find themselves continually employed.

5. Even the passengers shall be ready to give information to those whose business it is to cleanse the land of what public nuisances they meet with, which call for their assistance. They that pass through the land, though they will not stay to bury the dead themselves, lest they should contract a ceremonial pollution, yet they will give notice of those they find unburied. If they but discover a bone, they will set up a sign, that the buriers may come and bury it, and that till it is buried others may take heed of touching it; for which reason their sepulchres among the Jews were whited, that people might keep at a distance from them. Note, When good work is to be done, every one should lend a hand to further it, even the passengers themselves, who must not think themselves unconcerned in a common calamity, or a common iniquity, to put a stop to it. Those whose work it is to cleanse the land must not countenance any thing in it that is defiling; though it were not the body, but only the bone of a man, that was found unburied, they must encourage those who will give information of it, private information, by a sign, concealing the informer, that they may take it away, and bury it out of sight. Nay, "after the end of seven months," which was allowed them for this work, when all is taken away that appeared at first view, they shall search for more, that what is hidden may be brought to light; they shall search out iniquity till they find none. In memory of this they shall give a new name to their city; it shall be called "Hamonah, the multitude." O what a multitude of our enemies have we of this city buried! "Thus shall they cleanse the land," with all this care, with all this pains, ver. 16. Note, After conquering there must be cleansing. Moses appointed those Israelites that had been employed in the war with the Midianites to purify themselves, Num. xxxi. 24. Having received special favours from God, "let us cleanse ourselves from all filthiness."

Thirdly. The birds and beasts of prey shall rest upon the carcases of the slain, while they remain unburied, and it shall be impossible to prevent it, ver. 17, &c. We find a great slaughter represented by this figure, Rev. xix. 17, &c., which is borrowed from this.

1. There is a general invitation given, ver. 17. It is to the fowl of every wing, and to every beast of the field, from the greatest to the least, that preys upon carcases, from the eagle to the raven, from the lion to the dog; let them all gather themselves on every side, here is meat enough for them, and they are all welcome. Let them come to God's sacrifice, to his feast, so the margin reads it. Note, The judgments of God executed upon sin and sinners are both a sacrifice and a feast; a sacrifice to the justice of God, and a feast to the faith and hope of God's people. When God "brake the head of leviathan," he gave him to be meat to Israel, Ps. lxxiv. 14. "The righteous shall rejoice," as at a feast, "when he sees the vengeance," and shall "wash his foot," as at a feast, "in the blood of the wicked." This sacrifice is upon the mountains of Israel; these are the high places, the altars, where God had been dishonoured by the idolatries of the people, but where he will now glorify himself in the destruction of his enemies.

2. There is great preparation made. They shall "eat the flesh of the mighty," and "drink the blood of the princes of the earth," ver. 18, 19. 1st. It is the flesh and blood of men that they shall be treated with. This has sometimes been an instance of the rebellion of the inferior creatures against man their master, which is an effect of his rebellion against God his Maker. 2nd. It is the flesh and blood of great men, here called rams and bullocks, and great goats, "all of them "fatlings of Bashan." It is the blood of the princes of the earth that they shall regale themselves with. What a mortification is this to the princes of the blood, as they called themselves, that God can make that blood, that royal blood, which swells their veins, a feast for the birds and beasts of prey? 3rd. It is the flesh and blood of wicked men, the enemies of God's church and people, that they are invited to. They had accounted the Israel of God as "sheep for the slaughter," and now they shall themselves be so accounted; they had thus used the "dead bodies of God's servants," Ps. lxxix. 2, or would have done, and now it shall come upon themselves.

3. They shall all be fed, they shall all be feasted to the full; ver. 19, 20, "Ye shall eat fat, and drink blood," which are satiating, surfeiting things. The sacrifice is great, and the feast upon the sacrifice is accordingly. "You shall be filled at my table." Note, God keeps a table for the inferior creatures; he provideth food for all flesh, and the eyes of all wait upon him; and he satisfies their desires, for he keeps a plentiful table. And if the birds and beasts shall be filled at God's table, which he hath prepared for them, much more shall his children be abundantly satisfied with the goodness of his house, even of his holy temple. They shall be filled with horses and chariots; that is, those that ride in the chariots, mighty men, and men of war, who triumphed over nations, are now themselves triumphed over by the ravens of the valley, and the young eagles, Pr. xxx. 17. They thought to have made an easy prey of God's Israel, and now they are themselves an easy prey to the birds and beasts. See how evil pursues sinners, even after death. This exposing of their bodies to be a prey is but a type and sign of those terrors that after death shall prey upon their consciences, (which the poetical fiction represented by a vulture continually pecking at the heart,) and this shame but an earnest of the everlasting shame and contempt they shall rise to.

Fourthly. This shall redound very much both to the glory and to the comfort and satisfaction of his people.

1. It shall be much to the honour of God, for the heathen shall hereby be made to know that he is the Lord; ver. 21, "All the heathen shall see" and observe "my judgments, that I have executed," and thereby my glory shall be set among them. This principle shall be admitted and established among them more than ever, that the God of Israel is a great and glorious God. He is known to be so even among the heathen, that have not, or read not, his written word, by the judgments which he executed.

2. It shall be much for the satisfaction of his people, for they shall hereby be made to know that he is their God; ver. 22, "The house of Israel shall know" abundantly to their comfort that "I am the Lord their God from that day and forward." 1st. He will be so "from that day and forward." God's present mercies are pledges and assurances of farther mercies. If God evidence to us that he is our God, he assures us that he will never leave us; "This God is our God for ever and ever." 2nd. They shall know it with more satisfaction "from that day and forward." They had sometimes been ready to question whether the Lord was with them or no; but the events of this day shall silence their doubts, and the matter being thus settled, and made clear, it shall not be doubted of for the future. As boasting in themselves is hereby for ever excluded, so boasting in God is hereby for ever secured.

23 And the heathen shall know that the house of Israel went into captivity for their iniquity:
Because they trespassed against me, therefore hid I my face from them,
And gave them into the hand of their enemies:
So fell they all by the sword.
24 According to their uncleanness and according to their transgressions have I done unto them,
And hid my face from them.
25 Therefore thus saith the Lord GOD;
Now will I bring again the captivity of Jacob,
And have mercy upon the whole house of Israel,
And will be jealous for my holy name;
26 After that they have borne their shame,
And all their trespasses whereby they have trespassed against me,
When they dwelt safely in their land, and none made them afraid.
27 When I have brought them again from the people,
And gathered them out of their enemies' lands,
And am sanctified in them in the sight of many nations;
28 Then shall they know that I am the LORD their God,
Which caused them to be led into captivity among the heathen:
But I have gathered them unto their own land,
And have left none of them any more there.
29 Neither will I hide my face any more from them:
For I have poured out my spirit upon the house of Israel
Saith the Lord GOD.

This is the conclusion of the whole matter going before, and hath reference not only to the predictions concerning Gog and Magog, but to all the prophecies of this book concerning the captivity of the house of Israel, and then concerning their restoration and return out of their captivity.

First. God will let the heathen know the meaning of his people's troubles, and rectify their mistake concerning them who took occasion from the troubles of Israel to reproach the God of Israel as unable to protect them, and untrue to his covenant with them. When God, upon their reformation and return to him, turned again their captivity, and brought them back to their own land, and, upon their perseverance in their reformation, wrought such great salvations for them as that from the attempts of Gog upon them, then it will be made to appear, even to the heathen, that will but consider and compare things, that there was no ground at all for their reflection; that Israel went into captivity, not because God could not protect them, but because they had by sin forfeited his favour, and thrown themselves out of his protection; ver. 23, 24, "The heathen shall know that the house of Israel went into captivity for their iniquity," that iniquity which they learned from the heathen their neighbours, because they trespassed against God. That was the true reason why God hid his face from them, and "gave them into the hand of their enemies." It was "according to their uncleanness, and according to their transgressions." Now the evincing of this will not only silence their reflections on God, but will redound greatly to his honour. When the troubles of God's people are over, and we see the end of them, we shall better understand them than we did at first. And it will appear much for the glory of God when the world is made to know, 1. That God punisheth sin even in his own people, because he hates it most in those that are nearest and dearest to him, Am. iii. 2. It is the praise of justice to be impartial. 2. That when God gives up his people for a prey, it is to correct them and reform them, not to gratify their enemies, Isa. x. 7; xlii. 24. Let not them therefore exalt themselves. 3. That no sooner do God's people humble themselves under the rod but he returns in mercy to them.

Secondly. God will give his own people to know what great favour he has in store for them, notwithstanding the troubles he had brought them into; ver. 25, 26, "Now will I bring again the captivity of Jacob."

1. Why now? Now God will "have mercy upon the whole house of Israel," 1st. Because it is time for him to stand up for his own glory, which suffers in their sufferings; Now will I "be jealous for my holy name," that that may no longer be reproached. 2nd. Because now they repent of their sins; they have borne their shame and all their trespasses. When sinners repent and take shame to themselves, God will be reconciled and put honour upon them. It is particularly pleasing to God that these penitents look a great way back in their penitential reflections, and are ashamed of all their trespasses which they were guilty of "when they dwelt safely in their land, and none made them afraid." The remembrance of the mercies they enjoyed in their own land, and the Divine protection they were under there, shall be improved as an aggravation of the sins they committed in that land. They dwelt safely, and might have continued to dwell so, and none should have given them any disquiet or disturbance if they had continued in the way of their duty; nay, therefore they trespassed because they dwelt safely. Outward safety is often a cause of inward security, and that is an inlet to all sin, Ps. lxxiii. Now this they are willing to bear the blame of, and acknowledge that God hath justly brought them into a land of trouble, where every one makes them afraid, because they had trespassed against him in a land of peace, where none made them afraid. And when they thus humble themselves under humbling providences God will bring again their captivity.

2. What then? When God has gathered them out of their enemies' hands, and brought them home again, 1st. Then God will have the praise of it. I will be "sanctified in them in the sight of many nations," ver. 27. As God was reproached in the reproach they were under during their captivity, so he will be sanctified in their reformation, and the making of them a holy people again; and will be glorified in their restoration, and the making of them a happy, xxxix. 11. This verse is not all clear. The valley where Gog and his host shall be buried is regarded as on the east of the sea, i.e., we suppose, the Dead Sea. The passengers, not their noses, are to be stopped by the burial threatened. Some think the passengers are the enemies who are buried. The entire context to verse 16 involves questions of interpretation too numerous to be discussed in these brief notes. Dr. Fairbairn thus summarises the verses: "The whole people of the land are engaged burying the corpses in the grave-valley for seven months (the seven, as before, the symbol of sacredness and completeness); then at the end of the seven months persons are selected to the special and regular work of going through the land to search everywhere for the skeletons of those who might still have been left—the stragglers of the great host. And when they found any such skeletons they were to set up a mark, that the buryers might go and fetch them to the proper burying-ground. The whole denotes the minute care and business-like alacrity with which the glorious people again. 2nd. Then they shall have the benefit of it; ver. 28, "They shall know that I am the Lord their God." Note, The providences of God concerning his people that are designed for their good have the grace of God going along with them to teach them to eye God as the Lord, and their God in all, and then they do them good. They shall eye him as the Lord, and their God, First. In their calamities; that it was he that "caused them to be led into captivity," and therefore they must not only submit to his will, but endeavour to answer his end in it. Secondly. In their comfort; that it is he that has "gathered them to their own land," and left none of them among the heathen. Note, By the variety of events that are concerning us, if we look up to God in all, we may come to acquaint ourselves better with his various attributes and designs. 3rd. Then God and they will never part, ver. 29. First. God will pour out his Spirit upon them, to prevent their departures from him, and returns to folly again, and to keep them close to their duty. And then, Secondly. He will never hide his face any more from them, will never suspend his favour as he had done. He will never turn from doing them good; and, in order to that, he will effectually provide that they shall never turn from doing him service. Note, The indwelling of the Spirit is an infallible pledge of the continuance of God's favour. He will hide his face no more from those on whom he has poured out his Spirit. When therefore we pray that God would never cast us away from his presence, we must as earnestly pray that, in order to that, he would never take his Holy Spirit away from us, Ps. li. 11.

CHAPTER XL.

The waters of the sanctuary which this prophet saw in vision, ch. xlvii. 1., are a proper representation of this prophecy. Hitherto the waters have been sometimes but to the ankles, in other places to the knees, or to the loins, but now the waters are risen, and are become a river which cannot be passed over. Here is one continual vision, beginning at this chapter to the end of the book, which is justly looked upon to be one of the most difficult portions of scripture in all the book of God. The Jews will not allow any to read it till they are thirty years old, and tell those who do read it, that, though they cannot understand every thing in it, yet when Elias comes he will explain it. Many commentators, both ancient and modern, have owned themselves at a loss what to make of it, and what use to make of it: but because it is hard to be understood we must not therefore throw it by, but humbly search concerning it, get as far as we can into it, and as much as we can out of it; and when we despair of satisfaction in every difficulty we meet with, bless God that our salvation doth not depend upon it, but things necessary are plain enough, and wait till God shall reveal even this unto us. These chapters are the more to be regarded, because the two last chapters of the Revelation seem to have a plain allusion to them, as Rev. xx. has to the foregoing prophecy of Gog and Magog. Here is the vision of a glorious temple in this chapter, and ch. xli. xlii.; of God's taking possession of it, ch. xliii.; orders concerning the priests that are to minister in this temple, ch. xliv.; the divisions of the land, what portion should be allotted for the sanctuary, what for the city, and what for the prince, both in his government of the people and his worship of God, ch. xlv.; and farther instructions for him and the people, ch. xlvi.; and, after the vision of the holy waters, we have the borders of the holy land, and the portions assigned to the tribes, and the dimensions and gates of the holy city, ch. xlvii., xlviii. Some make this to represent what had been during the flourishing state of the Jewish church; how glorious Solomon's temple was in its best days, that the captives might see what they had lost by sin, and might be the more humbled. But that seems not probable. The general scope of it I take to be, I. To assure the captives that they should not only return to their land, and be settled there, which had been often promised in the foregoing chapters, but that they should have, and therefore should be encouraged, to build another temple, which God would own, and where he would meet them, and bless them. That the ordinances of worship should be revived, and the sacred priesthood should there attend; and, though they should not have a king to live in such splendour as formerly, yet they should have a prince or ruler (who is often spoken of in this vision) that should countenance the worship of God amongst them, and should himself be an example of diligent attendance upon it; and that prince, priests, and people, should have a very comfortable settlement and subsistence in their own land. II. To direct them to look farther than all this, and to expect the coming of the Messiah, who had before been prophesied of under the name of David, because he was the man that projected the building of the temple; and who should set up a spiritual temple, even the gospel church, the glory of which should far exceed that of Solomon's temple, and which should continue to the end of time. And the dimensions of these visionary buildings being so large, the new temple bigger than all the old Jerusalem, and the new Jerusalem bigger than all the land of Canaan, plainly intimates, as Dr. Lightfoot observes, that these things cannot be literally, but must be spiritually, understood. And the gospel temple erected by Christ and his apostles was so closely connected with the second material temple, was erected so carefully just at the time when that fell into decay, that it might be ready to receive its glories when it resigned them, it was proper enough that they should both be referred to in one and the same vision. Under the type and figure of a temple and altar, priests and sacrifices, is foreshewed the spiritual worship that should be performed in gospel times more agreeably to the nature both of God and man, and that perfected at last in the kingdom of glory, in which perhaps these visions will have their full accomplishment; and, some think, in some happy and glorious state of the gospel church on this side heaven, in the latter days. In this chapter we have, I. A general account of this vision of the temple and city, ver. 1—4. II. A particular account of it entered upon, and a description given, 1. Of the out-wall, ver. 5; 2. Of the east gate, ver. 6—19; 3. Of the north gate, ver. 20—23; 4. Of the south gate, ver. 24—31; and the chambers, and other appurtenances belonging to these gates; 5. Of the inner court, both towards the east and towards the south, ver. 32—38; 6. Of the tables, ver. 39—43; 7. Of the lodgings for the singers and the priests, ver. 44—47; 8. Of the porch of the house, ver. 48, 49.

IN the five and twentieth year of our captivity, in the beginning of the year, in the tenth day of the month, in the fourteenth year after that the city was smitten, in the selfsame day the hand of the LORD was upon me, and brought me thither. 2 In the visions of God brought he me into the land of Israel, and set me upon a very high mountain, by which was as the frame of a city on the south. 3 And he brought me thither, and, behold, there was a man, whose appearance was like the appearance of brass, with a line of flax in his hand, and a measuring reed; and he stood in the gate. 4 And the man said unto me,

Son of man, behold with thine eyes, and hear with thine ears,
And set thine heart upon all that I shall shew thee;
For to the intent that I might shew them unto thee
Art thou brought hither:
Declare all that thou seest to the house of Israel.

Here is, First. The date of this vision. It was in the twenty-fifth year of Ezekiel's captivity, ver. 1, which some compute to be the thirty-third year of the first captivity, and is here said to be the "fourteenth year after the city was smitten." See how seasonably the clearest and fullest prospects of their deliverance were given them, when they were in the depths of their distress; and an assurance of the return of the morning when they were in the midnight of their captivity; then "the hand of the Lord was upon me, and brough me thither" to Jerusalem. Now it was in ruins, desolate and deserted, piteous sight to the prophet.

Secondly. The scene where it was laid. The prophet was brought "in the visions of God to the land of Israel," ver. 2. And it was not the first time he had been brought thither in vision; we had him carried to Jerusalem to see it in its iniquity and shame, ch. viii. 3, here he is carried thither to have a pleasing prospect of it in its glory, though its present aspect, now it was quite depopulated, was dismal. He was set "upon a very high mountain," as Moses upon the top of Pisgah, to view the land which was now a second time a land of promise, not yet in possession. From the top of this mountain he saw "as the frame of a city," the plan and model of it; but this city was a temple as large as a city. The New Jerusalem, Rev. xxi. 22, had no temple therein; this here is all temple, which comes much to the same. It is a city for men to dwell in; it is a temple for God to dwell in; for in the church on earth God dwells with men, in that in heaven men dwell with God. Both these are framed in the counsel of God,—framed by Infinite Wisdom, and all very good.

Thirdly. The particular discoveries of this city, (which he had at first a general view of,) were made to him by "a man whose appearance was like the appearance of brass," ver. 3; not a created angel, but Jesus Christ, who should be found in fashion as a man, that he might both discover and build the gospel temple. He brought him to this city; for it is through Christ that we have both acquaintance with, and access to, the benefits and privileges of God's house; he it is that "shall build the temple of the Lord," Zec. vi. 13. His appearing like brass speaks both his brightness and his strength. John in vision saw "his feet like unto fine brass," Rev. i. 15.

Fourthly. The dimensions of this city or temple, and the several parts of it, were taken with a line of flax and a measuring reed or rod, ver. 3, as carpenters have both their line and a wooden measure. The temple of God is built by line and rule, and those that would let others into the knowledge of it must do it by that line and rule. The church is formed according to the Scripture, the pattern in the Mount. That is the line and the measuring reed that is in the hand of Christ. With that doctrine and laws ought to be measured, and examined by that; for then peace is upon the Israel of God when they walk according to that rule.

Fifthly. Directions are here given to the prophet to receive this revelation from the Lord, and transmit it pure and entire to the church, ver. 4. 1. He must carefully observe everything that was said and done in this vision. His attention is raised and engaged; ver. 4, "Behold with thine eyes" all that is shewed thee; do not only see it, but look intently upon it; and "hear with thine ears" all that is said to thee, diligently hearken to it, and be sure to "set thine heart upon it;" attend with a fixedness of thought and a close application of mind. What we see of the works of God, and what we hear of the word of God, will do us no good unless we set our hearts upon it, as those that reckon ourselves nearly concerned in it, and expect advantage to our souls by it. 2. He must faithfully declare it to the house of Israel, that they may have the comfort of it; therefore he receives that he may give. Thus the revelation of Jesus Christ was lodged in the hands of John that he might signify it to the churches, Rev. i. 1. And, because he is to declare it as a message from God, he must therefore be fully apprised of it himself, and much affected with it. Note, Those who are to preach God's word to others ought to study it well themselves, and set their hearts upon it. Now the reason given why he must both observe it himself and declare it to the house of Israel is, because to this intent he is brought hither, and has it shewed him. Note, When the things of God are shewn us it concerns us to consider to what intent they are shewn us; and when we are sitting under the ministry of the word to consider to what intent we are brought thither, that we may answer the end of our coming, and may not receive the grace of God in shewing us such things in vain.

5 And behold a wall on the outside of the house round about, and in the man's hand a measuring reed of six cubits long by the cubit and an hand breadth: so he measured the breadth of the building, one reed; and the height, one reed. 6 Then came he unto the gate which looketh toward the east, and went up the stairs thereof, and measured the threshold of the gate, which was one reed broad; and the other threshold of the gate, which was one reed broad. 7 And every little chamber was one reed long, and one reed broad; and between the little chambers were five cubits; and the threshold of the gate by the porch of the gate within was one reed. 8 He measured also the porch of the gate within, one reed. 9 Then measured he the porch

xxxix. 20. Just as "horse" is used for "horsemen" from time to time even among us, so "chariots" in this place seem to denote "charioteers." This great symbolical feast is here placed out of its natural order, which would be before and not after the seven months' burying. That the entire prediction respecting Gog is symbolical of a great conflict between the powers of good and of evil is admitted by the most judicious commentators, who regard the corresponding passage in Rev. xx. as to some extent, though not absolutely, parallel. The endeavour to impose a literal signification on this wonderful prophecy must be an ignominious failure before any common-sense tribunal. The hyperbole is so manifest, and the imagery on so gigantic a scale, that we must treat the whole as figurative. Of the suggestions which have been made as to the fulfilment of various portions of the prophecy we cannot speak.

of the gate, eight cubits; and the posts thereof, two cubits; and the porch of the gate was inward. 10 And the little chambers of the gate eastward were three on this side, and three on that side; they three were of one measure: and the posts had one measure on this side and on that side. 11 And he measured the breadth of the entry of the gate, ten cubits; and the length of the gate, thirteen cubits. 12 The space also before the little chambers was one cubit on this side, and the space was one cubit on that side: and the little chambers were six cubits on this side, and six cubits on that side. 13 He measured then the gate from the roof of one little chamber to the roof of another: the breadth was five and twenty cubits, door against door. 14 He made also posts of threescore cubits, even unto the post of the court round about the gate. 15 And from the face of the gate of the entrance unto the face of the porch of the inner gate were fifty cubits. 16 And there were narrow windows to the little chambers, and to their posts within the gate round about, and likewise to the arches: and windows were round about inward: and upon each post were palm trees. 17 Then brought he me into the outward court, and, lo, there were chambers, and a pavement made for the court round about: thirty chambers were upon the pavement. 18 And the pavement by the side of the gates over against the length of the gates was the lower pavement. 19 Then he measured the breadth from the forefront of the lower gate unto the forefront of the inner court without, an hundred cubits eastward and northward. 20 And the gate of the outward court that looked toward the north, he measured the length thereof, and the breadth thereof. 21 And the little chambers thereof were three on this side and three on that side; and the posts thereof and the arches thereof were after the measure of the first gate: the length thereof was fifty cubits, and the breadth five and twenty cubits. 22 And their windows, and their arches, and their palm trees, were after the measure of the gate that looketh toward the east; and they went up unto it by seven steps; and the arches thereof were before them. 23 And the gate of the inner court was over against the gate toward the north, and toward the east; and he measured from gate to gate an hundred cubits. 24 After that he brought me toward the south, and behold a gate toward the south: and he measured the posts thereof and the arches thereof according to these measures.

OBELISKS IN FRONT OF THE GATE AT THE TEMPLE OF LUXOR.

25 And there were windows in it and in the arches thereof round about, like those windows: the length was fifty cubits, and the breadth five and twenty cubits. 26 And there were seven steps to go up to it, and the arches thereof were before them: and it had palm trees, one on this side, and another on that side, upon the posts thereof.

The measuring reed, which was in the hand of the surveyor-general, was mentioned before, ver. 3. Here we are told, ver. 5, what was the exact length of it, which must be observed, because the house was measured by it. It was six cubits long, reckoning, not by the common cubit, but the cubit of the sanctuary, the sacred cubit, by which it was fit this holy house should be measured, and that was a hand-breadth, that is, four inches longer than the common cubit. The common cubit was eighteen inches, this twenty-two: see ch. xliii. 13. Yet some of the critics contend that this measuring reed was but six common cubits in length, and one hand-breadth added to the whole. The former seems more probable. Here is an account,

First. Of the outer wall of the house, which compassed it round, which was three yards thick, and three yards high; which notes the separation between the church and the world on every side, and the Divine protection which the church is under. If a wall of this vast thickness will not secure it, God himself will be a wall of fire round about it. Whoever attacks it, it is at their peril.

Secondly. Of the several gates, with the chambers adjoining to them. Here is no mention of the outer court of all, which was called the court of the Gentiles. Some think because in gospel times there should be such a vast confluence of Gentiles to the church that their court should be left unmea-

xl. 1. From this point to the end of the book we have a prediction which is one of the most curious and yet one of the most obscure in the Bible. There are frequent difficulties in the very words, but the difficulties of interpretation and of intention are more numerous and important. Hence, of course, expositors vary very much, and the wisest often feel called on to speak with modest reserve. Dr. S. Davidson says the prophecy may be explained in three ways—literally spiritually, or partly the one and the other at the same time. He objects to the second of these, because of the evangelical turn it gives to the passage. He objects to the third, because he does not believe the prophet predicted or intended to predict a Jewish institution and a Christian one at the same time. He accepts the first, admitting many figurative elements, but saying that "all the fulfilment is past, and nothing more need be expected." There are many Christians who think that the prophecy received a preliminary and partial accomplishment sured, to signify that the worshippers in that court should be unnumbered, Rev. vii. 9, 11, 12.

1. He begins with the east gate, because that was the usual way of entering into the lower end of the temple, the holy of holies being at the west end, in opposition to the idolatrous heathen, that worshipped towards the east. Now in the account of this gate observe, 1st. That he went up to it by stairs, ver. 6; for the gospel church was exalted above that of the Old Testament, and when we go to worship God we must ascend: so is the call, Rev. iv. 1. Come up hither; Sursum corda,—'Up with your hearts.' 2nd. That the chambers adjoining to the gates were but little chambers about ten feet square, ver. 7; these were for those to lodge in who attended the service of the house. And it becomes such who are made spiritual priests to God to content themselves with little chambers, and not to seek great things to themselves. So that we may but have a place within the verge of God's court we have reason to be thankful, though it be in a little chamber, a mean apartment, though we be but doorkeepers there. 3rd. The chambers, as they were each of them four-square, noting their stability and due proportion, and their exact agreement with the rule, for they were each of them one reed long and one reed broad, so they were all of one measure, that there might be an equality among the attendants on the service of the house. 4th. The chambers were very many; for in our Father's house there are many mansions, Jno. xiv. 2, in his house above and in that here on earth. In the secret of his tabernacle shall those be hid, and in a safe pavilion, whose desire is to dwell in the house of the Lord all the days of their life, Ps. xxvii. 4, 5. Some make these chambers to represent the particular congregations of believers which are parts of the great temple, the universal church, which are and must be framed by the Scripture line and rule, and which Jesus Christ takes a measure of, that is, takes cognizance of, for he walks in the midst of the seven golden candlesticks. 5th. It is said, ver. 14, "He made also the posts." He that now measured them was the same that made them; for Christ is the builder of his church, and therefore is best able to give us the knowledge of it; and his reducing them to the rule and standard is called his making of them, for no account is made of them farther than they agree with that; "To the law and to the testimony." 6th. Here are posts of sixty cubits, which some think was literally fulfilled, when Cyrus, in his edict for rebuilding the temple at Jerusalem, ordered that the height thereof should be sixty cubits, that is, thirty yards and more, Ezr. vi. 3. 7th. Here were windows to the little chambers, and windows to the posts and arches, that is, to the cloisters below, and windows round about, ver. 16, to signify the light from heaven with which the church is illuminated. Divine revelation is let into it for instruction, direction, and comfort to those that dwell in God's house; light to work by, light to walk by, light to see themselves and one another by. There were lights to the little chambers; even the least, and least considerable parts and members of the church, shall have light afforded them; "All thy children shall be taught of the Lord." But they are narrow windows, as those in the temple, 1 Kin. vi. 4. The discoveries made to the church on earth are but narrow and scanty compared with what shall be in the future state, when we shall no longer see through a glass darkly. 8th. Divers courts are here spoken of, an outermost of all, then an outer court, then an inner, and then the innermost of all, into which the priests only entered, which some think may put us in mind 'of the diversities of gifts, and graces, and offices, in the several members of Christ's mystical body here, as also of the several degrees of glory in the courts and mansions of heaven, as there are stars in several spheres, and stars of several magnitudes in the fixed firmament,' Engl. Annot. Some draw nearer to God than others, and have a more intimate acquaintance with Divine things; but to a child of God a day in any of his courts is better than a thousand elsewhere. These courts had porches or piazzas round them, for the shelter of those that attended in them from wind and weather; for when we are in the way of our duty to God we may believe ourselves to be under his special protection; that he will graciously provide for us, nay, that he will himself be to us a covert from the storm and tempest, Isa. iv. 5, 6. 9th. On the posts were palm-trees engraven, ver. 16, to signify that the righteous shall flourish like the palm-tree in the courts of God's house, Ps. xcii. 12. The more they are depressed with the burthen of affliction the more strongly do they grow, as they say of the palm-tree. It likewise intimates the saints' victory and triumph over their spiritual enemies. They have palms in their hands, Rev. vii. 4; but, lest they should drop these, or have them snatched out of their hands, they are here engraven upon the posts of the temple, as perpetual monuments of their honour; "Thanks be to God who always causeth us to triumph." Nay, believers shall themselves be made pillars in the temple of our God, and shall go no more out, and shall have his name engraven on them, which will be their brightest ornament and honour, Rev. iii. 12. 10th. Notice is here taken of the pavement of the court, ver. 17, 18. The word intimates that the pavement was made of porphyry stone, which was of the colour of burning coals; for the brightest and most sparkling glories of this world should be put and kept under our feet when we draw near to God, and are attending upon him. The stars are, as it were, the burning coals, or stones of a fiery colour, with which the pavement of God's celestial temple is laid; and if the pavement of the court be so bright and glittering, how glorious must we conclude the mansions of that house to be!

2. The gates that looked towards the north, ver. 20, and towards the south, ver. 24, with their appurtenances, are much the same with that towards the east, after the measure of the first gate, ver. 21. But the description is repeated very particularly. And thus largely was the structure of the tabernacle related in Exodus, and of the temple, in the books of the Kings and Chronicles, to signify the special notice God doth take, and his ministers should take, of all that belong to his church. His delight is in them, his eye is upon them; he knows all that are his, all his living temples, and all that belongs to them. Observe, 1st. This temple had not only a gate toward the east, to let into it the children of the east, that were famous for their wealth and wisdom; but it had a gate to the north, and another to the south, for the admission of the poorer and less civilized nations. The New Jerusalem has twelve gates, three towards each quarter of the world, Rev. xxi. 13; for many shall come from all parts to sit down there, Mat. viii. 11. 2nd. To those gates they went up by seven steps, ver. 22—26, which, as some observe, may remind us of the necessity of advancing in grace and holiness, adding one grace to another, going from step to step, from strength to strength, still pressing forwards towards perfection—upwards, upwards towards heaven, the temple above.

27 And there was a gate in the inner court toward the south: and he measured from gate to gate toward the south an hundred cubits. 28 And he brought me to the inner court by the south gate: and he measured the south gate according to these measures: 29 And the little chambers thereof, and the posts thereof, and the arches thereof, according to these measures: and there were windows in it and in the arches thereof round about: it was fifty cubits long, and five and twenty cubits broad. 30 And the arches round about were five and twenty cubits long, and five cubits broad. 31 And the arches thereof were toward the utter court; and palm trees were upon the posts thereof: and the going up to it had eight steps. 32 And he brought me into the inner court toward the east: and he measured the gate according to these measures. 33 And the little chambers thereof, and the posts thereof, and the arches thereof, were according to these measures: and there were windows therein and in the arches thereof round about: it was fifty cubits long, and five and twenty cubits broad. 34 And the arches thereof were toward the outward court; and palm trees were upon the posts thereof, on this side, and on that side: and the going up to it had eight steps. 35 And he brought me to the north gate, and measured it according to these measures; 36 The little chambers thereof, the posts thereof, and the arches thereof, and the windows to it round about: the length was fifty cubits, and the breadth five and twenty cubits. 37 And the posts thereof were toward the utter court; and palm trees were upon the posts thereof, on this side, and on that side: and the going up to it had eight steps. 38 And the chambers and the entries thereof were by the posts of the gates, where they washed the burnt offering.

In these verses we have a delineation of the "inner court." The survey of the outer court ended with the south side of it; this of the inner court begins with the south side, ver. 27, proceeds to the east, ver. 32, and so to the north, ver. 35, for there is no gate, either of the outer or inner court, towards the west. It should seem that in Solomon's temple there were gates westward, for we find porters towards the west, 1 Chr. ix. 24; xxvi. 18; but Josephus saith that in the second temple there was no gate on the west side. Observe,

First. These gates into the inner court were exactly uniform with those into the outer court; the dimensions the same, the chambers adjoining the same, and the galleries or rows round the court the same, the very engraving on the posts the same. The work of grace and its workings are the same, for substance, in grown Christians that they are in young beginners, only that the former are got so much nearer their perfection. The faith of all the saints is alike precious, though it be not alike strong. There is a great resemblance between one child of God and another; for "all they are brethren," and bear the same image.

Secondly. The ascent into the outer court at each gate was by seven steps, but the ascent into the inner court at each gate was by eight steps. This is expressly taken notice of, ver. 31, 34, 37, to signify that the nearer we approach to God the more we should rise above this world and the things of it. The people that worshipped in the outer court must rise seven steps above other people, but the priests that attended in the inner court must rise eight steps above them, must exceed them at least one step more than they exceed other people.

after the captivity, but that it is to receive a very full literal realisation hereafter under the Messiah. Other theories more or less complex have been advanced, but need not be enumerated. No doubt the first duty of a critic is to ascertain the meaning of the words as words, then to discover whether a literal accomplishment is practicable, and then to seek for some application which is in harmony with the analogy of faith. One thing may here be noted, without prejudging the inspired intention of this wonderful vision, and it is that the literal fulfilment of a good many of its details would practically involve a geological catastrophe and a consequent transformation of the physical features of Palestine and regions round about. One other note also must be made, and it is that no such geological catastrophe and geographical change is contemplated, because localities are treated of as if unchanged. This is an incongruity, and it is not one of the least important, though not one of the most conspicuous, for there are others which will strike the casual reader.

39 And in the porch of the gate were two tables on this side, and two tables on that side, to slay thereon the burnt offering and the sin offering and the trespass offering. 40 And at the side without, as one goeth up to the entry of the north gate, were two tables; and on the other side, which was at the porch of the gate, were two tables. 41 Four tables were on this side, and four tables on that side, by the side of the gate; eight tables, whereupon they slew their sacrifices. 42 And the four tables were of hewn stone for the burnt offering, of a cubit and an half long, and a cubit and an half broad, and one cubit high: whereupon also they laid the instruments wherewith they slew the burnt offering and the sacrifice. 43 And within were hooks, an hand broad, fastened round about: and upon the tables was the flesh of the offering. 44 And without the inner gate were the chambers of the singers in the inner court, which was at the side of the north gate; and their prospect was toward the south: one at the side of the east gate having the prospect toward the north. 45 And he said unto me, This chamber, whose prospect is toward the south, is for the priests, the keepers of the charge of the house. 46 And the chamber whose prospect is toward the north is for the priests, the keepers of the charge of the altar: these are the sons of Zadok among the sons of Levi, which come near to the LORD to minister unto him. 47 So he measured the court, an hundred cubits long, and an hundred cubits broad, foursquare; and the altar that was before the house. 48 And he brought me to the porch of the house, and measured each post of the porch, five cubits on this side, and five cubits on that side: and the breadth of the gate was three cubits on this side, and three cubits on that side. 49 The length of the porch was twenty cubits, and the breadth eleven cubits; and he brought me by the steps whereby they went up to it: and there were pillars by the posts, one on this side, and another on that side.

In these verses we have an account,

First. Of the tables that were in the porch of the gates of the "inner court." We find no description of the altars of burnt offerings in the midst of that court till ch. xliii. 13. But, because the one altar under the law was to be exchanged for a multitude of tables under the Gospel, here is early notice taken of the tables at our entrance into the inner court; for till we come to partake of the table of the Lord we are but professors at large; our admission to that is our entrance into the inner court. But in this gospel temple we meet with no altar, till after the glory of the Lord has taken possession of it, for Christ is our altar, that sanctifies every gift. Here were eight tables provided, whereon to slay the sacrifices, ver. 41. We read not of any tables for this purpose, either in the tabernacle or in Solomon's temple; but here they are provided to intimate the multitude of spiritual sacrifices that should be brought to God's house in gospel times, and the multitude of hands that should be employed in offering up those sacrifices. Here were the shambles for the altar; here were the dressers on which they laid the flesh of the sacrifice, the knives with which they cut it up, and the hooks on which they hung it up, that it might be ready to be offered on the altar, ver. 43, and there also they washed the burnt offerings, ver. 38; to intimate that, before we draw near to God's altar, we must have every thing in readiness, must wash our hands, our hearts, those spiritual sacrifices, and so compass God's altar.

Secondly. The use that some of the chambers mentioned before were put to. Some were for the singers, ver. 44. It should seem they were first provided for before any other that attended this temple service, to intimate not only that singing of psalms should still continue a gospel ordinance, but that the Gospel should furnish all that embrace it with abundant matter for joy and praise, and give them occasion to break forth into singing, which is often foretold concerning gospel times, Ps. xcvi. 1; xcviii. 1. Christians should be singers; "Blessed are they that dwell in God's house," they will be "still praising him." 2. Others were for the priests, both those that kept the charge of the house to it, and to see that none came into it to pollute it, and to keep it in good repair, ver. 45, and those that kept "the charge of the altar," ver. 46, that "came near to the Lord to minister unto him." God will find convenient lodging for all his servants. Those that do the work of his house shall enjoy the comforts of it.

Thirdly. Of the inner court, the court of the priests, which was fifty yards square, ver. 47. The altar that was "before the house" was placed in the midst of this court, over against the three gates, which, standing in a direct line with the three gates of the outer court, when the gates were set open all the people in the outer court might, through them, be spectators of the service done at the altar. Christ is both our altar and our sacrifice, to whom we must look with an eye of faith in all our approaches to God, and he is salvation in the midst of the earth, Ps. lxxiv. 12, to be looked unto from all quarters.

Fourthly. Of the porch of the house. The temple is called the house emphatically, as if no other house were worthy to be called so. Before this house there was a porch, to teach us not to rush hastily and inconsiderately into the presence of God, but gradually, that is, gravely, and with solemnity, passing first through the outer court, then the inner, then the porch, ere we enter into the house. Between this porch and the altar was a place where the priests used to pray, Joel ii. 17. In the porch, besides the posts on which the doors were hung, there were pillars, probably for state and ornament, like Jachin and Boaz, ("He will establish; in him is strength,") ver. 49. In the gospel church every thing is strong and firm, and every thing ought to be kept in its place, and to be done decently and in order.

CHAPTER XLI.

An account was given of the porch of the house in the close of the foregoing chapter; this brings us to the temple itself, the description of which here given creates much difficulty in the critical expositors, and occasions differences among them. Those must consult them who are nice in their inquiries into the meaning of the particulars of this delineation; it shall suffice us to observe, I. The dimensions of the house: the posts of it, ver. 1; the door, ver. 2; the wall and the side-chambers, ver. 5, 6; the foundations and wall of the chambers, and their doors, ver. 8—11; the house itself, ver. 13. II. The dimensions of the oracle, or most holy place, ver. 3, 4. III. An account of another building over against the separate place, ver. 12—15. IV. The manner of the building of the house, ver. 7, 16, 17. V. The ornaments of the house, ver. 18—20. VI. The altar of incense, and the table, ver. 22. VII. The doors between the temple and the oracle, ver. 23, 26. There is so much difference, both in the terms and in the rules of architecture, between one age and another, one place and another, that it ought not to be any stumblingblock to us that there is so much in these descriptions dark and hard to be understood, about the meaning of which the learned are not agreed. To one not skilled in mathematics the mathematical description of a modern structure would be scarce intelligible; and yet to a common carpenter or mason among the Jews at that time we may suppose all this, in the literal sense of it, was easy enough.

AFTERWARD he brought me to the temple, and measured the posts, six cubits broad on the one side, and six cubits broad on the other side, which was the breadth of the tabernacle. 2 And the breadth of the door was ten cubits; and the sides of the door were five cubits on the one side, and five cubits on the other side: and he measured the length thereof, forty cubits: and the breadth, twenty cubits. 3 Then went he inward, and measured the post of the door, two cubits; and the door, six cubits; and the breadth of the door, seven cubits. 4 So he measured the length thereof, twenty cubits; and the breadth, twenty cubits, before the temple: and he said unto me, This is the most holy place. 5 After he measured the wall of the house, six cubits; and the breadth of every side chamber, four cubits, round about the house on every side. 6 And the side chambers were three, one over another, and thirty in order; and they entered into the wall which was of the house for the side chambers round about, that they might have hold, but they had not hold in the wall of the house. 7 And there was an enlarging, and a winding about still upward to the side chambers: for the winding about of the house went still upward round about the house: therefore the breadth of the house was still upward, and so increased from the lowest chamber to the highest by the midst. 8 I saw also the height of the house round about: the foundations of the side chambers were a full reed of six great cubits. 9 The thickness of the wall, which was for the side chamber without, was five cubits: and that which was left was the place of the side chambers that were with xl. 2—5. The "very high mountain" was an ideal one, or Zion idealised. Upon it was "as it were the structure of a city;" but as we gather from verse 5 and elsewhere, it was one "house" or temple, we are to understand a building of extensive proportions, and so elaborate that it looked like a city. The man seen in the vision had a flaxen line in his hand, and a reed or rod. The proportions of the line are not given, but the rod was one of six cubits; the cubit here being one-sixth larger than the common one, or fully two feet. We cannot determine all the details here and in the following verses Our own translators have not always hit the clear signification, and it is no wonder that numerous technical expressions have baffled the skill of ordinary interpreters. The difficulties of exposition are, however, more numerous than those of translation.

xl. 6. The Hebrew says nothing about "the other threshold," but runs thus, "and he measured the threshold of the gate, one reed broad, even the one threshold was one reed broad." The idea is 10 And between the chambers was the wideness of twenty cubits round about the house on every side. 11 And the doors of the side chambers were toward the place that was left, one door toward the north, and another door toward the south: and the breadth of the place that was left was five cubits round about.

We are still attending a prophet that is under the conduct of an angel, and therefore attend with reverence, though we are often at a loss to know both what this is, and what it is to us. Observe here,

First. After the prophet has observed the courts he was at length brought to the temple, ver. 1. If we diligently attend to the instructions given us in the plainer parts of religion, and profit by them, we shall be led farther into an acquaintance with the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven. They that are willing to dwell in God's courts shall at length be brought into his temple. Ezekiel was himself a priest, but by the iniquity and calamity of the times was cut short of his birthright privilege of ministering in the temple; but God makes up the loss to him by introducing him into this prophetical, evangelical, celestial temple, and employing him to transmit a description of it to the church, in which he was dignified above all the rest of his order.

Secondly. When our Lord Jesus spoke of the destroying of this temple, which his hearers understood of this second temple at Jerusalem, he spake of the temple of his body, Jno. ii. 19, 21; and with good reason might he speak so ambiguously, when Ezekiel's vision had a joint respect to them both together, including also his mystical body the church, which is called the house of God, 1 Tim. iii. 15, and all the members of that body, which are living temples, in whom the Spirit dwells.

Thirdly. The very posts of this temple, the doorposts, were as far one from the other, and consequently the door was as wide, as the whole breadth of the tabernacle of Moses, ver. 1, namely, twelve cubits, Ex. xxvi. 16, 22, 25. In comparison with what had been under the law we may say that wide is the gate which leads into the church, the ceremonial law, that wall of partition which had so much straitened the gate, being taken down.

Fourthly. The most holy place was an exact square, twenty cubits each way, ver. 4. For the New Jerusalem is exactly foursquare, Rev. xxi. 16, noting its stability; for we look for a city that cannot be moved.

Fifthly. The upper stories were larger than the lower, ver. 7. The walls of the temple were six cubits thick at the bottom, five in the middle story, and four in the highest, which gave room to enlarge the chambers the higher they went; but care was taken that the timber might have fast hold. Though God builds high, yet he builds firm, yet so as not to weaken one part for the strengthening another; they had hold, but not "in the wall of the house." By this spreading gradually, the side chambers that were on "the height of the house," that is, in the uppermost story of all, were six cubits, whereas the lowest were but four; they gained a cubit every story. The higher we build up ourselves in our most holy faith, the more should our hearts, those living temples, be enlarged.

12 Now the building that was before the separate place at the end toward the west was seventy cubits broad; and the wall of the building was five cubits thick round about, and the length thereof ninety cubits. 13 So he measured the house, an hundred cubits long; and the separate place, and the building, with the walls thereof, an hundred cubits long; 14 Also the breadth of the face of the house, and of the separate place toward the east, an hundred cubits. 15 And he measured the length of the building over against the separate place which was behind it, and the galleries thereof on the one side and on the other side, an hundred cubits, with the inner temple, and the porches of the court; 16 The door posts, and the narrow windows, and the galleries round about on their three stories, over against the door, cieled with wood round about, and from the ground up to the windows, and the windows were covered; 17 To that above the door, even unto the inner house, and without, and by all the wall round about within and without, by measure. 18 And it was made with cherubims and palm trees, so that a palm tree was between a cherub and a cherub; and every cherub had two faces; 19 So that the face of a man was toward the palm tree on the one side, and the face of a young lion toward the palm tree on the other side: it was made through all the house round about. 20 From the ground unto above the door were cherubims and palm trees made, and on the wall of the temple. 21 The posts of the temple were squared, and the face of the sanctuary; the appearance of the one as the appearance of the other. 22 The altar of wood was three cubits high, and the length thereof two cubits; and the corners thereof, and the length thereof, and the walls thereof, were of wood: and he said unto me, This is the table that is before the LORD. 23 And the temple and the sanctuary had two doors. 24 And the doors had two leaves apiece, two turning leaves; two leaves for the one door, and two leaves for the other door. 25 And there were made on them, on the doors of the temple, cherubims and palm trees, like as were made upon the walls; and there were thick planks upon the face of the porch without. 26 And there were narrow windows and palm trees on the one side and on the other side, on the sides of the porch, and upon the side chambers of the house, and thick planks

Here is, First. An account of a building that was before the separate place; that is, before the temple, "at the end towards the west," ver. 12, which is here measured and compared (ver. 13) with the measure of the house, and appears to be of equal dimensions with it. This stood in a court by itself, which is measured, ver. 15, and its galleries or chambers belonging to it, its posts and windows, and the ornaments of them, ver. 15—17. But what use was to be made of this other building we are not told; perhaps in this vision it signified the setting up of a church among the Gentiles, not inferior to the Jewish temple, but of quite another nature, and which should soon supersede it.

Secondly. A description of the ornaments of the temple and the other building. The walls on the inside from top to bottom were adorned with cherubims and palm-trees, placed alternately, as in Solomon's temple, 1 Kin. vi. 29. Each cherub is here said to have two faces, the face of a man towards the palm-tree on one side, and the face of a young lion towards the palm-tree on the other side, ver. 16. These seem to represent the angels, that have more than the wisdom of a man and the courage of a lion; and in both they have an eye to the palms of victory and triumph which are set before them, and which they are sure of in all their conflicts with the powers of darkness. And in the assemblies of the saints angels are in a special manner present, 1 Cor. xi. 10.

Thirdly. A description of the posts of the doors, both of the temple and of the sanctuary. They were squared, ver. 21, not round, like pillars, and "the appearance of the one as the appearance of the other." In the tabernacle, and in Solomon's temple, the door of the sanctuary, or most holy, was narrower than that of the temple, but here it was fully as broad; for in gospel times "the way into the holiest of all is made" more "manifest" than it had been under the Old Testament, Heb. ix. 8, and therefore the door wider. These doors are described, ver. 23, 24. The temple and the sanctuary had each of them their door, and they were two-leaved, folding doors.

Fourthly. We have here the description of the altar of incense, here said to be an "altar of wood," ver. 22. No mention is made of its being overlaid with gold; but sure it was intended to be so, else it would not bear the fire with which the incense was to be burned, unless we will suppose that it served only to put the censers upon. Or else it intimates that the incense to be offered in the gospel temple shall be purely spiritual, and the fire spiritual, which will not consume an altar of wood. Therefore this altar is called a table; "This is the table that is before the Lord." Here, as before, we find the altar turned into a table; for the great sacrifice being now offered, that which we have to do is to feast upon the sacrifice at the Lord's table.

Fifthly. Here is the adorning of the doors and windows with palm-trees, that they might be of a piece with the walls of the house, ver. 25, 26. Thus the living temples are adorned, not with gold, or silver, or costly array, but with "the hidden man of the heart, in that which is not corruptible."

CHAPTER XLII.

This chapter continues and concludes the describing and measuring of this mystical temple, which it is very hard to understand the particular architecture of, and yet more hard to comprehend the mystical meaning of. Here is, I. A description of the chambers that were about the courts, their situation and structure, ver. 1—13; and the uses for which they were designed, ver. 13, 14. II. A survey of the whole compass of ground which was taken up with the house, and the courts belonging to it, ver. 15—20.

THEN he brought me forth into the utter court, the way toward the north: and he brought me into the chamber that was over against the separate place, and which was before the building toward the north. 2 Before the length of an hundred cubits was the north door, and the breadth was fifty cubits. 3 Over against the twenty cubits which were for the inner court, and over against the pavement which was for the utter court, was gallery against gallery probably that of an immense slab of stone at the entrance, serving as a door-sill.

xl. 9. The "posts" are apparently pilasters, but our general ignorance of Jewish architecture compels us to speak with continual reserve.

xl. 16. The word for "arches" is rendered "galleries or porches" in the margin. Some kind of niche or recess is meant, but more we cannot say. There is no doubt that the arch was already known in the time of Ezekiel, but we have no reason to think the Jews were acquainted with it.

xl. 46. Zadok was appointed high priest by Solomon (1 Kings ii. 35), and the sons of Zadok here are therefore his descendants.

xl. 49. This is a difficult verse, and it has been suspected that there is some error in the present text, especially in some of the numbers.

xli. 1. The mention of the tabernacle here seems out of place, and in three stories. 4 And before the chambers was a walk of ten cubits breadth inward, a way of one cubit; and their doors toward the north. 5 Now the upper chambers were shorter: for the galleries were higher than these, than the lower, and than the middlemost of the building. 6 For they were in three stories, but had not pillars as the pillars of the courts: therefore the building was straitened more than the lowest and the middlemost from the ground. 7 And the wall that was without over against the chambers, toward the utter court on the forepart of the chambers, the length thereof was fifty cubits. 8 For the length of the chambers that were in the utter court was fifty cubits: and, lo, before the temple were an hundred cubits. 9 And from under these chambers was the entry on the east side, as one goeth into them from the utter court. 10 The chambers were in the thickness of the wall of the court toward the east, over against the separate place, and over against the building. 11 And the way before them was like the appearance of the chambers which were toward the north, as long as they, and as broad as they: and all their goings out were both according to their fashions, and according to their doors. 12 And according to the doors of the chambers that were toward the south was a door in the head of the way, even the way directly before the wall toward the east, as one entereth into them. 13 Then said he unto me, The north chambers and the south chambers, which are before the separate place, they be holy chambers, where the priests that approach unto the LORD shall eat the most holy things: there shall they lay the most holy things, and the meat offering, and the sin offering, and the trespass offering; for the place is holy. 14 When the priests enter therein, then shall they not go out of the holy place into the utter court, but there they shall lay their garments wherein they minister; for they are holy; and shall put on other garments, and shall approach to those things which are for the people.

The prophet hath taken a very exact view of the temple and the buildings belonging to it, and is now brought again into the outer court to observe the chambers that were in that square.

First. Here is a description of these chambers which, as that which went before, seems to us very perplexed and intricate, through our unacquaintedness with the Hebrew language, and the rules of architecture at that time. We shall only observe in general,

1. That about the temple, which was the place of public worship, there were private chambers, to teach us that our attendance upon God in solemn ordinances will not excuse us from the duties of the closet. We must not only worship in the courts of God's house, but must, both before and after our attendance there, enter into our chambers, enter into our closets, and read, and meditate, and "pray to our Father in secret;" and a great deal of comfort the people of God have found in their communion with God in solitude.

2. That these chambers were many. There were three stories of them; and though the higher stories were not so large as the lower, yet they served as well for retirement, ver. 5, 6. There were many, that there might be conveniences for all such people as Anna the prophetess, who "departed not from the temple night or day," Lu. ii. 37. "In my Father's house are many mansions;" in his house on earth there are so. Multitudes by faith have taken lodgings in his sanctuary, and yet there is room.

3. That these chambers, though they were private, yet were near the temple, within view of it, within reach of it, to teach us to prefer public worship before private—"The Lord loves the gates of Zion more than all the dwellings of Jacob," and so must we—and to refer our private worship to the public; our religious performances in our chambers must be to prepare us for the exercises of devotion in public, and to further us in our improvement of them, as our opportunities are.

4. That before these chambers there were walks of five yards broad, ver. 4, in which those that had lodgings in these chambers might meet for conversation, might walk and talk together for their mutual edification, might communicate their knowledge and experiences; for we are not to spend all our time between the church and the chamber, though a great deal of time may be spent to very good purpose in both; but man is made for society, and Christians for the communion of saints; and the duties of that communion we must make conscience of, and the privileges and pleasures of that communion we must take the comfort of. It is promised to Joshua, who was high priest in the second temple, that God will "give him places to walk in among them that stand by," Zec. iii. 7.

Secondly. Here is the use of these chambers appointed, ver. 13, 14.

1. They were for the priests that approach unto the Lord, that they may be always near their business, and may not be non-residents. Therefore they are called holy chambers, because they were for the use of them that ministered in holy things, during their ministration. Those that have public work to do for God and the souls of men have need to be much in private, to fit themselves for it. Ministers should spend much time in their chambers, in reading, meditation, and prayer, that their profiting may appear; and they ought to be provided with conveniences for this purpose.

2. There the priests were to deposit the most holy things, that is, those parts of the offerings which fell to their share, and there they were to eat them, they and their families, in a religious manner, for the place is holy; and thus they must make a difference between those feasts upon the sacrifice and other meals.

3. There (among other uses) they were to lay their vestments, which God had appointed them to wear when they ministered at the altar, their linen ephods, coats, girdles, and bonnets. We read of the providing of priest's garments after their return out of captivity, Neh. vii. 70, 72. When they had ended their service at the altar they must lay by those garments, to signify that the use of them should continue only during that dispensation. But they must put on other garments, such as other people wear, when they approached to those things which were for the people; that is, to do that part of their service which related to the people, to teach them the law, and to answer their inquiries. Their holy garments must be laid up, that they may be kept clean and decent for the credit of their service.

15 Now when he had made an end of measuring the inner house, he brought me forth toward the gate whose prospect is toward the east, and measured it round about. 16 He measured the east side with the measuring reed, five hundred reeds, with the measuring reed round about. 17 He measured the north side, five hundred reeds, with the measuring reed round about. 18 He measured the south side, five hundred reeds, with the measuring reed. 19 He turned about to the west side, and measured five hundred reeds with the measuring reed. 20 He measured it by the four sides: it had a wall round about, five hundred reeds long, and five hundred broad, to make a separation between the sanctuary and the profane place.

We have attended the measuring of this mystical temple, and are now to see how far the holy ground on which we tread doth extend; and that also is here measured, and found to take in a great compass. Observe,

First. What the dimensions of it were. It extended each way five hundred reeds, ver. 16—19, each reed above three yards and a half, so that it reached every way about an English measured mile, which, the ground lying square, was above eight miles round. Thus large were the suburbs (as I may call them) of this mystical temple, signifying the great extent of the church in Gospel times, when all nations should be discipled, and the kingdoms of the world made Christ's kingdoms. Room should be made in God's courts for the numerous forces of the Gentiles that shall flow into them, as was foretold, Isa. xlix. 18; lx. 4. It is in part fulfilled already in the accession of the Gentiles to the church; and we trust it shall have a more full accomplishment when the "fulness of the Gentiles shall come in," and "all Israel shall be saved."

Secondly. Why the dimensions of it were made thus large. It was to make a separation, by putting a very large distance between the sanctuary and the profane place; and therefore there was a wall surrounding it, to keep off those at were unclean, and to separate between the precious and the vile. Note, hence it has been thought that the word means the covering of the portion measured.

xli. 18—20. In this temple numerous details correspond with those of the Temple of Solomon, but very often with differences. Thus, here the ornaments are cherubim and palm-trees, and in 1 Kings vi. 29 they are cherubim, palm-trees, and open flowers. Here it is said that the cherubim had each two faces, that of a lion and that of a man, but in the other place these details are omitted.

xlii. 15—20. The external measurements here given show what an enormous structure was displayed before the prophet's vision, and explains why at the outset he declared it like "the building of a city." As the reed used was over twelve feet in length, or more than four yards, the enclosure must have been a square, each side of which measured upwards of 2,000 yards. Many efforts have been made to reduce this calculation, without success and without reason; and we prefer to say with Dr. Fairbairn, "We have here another of

A difference is to be put between common and sacred things; between God's name and other names, between his day and other days, his book and other books, his institutions and other observances; and a distance to be put between our worldly and religious actions, so as still to go about the worship of God with a solemn pause.

CHAPTER XLIII.

The prophet having given us a view of the mystical temple, the gospel church, as he received it from the Lord, that it might appear not to be erected in vain, comes to describe in this and the next chapter the worship that should be performed in it, but under the type of the old services. In this chapter we have, I. Possession taken of this temple, by the glory of God filling it, ver. 1—6. II. A promise given of the continuance of God's presence with his people, upon condition of their return to, and continuance in, the instituted way of his worship, and their abandoning of idols and idolatry, ver. 7—12. III. A description of the altar of burnt offerings, ver. 13—17. IV. Directions given for the consecration of that altar, ver. 18—27. And Ezekiel seems here to stand between God and Israel, as Moses, the servant of the Lord, did, when the sanctuary was first set up.

AFTERWARD he brought me to the gate, even the gate that looketh toward the east: 2 And, behold, the glory of the God of Israel came from the way of the east: and his voice was like a noise of many waters: and the earth shined with his glory. 3 And it was according to the appearance of the vision which I saw, even according to the vision that I saw when I came to destroy the city: and the visions were like the vision that I saw by the river Chebar; and I fell upon my face. 4 And the glory of the LORD came into the house by the way of the gate whose prospect is toward the east. 5 So the spirit took me up, and brought me into the inner court; and, behold, the glory of the LORD filled the house. 6 And I heard him speaking unto me out of the house; and the man stood by me.

After Ezekiel had patiently surveyed the temple of God, the greatest glory of this earth, he is admitted to a higher form, and honoured with a sight of the glories of the upper world; it is said to him, Come up hither. He hath seen the temple, and sees it to be very spacious and splendid; but till the glory of God comes into it it, is but like the dead bodies he had seen in vision, ch. xxxvii., that had no breath till the spirit of life entered into them. Here therefore he sees the house filled with God's glory.

First. He has a vision of the glory of God; ver. 2, "The glory of the God of Israel," that God who is in covenant with Israel, and whom they serve and worship. The idols of the heathen have no glory but what they owe to the goldsmith or the painter; but this is the glory of the God of Israel. This glory came from the way of the east, and therefore he was brought to the gate that leads towards the east, to expect the appearance and approach of it. Christ's star was seen in the east, and he is that other Angel that ascendeth out of the east, Rev. vii. 2; for he is the Morning Star, he is the Sun of Righteousness. Two things he observed in this appearance of the glory of God. 1. The power of his word which he heard. His voice was like a noise of many waters, which is heard very far, and makes impressions; the noise of purling streams is grateful, of a roaring sea dreadful, Rev. i. 15; xiv. 2. Christ's Gospel, in the glory of which he shines, was to be proclaimed aloud, the report of it to be heard far; to some it is a savour of life, to others of death, according as they are. 2. The brightness of his appearance which he saw; "The earth shined with his glory;" for God is light, and none can bear the lustre of his light, none hath seen or can see it. Note, That glory of God which shines in the church shines on the world. When God appeared for David, "the brightness that was before him" dispersed the clouds. Ps. xviii. 12.

This appearance of the glory of God to Ezekiel here he observed to be the same with the vision he saw when he first received his commission, ch. i. 4; according to that by the river Chebar, ver. 3. Because God is the same he was pleased to manifest himself in the same manner, for with him is no variableness. It was the same (saith he) with that which I saw when I came to destroy the city, that is, to foretell the city's destruction; which he did with such authority and efficacy, and the event did so certainly answer the prediction, that he might be said to destroy it. As a judge, in God's name, he passed his sentence upon it, which was soon executed. God appeared in the same manner when he sent him to speak words of terror, and when he sent him to speak words of comfort; for in both God is and will be glorified. "He kills and he makes alive," he "wounds and he heals," Deu. xxxii. 39. To the same hand that destroyed we must look for deliverance; "he hath smitten, and he will bind up." Una eademque manus vulnus opemque tulit,—'The same hand inflicted the wound and healed it.'

Secondly. He has a vision of the entrance of this glory into the temple. When he saw this glory he fell upon his face, ver. 3, as not able to bear the lustre of God's glory, or rather, as one willing to give him the glory of it by an humble and reverend adoration; but the Spirit took him up, ver. 5, when the glory of the Lord was come into the house, ver. 4, that he might see how the house was filled with it. He saw how the glory of the Lord, in this same appearance, departed from the temple, because it was profaned, to his great grief; now he shall see it return to the temple, to his great satisfaction: see ch. x. 18, 19; xi. 23. Note, Though God may forsake his people for a small moment, he will return with everlasting loving-kindness. God's glory filled the house as it had filled the tabernacle which Moses set up, and the temple of Solomon, Ex. xl. 34; 1 Kin. viii. 10. Now we do not find that ever the Shechinah did in that manner take possession of the second temple, and therefore this was to have its accomplishment in that glory of the Divine grace which shines so bright in the gospel church, and fills it. Here is no mention of a cloud filling the house as formerly, for we now "with open face behold the glory of the Lord," in the face of Christ, and not as of old through the cloud of types.

Thirdly. He receives instructions more immediately from the glory of the Lord, as Moses did when God had taken possession of the tabernacle, Lev. i. 1; "I heard him speaking to me out of the house," ver. 6. God's glory shining in the church, we must from thence expect to receive Divine oracles. "The man stood by me;" we could not bear to hear the voice of God, any more than to see the face of God, if Jesus Christ did not stand by us as Mediator. Or, if this was a created angel, it is observable that when God began to speak to Ezekiel, he stood by, and gave way, having no more to say. Nay, he stood by the prophet, as a learner with him; for to the principalities and powers, to the angels themselves, who desire to look into these things, "is known by the church the manifold wisdom of God," Eph. iii. 10. The man stood by him to conduct him thither where he might receive farther discoveries, ch. xliv. 1.

7 And he said unto me,
Son of man, [feet,
The place of my throne, and the place of the soles of my
Where I will dwell in the midst of the children of Israel for ever, [defile,
And my holy name, shall the house of Israel no more
Neither they, nor their kings, by their whoredom,
Nor by the carcases of their kings in their high places
8 In their setting of their threshold by my thresholds,
And their post by my posts,
And the wall between me and them,
They have even defiled my holy name
By their abominations that they have committed.
Wherefore I have consumed them in mine anger.
9 Now let them put away their whoredom,
And the carcases of their kings, far from me,
And I will dwell in the midst of them for ever.
10 Thou son of man, shew the house to the house of Israel,
That they may be ashamed of their iniquities:
And let them measure the pattern.
11 And if they be ashamed of all that they have done,
Shew them the form of the house, and the fashion thereof,
And the goings out thereof, and the comings in thereof,
And all the forms thereof, and all the ordinances thereof,
And all the forms thereof, and all the laws thereof:
And write it in their sight,
That they may keep the whole form thereof,
And all the ordinances thereof, and do them.

12 This is the law of the house; Upon the top of the mountain the whole limit thereof round about shall be most holy. Behold, this is the law of the house.

God doth here, in effect, renew his covenant with his people Israel, upon his retaking possession of the house; and Ezekiel negotiates the matter, as Moses formerly. This would be of great use to the captives at their return, both for direction and encouragement. But look farther, to those that are blessed with the privileges of the gospel temple, that they may understand how they are before him on their good behaviour.

First. God, by the prophet, puts them in mind of their former provocations, for which they had long lain under the tokens of his displeasure. This conviction is spoken to them to make way for the comforts designed them. Though God gives and upbraids not, it becomes us, when he forgives, to upbraid ourselves with our unworthy carriage towards him. Let them now remember, therefore, 1. That they had formerly "defiled God's holy name," had profaned and abused all those sacred things by which he had made himself known among them, ver. 7. They and their kings had brought contempt on the religion they professed, and their relation to God, by their spiritual whoredom, their idolatry, and by worshipping images, which they called their kings, for so Moloch signifies—or lords, for so Baal signifies—but were really the carcases of kings, not only lifeless and useless, but loathsome and abominable, as dead carcases, in their high places, set up in honour of them. They had defiled God's name by their abominations. And what were they? It was "in setting their threshold by my thresholds, and their post by my posts," that is, adding their own inventions to God's institutions, and urging all to a compliance with them, as if they had been of equal authority and efficacy, "teaching for doctrines the commandments of men," Isa. xxix. 13. Or, rather, setting up altars to their idols even in the courts of the temple, than which a more impudent affront could not be put upon the Divine majesty. Thus they set up a separation wall between him and them, which stopped the current of his favours to them, and spoiled the acceptableness of their services to him. See what an indignity sinners do to God, setting up their walls in opposition to his, and thrusting him out from what is his right. And see what injury they do to themselves, for the nearer any come to God with their sins, the farther they set him at a distance from them. Some give this sense of it: Though their houses joined close to God's house, their posts and thresholds to his, so that they were in a manner his next neighbours, ("There was but a wall between me and them," so it is in the margin,) so that it might have been expected they should have acquainted themselves with him, and been in care to please him, yet they were not so much as neighbourly. Note, It often proves too true, 'The nearer the church the farther from God.' They were by profession in covenant with God, and yet they had "defiled the place of his throne," and of the soles of his feet; that is, those traits which render manifest, and I believe were intended to render manifest and palpable, the ideal character of the whole description. It is of a nature throughout which defies all attempts to bring it within the bounds of the real." Real indeed it may be, and is, but the reality is not material and tangible, so much as it is spiritual and divine. It foreshadows, dimly but grandly, the magnitude and glory of that "latter house" which is slowly rising for our Lord's honour in the world.

xliii. 7. The allusion to carcases of kings in high places here and in verse 9 may be an allusion to a real custom. The Egyptians embalmed their dead, and "the carcases" of their kings were preserved with the utmost care and veneration. Did the Israelites imitate in any way this practice, and associate it with idolatrous ideas? We may ask though we cannot answer this question. The text has been variously explained, but its precise reference is still open to inquiry. Its general reference is to some form of profanity.

his temple, where he did both reside and reign. Jerusalem is called the "city of the great King," Ps. xlviii. 2; and his footstool, Ps. xcix. 5; cxxxii. 7. Note, When God's ordinances are profaned his holy name is polluted. 2. That for this God had had a controversy with them in their late troubles. They could not condemn him, for he had but brought upon them the desert of their sins; "Wherefore I have consumed them in mine anger." Note, Those that pollute God's holy name fall under his just displeasure.

Secondly. He calls upon them to repent and reform, and, in order to that, to be ashamed of their iniquities; ver. 9, "Now let them put away their whoredom." Now they have smarted so severely for it, and now God is returning in mercy to them, and setting up his sanctuary again in the midst of them, now let them cast away their idols, and have no more to do with them, that they may not again forfeit the privileges which they have been taught to know the worth of by the want of. Let them put away their idols, those lothsome "carcases of their kings, far from me," from being a provocation to me. This was seasonable counsel now the prophet had the platform of the temple to set before them; for, 1. If they see that platform they will surely be ashamed of their sins, ver. 10; when they see what mercy God has in store for them, notwithstanding their utter unworthiness of it, they will be ashamed to think of their disingenuous carriage towards him. Note, The goodness of God to us should lead us to repentance, especially to a penitential shame. Let them measure the pattern themselves, and see how much it exceeds the former pattern, and guess by that what great things God has in store for them, and surely it will put them out of countenance to think what the desert of their sins was. And then, 2. If they be ashamed of their sins, they shall surely see more of the platform, ver. 11; if they be ashamed of all that they have done, upon a general view of the goodness of God, let them have a more distinct, particular account of it. Note, Those that improve what they see and know of the goodness of God shall see and know more of it. And then, and not till then, we are qualified for God's favours, when we are truly humbled for our own follies. "Shew them the form of the house," let them see what a stately structure it will be, and withal shew them the ordinances and laws of it. Note, With the foresights of our comforts it is fit we should get the knowledge of our duty; with the privileges of God's house we must acquaint ourselves with the rules of it. Shew them these ordinances that they may keep them and do them. Note, Therefore we are made to know our duty, that we may do it, and be blessed in our deed.

Thirdly. He promiseth that they shall be such as they should be, and then he will be to them such as they would have him to be, ver. 7. 1. The house of Israel "shall no more defile my holy name." This is pure gospel. The precept of the law saith, You must not defile my name. The grace of the Gospel saith, You shall not. Thus what is required in the covenant is promised in the covenant, Jer. xxxii. 40. 2. Then "I will dwell in the midst of them for ever," and the same again, ver. 9. God secures to us his good-will by confirming in us his good work. If we do not defile his name we may be sure he will not depart from us.

Fourthly. The general law of God's house is laid down, ver. 12: that, whereas formerly only the chancel or sanctuary was most holy, now the whole mountain of the house shall be so; the whole limit thereof, including all the courts, and all the chambers, shall be as the most holy place; signifying that in gospel times, 1. The whole church shall have the privilege of the holy of holies, that of a near access to God. All believers have now, under the Gospel, "boldness to enter into the holiest," Heb. x. 19, with this advantage, that whereas the high priest entered in the virtue of the blood of bulls and goats, we enter in the virtue of the blood of Jesus, and wherever we are we have through him access to the Father. 2. The whole church shall be under a mighty obligation to press towards the perfection of holiness, as he who hath called us is holy. All must now be "most holy." Holiness becomes God's house for ever, and in gospel times more than ever. Behold, this is the law of the house, let none expect the protection of it who will not submit to this law.

13 And these are the measures of the altar after the cubits: The cubit is a cubit and an hand breadth; even the bottom shall be a cubit, and the breadth a cubit, and the border thereof by the edge thereof round about shall be a span: and this shall be the higher place of the altar. 14 And from the bottom upon the ground even to the lower settle shall be two cubits, and the breadth one cubit; and from the lesser settle even to the greater settle shall be four cubits, and the breadth one cubit. 15 So the altar shall be four cubits; and from the altar and upward shall be four horns. 16 And the altar shall be twelve cubits long, twelve broad, square in the four squares thereof. 17 And the settle shall be fourteen cubits long and fourteen broad in the four squares thereof; and the border about it shall be half a cubit; and the bottom thereof shall be a cubit about; and his stairs shall look toward the east. 18 And he said unto me, Son of man, thus saith the Lord GOD; These are the ordinances of the altar in the day when they shall make it, to offer burnt offerings thereon, and to sprinkle blood thereon. 19 And thou shalt give to the priests the Levites that be of the seed of Zadok, which approach unto me, to minister unto me, saith the Lord GOD, a young bullock for a sin offering. 20 And thou shalt take of the blood thereof, and put it on the four horns of it, and on the four corners of the settle, and upon the border round about: thus shalt thou cleanse and purge it. 21 Thou shalt take the bullock also of the sin offering, and he shall burn it in the appointed place of the house, without the sanctuary. 22 And on the second day thou shalt offer a kid of the goats without blemish for a sin offering; and they shall cleanse the altar, as they did cleanse it with the bullock. 23 When thou hast made an end of cleansing it, thou shalt offer a young bullock without blemish, and a ram out of the flock without blemish. 24 And thou shalt offer them before the LORD, and the priests shall cast salt upon them, and they shall offer them up for a burnt offering unto the LORD. 25 Seven days shalt thou prepare every day a goat for a sin offering: they shall also prepare a young bullock, and a ram out of the flock, without blemish. 26 Seven days shall they purge the altar and purify it; and they shall consecrate themselves. 27 And when these days are expired, it shall be, that upon the eighth day, and so forward, the priests shall make your burnt offerings upon the altar, and your peace offerings; and I will accept you, saith the Lord GOD.

This is concerning the altar in this mystical temple; and that is mystical too, for Christ is our altar. The Jews, after their return out of captivity, had an altar long before they had a temple, Ezr. iii. 3; but this was an altar in the temple. Now here we have,

First. The measures of the altar, ver. 13. It was six yards square at the top, and seven yards square at the bottom; it was four yards and a half high. It had a lower bench or shelf, here called a settle, a yard from the ground, on which some of the priests stood to minister; and another two yards above that, on which others of them stood; and these were each of them half a yard broad, and had ledges on either side, that they might stand firm upon them. The sacrifices were killed at the table, spoken of before, ch. xl. 39. What was to be burnt on the altar was given up to those on the lower bench, and handed by them to those on the higher, and they laid it on the altar. Thus, in the service of God, we must be assistant to one another.

Secondly. The ordinances of the altar. Directions are here given,

1. Concerning the dedication of the altar at first. Seven days were to be spent in the dedication of it, and every day sacrifices were to be offered upon it, and particularly a goat for a sin offering, ver. 25; besides a young bullock for a sin offering on the first day, ver. 19; which teacheth us, in all our religious services, to have an eye to Christ, the great sin offering. Neither our persons nor our performances can be acceptable to God unless sin be taken away; and that cannot be taken away but by the blood of Christ, which both sanctifies the altar, (for Christ entered by his own blood, Heb. ix. 12,) and the gift upon the altar. There were also to be a bullock and a ram offered for a burnt offering, ver. 24, which was intended purely for the glory of God, to teach us to have an eye to that in all our services. We present ourselves as living sacrifices, and our devotions as spiritual sacrifices, that we and they may be to him for a name, and for a praise, and for a glory. The dedication of the altar is here called the cleansing and purging of it, ver. 20, 26. Christ our altar, though he had no pollution to be cleansed from, yet sanctified himself, Jno. xvii. 19; and when we consecrate the altars of our hearts to God, to have the fire of holy love always burning upon them, we must see that they be purified and cleansed from the love of the world and the lusts of the flesh. It is observable that there are several differences between the rites of dedication here and those which were appointed, Ex. xxix., to intimate that the ceremonial institutions were mutable things, and the changes in them were earnests of their period in Christ. Only here, according to the general law, that all the sacrifices must be seasoned with salt, Lev. ii. 13, particular orders are given, ver. 24, that the priests shall cast salt upon the sacrifices. Grace is the salt with which all our religious performances must be seasoned, Col. iv. 6. An everlasting covenant is called a covenant of salt, because it is incorruptible. The glory reserved for us is incorruptible and undefiled; and the grace wrought in us is the hidden man of the heart in that which is not corruptible.

2. Concerning the constant use that should be made of it when it was dedicated. From henceforward the priests shall make their burnt offerings and peace offerings upon this altar, ver. 27; for therefore it was sanctified, that it might sanctify the gift that was offered upon it.

Thirdly. Observe farther, 1. Who were to serve at the altar; the priests "of the seed of Zadok," ver. 19. That family was substituted in the room of Abiathar by Solomon, and God confirms it. His name signifies righteous, for they are the righteous seed that are priests to God through Christ, "the Lord our righteousness." 2. How they should prepare for this service: ver. 26, "They shall consecrate themselves;" shall fill their hand with the offerings, in token of the giving up of themselves with their offerings to God, and to his service. Note, Before we minister to the Lord in holy things we must consecrate ourselves by getting our hands and hearts filled with those things. 3. How they should speed in it; ver. 27, "I will accept you;" and if God now accept our works, if our services be pleasing to him, it is enough, we need no more. Those that give themselves to God shall be accepted of God, their persons first, and then their performances, through the Mediator.

xliii. 13—17. Some have endeavoured to produce a sketch of the altar from the dimensions here given. There is some difference of opinion as to the rendering and explanation of verses 15 and 16. Our translators at verse 15, for "the altar," put in the margin, "Heb. Harel, that is, the mountain of God." This applies to the first occurrence of the words, and for their second occurrence the marginal note is, "Heb. Ariel, that is, the lion of God," with a reference to Isa. xxix. 1, where, however, the Hebrew "Ariel" is spelt a little differently. There is, perhaps, no mystery about Harel and Ariel, which Gesenius and others regard as alike signifying the hearth or fireplace of the altar. By Fürst they are spoken of as different forms of the same word, and if it be so the four cubits and the twelve cubits must be variously taken. The altar seems to have been graduated, with ledges and other modifications of its sides. The four cubits may refer in some way to the elevation.

xliii. 18—27. There is evidently here a description of the in-

CHAPTER XLIV.

In this chapter we have, I. The appropriating of the east gate of the temple to the prince, ver. 1—3. II. A reproof sent to the house of Israel for their former profanations of God's sanctuary, with a charge to them to be more strict for the future, ver. 4—9. III. The degrading of those Levites who had formerly been guilty of idolatry, and the establishing of the priesthood in the family of Zadok, which had kept their integrity, ver. 10—16. IV. Divers laws and ordinances concerning the priests, ver. 17—31.

THEN he brought me back the way of the gate of the outward sanctuary which looketh toward the east; and it was shut. 2 Then said the LORD unto me; This gate shall be shut, it shall not be opened, and no man shall enter in by it; because the LORD, the God of Israel, hath entered in by it, therefore it shall be shut. 3 It is for the prince; the prince, he shall sit in it to eat bread before the LORD; he shall enter by the way of the porch of that gate, and shall go out by the way of the same.

The prophet is here brought to review what he had before once surveyed; for, though we have often looked into the things of God, they will yet bear to be looked over again, such a copiousness there is in them. The lessons we have learned we should still repeat to ourselves. Every time we review the sacred fabric of holy things, which we have in the Scriptures, we shall still find something new which we did not before take notice of. The prophet is brought a third time to the east gate, and finds it shut, which intimates that the rest of the gates were open at all times to the worshippers. But such an account is given of this gate being shut as puts honour,

First. Upon the God of Israel. It is for the honour of him that the gate of the inner court, at which his glory entered when he took possession of the house, was ever after kept shut, and no man was allowed to enter in by it, ver. 2. The difference ever after made between this and the other gates, that this was shut when the others were open, was intended both to perpetuate the remembrance of the solemn entrance of the glory of the Lord into the house, which it would remain a traditional evidence of the truth of, and also to possess the minds of people with a reverence for the Divine majesty, and with very awful thoughts of his transcendent glory, which was designed in God's charge to Moses at the bush, "Put off thy shoe from off thy foot." God will have a way by himself.

Secondly. Upon the prince of Israel, ver. 2. It is an honour to him that though he may not enter in by this gate, for no man may, yet, 1. He shall sit in this gate, to eat his share of the peace offerings, that sacred food, before the Lord. 2. He shall "enter by the way of the porch of that gate," by some little door or wicket, either in the gate or adjoining to it, which is called "the way of the porch." This was to signify that God put some of his glory upon magistrates, upon the princes of his people, for he hath said, Ye are gods. Some, by the prince, here understand the high priest, or the sagan, or second priest; and that he only was allowed to enter by this gate, for he was God's representative. Christ is the high priest of our profession, who entered himself into the holy place, and "opened the kingdom of heaven to all believers."

4 Then brought he me the way of the north gate before the house: and I looked, and, behold, the glory of the LORD filled the house of the LORD: and I fell upon my face. 5 And the LORD said unto me, Son of man, mark well, and behold with thine eyes, and hear with thine ears all that I say unto thee concerning all the ordinances of the house of the LORD, and all the laws thereof; and mark well the entering in of the house, with every going forth of the sanctuary. 6 And thou shalt say to the rebellious, even to the house of Israel, Thus saith the Lord GOD; O ye house of Israel, let it suffice you of all your abominations, 7 In that ye have brought into my sanctuary strangers, uncircumcised in heart, and uncircumcised in flesh, to be in my sanctuary, to pollute it, even my house, when ye offer my bread, the fat and the blood, and they have broken my covenant because of all your abominations. 8 And ye have not kept the charge of mine holy things: but ye have set keepers of my charge in my sanctuary for yourselves. 9 Thus saith the Lord GOD; No stranger, uncircumcised in heart, nor uncircumcised in flesh, shall enter into my sanctuary, of any stranger that is among the children of Israel.

This is much to the same purpose with what we had in the beginning of ch. xliii.; as the prophet must look again upon what he had before seen, so he must be told again what he had before heard. Here, as before, he sees the house filled with "the glory of the Lord," which strikes an awe upon him, so that he falls prostrate at the sight, the humblest posture of adoration, and the expression of a holy awe; "I fell upon my face," ver. 4. Note, The more we see of the glory of God the more low we shall lie in our own eyes. Now here,

First. God chargeth the prophet to take a very particular notice of all he saw, and all that was said to him; ver. 5, "Mark well;" set thine heart, apply thy mind to the discoveries now made to thee. 1. "Behold with thine eyes" what is shewed thee, particularly the entering in of the house, and every going forth of it, all the inlets and all the outlets of the sanctuary; those he must take special notice of. Note, In acquainting ourselves with Divine things we must not aim so much at an abstract speculation of the things themselves as at finding the plain appointed way of converse and communion with those things, that we may go in and out and find pasture. 2. "Hear with thine ears all that I say unto thee," about the laws and "ordinances of the house," which he was to instruct the people in. Note, Those who are appointed to be teachers have need to be very diligent, careful learners, that they may neither forget any of the things they are intrusted with nor mistake concerning them.

Secondly. He sends him upon an errand to the people, "to the rebellious, even to the house of Israel," ver. 6. It is sad to think that the house of Israel should deserve this character from him who perfectly knew them, that a people in covenant with God should be rebellious against him. Who are his subjects, if the house of Israel be rebels? But it is an instance of God's rich mercy, that though they had been rebellious, yet, being the house of Israel, he doth not cast them off, but sends an ambassador to them, to invite and encourage them to return to their allegiance, which he would not have done if he had been pleased to kill them. The whole race of mankind is fallen under the character here given of the house of Israel; but our Lord Jesus, when he ascended on high, received gifts for men, "yea, even for the rebellious also," that, as here, "the Lord God might dwell among them," Ps. lxviii. 18.

1. He must tell them of their faults, must shew them their rebellions, must shew the house of Jacob their sins. Note, Those who are sent to comfort God's people must first convince them, and so prepare them for comfort; "Let it suffice you of all your abominations," ver. 6. Note, It is time for those who have continued long in sin to reckon it long enough, and too long, and to begin to think of taking up in time, and leaving off their evil courses. Let the time past of your life suffice; for by this time sure you have surfeited upon your abominations, and are become sick of them, 1 Pet. iv. 3. That which is here charged upon them is,

1st. That they had admitted those to the privileges of the sanctuary who were not entitled to them; whereas God had said, "The stranger that comes nigh shall be put to death." They had not only connived at the intrusion of strangers into the sanctuary, but had themselves introduced them; ver. 7, "You brought in strangers uncircumcised in flesh," and therefore under a legal incapacity to enter into the sanctuary, which was a breaking off the covenant of circumcision, throwing down the hedge of their peculiarity, and laying themselves in common with the rest of the world. Yet if these strangers had been devout and good, though they were not circumcised, the crime had not been so great; but they were "uncircumcised in heart" too, unhumbled, unreformed, and strangers indeed to God and all goodness. When they came to offer sacrifice they brought these with them to feast with them upon the sacrifice, because they were fond of their company; and this was one of their abominations wherewith they polluted God's sanctuary; it was "giving that which was holy unto dogs," Mat. vii. 6. Note, The admission of those who are openly wicked and profane to special ordinances is a polluting of God's sanctuary, and a great provocation to him.

2nd. That they had employed those in the service of the sanctuary who were not fit for it. Though none but priests and Levites were to minister in the sanctuary, yet we may suppose that all that were priests and Levites did not immediately attend there, but chosen men of them who were best qualified, that were more wise and serious and conscientious, and most likely to keep the charge of the holy things carefully; but in making this choice they had not regard to merit and qualification for the work, but "Ye have set keepers of my charge in my sanctuary for yourselves," such as you had some favour or affection for, such as you either had got or hoped to get money by, or such as would comply with your humours, and would dispense with the laws of the sanctuary to please you. Thus you "have not kept the charge of my holy things." Note, Those who have the choice of the keepers of the holy things, if to serve some secular, selfish purpose they choose such as are unfit and unfaithful, will justly have it laid at their door that they have betrayed the holy things, by lodging them in ill hands.

2. He must tell them their duty; ver. 9, "No stranger shall enter into my sanctuary" till he has first submitted to the laws of it; but, lest any should think this excluded the penitent, believing Gentiles from the church, the stranger here is described to be one that is "uncircumcised in heart," not in sincerity consenting to the covenant, nor putting away the filth of the flesh; whereas the believing Gentiles were "circumcised with the circumcision made without hands," Col. ii. 11 This circumcision of the heart, in the spirit, not in the letter, was what the unbelieving Jews were strangers to, and unconcerned about, while yet they were zealous to keep out of the sanctuary uncircumcised Gentiles; witness their rage against Paul when they did but suspect him to have brought Greeks into the temple, Acts xxi. 28.

10 And the Levites that are gone away far from me, when Israel went astray, which went astray away from me after their idols; they shall even bear their iniquity. 11 Yet they shall be ministers in my sanctuary, having charge at the gates of the house, and ministering to the house: they shall slay the burnt offering and the sacrifice for the people, and they shall stand before them to minister unto them. 12 Because they ministered unto them before their idols, and caused the house of Israel to fall into iniquity; therefore have I lifted up mine hand against them, saith the Lord GOD, and they shall bear their iniquity. 13 And they shall not auguration of the sacrificial service, which is to be extended over seven days. This may be called the consecration and purification of the altar in the new temple. The last verse simply introduces the permanent service which is afterwards to follow. What all this signifies must depend upon the interpretation of the whole prophecy as literal or figurative.

xliv. 1—3. The east gate was that through which the glory of the Lord had entered (chap. xliii. 4), and it was henceforth to be entered only by the prince. By some the word "prince" is applied exclusively to the Messiah, but there are practical difficulties in the way of this idea, which prevent us from accepting it. In particular, the priests have to offer sacrifices on behalf of the prince. On the other hand we cannot regard the word "prince" as meaning rulers collectively. The word may be taken in its ordinary sense, as part and a consistent part of the entire imagery of the prophecy, which is based on Jewish institutions.

come near unto me, to do the office of a priest unto me, nor to come near to any of my holy things, in the most holy place: but they shall bear their shame, and their abominations which they have committed. 14 But I will make them keepers of the charge of the house, for all the service thereof, and for all that shall be done therein. 15 But the priests the Levites, the sons of Zadok, that kept the charge of my sanctuary when the children of Israel went astray from me, they shall come near to me to minister unto me, and they shall stand before me to offer unto me the fat and the blood, saith the Lord GOD: 16 They shall enter into my sanctuary, and they shall come near to my table, to minister unto me, and they shall keep my charge.

The Master of the house, being about to set up house again, takes account of his servants the priests, and sees who are fit to be turned out of their places, and who to be kept in, and takes a course with them accordingly.

First. Those who had been treacherous are degraded and put lower. Those Levites or priests, that were carried down the stream of the apostacy of Israel formerly, that "went astray from God after their idols," ver. 10, that had complied with the idolatrous kings of Israel or Judah, that ministered to them before their idols, ver. 12, bowed with them in the house of Rimmon, or set up altars for them, as Uriah did for Ahaz, and so "caused the house of Israel to fall into iniquity," led them to sin, and hardened them in sin,—for if priests go astray many will follow their pernicious ways; perhaps in Babylon some of the Jewish priests had complied with the idolaters of the place, to the great scandal of their religion,—now these priests, who had thus prevaricated, were justly put under the marks of God's displeasure; or, if they were dead, (as it is likely they were, if the crime were committed before the captivity,) the iniquity was visited upon their children; or perhaps it was the whole family of Abiathar that had been guilty of this trespass, which was now called to account for it. And,

1. They are sentenced to be deprived in part of their office, and from the dignity of priests are put down into the condition of ordinary Levites. God hath lifted up his hand against them, hath said it and sworn it, that "they shall bear their iniquity," ver. 12; assuredly they shall suffer for it—shall suffer disgrace for it. "They shall bear their shame," ver. 13; for though they have (we charitably hope) repented of it, yet they "shall not come near to do the office of a priest," that is, those parts of the office that were peculiar to them; they shall not come near to any of the holy things within the sanctuary, ver. 13. Note, Those who have robbed God of his honour will justly be deprived of their honour. And it is really a great punishment to be forbidden to come near to God; and justly might they who have once gone away from him be rejected, as unworthy ever to come near to him, and put at an everlasting distance.

2. Yet there is a mixture of mercy in this sentence. God deals not in severity, as he might have done, with those who had dealt treacherously with him, but mitigates the sentence, ver. 11, 14. They are deprived but in part ab officio,—'of their office,' and, it should seem, not at all a beneficio,—'of their emoluments.' They shall help to slay the sacrifice, which the Levites were permitted to do, and which in this temple was done, not at the altar, but at the tables, ch. xl. 39. They shall be porters at the gates of the house, and they shall be "keepers of the charge of the house, for all the service thereof." Note, Those who may not be fit to be employed in one kind of service may yet be fit to be employed in another; and even those that have offended may yet be made use of, and not quite thrown aside, much less thrown away.

Secondly. Those who had been faithful are honoured and established, ver. 15, 16. These are remarkably distinguished from the other; but "the sons of Zadok," that kept their integrity in a time of general apostacy, that went not astray when others did, "they shall come near to me, shall come near to my table." Note, God will put marks of honour upon those that give proofs of their fidelity and constancy to him in shaking, trying times, and will employ those in his service who have kept close to his service when others deserted it and drew back. And it ought to be reckoned a true and great reward of stability of duty to be established in it. If we keep close to God God will keep us close to him.

17 And it shall come to pass, that when they enter in at the gates of the inner court, they shall be clothed with linen garments; and no wool shall come upon them, whiles they minister in the gates of the inner court, and within. 18 They shall have linen bonnets upon their heads, and shall have linen breeches upon their loins; they shall not gird themselves with any thing that causeth sweat. 19 And when they go forth into the utter court, even into the utter court to the people, they shall put off their garments wherein they ministered, and lay them in the holy chambers, and they shall put on other garments; and they shall not sanctify the people with their garments. 20 Neither shall they shave their heads, nor suffer their locks to grow long; they shall only poll their heads. 21 Neither shall any priest drink wine, when they enter into the inner court. 22 Neither shall they take for their wives a widow, nor her that is put away: but they shall take maidens of the seed of the house of Israel, or a widow that had a priest before. 23 And they shall teach my people the difference between the holy and profane, and cause them to discern between the unclean and the clean. 24 And in controversy they shall stand in judgment; and they shall judge it according to my judgments: and they shall keep my laws and my statutes in all mine assemblies; and they shall hallow my sabbaths. 25 And they shall come at no dead person to defile themselves: but for father, or for mother, or for son, or for daughter, for brother, or for sister that hath had no husband, they may defile themselves. 26 And after he is cleansed, they shall reckon unto him seven days. 27 And in the day that he goeth into the sanctuary, unto the inner court, to minister in the sanctuary, he shall offer his sin offering, saith the Lord GOD. 28 And it shall be unto them for an inheritance: I am their inheritance: and ye shall give them no possession in Israel: I am their possession. 29 They shall eat the meat offering, and the sin offering, and the trespass offering; and every dedicated thing in Israel shall be their's. 30 And the first of all the firstfruits of all things, and every oblation of all, of every sort of your oblations, shall be the priest's: ye shall also give unto the priest the first of your dough, that he may cause the blessing to rest in thine house. 31 The priests shall not eat of any thing that is dead of itself, or torn, whether it be fowl or beast.

God's priests must be regulars, not seculars, and therefore here are rules laid down for them to govern themselves by, and due encouragement given them to live up to those rules. Directions are here given,

First. Concerning their clothes. They must wear linen garments when they went in to minister, or do any service in the inner court or in the sanctuary, and nothing that was woollen, because it would cause sweat, ver. 17, 18. They must dress themselves cool, that they might go the more readily about their work; and they had the more need to do so, because they were to attend the altars, which had constant fires upon them. And they must dress themselves clean and sweet, and avoid every thing that was sweaty and filthy, to signify the purity of mind with which the service of God is to be attended. Sweat came in with sin, and was a part of the curse; "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread." Clothes came in with sin, coats of skin did; and therefore the priests must use as little and as light clothing as possible, and not such as caused sweat. When they had finished their service they must change their clothes again, and lay up their linen garments in the chambers appointed for that purpose, ver. 19, as before, ch. xlii. 14. They must not go among the people with their holy garments on, lest they should imagine themselves sanctified by the touch of them; or, they shall "sanctify the people," that is, as it is explained ch. xlii. 14, they "shall approach to those things which are for the people" in their ordinary garments.

Secondly. Concerning their hair. In that they must avoid extremes on both hands, ver. 20. They must not shave their heads, in imitation of the Gentile priests, and as the priests of the Romish church do; nor, on the other hand, must they "suffer their locks to grow long," as the beaux; or that they might be thought Nazarites, when really they were not; but they must be grave and modest, must "poll their heads," and keep their hair short. If a man, especially a minister, wear long hair, it is not becoming, 1 Cor. xi. 14; it is effeminate.

Thirdly. Concerning their diet. They must be sure to drink no wine when they went in to minister, lest they should drink to excess,—should drink and forget the law, ver. 21. It is not for kings to drink wine, more than will do them good, much less for priests: see Lev. x. 9; Pr. xxxi. 4, 5.

Fourthly. Concerning their marriages, ver. 22. Here they must consult the credit of their office, and not marry one that had been divorced, that was at least under the suspicion of immodesty, nor a widow, unless she were a priest's widow, that had been accustomed to the usages of the priest's families. Others may do that which ministers may not do, but must deny themselves in, in honour of their character. Their wives, as well as themselves, must be of good report.

Fifthly. Concerning their preaching and church government.

1. It was part of their business to teach the people, and herein they must approve themselves both skilful and faithful; ver. 23, "They shall teach my people the difference between the holy and profane," between good and evil, lawful and unlawful, that they may neither scruple what is lawful nor venture xliv. 9—14. The disqualifications for various services in the sanctuary are carefully noted, in order that it may be seen how careful God is of his honour. He will not accept those who fail in obedience, or who do not fulfil the requirements of his law. Those especially who are contaminated with idolatrous associations are rejected.

xliv. 15. The qualifications of the priests are for the most part collected from the enactments of the law of Moses.

xliv. 17—21. It is not because these precepts were contrary to those of paganism that they were introduced, so much as because they symbolically taught purity, sobriety, modesty, and other virtues. The "bonnets" of verse 18 were not such in our sense of the word, but rather turban-like caps of linen. The Hebrew word really means "ornament" or "attire," and no more. The priests were to wear a linen head-dress and linen drawers, and to clothe themselves so as to avoid perspiration when they were occupied in sacred upon what is unlawful; that they may not pollute what is holy, nor pollute themselves with what is profane. Ministers must take pains to cause "people to discern between the unclean and the clean," that they may not confound the distinctions between right and wrong, nor mistake concerning them, so as to put darkness for light, and light for darkness, but may have a good judgment of discretion concerning their own actions.

2. It was part of their business to judge upon appeals made to them, Deu. xvii. 8, 9; "And in controversy they shall stand in judgment," ver. 24. They shall have the honesty to stand up for what is right, and when they have passed a right judgment shall have the courage to stand to it, and stand by it. They must judge, not according to their own fancies or inclinations, or secular interest, but "according to my judgments;" that must be their rule and standard. Note, Ministers must decide controversies according to the word of God, "to the law and to the testimony;" sit liber judex,—'let the judge be unbiassed.' Their business is to keep courts in God's name,—to preside in the congregations of his people. And herein they must go by the statute book; they shall "keep my statutes in all mine assemblies." God calls the assemblies of his people his assemblies, because they are held in his name, to his glory. Ministers are the masters of those assemblies, are to preside in them, and in all their acts must keep close to God's laws. Another part of their work, as church governors, is to hallow God's sabbaths, to do the public work of that day with a becoming care and reverence, as the work of a holy day should be done; and to see that God's people also sanctify that day, and do nothing to pollute it.

Sixthly, Concerning their mourning for dead relations. The rule here agrees with the law of Moses, Lev. xxi. 1, 11. A priest shall not come near any dead body, (for they must be purified from dead works,) except of their next relations, ver. 25. Decent expressions of a pious sorrow for dear relations, when they are removed by death, is not disagreeable to the character of a minister. Yet by this approach to the dead body of a relation they contracted a ceremonial pollution, from which they must be cleansed by a sin offering before they went in again to minister, ver. 26, 27. Note, The sorrow for the dead is very allowable and commendable, yet there is danger of sinning in it, either by excess or dissimulation, and those tears have too often need to be wept over again.

Seventhly, Concerning their maintenance. They must live upon the altar at which they served, and live comfortably; ver. 27, "Ye shall give them no possession in Israel," no lands or tenements, lest they should be entangled with the affairs of this life; for God hath said, "I am their inheritance," and they need no other in reserve; "I am their possession," and they need no other in hand. Some land was allowed them, ch. xlviii. 10, but their principal subsistance was by their office. What God appropriated to himself they were the receivers of, to their own proper use and behoof. They lived upon the holy things, and so God himself was the portion both of their inheritance and of their cup. Note, Those who have God for their inheritance and their possession may be content with a little, and ought not to covet a great deal of the possessions and inheritances of this earth. If we have God, we have all; and therefore may well reckon that we have enough. Observe,

1. What the priests were to have from the people, for their maintenance and encouragement. 1st. They must have the flesh of many of the offerings, the sin offering and trespass offering, which would supply them and their families with flesh meat; and the meat offerings, which would supply them with bread. What we offer to God will redound to our own advantage. 2nd. They must have "every dedicated," devoted, "thing in Israel," which was in many cases to be turned into money, and given to the priest. This is explained, ver. 30; every oblation or freewill offering, which in times of reformation and devotion would be many and considerable, "of all, of every sort of your oblations, shall be the priest's." We have the law concerning them, Lev. xxvii. 3rd. They were to have the first of the dough when it was going to the oven, as well as the first of their fruits when they were going to the barn. God, who is the first, must have the first; and, if it belong to him, his priests must have it. We may then comfortably enjoy what we have when a share of it has been first set apart for works of piety and charity. To this the apostle's rule bears some analogy, to begin the week with laying by for pious uses, 1 Cor. xvi. 2. The priests being so well provided for, it would be inexcusable in them if they (contrary to the law which every Israelite is bound by) should eat that "which is torn, or dead of itself," ver. 31. Those that were in want of necessary food might perhaps expect to be dispensed with in such a case. Poverty has its temptations, but the priests were so well provided for that they could have no pretence for it.

2. What the people might expect from the priest for their recompense. Those who are kind to a prophet, to a priest, shall have a prophet's, a priest's, reward, "that he may cause the blessing to rest in thine house," ver. 30; that God may cause it, by commanding it; that the priests may cause it, by praying for it. And it was part of the priest's work to "bless the people in the name of the Lord;" not only their congregation, but their families. Note, It is all in all to the comfort of any house to have the blessing of God upon it, and to have the blessing to rest in it; to dwell where we dwell, and to attend the entail of it upon those who shall come after us. And the way to have the blessing of God abide upon our estates is to honour God with them, and to give him and his ministers, him and his poor, their share out of them God blesseth, he surely blesseth, the habitation of those who are thus just, Pr. iii. 33. And ministers, by instructing and praying for the families that are kind to them, should do their part towards causing the blessing to rest there. "Peace be to this house."

CHAPTER XLV.

In this chapter is farther represented to the prophet in vision, I. The division of the Holy Land: so much for the temple, and the priests that attended the service of it, ver. 1—4; so much for the Levites, ver. 5; so much for the city, ver. 6; so much for the prince, and the residue to the people, ver. 7, 8. II. The ordinances of justice that were given both to the prince and people, ver. 9—12. III. The oblations they were to offer, and the prince's part in those oblations, ver. 13—17; particularly in the beginning of the year, ver. 18—20; and in the passover and the feast of tabernacles, ver. 21—25. And all this seems to point at the new church state that should be set up under the Gospel, which, both for extent and purity, should far exceed that of the Old Testament.

MOREOVER, when ye shall divide by lot the land for inheritance, ye shall offer an oblation unto the LORD, an holy portion of the land: the length shall be the length of five and twenty thousand reeds, and the breadth shall be ten thousand. This shall be holy in all the borders thereof round about. 2 Of this there shall be for the sanctuary five hundred in length, with five hundred in breadth, square round about; and fifty cubits round about for the suburbs thereof. 3 And of this measure shalt thou measure the length of five and twenty thousand, and the breadth of ten thousand: and in it shall be the sanctuary and the most holy place. 4 The holy portion of the land shall be for the priests the ministers of the sanctuary, which shall come near to minister unto the LORD: and it shall be a place for their houses, and an holy place for the sanctuary. 5 And the five and twenty thousand of length, and the ten thousand of breadth, shall also the Levites, the ministers of the house, have for themselves, for a possession for twenty chambers. 6 And ye shall appoint the possession of the city five thousand broad, and five and twenty thousand long, over against the oblation of the holy portion: it shall be for the whole house of Israel. 7 And a portion shall be for the prince on the one side and on the other side of the oblation of the holy portion, and of the possession of the city, before the oblation of the holy portion, and before the possession of the city, from the west side westward, and from the east side eastward: and the length shall be over against one of the portions, from the west border unto the east border. 8 In the land shall be his possession in Israel: and my princes shall no more oppress my people; and the rest of the land shall they give to the house of Israel according to their tribes.

Directions are here given for the dividing of the land after their return to it, and God having warranted them to do it, it would be an act of faith, and not of folly, thus to divide it before they had it; and it would be welcome news to the captives to hear that they should not only return to their own land, but that, whereas they were now but few in number, they should increase and multiply, so as to replenish it. But this never had its accomplishment in the Jewish state after their return out of captivity, but was to be fulfilled in the model of the Christian church, which was perfectly new, (as this division of the land was quite different from that in Joshua's time,) and much enlarged by the accession of the Gentiles to it, and will be perfected in the heavenly kingdom, of which the land of Canaan had always been a type. Now,

First. Here is the portion of land assigned to the sanctuary, in the midst of which the temple was to be built, with all its courts and purlieus; the rest round about it was for the priests. This is called, ver. 1, "An oblation to the Lord;" for what is given in works of piety, for the maintenance and support of the worship of God and the advancement of religion, God accepts as given to him, if it be done with a single eye. It is a "holy portion of the land" which is to be set out first as the firstfruits that sanctify the lump. The appropriating of lands for the support of religion and the ministry is an act of piety that bids as fair for perpetuity, and the benefit of posterity, as any other. This "holy portion of the land" was to be measured, and the borders of it fixed, that the sanctuary itself might not have more than its share, and in time engross the whole land. So far the lands of the church shall extend, and no farther, as in our own kingdom donations to the church were of old limited by the statute of mortmain. The lands here allotted to the sanctuary were five and twenty thousand reeds (so our translation makes it, though some make them only cubits,) in length, and ten thousand in breadth; about eighty miles one way, and thirty miles another way, say some; five-and-twenty miles one way, and ten miles the other way, so others. The priests and Levites that were to come near to minister were to have their dwellings in this portion of land that was round about the sanctuary, that they might be near their work; whereas, by their distribution of the land in Joshua's time, the cities of the priests and Levites were dispersed all the nation over. This intimates that gospel ministers should reside upon their charge; where their service lies, there must they live.

Secondly. Next to the lands of the sanctuary the city lands are assigned, in which the holy city was to be built, and with the issues and profits of which the citizens were to be maintained; ver. 6, "It shall be for the whole house of Israel," not appropriated, as before, to one tribe or two, but some of all the tribes shall dwell in the city, as we find they did, Neh. xi. 1, 2. The portion for the city was full as long, but only half as broad, as that for the sanctuary, for the city was enriched by trade, and therefore had the less need of lands.

Thirdly. The next allotment, after the church lands and the city lands, is of the crown lands, ver. 7, 8. Here is no admeasurement of these, but they are said to lie on the one side and on the other side of the church lands and city lands, to intimate that the prince, with his wealth and power, was to be a protection to both. Some make the prince's share equal to the church's and city's share both together; others make it to be a thirteenth part of the rest of the services. With respect to the prohibition to shave their heads, it is well known that the Egyptian priests shaved their heads and also left them uncovered. Hence Jerome thought the rule for the priests of Israel was given to distinguish them from those of Serapis and Isis. But to show how little ground we have for such a conclusion, it is enough to note that Herodotus says, "The Egyptians are forbidden by their religion either to be buried or to enter any sacred edifice wearing vests of wool" (Book II., chap. 81). He goes on to say those who have been initiated in the Orphic and Pythagorean mysteries could not be interred in woollen, for which a sacred reason was assigned.

xliv. 22. The latter clause may be more closely rendered, "They shall take virgins of the seed of the house of Israel, or the widow who is the widow of a priest." Thus, while a priest might marry a wife belonging to any tribe, the widow of a priest was the only widow he could marry.

land, the other twelve being for the twelve tribes. The prince that attends continually to the administration of public affairs must have wherewithal to support his dignity and have abundance, that he may not be in temptation to oppress the people, which yet, with many, doth not prevent that. But the grace of God shall prevent it, for it is promised here, "My princes shall no more oppress my people," for God will make the officers peace, and the exactors righteousness. Notwithstanding this, we find that after the return of the Jews to their own land the princes were complained of for their exactions; but Nehemiah was one that did not do as the former governors, and yet kept a handsome court, Neh. v. 15, 18. But so much is said of the prince, in this mystical holy state, to intimate that in the gospel church magistrates should be as nursing fathers to it, and Christian princes its patrons and protectors; and the holy religion they profess, as far as they are subject to the power of it, will restrain them from oppressing God's people, because they are more his people than theirs.

Fourthly. The rest of the lands were to be distributed to the people according to their tribes, who had reason to think themselves well settled, when they had both the testimony of Israel and the throne of judgment so near them.

9 Thus saith the Lord GOD; Let it suffice you, O princes of Israel: remove violence and spoil, and execute judgment and justice, take away your exactions from my people, saith the Lord GOD. 10 Ye shall have just balances, and a just ephah, and a just bath. 11 The ephah and the bath shall be of one measure, that the bath may contain the tenth part of an homer, and the ephah the tenth part of an homer: the measure thereof shall be after the homer. 12 And the shekel shall be twenty gerahs: twenty shekels, five and twenty shekels, fifteen shekels, shall be your maneh.

We have here some general rules of justice laid down both for prince and people, the rules of distributive and commutative justice; for godliness without honesty is but a form of godliness, will neither please God nor avail to the benefit of any people. Be it therefore enacted by the authority of the church's King and God,

First. That princes do not oppress their subjects, but duly and faithfully administer justice among them; ver. 9, "Let it suffice you, O princes of Israel," that you have been oppressive to the people, and have enriched yourselves by spoil and violence, that you have so long fleeced the flock instead of feeding them, and from henceforward do so no more. Note, Even princes and great men, that have long done amiss, must at length think it time, high time, to reform and amend; for no prescription will justify a wrong. Instead of saying they have been long accustomed to oppress, and therefore may persist in it, (for the custom will bear them out,) they should say they have been long accustomed to it, and therefore, as here, let the time past suffice, and let them now remove "violence and spoil;" let them drop wrongful demands, cancel wrongful usages, and turn out those from employments under them that do violence; let them "take away their exactions," ease their subjects of those taxes which they find lie heavy upon them; and let them "execute judgment and justice" according to law, as the duty of their place requires. Note, All princes, but especially the princes of Israel, are concerned to do justice; for of their people God saith, They are my people; and they in a special manner rule for God.

Secondly. That one neighbour doth not cheat another in commerce; ver. 10, "Ye shall have just balances," in which to weigh both money and goods, a just ephah, for dry measure of corn and flour, a just bath, for the measure of liquids, wine and oil; and the ephah and bath shall be of one measure, the tenth part of a chomer or cor, ver. 11. So that the ephah and bath contained (as the learned Dr. Cumberland has computed) seven wine gallons and four pints, and something more. An omer was but the tenth part of an ephah, Ex. xvi. 36, and the hundredth part of a chomer or homer, and contained about six pints. The shekel is here settled, ver. 13; it is twenty gerahs, just half a Roman ounce,—in our money two shillings and fourpence farthing and almost the eighth part of a farthing, as the aforesaid learned man exactly computes it. By the shekels the maneh or pound was reckoned, which, when it was set for a mere weight, (saith Bishop Cumberland,) without respect to coinage, contained just a hundred shekels, as appears by comparing 1 Kin. x. 17, where it is said three manehs or pounds of gold went to one shield, with the parallel place, 2 Chr. ix. 16, where it is said three hundred shekels of gold went to one shield. But when the maneh is set for a sum of money or coin it contains but sixty shekels, as appears here, where twenty shekels, five-and-twenty shekels, and fifteen shekels, which in all make sixty, shall be the maneh. But it is thus reckoned because they had one piece of money that weighed twenty shekels, another five and twenty, another fifteen, all which made up one pound, as a learned writer here observes. Note, It concerns God's Israel to be very honest and just in all their dealings, very punctual and exact in rendering to all their due, very cautious to do wrong to none, because otherwise they spoil the acceptableness of their profession with God and the reputation of it before men.

13 This is the oblation that ye shall offer; the sixth part of an ephah of an homer of wheat, and ye shall give the sixth part of an ephah of an homer of barley: 14 Concerning the ordinance of oil, the bath of oil, ye shall offer the tenth part of a bath out of the cor, which is an homer of ten baths; for ten baths are an homer: 15 And one lamb out of the flock, out of two hundred, out of the fat pastures of Israel; for a meat offering, and for a burnt offering, and for peace offerings, to make reconciliation for them, saith the Lord GOD. 16 All the people of the land shall give this oblation for the prince in Israel. 17 And it shall be the prince's part to give burnt offerings, and meat offerings, and drink offerings, in the feasts, and in the new moons, and in the sabbaths, in all solemnities of the house of Israel: he shall prepare the sin offering, and the meat offering, and the burnt offering, and the peace offerings, to make reconciliation for the house of Israel. 18 Thus saith the Lord GOD; In the first month, in the first day of the month, thou shalt take a young bullock without blemish, and cleanse the sanctuary: 19 And the priest shall take of the blood of the sin offering, and put it upon the posts of the house, and upon the four corners of the settle of the altar, and upon the posts of the gate of the inner court. 20 And so thou shalt do the seventh day of the month for every one that erreth, and for him that is simple: so shall ye reconcile the house. 21 In the first month, in the fourteenth day of the month, ye shall have the passover, a feast of seven days; unleavened bread shall be eaten. 22 And upon that day shall the prince prepare for himself and for all the people of the land a bullock for a sin offering. 23 And seven days of the feast he shall prepare a burnt offering to the LORD, seven bullocks and seven rams without blemish daily the seven days; and a kid of the goats daily for a sin offering. 24 And he shall prepare a meat offering of an ephah for a bullock, and an ephah for a ram, and an hin of oil for an ephah. 25 In the seventh month, in the fifteenth day of the month, shall he do the like in the feast of the seven days, according to the sin offering, according to the burnt offering, and according to the meat offering, and according to the oil.

Having laid down the rules of righteousness towards men, which is really a branch of true religion, he comes next to give some directions for their religion towards God, which is a branch of universal righteousness.

First. It required that they offer an oblation to the Lord out of what they have, ver. 13; "All the people of the land" must give an oblation, ver. 16. As God's tenants they must pay a quit rent to their great Landlord. They had offered an oblation out of their real estates, ver. 1, "a holy portion of their land;" now they are directed to offer an oblation out of their personal estates, their goods and chattels, as an acknowledgment of their receivings from him, their dependence on him, and their obligations to him. Note, Whatever our substance is we must honour God with it by giving him his dues out of it. Not that God has need of, or may be benefited by, any thing that we can give him, Ps. l. 9; no, it is but an oblation. We only offer it to him; the benefit of it returns back to ourselves, to his poor, who, as our neighbours, are ourselves, or to his ministers who serve continually for our good.

Secondly. The proportion of this oblation is here determined, which was not done by the law of Moses. No mention is made of the tithe, but only of this oblation; and the quantum of this is thus settled: 1. Out of their corn they were to offer a sixtieth part; out of every homer of wheat and barley, which contained ten ephahs, they were to offer the sixth part of one ephah, which was a sixtieth part of the whole, ver. 13. 2. Out of their oil (and probably their wine too) they were to offer a hundredth part for this oblation; out of every cor or homer, which contained ten baths, they were to offer the tenth part of one bath, ver. 14. This was given to the altar, for in every meat offering there was flour mingled with oil. 3. Out of their flocks they were to give one lamb out of two hundred. That was the smallest proportion of all, ver. 15; but it must be out of the fat pastures of Israel. They must not offer to God that which was taken up from the common, but the fattest and best they had, for burnt offerings and peace offerings. The former were offered for the giving of glory, to God, the latter for the fetching in of mercy, grace, and peace from God, and in our spiritual sacrifices these are our two great errands at the throne of grace; but, in order to the acceptance of both, these sacrifices were to make reconciliation for them. Christ is our sacrifice of atonement, by whom reconciliation is made, and to him we must have an eye in our sacrifices of acknowledgment.

Thirdly. This oblation must be given for "the prince in Israel," ver. 16. Some read it 'to the prince,' and understand it of Christ, who is indeed the Prince in Israel, to whom we must offer our oblations, and into whose hand we must put them to be presented to the Father. Or, they shall give it with the prince; xliv. 29. The thing here called "dedicated" is elsewhere represented by our translators as "devoted," "accursed," and "appointed to destruction." The word is cherem, and obtained the idea of anathema, excommunication, and setting aside. It could be applied to a man, one of the lower animals, a house, a piece of ground, or anything else. From the same root comes the haram, or harem of the Arabs (as if prohibited, interdicted, or reserved), and Moharram, the first month of the Mohammedan year. There is no instance in which the term cherem means an offering or sacrifice to God, though it often denotes that which is renounced by men and left for God to deal with. Such a thing might be claimed by the priests, and would almost of necessity come under their jurisdiction, as the executive ministers of the theocratic law.

xlv. 1, 2. Critics are still divided in opinion as to the measurements in this passage. According to some the numbers relate to cubits, while others think they are "reeds" or rods of six cubits each every private person shall bring his oblation to be offered with that of the prince. For it follows, ver. 17, "It shall be the prince's part" to provide all the offerings, "to make reconciliation for the house of Israel." The people were to bring their oblations to him, according to the foregoing rules, and he was to bring them to the sanctuary, and to make up what fell short out of his own. Note, It is the duty of rulers to take care of religion, and to see that the duties of it be regularly and carefully performed by those under their charge, and that nothing be wanting that is requisite thereto. The magistrate is the keeper of both tables; and it is a happy time when those that are above others, in power and dignity, go before them in the service of God.

Fourthly. Some particular solemnities are here appointed.

1. Here is one in the beginning of the year, which seems to be altogether new, and not instituted by the law of Moses. It is the annual solemnity of cleansing the sanctuary. 1st. On the first day of the first month, upon new-year's day, they were to offer a sacrifice for the cleansing of the sanctuary, ver. 18; that is, to make atonement for the iniquity of the holy things the year past, that they might bring none of the guilt of them into the services of the new year, and to implore grace for the preventing of that iniquity, and for the better performance of the service of the sanctuary the ensuing year; and in token of this the blood of this sin offering was to be put upon the posts of the temple, the four corners, not of the altar, but "the settle of the altar," and "the posts of the gate of the inner court," ver. 19, to signify that by it atonement was intended to be made for the sins of all the servants that attended that house, priests, Levites, and people, even the sins that were found in all their services. Note, Even sanctuaries on earth need cleansing, frequent cleansing; that above needs none. Those that worship God together should often join in renewing their repentance for their manifold defects, and applying the blood of Christ for the pardon of them, and in renewing their covenants to be more careful for the future; and it is very seasonable to begin the year with this work, as Hezekiah did when it had been long neglected, 2 Chr. xxix. 17. They were here appointed to cleanse the sanctuary upon the first day of the month, because on the fourteenth day of the month they were to eat the passover, an ordinance which, of all other the Old Testament institutions, had most in it of Christ and gospel grace, and therefore it was very fit they should begin to prepare for it a fortnight before, by cleansing the sanctuary. 2nd. This sacrifice was to be repeated on the seventh day of the first month, ver. 20. And then it was intended to make atonement "for every one that erreth, and for him that is simple." Note, He that sins, errs, and is simple; he mistakes, he goes out of the way, and shews himself to be foolish and unwise. But here it is spoken of those sins which are committed through ignorance, mistake, or inadvertency, whether by any of the priests, or of the Levites, or of the people. Such sins, sacrifices were appointed to atone for, which men were surprised into, did before they were aware, which they would not have done if they had known and remembered aright, which they were overtaken in, and for which afterwards they condemn themselves; but for presumptuous sins, committed with a high hand, there was no sacrifice appointed, Num. xv. 30. By these repeated sacrifices ye shall reconcile the house, that is, God will be reconciled to it, and continue the tokens of his presence in it, and will let it alone this year also.

2. The passover was to be religiously observed at the time appointed, ver. 21. Christ is our passover that is sacrificed for us; we celebrate the memorial of that sacrifice, and feast upon it,—triumphing in our deliverance out of the Egyptian slavery of sin, and our preservation from the sword of the destroying angel, the sword of Divine justice,—in the Lord's supper, which is our passover feast, as the whole Christian life is, and must be, the feast of unleavened bread. It is here appointed that the prince shall prepare a sin offering, to be offered "for himself and the people;" a bullock on the first day, ver. 21, and a kid of the goats every other day, ver. 23, to teach us, in all our attendance upon God for communion with him, to have an eye to the great sin offering, by which transgression was finished, and an everlasting righteousness brought in. On every day of the feast there was to be a burnt offering, purely for the honour of God, of no less than seven bullocks and seven rams, with their meat offering, which were wholly consumed upon the altar, and yet no waste, ver. 23, 24.

3. The feast of tabernacles is that spoken of next, ver. 25, and no mention of the feast of pentecost, which came between that of the passover and that of the tabernacles. Orders are here given (above what were given by the law of Moses) for the same sacrifices to be offered during the seven days of the passover. See the deficiency of the legal sacrifices for sin; they were therefore often repeated, not only every year, but every feast, every day of the feast, because "they could not make the comers thereunto perfect," Heb. x. 1, 3. See the necessity of our frequently repeating the same religious exercises. Though the sacrifice of atonement is offered once for all, yet the sacrifices of acknowledgment, that of a broken heart, that of a thankful heart, must be every day offered, those spiritual sacrifices which are acceptable to God through Christ Jesus. We should, as here, fall into a method of holy duties, and stick to it.

CHAPTER XLVI.

In this chapter we have, I. Some farther rules given both to the priests and to the people relating to their worship, ver. 1—15. II. A law concerning the prince's disposal of his inheritance, ver. 16—18. III. A description of the places provided for the boiling of the sacrifices and the baking of the meat offerings, ver. 19—24.

THUS saith the Lord GOD; The gate of the inner court that looketh toward the east shall be shut the six working days; but on the sabbath it shall be opened, and in the day of the new moon it shall be opened. 2 And the prince shall enter by the way of the porch of that gate without, and shall stand by the post of the gate, and the priests shall prepare his burnt offering and his peace offerings, and he shall worship at the threshold of the gate: then he shall go forth; but the gate shall not be shut until the evening. 3 Likewise the people of the land shall worship at the door of this gate before the LORD in the sabbaths and in the new moons. 4 And the burnt offering that the prince shall offer unto the LORD in the sabbath day shall be six lambs without blemish, and a ram without blemish. 5 And the meat offering shall be an ephah for a ram, and the meat offering for the lambs as he shall be able to give, and an hin of oil to an ephah. 6 And in the day of the new moon it shall be a young bullock without blemish, and six lambs, and a ram: they shall be without blemish. 7 And he shall prepare a meat offering, an ephah for a bullock, and an ephah for a ram, and for the lambs according as his hand shall attain unto, and an hin of oil to an ephah. 8 And when the prince shall enter, he shall go in by the way of the porch of that gate, and he shall go forth by the way thereof. 9 But when the people of the land shall come before the LORD in the solemn feasts, he that entereth in by the way of the north gate to worship shall go out by the way of the south gate; and he that entereth by the way of the south gate shall go forth by the way of the north gate: he shall not return by the way of the gate whereby he came in, but shall go forth over against it. 10 And the prince in the midst of them, when they go in, shall go in; and when they go forth, shall go forth. 11 And in the feasts and in the solemnities the meat offering shall be an ephah to a bullock, and an ephah to a ram, and to the lambs as he is able to give, and an hin of oil to an ephah. 12 Now when the prince shall prepare a voluntary burnt offering or peace offerings voluntarily unto the LORD, one shall then open him the gate that looketh toward the east, and he shall prepare his burnt offering and his peace offerings, as he did on the sabbath day: then he shall go forth; and after his going forth one shall shut the gate. 13 Thou shalt daily prepare a burnt offering unto the LORD of a lamb of the first year without blemish: thou shalt prepare it every morning. 14 And thou shalt prepare a meat offering for it every morning, the sixth part of an ephah, and the third part of an hin of oil, to temper with the fine flour; a meat offering continually by a perpetual ordinance unto the LORD. 15 Thus shall they prepare the lamb, and the meat offering, and the oil, every morning for a continual burnt offering.

Whether the rules for public worship here laid down were designed to be observed, even in those things wherein they differed from the law of Moses, and were so observed under the second temple, is not certain; we find not in the history of that latter part of the Jewish church that they governed themselves in their worship by these ordinances, as one would think they should have done, but only by the law of Moses, looking upon this then, in the next age after, as mystical, and not literal. We may observe, in these verses,

First. That the place of worship was fixed, and rules given concerning that, both to prince and people.

1. The east gate, which was kept shut at other times, was to be opened on the sabbath days, in the new moons, ver. 1, and whenever the prince offered a voluntary offering, ver. 12. Of the keeping of this gate ordinarily shut we read before, ch. xliv. 2, whereas the other gates of the court were opened every day, this only on high days, and on special occasions, when it was opened for the prince, who was to go in "by the way of the porch of that gate," ver. 2, and again, ver. 8. Some think he went in with the priests and Levites into the inner court, (for into that court this gate was the entrance,) and they observe that magistrates and ministers should join forces, and go the same way, hand in hand, in promoting the service of God. But it should rather seem that he did not go through the gate, (as the glory of the Lord had done,) though it was open, but he went "by the way of the porch of the gate," stood "at the post of (chap. xl. 5). Whatever is meant, no such division of the land was ever made, whence it is concluded by many that the language is figurative or symbolical.

xlv. 12. This verse is very difficult to understand. As translated the maneh is represented as equal to fifteen, twenty, and twenty-five shekels respectively. This is of course not impossible, because the maneh may have been like our "pound," a word of varied signification, in which fact we have the clue to a rational interpretation. Another method proposed is to add the numbers twenty, twenty-five, and fifteen together, and to regard the maneh as equal to sixty shekels. Whichever mode be adopted, it is urged by many that there is some error in the numbers. Without speaking dogmatically, we may observe that as two kinds of maneh at least were used among the Babylonians, so there may have been more than one among the Jews. It is also possible that the numbers in the Hebrew text require revision.

the gate," and "worshipped at the threshold of the gate," ver. 2, where he had a full view of the priests' performances at the altar, and signified his concurrence in them, for himself, and for the people of the land, that stood behind him at the door of that gate, ver. 3. Thus must every prince shew himself to be of David's mind, who would very willingly be "a doorkeeper in the house of his God," and, as the word there is, "lie at the threshold," Ps. lxxxiv. 10. Note, The greatest of men are less than the least of the ordinances of God. Even princes themselves, when they draw near to God, must worship with reverence and godly fear, owning that even they are unworthy to approach him. But Christ is our prince, whom God causeth to draw near, and approach to him, Jer. xxx. 21.

2. As to the north gate and south gate, by which they entered into the court of the people, (not into the inner court,) there was this rule given, that whoever came in at the north gate should go out at the south gate, and whoever came in at the south gate should go out at the north gate, ver. 9. Some think this was to prevent thrusting and jostling one another; for God is the God of order, and not of confusion. We may suppose they came in at the gate that was next their own houses; but when they went away God would have them go out at that gate which would lead them the farthest way about, that they might have time for meditation. Being thereby obliged to go a great way round the sanctuary, they might have an opportunity to consider the palaces of it; and, if they improved their time well in fetching this circuit, they would call it the next way home. Some observe that this may remind us in the service of God to be still pressing forward, Phil. iii. 13, and not to look back; and, in our attendance upon ordinances, not to go back as we came, but more holy, and heavenly, and spiritual.

3. It is appointed that the people shall worship at the door of the east gate, where the prince doth; he at the head, and they attending him, both in the sabbaths and in the new moons, ver. 3, and that when they come in, and go out, the prince shall be "in the midst of them," ver. 10. Note, Great men should, by their constant and reverend attendance on God in public worship, give a good example to their inferiors, both engaging them and encouraging them to do likewise. It is a very graceful, becoming thing for persons of quality to go to church with their servants, and tenants, and poor neighbours about them, and to behave themselves there with an air of seriousness and devotion. And those who thus honour God with their honour he will delight to honour.

Secondly. That the ordinances of worship were fixed. Though the prince is supposed himself to be a very hearty, zealous friend to the sanctuary, yet it is not left to him, no, not in concert with the priests, to appoint what sacrifices shall be offered, but God himself appoints them; for it is his prerogative to institute the rites and ceremonies of religious worship.

1. Every morning, as duly as the morning came, they must offer a lamb for a burnt offering, ver. 13. It is strange that no mention is made of the evening sacrifice. But Christ being come, and having offered himself now in the end of the world, Heb. ix. 26, we are to look upon him as the evening sacrifice, about the time of the offering up of which he died.

2. On the sabbath days, whereas by the law of Moses four lambs were to be offered, Num. xxviii. 9, it is here appointed that (at the prince's charge) there shall be six lambs offered, and a ram beside, ver. 4; to intimate how much we should abound in sabbath work, now in gospel time, and what plenty of the spiritual sacrifices of prayer and praise we should offer up to God on that day. And if with such sacrifices God is well pleased, sure we have a great deal of reason to be so.

3. On the new moons, in the beginning of their months, there was, over and above the usual sabbath sacrifices, the additional offering of a young bullock, ver. 6. Those who do much for God and their souls, statedly and constantly, must, upon some occasions, do yet more.

4. All the sacrifices were to be without blemish. So Christ the great sacrifice was, 1 Pet. i. 19; and so Christians, who are to present themselves to God as living sacrifices, should aim and endeavour to be "blameless, and harmless, and without rebuke."

5. All the sacrifices were to have their meat offerings annexed to them; for so the law of Moses had appointed, to shew what a good table God keeps in his house, and that we ought to honour him with the fruit of our ground, as well as with the fruit of our cattle, because in both he hath blessed us, Deu. xxviii. 4. In the beginning Cain offered the one and Abel the other. Some observe that the meat offerings here are much larger in proportion than they were by the law of Moses. Then it was three tenth-deals to a bullock, and two to a ram, (that is, so many tenth-parts of an ephah,) and half a hin of oil at the most, Num. xv. 6—9; but here, for every bullock and every ram, a whole ephah and a whole hin of oil, ver. 7. These unbloody sacrifices shall be more abounded in. Or, in general, it intimates that as now, under the Gospel, God abounds in the gifts of his grace to us more than under the law, so we should abound in the returns of praise and duty to him. But it is observable that, in the meat offering for the lambs, the prince is allowed to offer "as he shall be able to give," ver. 5, 7, "as his hand shall attain unto;" so likewise, ver. 11. Note, Princes themselves must spend as they can afford; and even in that which is laid out in works of piety God expects and requires but that we should do according to our ability, every man "as God hath prospered him," 1 Cor. xvi. 2. God hath not "made us to serve with an offering," Isa. xliii. 23, but considers our frame and state. Yet this will not countenance those who pretend a disability that is not real, or those who, by their extravagances in other things, disable themselves to do the good they should. And we find those praised who, in an extraordinary case of charity, went not only to their power, but beyond their power.

16 Thus saith the Lord GOD; If the prince give a gift unto any of his sons, the inheritance thereof shall be his sons'; it shall be their possession by inheritance. 17 But if he give a gift of his inheritance to one of his servants, then it shall be his to the year of liberty; after it shall return to the prince: but his inheritance shall be his sons' for them. 18 Moreover the prince shall not take of the people's inheritance by oppression, to thrust them out of their possession; but he shall give his sons inheritance out of his own possession: that my people be not scattered every man from his possession.

We have here a law for the limiting the power of the prince in the disposin of the crown lands,

First. If he has a son that is a favourite, or has merited well, he may, if he pleaseth, as a token of his favour, and in recompense for his services, settle some parts of his lands upon him and his heirs for ever, ver. 16, provided it do not go out of the family. There may be a cause for parents, when their children are grown up, to be more kind to one than to another, as Jacob gave to Joseph one portion above his brethren, Gen. xlviii. 22.

Secondly. Yet, if he have a servant that is a favourite, he may not in like manner settle lands upon him, ver. 17; but if he see cause he may give him lands to the year of jubilee, and then they must return to the family again, ver. 17. The servant might have the rents, issues, and profits, for such a term, but the inheritance, the jus proprietarium,—'the right of proprietorship,' shall remain in the prince and his heirs. It was fit a difference should be put between a child and a servant, like that Jno. viii. 35, "the servant abideth not in the house for ever," as the son doth.

Thirdly. What estates he gives his children must be of his own; ver. 18, "He shall not take of the people's inheritance," under pretence of having many children to provide for. He shall not find ways to make them forfeit their estates, or to force them to sell them, and so thrust his subjects out of their possession, but let him and his sons be content with their own. It is far from being a prince's honour to increase the wealth of his family and crown by encroaching upon the rights and properties of his subjects; nor will he himself be a gainer by it at last, for he will be but a poor prince when the people are "scattered every man from his possession," when they quit their native country, being forced out of it by oppression, choosing rather to live among strangers that are free people, and where what they have they can call their own, be it never so little. It is the interest of princes to rule in the hearts of their subjects, and then all they have is in the best manner at their service. It is better for themselves to gain their affections by protecting their rights than to gain their estates by invading them.

19 After he brought me through the entry, which was at the side of the gate, into the holy chambers of the priests, which looked toward the north: and, behold, there was a place on the two sides westward. 20 Then said he unto me, This is the place where the priests shall boil the trespass offering and the sin offering, where they shall bake the meat offering; that they bear them not out into the utter court, to sanctify the people. 21 Then he brought me forth into the utter court, and caused me to pass by the four corners of the court; and, behold, in every corner of the court there was a court. 22 In the four corners of the court there were courts joined of forty cubits long and thirty broad: these four corners were of one measure. 23 And there was a row of building round about in them, round about them four, and it was made with boiling places under the rows round about. 24 Then said he unto me, These are the places of them that boil, where the ministers of the house shall boil the sacrifice of the people.

We have here a farther discovery of buildings about the temple which we did not observe before, and those were places to boil the flesh of the offerings, ver. 20. He that kept such a plentiful table at his altar had need have large kitchens; and a wise builder will provide conveniences of that kind. Observe,

First. Where those boiling places were situated. There were some at the entry into the inner court, ver. 19; and others under the rows, in the four corners of the outer court, ver. 21—23. These were the places where it is likely there was most room to spare for this purpose; and this purpose was found for the spare room, that none might be lost. Pity holy ground should be waste ground.

Secondly. What use they were put to. In those places they were to "boil the trespass offering, and the sin offering," those parts of them which were allotted to the priests, and which were more sacred than the flesh of the peace offerings, of which the offerers also had a share. There also they were to bake the meat offering, their share of it which they had from the altar for their own tables, ver. 20. Care was taken that they "bear them not out into the outer court to sanctify the people." Let them not pretend to sanctify the people with this holy flesh, and so impose upon them. Or, let not the people imagine that by touching these sacred things they were sanctified, and made ever the better or more acceptable to God. It should seem by Hag. ii. 12, there were those that had such a conceit; and therefore the priests must not carry any of the holy flesh away with them lest they should encourage that conceit. Ministers must take heed of doing any thing to bolster up ignorant people in their superstitious vanities.

CHAPTER XLVII.

In this chapter we have, I. The vision of the holy waters,—their rise, extent, depth, and healing virtue, the plenty of fish in them, and an account of the trees growing on the banks of them, ver. 1—12. II. An appointment of the borders of the land of Canaan, which was to be divided by lot to the tribe of Israel, and the strangers who sojourned among them, ver. 13—23.

AFTERWARD he brought me again unto the door of the house; and, behold, waters issued out from under the threshold of the house eastward:

xlv. 15, 17, 20. In these verses, "to make reconciliation" and to "reconcile" might be better expressed "to make atonement for." In verse 20, "for every one that erreth, and for him that is simple," must be understood of those who go astray and are foolish or thoughtless.

xlv. 22. According to some Roman Catholic writers, chap. xliv. 2 teaches the perpetual virginity of Mary, the Lord's mother, the Lord himself being meant by "the prince" in verse 3. But here the prince is represented as needing to offer sacrifice for himself, and we are therefore compelled to reject the Romish view, as contrary to the analogy of Scripture, which declares that the Saviour was without sin.

xlvi. 2. In this chapter we have resumed the subject of the duties of the prince. These are not distinctively treated of in the law of Moses, and the reason evidently is that Ezekiel contemplates a kingly form of government, and prescribes accordingly. The altered cir-for the forefront of the house stood toward the east, and the waters came down from under from the right side of the house, at the south side of the altar. 2 Then brought he me out of the way of the gate northward, and led me about the way without unto the utter gate by the way that looketh eastward; and, behold, there ran out waters on the right side. 3 And when the man that had the line in his hand went forth eastward, he measured a thousand cubits, and he brought me through the waters; the waters were to the ancles. 4 Again he measured a thousand, and brought me through the waters; the waters were to the knees. Again he measured a thousand, and brought me through; the waters were to the loins. 5 Afterward he measured a thousand; and it was a river that I could not pass over: for the waters were risen, waters to swim in, a river that could not be passed over. 6 And he said unto me, Son of man, hast thou seen this? Then he brought me, and caused me to return to the brink of the river. 7 Now when I had returned, behold, at the bank of the river were very many trees on the one side and on the other. 8 Then said he unto me, These waters issue out toward the east country, and go down into the desert, and go into the sea: which being brought forth into the sea, the waters shall be healed. 9 And it shall come to pass, that every thing that liveth, which moveth, whithersoever the rivers shall come, shall live: and there shall be a very great multitude of fish, because these waters shall come thither: for they shall be healed; and every thing shall live whither the river cometh. 10 And it shall come to pass, that the fishers shall stand upon it from En-gedi even unto En-eglaim; they

l be a place to spread forth nets; their fish shall be according to their kinds, as the fish of the great sea, exceeding many. 11 But the miry places thereof and the marishes thereof shall not be healed; they shall be given to salt. 12 And by the river upon the bank thereof, on this side and on that side, shall grow all trees for meat, whose leaf shall not fade, neither shall the fruit thereof be consumed: it shall bring forth new fruit according to his months, because their waters they issued out of the sanctuary: and the fruit thereof shall be for meat, and the leaf thereof for medicine.

This part of Ezekiel's vision must so necessarily have a mystical and spiritual meaning that from thence we conclude the other parts of his vision hath so too; for it cannot be applied to the waters brought by pipes into the temple for the washing of the sacrifices, and the keeping of the temple clean, and the carrying off of those waters, for that would be to turn this pleasant river into a sink or common sewer. That prophecy, Zec xiv. 8, may explain it, of "living waters that shall go out from Jerusalem, half of them towards the former sea, and half of them towards the hinder sea;" and there is plainly a reference to this in St. John's vision of "a pure river of water of life," Rev. xxii. 1. That seems to represent the glory and joy, which is grace perfected. This here seems to represent the grace and joy, which is glory begun. Most interpreters agree that these waters signify the Gospel of Christ, which went forth from Jerusalem, and spread itself into the countries about, and the gifts and power of the Holy Ghost which accompanied it, and by virtue of which it spread itself far, and produced strange and blessed effects. Ezekiel had walked round the house again and again, and yet did not till now take notice of those waters; for God makes known his mind and will to his people, not all at once, but by degrees. Now observe,

First. The rise of these waters. He is not put to trace the streams to the fountain, but has the fountain-head first discovered to him; ver. 1, "Waters issued out from the threshold of the house eastward," and from "under the right side of the house," that is, the south side of the altar; and again, ver. 2, "There ran out waters on the right side," signifying that "from Zion should go forth the law, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem," Isa. ii. 3. There it was that the Spirit was poured out upon the apostles, and endowed them with the gift of tongues, that they might carry these waters to all nations. In the temple first they were to stand and "preach the words of this life," Acts v. 20; they must preach the Gospel to all nations, but must "begin at Jerusalem," Lu. xxiv. 47. But that is not all: Christ is the temple; he is the door, from him those living waters flow, out of his pierced side. It is the water that he gives us that is "the well of water which springs up," Jno. iv. 14; and it is by believing in him that we receive from him "rivers of living water;" and "this spake he of the Spirit," Jno. vii. 38, 39. The original of these waters was not above ground, but they sprang up from under the threshold; for the fountain of a believer's life is a mystery; it is hid with Christ in God, Col. iii. 3. Some observe that they came forth "on the right side of the house," to intimate that gospel blessings are right-hand blessings. It is also an encouragement to those who attend at wisdom's gates, at the posts of her doors, who are willing to lie at the threshold of God's house, as David was, that they lie at the fountain-head of comfort and grace. The very entrance into God's word gives light and life, Ps. cxix. 130. David speaks it to the praise of Zion, "All my springs are in thee," Ps. lxxxvii. 7. They came from the side of the altar; for it is in and by Jesus Christ, the great altar, who sanctifies our gifts to God, that God hath blessed us with spiritual blessings in holy, heavenly places. From God as the fountain, in him as the channel, flows the river which "makes glad the city of our God, the holy place of the tabernacles of the Most High," Ps. xlvi. 4. But observe how much the blessedness and joy of glorified saints in heaven exceed those of the best and happiest saints on earth. Here the streams of our comfort arise from under the threshold; there they proceed "from the throne," the throne "of God and of the lamb," Rev. xxi. 1.

Secondly. The progress and increase of these waters. They "went forth eastward," ver. 3, towards the east country, ver. 9; for so they were directed. The prophet and his guide followed the stream as it ran down from the holy mountains; and, when they had followed it about a thousand cubits, they went over across it to try the depth of it, and it was to the ancles, ver. 3; then they walked along on the bank of the river, on the other side, a thousand cubits more, and then, to try the depth of it, they waded through it the second time, and it was up to their knees, ver. 4; they walked along by it a thousand cubits more, and then forded it the third time, and then it was up to their middle, the waters were to the loins; they then walked a thousand cubits farther, and attempted to repass it the fourth time, but found it impracticable; the waters were risen, either by the addition of brooks, that fell into it above ground, or by springs under ground, so that they were "waters to swim in, a river that could not be passed over," ver. 5. Note, 1. The waters of the sanctuary are running waters, as those of a river, not standing waters, as those of a pond. The Gospel, when it was first preached, was still spreading farther. Grace in the soul is still pressing forwards; it is an active principle, plus ultra, —'onward still,' till it comes to perfection. 2. They are increasing waters. This river, as it runs constantly, so the farther it goes the fuller it grows. The gospel church was very small in its beginnings, like a little purling brook; but by degrees it came to be to the ankles, to the knees; many were added to it daily, and the grain of mustard seed grew up to be a great tree. The gifts of the Spirit increase by being exercised; and grace, where it is true, is growing like the light of the morning, which "shines more and more unto the perfect day." 3. It is good for us to follow these waters, and go along with them. Observe the progress of the Gospel in the world; observe the process of the work of grace in the heart; attend the motions of the blessed Spirit, and walk after them, under a Divine conduct, as Ezekiel here did. 4. It is good to be often searching into the things of God, and trying the depth of them; not only look on the surface of those waters, but go to the bottom of them, as far as we can; be often digging, often diving into the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven, as those who covet to be intimately acquainted with those things. 5. If we search into the things of God we shall find some things very plain and easy to be understood, as the waters that were but to the ankles; others more difficult, and which require a deeper search, as the waters to the knees, or the loins; and some quite beyond our reach, which we cannot penetrate into, or account for, but despairing to find the bottom, must, as St. Paul, sit down at the brink, and adore the depth, Rom. xi. 33. It has been often said that in the Scripture, like these waters of the sanctuary, there are some places so shallow that a lamb may wade through them, and others so deep that an elephant may swim in them. And it is our wisdom, as the prophet here, to begin with that which is most easy, and get our hearts washed with those things, before we proceed to that which is "dark and hard to be understood:" it is good to take our work before us.

Thirdly. The extent of this river. It "issues towards the east country;" but from thence it either divides itself into several streams, or fetcheth a compass so as that it goes down into the desert, and so goes into the sea, either into the Dead Sea, which lay south-east, or the sea of Tiberias, which lay north-east; or the great sea, which lay west, ver. 8. This was accomplished when the Gospel was preached with success throughout all the regions of Judæa and Samaria, Acts viii. 1, and afterwards the nations about, nay, and those that lay cumstances which the prophet has in view generally account for his numerous deviations from the old law.

xlvi. 23. Dr. Adam Clarke regards these as "uncovered apartments, where they kept fires for dressing those parts of the peace-offerings which were made in the Temple by individuals through a principle of devotion. On these their families and their friends feasted; and portions were sent to the poor, the widows, and the orphans." The language is not very clear, but this may be the idea. It is evidently intended to describe the culinary arrangements of the department, and to represent them as on an extensive scale.

xlvii. 1. It is necessary to take this account of the river which flowed from the sanctuary in a spiritual or figurative sense. No stream of any magnitude either did or could arise in such a situation. It is, however, so far in agreement with fact that the water from Jerusalem would fall into the Dead Sea somewhere near its north-western extremity, and to the east of the city.

most remote, even in the isles of the sea, were enlightened and leavened by it. The sound of it went forth to the end of the world; and the enemies of it could no more prevail to stop the progress of it than that of a mighty river.

Fourthly. The healing virtue of this river. The waters of the sanctuary, wherever they come, and have a free course, will be found a wonderful restorative. Being brought forth into the sea, the sulphureous lake of Sodom, that standing monument of Divine vengeance, even those "waters shall be healed," ver. 8; shall become sweet, and pleasant, and healthful. This intimates the wonderful and blessed change that the Gospel would make wheresoever it came in its power, as great a change, in respect both of character and condition, as the turning of the Dead Sea into a fountain of gardens. When children of wrath became children of love, and those that were dead in trespasses and sins were made alive, then this was fulfilled. The Gospel was as that salt which Elisha cast into the spring of the waters of Jericho, with which he healed them, 2 Kin. ii. 20, 21. Christ, coming into the world to be its physician, sent his Gospel as the great medicine, the pampharmacon; there is in it a remedy for every malady. Nay, wherever these rivers come they make things to live, ver. 9, both plants and animals; they are the water of life, Rev. xxii. 1, 17. Christ came that we may have life, and for that end he sends his Gospel; every thing shall live whither the river comes. The grace of God makes dead sinners alive, and living saints lively; every thing is made fruitful and flourishing by it. But its effect is according as it is received, and as the mind is prepared and disposed to receive it; for, ver. 11, the marshes and miry places thereof, that are settled in the mire of their own sinfulness, and will not be healed or settled in the moisture of their own righteousness, and think they need no healing, their doom is, they "shall not be healed." The same Gospel which to others is a savour of life unto life shall to them be a savour of death unto death; "They shall be given to salt," that is, to perpetual barrenness, Deu. xxix. 23. They that will not be watered with the grace of God, and made fruitful, shall be abandoned to their own hearts' lusts, and left for ever unfruitful. "He that is filthy, let him be filthy still." "Never fruit grow on thee more for ever." They shall be given to salt, that is, to be monuments of Divine justice, as Lot's wife that was turned into a pillar of salt, to season others.

Fifthly. The great plenty of fish that should be in this river. Every living moving thing shall be found here, shall live here, ver. 9; that is, shall come on and prosper, shall be the best of the kind, and shall increase greatly, so that there shall be "a very great multitude of fish, according to their kinds, as the fish of the great sea, exceeding many." There shall be as great plenty of the river fish, and as vast shoals of them, as there used to be of salt water fish, ver. 10. There shall be great numbers of Christians in the church, and those multiplying like fishes, in the rising generations and the dew of their youth. In the creation the waters brought forth the fish abundantly, Gen. i. 20, 21; and they still live in and by the waters that produced them. So believers are begotten by the word of truth, Jas. i. 18, and born by it, 1 Pet. i 23,—that river of God. By it they live, and from it they have their maintenance and subsistence; in the waters of the sanctuary they are as in their element, out of them they are as fish upon dry ground; so David was when he thirsted and panted for God, for the living God. Where the fish are known to be in abundance thither will the fishers flock, and there they will cast their nets; and therefore, to intimate the replenishing of these waters, and their being made every way useful, it is here foretold that the fishers shall stand upon the banks of this river, from Engedi, which lies on the border of the Dead Sea, to Eneglaim, another city, that joins to that sea, and all along shall spread their nets. The Dead Sea, which before was shunned as noisome and noxious, shall be frequented. Gospel grace makes those persons and places which were unprofitable and good for nothing to become serviceable to God and man.

Sixthly. The trees that were on the banks of this river, many trees on the one side and on the other, ver. 12, which made the prospect very pleasant and agreeable to the eye. The shelter of these trees also would be a convenience to the fishery; but that is not all, ver. 12, they are "trees for meat," and the fruit of them shall not be consumed, for it shall produce fresh fruit every month. The leaf shall be "for medicine," and it "shall not fade." This part of the vision is copied out into St. John's vision very exactly, Rev. xxii. 2, where, on either side of the river, is said to grow the tree of life, which yielded her fruit every month, and the leaves were for the healing of the nations. Christians are supposed to be these trees, ministers especially; "Trees of righteousness, the planting of the Lord," Isa. lxi. 3; set by "the rivers of water," the waters of the sanctuary, Ps. i. 3; grafted into Christ, the tree of life, and by virtue of their union with him made trees of life too, rooted in him, Col. ii. 7. There is a great variety of these trees, through the diversity of gifts with which they are endued, by that one Spirit who worketh all in all. They grow on the bank of the river, for they keep close to holy ordinances, and through them derive from Christ sap and virtue. They are fruit trees, designed, as the fig-tree and the olive with their fruits, to honour God and man, Jud. ix. 9; "The fruit thereof shall be for meat," for the lips of the righteous feed many. The fruits of their righteousness are one way or other beneficial. The very leaves of these trees are for medicine; for bruises and sores, (margin.) Good Christians, with their good discourses, which are as their leaves, as well as with their charitable actions, which are as their fruits, do good to those about them; they strengthen the weak, and bind up the broken-hearted. Their cheerfulness doth good like a medicine, not only to themselves but to others also. They shall be enabled, by the grace of God, to persevere in their goodness and usefulness; "their leaf shall not fade," or lose its medicinal virtue, having not only life in their root, but sap in all their branches; their profession "shall not wither," Ps. i. 3, "neither shall the fruit thereof be consumed;" that is, they shall not lose the principle of their fruitfulness, but "shall still bring forth fruit in old age, to shew that the Lord is upright," Ps. xcii. 14. Or, the reward of their fruitfulness shall abide for ever; they bring forth fruit that shall abound to their account in the great day, fruit to life eternal; that is, indeed, fruit which shall not be consumed. They bring "new fruit according to their months," some in one month, and others in another; so that still there shall be one or other found to serve the glory of God for the purpose he designs. Or, each one of them shall bring forth fruit monthly, which notes an abundant disposition to fruit-bearing—they shall never be weary of well-doing; and a very happy climate, such as that there shall be a perpetual spring and summer. And the reason of this extraordinary fruitfulness is, because their waters "issued out of the sanctuary;" it is not to be ascribed to anything in themselves, but to the continual supplies of Divine grace with which they are watered every moment, Isa. xxvii. 3; for, whoever planted them, it was that which gave the increase.

13 Thus saith the Lord GOD; This shall be the border, whereby ye shall inherit the land according to the twelve tribes of Israel: Joseph shall have two portions. 14 And ye shall inherit it, one as well as another: concerning the which I lifted up mine hand to give it unto your fathers: and this land shall fall unto you for inheritance. 15 And this shall be the border of the land toward the north side, from the great sea, the way of Hethlon, as men go to Zedad; 16 Hamath, Berothah, Sibraim, which is between the border of Damascus and the border of Hamath; Hazar-hatticon, which is by the coast of Hauran. 17 And the border from the sea shall be Hazar-enan, the border of Damascus, and the north northward, and the border of Hamath. And this is the north side. 18 And the east side ye shall measure from Hauran, and from Damascus, and from Gilead, and from the land of Israel by Jordan, from the border unto the east sea. And this is the east side. 19 And the south side southward, from Tamar even to the waters of strife in Kadesh, the river to the great sea. And this is the south side southward. 20 The west side also shall be the great sea from the border, till a man come over against Hamath. This is the west side. 21 So shall ye divide this land unto you according to the tribes of Israel. 22 And it shall come to pass, that ye shall divide it by lot for an inheritance unto you, and to the strangers that sojourn among you, which shall beget children among you: and they shall be unto you as born in the country among the children of Israel: they shall have inheritance with you among the tribes of Israel. 23 And it shall come to pass, that in what tribe the stranger sojourneth, there shall ye give him his inheritance, saith the Lord GOD.

We are now to pass from the affairs of the sanctuary to those of the state; from the city to the country.

First. The land of Canaan is here secured to them for an inheritance; ver. 14, "I have lifted up my hand to give it unto your fathers," that is, promised it upon oath to them and their posterity. Though the possession had been a great while discontinued, yet God had not forgot his oath which he sware to their fathers. Though God's providences may for a time seem to contradict his promises, yet the promise will certainly take place at last, for God will be ever mindful of his covenant. "I lifted up my hand to give it," and therefore it shall without fail "fall to you for an inheritance." Thus the heavenly Canaan is sure to all the seed, because it is what God, that cannot lie, hath promised.

Secondly. It is here circumscribed, and the bounds and limits of it fixed, which they must not pass over to encroach upon their neighbours, and which their neighbours shall not break through to encroach upon them. We had such a draught of the borders of Canaan when Joshua was to put the people in possession of it, Num. xxxiv. 1, &c. That begins with the salt sea in the south, goes round, and ends there. This begins with Hamath, about Damascus in the north, and so goes round, and ends there, ver. 20. Note, It is God that appointeth the bounds of our habitation; and his Israel shall always have cause to say that the lines are fallen to them in pleasant places. The lake of Sodom is here called the East sea; for, it being healed by the waters of the sanctuary, it is no more to be called a salt sea, as it was in Numbers.

Thirdly. It is here ordered to be divided among the tribes of Israel, reckoning Joseph for two tribes, to make up the number of twelve, when Levi was taken out to attend the sanctuary, and had his lot adjoining to that, ver. 13, 21; "Ye shall inherit it one as well as another," ver. 14. The tribes shall have an equal share, one as much as another. As the tribes returned out of Babylon this seems unequal, because some tribes were much more numerous than other; and indeed, the most were of Judah and Benjamin, and very few of the other ten tribes. But as the twelve tribes stand in type and vision for the gospel church, the Israel of God, it was very equal, because we find in another vision an equal number of each of the twelve tribes sealed for the living God, just twelve thousand of each, Rev. vii. 5, &c.; and to those sealed ones these allotments did belong. It intimates, likewise, that all the subjects of Christ's kingdom have obtained like precious faith. Male and female, Jew and Gentile, bond and free, are all alike welcome to Christ, and made partakers of him.

Fourthly. The strangers that sojourn among them, "which shall beget children," and be built up into families, and so help to people their country, shall have inheritance among the tribes, as if they had been native Israelites, ver. 22, 23, which was by no means allowed in Joshua's division of the land. This is an act for a general naturalization, which would teach the Jews who was their neighbour, not those only of their own nation and religion, but those, whoever they were, that they had an opportunity of shewing kindness to, because from them they would be willing to receive kindness. It would likewise invite strangers to come and settle among them, and put themselves under the wings of the Divine majesty. But it certainly looks at gospel times, when the partition wall between Jew and Gentile was taken down, and both put upon a level before God, both made one in Christ, in whom "there is no difference." Rom. x. 12.

xlvii. 8. What is here called the "desert" seems to be the great natural depression in which the Dead Sea, here called "the sea," lies. As the waters of that sea are very salt, nauseous, and unwholesome, the "healing" of them must signify their being rendered sweet and wholesome.

xlvii. 10. The Dead Sea is no place for fishing, and probably fish do not exist in it, therefore the mention of fishermen and fish here is part of the symbolism, denoting an extraordinary change. Engedi is on the west of the Dead Sea, where there is a beautiful plain, and in the hills above it a copious fountain, the streams from which are fringed with abundant verdure. Eneglaim is only mentioned in this text, and its locality is not identified, though some have fixed it in Moab, north-east of the Dead Sea.

xlvii. 15—20. Some of the places mentioned in these verses are either unknown or uncertain. Such are Hethlon, Sibraim, and Hazar-hatticon, on the northern boundary. The line of the southern frontier

This land was a type of the heavenly Canaan, that better country, Heb. xi. 16, in which believing Gentiles shall have a blessed lot, as well as believing Jews, Isa. lvi. 3.

CHAPTER XLVIII.

In this chapter we have particular directions given for the distribution of the land, of which we had the metes and bounds assigned in the foregoing chapter. I. The portions of the twelve tribes: seven to the north of the sanctuary, ver. 1—7; and five to the south, ver. 23—29. II. The allotment of land for the sanctuary and the priests, ver. 8—11; for the Levites, ver. 12—14; for the city, ver. 15—20; and for the prince, ver. 21, 22. Much of this we had before, ch. xlv. III. A plan of the city, its gates, and the new name given to it, ver. 30—35; which seals up and concludes the vision and prophecy of this book.

NOW these are the names of the tribes. From the north end to the coast of the way of Hethlon, as one goeth to Hamath, Hazar-enan, the border of Damascus northward, to the coast of Hamath; for these are his sides east and west; a portion for Dan. 2 And by the border of Dan, from the east side unto the west side, a portion for Asher. 3 And by the border of Asher, from the east side even unto the west side, a portion for Naphtali. 4 And by the border of Naphtali, from the east side unto the west side, a portion for Manasseh. 5 And by the border of Manasseh, from the east side unto the west side, a portion for Ephraim. 6 And by the border of Ephraim, from the east side even unto the west side, a portion for Reuben. 7 And by the border of Reuben, from the east side unto the west side, a portion for Judah. 8 And by the border of Judah, from the east side unto the west side, shall be the offering which ye shall offer of five and twenty thousand reeds in breadth, and in length as one of the other parts, from the east side unto the west side: and the sanctuary shall be in the midst of it. 9 The oblation that ye shall offer unto the LORD shall be of five and twenty thousand in length, and of ten thousand in breadth. 10 And for them, even for the priests, shall be this holy oblation; toward the north five and twenty thousand in length, and toward the west ten thousand in breadth, and toward the east ten thousand in breadth, and toward the south five and twenty thousand in length: and the sanctuary of the LORD shall be in the midst thereof. 11 It shall be for the priests that are sanctified of the sons of Zadok; which have kept my charge, which went not astray when the children of Israel went astray, as the Levites went astray. 12 And this oblation of the land that is offered shall be unto them a thing most holy by the border of the Levites. 13 And over against the border of the priests the Levites shall have five and twenty thousand in length, and ten thousand in breadth: all the length shall be five and twenty thousand, and the breadth ten thousand. 14 And they shall not sell of it, neither exchange, nor alienate the firstfruits of the land: for it is holy unto the LORD. 15 And the five thousand, that are left in the breadth over against the five and twenty thousand, shall be a profane place for the city, for dwelling, and for suburbs: and the city shall be in the midst thereof. 16 And these shall be the measures thereof; the north side four thousand and five hundred, and the south side four thousand and five hundred, and on the east side four thousand and five hundred, and the west side four thousand and five hundred. 17 And the suburbs of the city shall be toward the north two hundred and fifty, and toward the south two hundred and fifty, and toward the east two hundred and fifty, and toward the west two hundred and fifty. 18 And the residue in length over against the oblation of the holy portion shall be ten thousand eastward, and ten thousand westward: and it shall be over against the oblation of the holy portion; and the increase thereof shall be for food unto them that serve the city. 19 And they that serve the city shall serve it out of all the tribes of Israel. 20 All the oblation shall be five and twenty thousand by five and twenty thousand: ye shall offer the holy oblation foursquare, with the possession of the city. 21 And the residue shall be for the prince, on the one side and on the other of the holy oblation, and of the possession of the city, over against the five and twenty thousand of the oblation toward the east border, and westward over against the five and twenty thousand toward the west border, over against the portions for the prince: and it shall be the holy oblation; and the sanctuary of the house shall be in the midst thereof. 22 Moreover from the possession of the Levites, and from the possession of the city, being in the midst of that which is the prince's, between the border of Judah and the border of Benjamin, shall be for the prince. 23 As for the rest of the tribes, from the east side unto the west side, Benjamin shall have a portion. 24 And by the border of Benjamin, from the east side unto the west side, Simeon shall have a portion. 25 And by the border of Simeon, from the east side unto the west side, Issachar a portion. 26 And by the border of Issachar, from the east side unto the west side, Zebulun a portion. 27 And by the border of Zebulun, from the east side unto the west side, Gad a portion. 28 And by the border of Gad, at the south side southward, the border shall be even from Tamar unto the waters of strife in Kadesh, and to the river toward the great sea. 29 This is the land which ye shall divide by lot unto the tribes of Israel for inheritance, and these are their portions, saith the Lord GOD.

We have here a very short and ready way taken for the dividing of the land among the twelve tribes, not so tedious and so far about as the way that was taken in Joshua's time; for in the distribution of spiritual and heavenly blessings there is not that danger of murmuring and quarrelling as in the participation of temporal blessings. When God gave to the labourers every one his penny, those that were uneasy at it were soon put to silence with, May I not do what I will with my own? And such is the equal distribution here among the tribes. In this distribution of the land we may observe,

1. That it differs very much from the division of it in Joshua's time, nor agrees with the order of their birth, or their blessing by Jacob or Moses. Simeon here is not divided in Jacob, nor is Zebulun a haven of ships, a plain intimation that it is not so much to be understood literally as spiritually, though the mystery of it is very much hidden from us. In gospel times old things are passed away; "Behold, all things are become new." The Israel of God is cast into a new method.

2. That the tribe of Dan, which was last provided for in the first division of Canaan, Jos. xix. 40, is first provided for here, ver. 1. Thus, in the Gospel, the last shall be first, Mat. xix. 30. God, in the dispensations of his grace, doth not follow the same method that he doth in the disposals of his providence. But is not definitely known, but the general idea is evidently that of an oblong. The measurements of the tribal portions in the next chapter make it assume the form of a parallelogram. The sea mentioned in connection with the north, south, and west is the Mediterranean; and the Dead Sea is meant in verse 18.

xlviii. 1—7. In the new allotment of the land seven tribes are placed on the north of Jerusalem, each of them occupying a strip of land extending from the Mediterranean to the eastern frontier.

xlviii. 8—22. The details given here respecting the division devoted to the sanctuary, the holy city, its suburbs, and the prince are sufficiently minute and yet intelligible. The reason for placing this south of seven and north of five of the tribes is that Jerusalem did not occupy the centre of the land, a greater portion of which lay to the north than to the south.

xlviii. 23—28. As Judah is next the holy city and its portion on the north, Benjamin is placed nearest the same portion on the south. It

Dan had now his portion thereabouts where he had only one city before, northward, on the border of Damascus, and farthest of all from the sanctuary, because that tribe had revolted to idolatry.

3. That all the ten tribes that were carried away by the king of Assyria, as well as the two tribes that were long after carried to Babylon, have their allotment in this visionary land, which some think had its accomplishment in the particular persons and families of those tribes which returned with Judah and Benjamin, of which we find many instances in Ezra and Nehemiah; and it is probable there were returns of many more afterwards, at several times, which are not recorded; and the Jews having Galilee, and other parts, that had been the possessions of the ten tribes, put into their hands, in common with them, they enjoyed them. Grotius says, If the ten tribes had repented and returned to God, as the "chief fathers of Judah and Benjamin did, and the priests and Levites," Ezr. i. 5, they should have fared as those two tribes did; but they forfeited the benefit of this glorious prophecy by sin. However, we believe it has its designed accomplishment in the establishment and enlargement of the gospel church, and the happy settlement of all those who are Israelites indeed, in the sure and sweet enjoyment of the privileges of the new covenant, in which there is enough for all, and enough for each.

4. That every tribe, in this visionary distribution, had its particular lot assigned it by the Divine appointment; for it was never the intention of the Gospel to pluck up the hedge of property, and lay all in common; it was in a way of charity, not of legal right, that the first Christians had all things common, Acts ii. 44. Many precepts of the Gospel suppose that every man should know his own. And we must not only acknowledge but acquiesce in the hand of God appointing us our lot, and be well pleased with it, believing it fittest for us. "He shall chose our inheritance for us," Ps. xlvii. 4.

5. That the tribes lay contiguous; by the border of one tribe was the portion of another, all on a row, in exact order, so that, like stones in an arch, they fixed, and strengthened, and wedged in one another. "Behold, how good and how pleasant a thing it is for brethren" thus "to dwell together!" It was a figure of the communion of churches and saints under the gospel government; thus, though they are many, yet they are one, and should hold together in holy love and mutual assistance.

6. That Reuben, which before lay at a distance beyond Jordan, now lies next to Judah, and next but one to the sanctuary; for the scandal he lay under, for which he was told he should not excel, began by this time to wear off. What has turned to the reproach of any person or people ought not to be remembered for ever, but should at length be kindly forgotten.

7. That the sanctuary was in the midst of them. There were seven tribes to the north of it, and the Levites, the princes, and the city's portion, with that of five tribes more, to the south of it; so that it was, as it ought to be, in the heart of the kingdom, that it might diffuse its benign influences to the whole, and might be the centre of their unity. The tribes that lay most remote from each other would meet there in a mutual acquaintance and fellowship. Those of the same parish or congregation, though dispersed, and having no occasion otherwise to know each other, yet, by meeting statedly to worship God together, should have their hearts knit to each other in holy love.

8. That where the sanctuary was the priests were; "For them, even for the priests, shall this holy oblation be," ver. 10. As on the one hand this speaks honour and comfort to ministers, that what is given for their support and maintenance is reckoned a holy oblation to the Lord, so it speaks their duty, which is, that since they are appointed and maintained for the service of the sanctuary, they ought to attend continually to this very thing, to reside on their cures. Those that live upon the altar must serve at the altar, not take the wages to themselves, and devolve the work upon others. But how can they serve the altar, his altar they live upon, if they do not live near it?

9. Those priests had the priests' share of these lands that had approved themselves faithful to God in times of trial, ver. 11; it shall be for "the sons of Zadok," who it seems had signalised themselves in some critical juncture, and went not astray when the children of Israel, and other the Levites, went astray. God will put honour upon them, and hath special favours in reserve for them, who keep their integrity in times of general apostacy. Those are swimming upwards, and so they will find at last, that are swimming against the stream.

10. The land which was appropriated to the ministers of the sanctuary might by no means be alienated. It was in the nature of the firstfruits of the land, and was therefore holy to the Lord; and, though the priests and Levites had both the use of it and the inheritance of it, to them and their heirs, yet they might not sell it or exchange it, ver. 14. It is sacrilege to convert that to other uses which is dedicated to God.

11. The land allotted for the city and its suburbs is called "a profane place," ver. 15, or common: not but that the city was a holy city, above other cities, for the Lord was there, but, in comparison with the sanctuary, it was a profane place. Yet it is too often true in the worst sense, that great cities, even those that, like this, have the sanctuary near them, are profane places, and it ought to be sadly lamented. It was the complaint of old, "from Jerusalem is profaneness gone forth into all the land," Jer. xxiii. 15.

12. The city is made to be exactly foursquare, and the suburbs extending themselves equally on all sides, as the Levites' cities did in the first division of the land, ver. 16, 17, which, never being literally fulfilled in any city, intimates, that it is to be understood spiritually of the beauty and stability of the gospel church, that city of the living God, which is formed according to the wisdom and counsel of God, and is made firm and immoveable by his promise.

13. Whereas before the inhabitants of Jerusalem were principally of Judah and Benjamin, in whose tribes it lay, now the head city lies not in the particular lot of any of the tribes, but "they that serve the city," and bear office in it, "shall serve it out of all the tribes of Israel," ver. 19. The most eminent men must be picked out of "all the tribes of Israel" for the service of the city, because many eyes were upon it, and there was great resort to it from all parts of the nation, and from other nations. They that live in the city are said to serve the city, for wherever we are we must study to be serviceable to the place, some way or other, according as our capacity is. They must not come out of the tribes of Israel to the city to take their ease and enjoy their pleasures, but to serve the city, to do all the good they can there, and in so doing they would have a good influence upon the country too.

14. Care was taken that those who applied themselves to public business in the city, as well as in the sanctuary, should have an honourable, comfortable maintenance; lands are appointed, the increase whereof "shall be food unto them that serve the city," ver. 18. Who goes a warfare at his own charges? Magistrates that attend the service of the state, as well as ministers that attend the service of the church, should have all due encouragement and support in so doing; and for this cause pay we tribute also.

15. The prince had a lot for himself suited to the dignity of his high station, ver. 21, (we took an account of it before, ch. xlv.) He was seated near the sanctuary, where the testimony of Israel was, and near the city, where the thrones of judgment were, that he might be a protection to both, and might see that the duty of both was carefully and faithfully done; and herein he was a minister of God for good to the whole community. Christ is the church's prince, that defends it on every side, and creates a defence; nay, he is himself a defence upon all its glory, and compasseth it with his favour.

16. As Judah had his lot next the sanctuary on one side, so Benjamin had, of all the tribes, his lot nearest it on the other side, which honour was reserved for them who adhered to the house of David and the temple at Jerusalem, when the other ten tribes went astray from both. It is enough if treachery and apostacy, upon repentance, be pardoned, but constancy and fidelity shall be rewarded and preferred.

30 And these are the goings out of the city on the north side, four thousand and five hundred measures. 31 And the gates of the city shall be after the names of the tribes of Israel: three gates northward; one gate of Reuben, one gate of Judah, one gate of Levi. 32 And at the east side four thousand and five hundred: and three gates; and one gate of Joseph, one gate of Benjamin, one gate of Dan. 33 And at the south side four thousand and five hundred measures: and three gates; one gate of Simeon, one gate of Issachar, one gate of Zebulun. 34 At the west side four thousand and five hundred, with their three gates; one gate of Gad, one gate of Asher, one gate of Naphtali. 35 It was round about eighteen thousand measures: and the name of the city from that day shall be, The LORD is there.

We have here a farther account of the city that should be built for the metropolis of this glorious land, and to be the receptacle of those who should come from all parts to worship in the sanctuary adjoining. It is nowhere called Jerusalem, nor is the land, which we have had such a particular account of the dividing of, anywhere called the land of Canaan; for the old names are forgotten, to intimate that the old things are done away, behold, all things are become new. Now, concerning this city, observe here,

First. The measures of its outlets, and the grounds belonging to it, for its several conveniences; each way its appurtenances extended four thousand and five hundred measures, eighteen thousand in all, ver. 35. But what these measures were is uncertain; it is never said in all this chapter whether so many reeds, as our translation determines, by inserting that word, ver. 8, each reed containing six cubits and a span, ch. xl. 5, (and why should the measurer appear with a measuring reed in his hand of that length if he did not measure with that, except where it is expressly said he measured by cubits?) or whether, as others think, it is so many cubits, because those are mentioned, ch. xlv. 2; xlvii. 3; yet that makes me incline rather to think that, where cubits are not mentioned, it must be intended so many lengths of the measuring reed. But those who understand it of so many cubits are not agreed whether it be meant of the common cubit, which was half a yard, or the geometrical cubit, which for better expedition is supposed to be mostly used in surveying lands, which some say contained six cubits, others about three cubits and a half, so making a thousand cubits the same with one thousand paces, that is, an English mile. But our being left at this uncertainty is an intimation that these things are to be understood spiritually, and that what is principally meant is, that there is an exact and just proportion observed by Infinite Wisdom in modelling the gospel church, which, though now we cannot discern, we shall when we come to heaven.

Secondly. The number of its gates. It had twelve gates in all, three on each side, which was very agreeable when it lay four square; and these twelve gates inscribed to the twelve tribes. Because the city was to be served "out of all the tribes of Israel," ver. 19, it was fit that each tribe should have its gate; and Levi being here taken in, to keep to the number twelve, Ephraim and Manasseh are made one in Joseph, ver. 32. On the north side were the gates of Reuben, Judah, and Levi, ver. 31; on the east, the gates of Joseph, Benjamin, and Dan, ver. 32; on the south, the gates of Simeon, Issachar, and Zebulun, ver. 33; and on the west, the gates of Gad, Asher, and Naphtali, ver. 34. Conformable to this, in St. John's vision, the new Jerusalem, (for so the holy city is called there, though not here,) has twelve gates, three of a side, and on them are written "the names of the twelve tribes of the children of Israel," Rev. xxi. 12, 13. Note, Into the church of Christ, both militant and triumphant, there is a free access by faith, for all that come, of every tribe, from every quarter. Christ has "opened the kingdom of heaven for all believers." Whoever will may come and take of the water of life, of the tree of life, freely.

Thirdly. The name given to this city; from that day, when it shall be new erected according to this model, the name of it shall be, not as before, Jerusalem, 'the vision of peace,' but, which is the original of that, and more than equivalent to it, Jehovah-shammah, "the Lord is there," ver. 35. This intimated,

1 That the captives, after their return, should have manifest tokens of God's presence with them, and his residence among them, both in his ordinances and in his providences. They should have no occasion to ask, as their fathers did, Is the Lord among us, or is he not? for they shall see and say that he is with them of a truth; and then, though their troubles were many, and threatening, they were like the bush which burned, but was not consumed, because the Lord was there. But when God departed from their temple, when he said, Migremus hinc,—'let us go hence,' their house was soon left unto them desolate. Being no longer his, it was not much longer theirs.

2. That the gospel church should likewise have the presence of God in it, though not in the Shechinah, as of old, yet in a token of it no less sure, that of his Spirit. Where the Gospel is faithfully preached, gospel ordinances duly administered, and God worshipped in the name of Jesus Christ only, it may truly be said, "The Lord is there;" for faithful is he that hath said it, and will be as good as his word, "Lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world." The Lord is there in his church to rule and govern it, to protect and defend it, and graciously to accept and own his sincere worshippers, and to be nigh unto them in all that they call upon him for. This should engage us to keep close to the communion of saints, for the Lord is there; and then whither must be observed, however, that the twelve tribes by no means come here in the order in which they originally stood. There can be no doubt that the whole arrangement is ideal, and it is certain that it never was nor could have been carried out. The actual contour and measurements of the land absolutely preclude the possibility of an actual distribution of it like the one here shadowed forth. It has also been frequently intimated that where measurements are given they are often uncertain.

Additional Notes.—The tomb of Ezekiel. It is not inappropriate to conclude the remarks upon Ezekiel with the following account of his tomb, which still exists to the south-west of Babylon. Mr. Layard, speaking in his "Nineveh and Babylon" of the view from the summit of Birs Nimroud, says, "To the south-west, in the extreme distance, rose the palm-trees of Kifil, casting their scanty shade over a small dome, the tomb of Ezekiel. To this spot annually flock in crowds, as their forefathers have done for centuries, the Jews of Baghdad, else shall we go to mend ourselves? Nay, it is true of every good Christian, he dwells in God and God in him. Whatever soul has in it a living principle of grace, it may be truly said, "The Lord is there."

3. That the glory and happiness of heaven should consist chiefly in this, that "the Lord is there." St. John's representation of that blessed state doth indeed far exceed this in many respects. That is all gold, and pearls, and precious stones; it is much larger than this, and much brighter, for it needs not the light of the sun. But in making the presence of God the principal matter of its bliss they both agree. There the happiness of the glorified saints is made to be that "God himself shall be with them," Rev. xxi. 3, that "he that sits on the throne shall dwell among them," Rev. vii. 15; and here it is made to crown the bliss of this holy city, that "the Lord is there." Let us therefore give all diligence to make sure to ourselves a place in that city, that we may be for ever with the Lord.

SUPPLEMENTARY NOTES TO THE BOOK OF EZEKIEL.

CHAP. I.—1. Among the captives by the river Chebar. Ezekiel was carried captive with Jehoiachim, king of Judah, in the year of the world 3406, and before Christ 598. He was placed with many of his countrymen upon the banks of the river Chebar, (still called Khabour,) which joins the Euphrates at Carchemish, between two and three hundred miles to the north-west of Babylon.

CHAP. III.—18. Thou shalt surely die. That is, If he turn not from his wickedness, and thou givest him not warning, as above, he shall die in his iniquity, which he should not have committed; but his blood will I require at thy hand—I will visit thy soul for the loss of his. O how awful is this! Hear it, ye priests, ye preachers, ye ministers of the Gospel; ye, especially, who have entered into the ministry for a living; ye who gather a congregation to yourselves that ye may feed upon their fat, and clothe yourselves with their wool; in whose parishes and in whose congregations souls are dying unconverted from day to day, who have never been solemnly warned by you, and to whom you have never shown the way of salvation, probably because ye know nothing of it yourselves! O, what a perdition awaits you! To have the blood of every soul that has died in your parishes or in your congregations unconverted laid at your door! To suffer a common damnation for every soul that perishes through your neglect! How many loads of endless woe must such have to bear! Ye take your tithes, your stipends, or your rents, to the last grain and the last penny; while the souls over whom you made yourselves watchmen have perished, and are perishing, through your neglect. O worthless and hapless men! better for you had ye never been born! Vain is your boast of apostolical authority, while ye do not the work of apostles! Vain your boasting of orthodoxy, while ye neither shew nor know the way of salvation! Vain your pretensions to a Divine call, when ye do not the work of evangelists! The state of the most wretched of the human race is enviable to that of such ministers, pastors, teachers, and preachers. But let not this discourage the faithful minister who teaches every man, and warns every man, in all wisdom, that he may present every man perfect in Christ Jesus. If after such teaching and warning they will sin on, and die in their sins, their blood will be upon themselves; but thou, O man of God, hast delivered thine own soul.—A. Clarke.

CHAP. IV.—15. Cow's dung. Here is sufficient intimation that the Hebrews sometimes employed animal dung for fuel. It is still used in some regions of Western Africa. In winter we have seen it used in the best rooms of some of the most respectable houses in towns of Northern Persia; and while travelling through the same country, and some parts of Media and Armenia, when we formed our camp near the villages, all the children who were old enough would come out with baskets to gather it. It is much used for baking, being considered preferable to any other fuel for that purpose, as it is by the villagers in Devonshire. See Pictorial Bible.

CHAP. VIII.—'In this remarkable chapter,' says Dr. Wilson, (Lands of the Bible, vol. i. 105,) 'the Israelites are represented as imitating the idolatry of the Syrians, 1—5; the Egyptians, ver. 10—12; the Phœnicians, ver. 14; and the Persians, ver. 14.' Referring to Dr. Abbot's Collection of Egyptian Antiquities at Cairo, he adds, 'The numerous images and drawings of the gods of the Egyptian pantheon, human, superhuman, and infrahuman, remind us of the time when the Egyptians worshipped "every form of creeping things, and abominable beasts, and all idols," or (as in the original) 'nastiness.'

> 'Genii with heads of birds, hawks, ibis, drakes,
> Of lions, foxes, cats, fish, frogs, and snakes,
> Bulls, rams, and monkeys, hippopotami,
> With knife in paw, suspended from the sky;
> Gods germinating men, and men turned gods,
> Seated in honour, with gilt crooks and rods;
> Vast scarabæi, globes by hands upheld
> From chaos springing, mid an endless field
> Of forms grotesque—the sphinx, the crocodile,
> And other reptiles from the slime of Nile.'—Hall's Life of Salt.

10. Pourtrayed on the wall round about. It is very likely that these images pourtrayed on the wall were the objects of Egyptian adoration: the ox, the ape, the dog, the crocodile, the ibis, the scarabæus or beetle, and various other things. It appears that these were privately worshipped by the Sanhedrim or great Jewish council, consisting of seventy or seventy-two persons, six chosen out of every tribe, as representatives of the people. The images were pourtrayed upon the wall as we find those ancient idols are on the walls of the tombs of the kings and nobles of Egypt. See the plates to Belzoni's Travels, the Isaic tomb in the Bodleian library, and the Egyptian heiroglyphics in general. (Also the various wood engravings of Egyptian tombs in this work, especially at ver. 10.) Virgil speaks of these, Æn. lib. viii.:—

> Omnigenumque Deum monstra, et latrator anubis.
> 'All kinds of gods, monsters, and barking dogs.'

14. Women weeping for Tammuz. 'This was Adonis,' says Adam Clarke, and adds, 'My old MS. Bible reads, "There saten women, mornynge a mawmete of lecherye that is cleped Adonydes." He is fabled to have been a beautiful youth beloved by Venus, and killed by a wild boar in mount Lebanon, whence springs the river Adonis, which was fabled to run blood at his festival in August. The women of Phœnicia, Assyria, and Judæa worshipped him as dead, with deep lamentation, wearing priapi and other obscene images all the while, and they prostituted themselves in honour of this idol. Having for some time mourned him as dead, they then supposed him revivified, and broke out into the most extravagant rejoicings. Of the appearance of the river at this season, Mr. Maundrell thus speaks:—"We had the good fortune to see what is the foundation of the opinion which Lucian relates, viz., that this stream at certain seasons of the year, especially about the feast of Adonis, is of a bloody colour, proceeding from a kind of sympathy, as the heathens imagined, for the death of Adonis, who was killed by a wild boar in the mountain out of which this stream issues. Something like this we saw actually come to pass, for the water was stained to a surprising redness; and, as we observed in travelling, had stained the sea a great way into a reddish hue." This was, no doubt, occasioned by a red ochre, over which the river ran with violence at this time of its increase. Milton works all this up in these fine lines:—

> "Thammuz came next behind,
> Whose annual wound in Lebanon allured
> The Syrian damsels to lament his fate,
> In amorous ditties all a summer's day;
> While smooth Adonis, from his native rock,
> Ran purple to the sea, suffused with blood
> Of Thammuz, yearly wounded. The love tale
> Infected Sion's daughters with like heat,
> Whose wanton passions in the sacred porch
> Ezekiel saw, when by the vision led,
> His eye surveyed the dark idolatries
> Of alienated Judah."—Paradise Lost, b. i. 446.

Tammuz signifies hidden or obscure, and hence the worship of his image was in some secret place.'—A. Clarke.

CHAP. X.—13. O wheel, or rather, move round. They are put in mind of continually attending upon their duty; for the wheels and living creature were animated with the same principle of understanding and instinct, ch. i. 19, 21.—Lowth.

CHAP. XII.—7. I digged through the wall with mine hand. See Note on ch. xiii. 10. 19. They shall eat their bread with carefulness—that her land may be desolate. The oppressions of the government on one side, and those of the Bedouins on the other, have reduced the Fellah of the Haouran to a state little better than that of the wandering Arab. Few individuals, either among the Druses or Christians, die in the same village in which they were born. Families are continually removing from one place to another; in the first year of their new settlement the sheikh acts with moderation towards them; but, his vexations becoming in a few years insupportable, they fly to some other place where they have heard that their brethren are better treated, but they soon find that the same system prevails over the whole country. Sometimes it is not merely the pecuniary extortion, but the personal enmity of the sheikh, or of some of the head men of the village, which drives a family from their home, for they are always permitted to depart. This continued wandering is one of the principal reasons why no village in the Haouran has either orchards, or fruit trees, or gardens for the growth of vegetables.—Burckhardt, p. 299. 'Shall we sow for strangers?' was the answer of a Fellah, to whom I once spoke on the subject, and who, by the word strangers, meant both the succeeding inhabitants, and the Arabs who visit the Haouran in the spring and summer, Isa. xxxiii. 9; Eze. xii. 19. It is thus, according to the prophetic word, that Bashan, like Carmel, has shaken off, and still shakes off, its fruits. It is thus also, as the Lord hath said, that the inhabitants of the land of Israel, as in manifold similar illustrations besides, eat their bread with carefulness; and the land is desolate from all that was therein, because of the violence of all them that dwelt therein.—Dr. Keith's Land of Israel.

> 'How has kind Heav'n adorned the happy land,
> And scattered blessings with a wasteful [bounteous] hand!
> But what avail her unexhausted stores,
> Her blooming mountains and her sunny shores,
> With all the gifts that heaven and earth impart,
> The smiles of nature, and the charms of art,
> While proud oppression in her valleys reigns,
> And tyranny usurps her happy plains?'—Addison.

CHAP. XIII.—10. One built up a wall, &c. The plaster in the East is made of clay and straw, the latter being chopped and beaten small, and serving the same purpose as ox hair with our plasterers. This to be good must be well tempered, which is generally done by long continued treading or beating. Walls formed of this material, and raised upon a foundation of stone or brick, were very ancient, and are still very common in the East. They resemble the cob walls of Devonshire, forming the subject of a paper, No. 116, of the Quarterly Review, which, as quoted in Pictorial Bible, (on ch. xii.,) contains the following remarks. 'Ezekiel, of all the prophets best acquainted with the customs of the Phœnicians, of which the thirty-seventh chapter is a proof, when speaking of breaking through a wall invariably used the words "dig through," διορυττειν,—"I digged through the wall with mine hand" (Eze. xii. 7); this would be impossible in the case of a stone or brick wall, but by no means so as to one of cob. The identical expression is used twice by our Saviour himself, Mat. vi., "Lay up for yourselves treasures—where thieves do not break through and steal"—ὀπου κλεπται μη διορυσσουσιν, where thieves "do not dig through." In fact, the common Greek term for a housebreaker was τοιχωρυχος, a wall-breaker. Therefore the author of that most ancient book, Job, in the fourth chapter adverts to the little trust to be placed in those "who dwell in houses of clay

Hillah, and other cities of Chaldea, the descendants of the captives of Jerusalem, who still linger in the land of their exile. Although tradition alone may place in the neighbourhood of Babylon the tomb of the prophet, yet from a very early period the spot appears to have been sought in pilgrimage by the pious Hebrew. I visited the edifice some years ago. It is now but a plain building, despoiled of the ornaments and manuscripts which it once appears to have contained. The description given by Benjamin of Tudela of this place is so curious that I cannot forbear transcribing it:—'On the banks of the Euphrates stands the synagogue of the prophet Ezekiel, who rests in peace. The place of the synagogue is fronted by sixty towers, the room between every two of which is also occupied by a synagogue; in the court of the largest stands the ark, and behind it is the sepulchre of Ezekiel, the son of Buzi the Cohen. This monument is covered by a large cupola, and the building is very handsome. It was erected by Jeconiah, king of Judah, and the 35,000 Jews who whose foundation is in the dust, who are crushed by the moth." A very high authority has suggested that by the moth is meant the white ant. It is clear that some sort of those destructive insects are alluded to which so notoriously harbour in walls of clay, that is, of cob.' 13. I will bring him to Babylon—yet shall not he see it, though he shall die there. The prophet Jeremiah foretold of Zedekiah, that his eyes should behold the eyes of the king of Babylon; and here Ezekiel predicts that he should not see Babylon though he should die there. We are informed by Josephus, that the king, thinking these prophecies contradicted each other, gave no credit to either. But both proved true; for, being taken captive and carried to Riblah, he there saw Nebuchadnezzar, and then his eyes were put out, and he was sent to Babylon, where he remained for the rest of his life; so that he saw not that city though he died in it.—Pictorial Bible.

CHAP. XVI.—2. Cause Jerusalem to know her abominations. And such a revelation of impurity never was seen before or since. Surely the state of the Jews, before the Babylonish captivity, was the most profligate and corrupt of all the nations of the earth. This chapter contains God's manifesto against this most abominable people, and although there are many metaphors here yet all is not metaphorical. Where there was so much idolatry there must have been adulteries, fornications, prostitutions, and lewdness of every description. The description of the prophet is sufficiently clear, except where there is a reference to ancient and obsolete customs. What a description of crimes!—A. Clarke, (whose also is the first part of Note under ver. 12.) 8. Spread my skirt over thee. See Supplementary Note on Ru. iii. 9. 13. Thou didst prosper into a kingdom. Here the figure explains itself: by this wretched infant, the low estate of the Jewish nation in its origin is pointed out; by the growing up of this child into woman's estate, the increase and multiplication of the people; by her being decked out and ornamented, her tabernacle service, and religious ordinances; by her betrothing and consequent marriage, the covenant which God made with the Jews; by her fornication and adulteries, their apostacy from God, and the establishment of idolatrous worship, with all its abominable rites; by her fornication and whoredoms with the Egyptians and Assyrians, the sinful alliances which the Jews made with those nations, and the incorporation of their idolatrous worship with that of Jehovah; by her lovers being brought against her, and stripping her naked, the delivery of the Jews into the hands of the Egyptians, Assyrians, and Chaldeans, who stripped them of all their excellences, and at last carried them into captivity. This is the key to the whole of this long chapter of metaphors; and the reader will do well to forget the figures, and look at the facts.——The figurative mode of describing idolatry by spiritual adultery, often used by the prophets, is pursued here with great force, and at considerable length. We are not to judge of these metaphors by modern ideas, but of those of the times and places in which they were used, where many of the expressions would not sound as they do to us. It must like wise be remembered that the design was to raise the highest detestation of idolatry, and that such metaphors were well calculated for the purpose.—Dr. John Smith.

CHAP. XVIII.—26, 27. When a righteous man. It is an old opinion, that prevails among the Jews even till this day, that at the day of judgment a considerable number of good actions shall overbalance men's evil ones; so that they thought it a hard case for a man who had been righteous the far greatest part of his life, if he did at last commit iniquity, that his former righteousness should avail him nothing. In opposition to this doctrine, God here declares, that a righteous man, sinning and not repenting, should die in his sins, and that a wicked man, upon his repentance, should save his soul alive. (Lowth.) Notwithstanding this plain declaration, it is obvious that the notion current among the Jews is equally current among the generality of professed Christians, though directly opposite to the whole doctrine of Scripture, and even subversive of it.—T. Scott.

CHAP. XXI.—21. Divination: he made his arrows bright. Four kinds of divination are particularly mentioned in sacred history, viz. by the cup, (see Supplementary Note on Gen. xliv. 5,) by arrows, by inspecting the livers of slaughtered animals, and by the staff. Divination by arrows was an ancient method of presaging future events. Jerome, in his commentary on Eze. xxi. 21, says that 'the manner of divining by arrows was thus: they wrote on several arrows the names of the cities against which they intended to make war, and then, putting them promiscuously all together into a quiver, they caused them to be drawn out in the manner of lots, and that city whose name was on the arrow first drawn out was the first they assaulted. This method of divination was practised by the idolatrous Arabs, and prohibited by Mohammed, and was likewise used by the ancient Greeks, and other nations.—Divination by inspecting the liver of slaughtered animals was another mode of ascertaining future events, much practised by the Greeks and Romans, by the former of whom it was termed Ἡπατοσκοπία, or looking into the liver. This word subsequently became a general term for divination by inspecting the entrails of sacrifices, because the liver was the first and principal part observed for this purpose. To this method of divination there is an allusion in Eze. xxi. 21.—Rabdomancy, or divination by the staff, is alluded to by the prophet Hosea (iv. 12); it is supposed to have been thus performed: the person consulting measured his staff by spans, or by the length of his finger, saying, as he measured, 'I will go, or I will not go; I will do such a thing, or, I will not do it;' and as the last span fell out so he determined. Cyril and Theophylact, however, give a different account of the matter. They say that it was performed by erecting two sticks, after which they murmured forth a certain charm, and then, according as the sticks fell, backwards or forwards, towards the right or left, they gave advice in any affair.—Horne's Introduction.

CHAP. XXIII.—14. Men pourtrayed. The figure in wood-cut (ver. 9) is that of an Assyrian, as engraved, with many others, on a rock at Nahr-el-Kelb, near Beirut, and there seen by Dr. Wilson, who, referring to the inscription, says, 'Perhaps it may be found to bear the name of a Shalmanezer, Sargon, Sennacherib, or Esarhaddon, who extended the conquests of the Assyrians to the shores of the Mediterranean.' These and the other sculptures and drawings of a similar kind lately found elsewhere, the same author considers particularly worthy of notice in connexion with this passage in Ezekiel, in which, when the adulterous infidelity of Samaria and Jerusalem are strictly characterised and reprobated, allusion is made to the gorgeously clothed Assyrians, "men pourtrayed," &c., ver. 14.—Lands of the Bible, vol. i. p. 409. 25. They shall take away thy nose and thine ears. These barbarous punishments have always been most extensively in use in the East, and examples without number of their infliction might be adduced from history, ancient and modern. As the mystical adulterers of Israel and Judah are the subject of this allegory, it may be instructive to learn that in Egypt the noses of adulterous persons were cut off, and in Chaldea both their ears and noses. For some offences, in the East, the nose was been and is cut off; for others, the ears; and frequently both members at once. Indeed there seems at all times to have been a barbarous fancy for joining these two members in the same punishment. It does not appear that the Uebrews ever exercised such mutilations; but they must have known them well as inflicted by their heathen neighbours. Even in modern times this punishment has been inflicted on persons of consideration. Thus the notorious Djezzar of Acre seldom allowed those about him to remain long in possession of their ears and noses, and often deprived them of their eyes and hands. 'There were,' says Dr. Clarke, 'persons standing by the door of his apartment, some without a nose, others without an arm, with one ear only, or one eye—"marked men," as he termed them; persons bearing signs of having been instructed to serve their master with fidelity.'—Pictorial Bible.

CHAP. XXV.—2. Set thy face against. 'Look thou towards the coast of the Ammonites, and in this posture do thou prophesy against them.'—Bp. Hall. 5. Rabbah, a place for camels: see Jer. xlix. 2, Rabbah shall be a desolate heap. Rabbah, which properly denotes a great city or metropolis, is applied in Scripture to the capital of the Ammonites. 'For the space of two miles before reaching Ammon, pieces of broken pottery strewed over the ground indicate the approach to the ruins of a great city. The remains of a large isolated building of excellent masonry, with sculptured blocks scattered near it on the ground, first meet the view of the traveller, once, as is supposed, an outer gate of the city, or a triumphal entrance. The castle of Ammon, a large inclosed ruin, occupying entirely the summit of a small steep hill, has the appearance of a fortress. On the other side the wall ascends like a sloping mole, the masonry of which is excellent, the stones being squarely hewn, and nicely adjusted, &c. The steep ascent of this ruined mass is passed over large heaps of fallen stones, till the eastern gateway is reached, which leads to an open square court, with arched recesses on each side, originally open, which had arched doorways facing each other. These were all either wholly closed or partially filled up, with the single exception of a narrow passage, just sufficient for the entrance of one man, and of the goats which the Arab keepers drive in here occasionally for shelter during the night.'—Buckingham's Travels among the Arab Tribes, pp. 60—66. 'We passed many ruined cities, and the country has once been very populous, but during the whole day's ride, thirty-five miles at least, we did not see a single village; the whole country is one vast pasture, overspread by the flocks and herds of the Schoor and Beni Hassan Bedouins. Ammon is now quite deserted, except by the Bedouins. Re-ascending we saw sheep and goats by thousands, and camels by hundreds, coming down to drink, all in beautiful condition. How—let me cite the prophecy—how runs it, "Ammon shall be a desolation. Rabbah of the Ammonites shall be a desolate heap. I will make Rabbah a stable for camels, and the Ammonites a couching-place for flocks, and ye shall know that I am the Lord."'—Lord Lindsay's Letters. 8—14. Moab—Seir—Edom. See Supplementary Note on Isa. xvi. 16. Philistines—I will destroy the remnant of the sea coasts: see Zeph. ii. 6, And the sea coasts shall be dwellings and cottages for shepherds, and folds for flocks. Volney, (though, like one who in ancient times was instrumental to the fulfilment of a special prediction, 'he meant not so, neither did his heart think so,') from the manner in which he generalizes his observations, and marks the peculiar features of the different districts of Syria, with greater acuteness and perspicuity than any other traveller whatever, is the ever-ready purveyor of evidence in all the cases which came within the range of his topographical description of the wide field of prophecy; while at the same time, from his known, open, and zealous hostility to the Christian cause, his testimony is alike decisive and unquestionable; and the vindication of the truth of the following predictions may safely be committed to this redoubted champion of infidelity. 'In the plain between Ramla and Gaza,' (Volney's Travels, vol. ii. 335, 336,)—the very plain of the Philistines along the sea coast—'we met with a number of villages, badly built of dried mud, and which, like the inhabitants, exhibit every mark of poverty and wretchedness. The houses, on a nearer view, are only so many huts, (cottages,) sometimes detached, at others ranged in the form of cells around a court-yard, enclosed by a mud wall. In winter they and their cattle may be said to live together, the part of the dwelling allotted to themselves being only raised two feet above that in which they lodge their beasts—("dwelling and cottages for shepherds, and folds for flocks.") Except the environs of these villages, all the rest of the country is a desert, and abandoned to the Bedouin Arabs, who feed their flocks on it.'—Keith on Prophecy. See Supplementary Note on Jer. xlvii. 5.

CHAP. XXVI.—4. Scrape her dust from her—and make her like the top of a rock—(the bare shining surface of a rock—Dr. Newcome's note)—a place for the spreading of nets. Alexander the Great seems actually to have scraped away the very rubbish as well as the stones of old Tyre to construct his causeway; (Humus aggerebatur, the words of Quintius Curtius, quoted by Dr. Keith, are very remarkable;) and now the bare rocks along the shore, in some part of which the ancient city must have stood, are literally a place for the spreading of nets. The first man we met in the gate of Tyre was a fisherman carrying a load of fish, and the fishing boats in the harbour we have already mentioned. If, indeed, the sea has made an advance upon the coast, then the very rocks where old Tyre stood may be now under water, and the nets of the fisherman may be literally spread over them. And this, also, would give new meaning to the expression, "Thou shalt be broken by the seas in the depths of the water," Eze. xxvii. 34; although at the same time the ruin of her fleets and merchant ships will completely satisfy the terms of the prophecy. How interesting, too, is the very uncertainty that hangs over the true situation of ancient Tyre, some placing it on the shore, some at Ras-el-Ain farther inward, and some on a rocky eminence called Marshuk, to the north-east—all combining to shew how awfully the thrice-repeated curse has been fulfilled, "I will make thee a terror and thou shalt be no more;" and how true to the letter, "Though thou be sought for, yet shalt thou never be found again."—Bonar & M'Cheyne's Narrative. See Supplementary Note on Isa. xxiii.

CHAP. XXVII.—3. The entry of the sea. The Mediterranean. Tyrus—a merchant of the people for many isles. 4. Thy borders are in the midst of the seas. Tyre was every way conveniently placed to unite in commerce Asia, Africa, and Europe, the whole of the known world at that time; especially it was the centre for the trade of Asia, and the East Indies, with the many isles, &c., of Europe. 5. They have made all thy ship boards—that is, decks—of fir trees, &c. The Phœnicians were the teachers of the Greeks and Romans in ship-building, and had a skill therein not contemptible, even compared with the like works at the present day. 6. Of ivory. Ornamented with ivory. Chittim. Meaning the islands on the coasts of the Mediterranean, Jer. ii. 10. 7. Fine linen—to be thy sail. Most probably sails were then usually made of matting, as, according to Niebuhr, is the case at present on the Red Sea. Linen sails, therefore, indicated refinement and luxury. Blue and purple. These colours adorned the richest attire: see Ex. xxv. 4; Jer. x. 9. Isles of Elishah. Elishah was a son of Javan, Gen. x. 4; and the isles so called are supposed to have been Greece. 8. Arvad. The Arvadite is mentioned, Gen. x. 18. 9. Gebal. A Phœnician town in which were the best mechanics, Jos. xiii. 5; 1 Kin. v. 18. 10. Lud. Thought to have been an Egyptian colony. Phut. In Africa. Were in thine army. They were the mercenaries of Tyre. They hanged the shield. They had a strong force at hand, and a ready armoury, like that in the tower of David, where hung the "shields of mighty men," Cant. iv. 4. 11 Arvad. See ver. 8. Were ent along with him, when Evil-Merodach released him from the prison which was situated between the river Chaboras and another river. The name of Jeconiah and of all those that came with him are inscribed on the wall, the king's name first, that of Ezekiel last. This place is considered holy unto the present day, and is one of those to which people resort from remote countries in order to pray, particularly at the season of the new year and atonement-day. Great rejoicings take place there about this time, which are attended even by the prince of the captivity and the presidents of the colleges of Baghdad. The assembly is so large that their temporary abodes cover twenty miles of open ground, and it attracts many Arabian merchants, who keep a market or fair. On the day of atonement the proper lesson of the day is read from a very large manuscript pentateuch of Ezekiel's own handwriting. A lamp burns night and day on the sepulchre of the prophet, and has always been kept burning since the day that he lighted it himself; and the oil and wicks are renewed as upon thy walls. The guards of the city walls. Gammadims. Perhaps a people of Phœnicia. These garrisoned the city. They have made thy beauty perfect. 'They set forth thy glory.'—Boothroyd. 12. Tarshish. The learned now generally think that Tarshish is Tartessus, a city of Spain, at the mouth of the river Bœtis, whence the Phœnicians, who first opened this trade, brought gold and silver, in which that country then abounded. 13. Javan. Greece, Dan. viii. 21; so called from Javan, the son of Japhet, Gen. x. 2, from whom the Greeks are called, in their own tongue, Ions. Tubal and Meshech. The people called Tibareni and Moschi, who dwelt near the Black Sea, and in the mountains between Iberia and Armenia. Traded the persons of men. That is, in slaves, Rev. xviii. 13. Grecian slaves were the most valuable, but Tubal and Meshech also sold slaves. This detestable traffic, which is still carried on in the world, ought to be held in universal execration, and the base souls that encourage slavery to be stigmatised as murderers, 1 Tim. i. 10. Vessels of brass. Copper mines are worked in Caucasus to this day. Here are Kubescha and Arzieni, or Erzerum, still famous for brass vessels. 14. Togarmah. See Gen. x. 3. Bochart understands Cappadocia; Michaelis prefers Armenia, which was much celebrated for its fine breed of horses. 15. Dedan. On the Persian Gulf, Gen. xxv. 3; probably imported goods from Eastern Asia. 16. Syria was thy merchant. Syria probably traded largely elsewhere, and sold and exchanged the merchandise of other countries with Tyre. 17. Judah, &c.—traded in thy market wheat, &c. In this way the Jews acquired their wealth, their land being extremely productive. The Tyrians grew nothing. Minnith. Was a place which belonged to the Ammonites, still a fertile spot, and then famous for its grain: see Jud. xi. 33. But Boothroyd's translation is, 'wheat, myrrh, and panic,' instead of 'wheat of Minnith and Pannag.' Rosenmuller thinks that Pannag means luxurious dried fruits, sweetmeats, &c. 18. Damascus, &c.—for the multitude of all riches. 'The abundance of all thy substance.'—Boothroyd. In the wine of Helbon. That is, Chalybon or Aleppo, in Syria; this wine was the only sort thought good enough for the tables of the Persian kings. And white wool. The wool was dyed purple at Tyre. The Damascenes still buy up and export the wool from the nomades of Arabia Deserta, whose flocks, always in the open air, produce the best. 19. Dan—Javan. These places were in Arabia. Javan may be pronounced Yeman in Arabia Felix. 20. Dedan. Different probably from that named in ver. 15; that was in the Persian Gulf, this in Edom or Arabia: see Dedan, Gen. xxv. 3. In precious clothes for chariots. 'In gorgeous apparel for horsemen.'—Boothroyd. Parkhurst understands it to signify horsecloths. 21. Kedar. In Arabia Petræa. For original possessor, see Gen. xxv. 13, &c. 22. Sheba and Raamah. Raamah near the Persian Gulf; named from Ramah, Gen. x. 7. Here too were the Sabeans in South Arabia. These brought, as now, caravans with Indian articles to Syria. 23. Haran, &c. Various tribes which inhabited Arabia Petræa, as some just before mentioned. The Sheba here is supposed to have been in Arabia Deserta, and spoken of Job i. 15. 24. In chests—made of cedar. Carefully packed in cedar for the sake of the scent, and for preservation. 25. Tarshish. This was the most celebrated mart in those times, and frequented by the Phœnicians. Did sing. Spoke strongly in praise of her. On this chapter, which contains the most ancient record in existence of the commerce of remote ages, we may observe, 1. That it is the wisdom of nations to encourage art and industry. As men must inhabit certain localities, though one country produces what another does not or cannot, so in the goodness of providence, while industry has its own reward, the whole world may reciprocally be favoured, through friendly commerce, with all the bounties providence has bestowed on the universal world. Prosperity has its snares, both for nations and individuals. Our own country has often been warned that its commerce is not on a rock. It depends much upon the friendship, the caprice, the stability, or the rivalry of other nations. 'Trade is a fluctuating thing: it passed from Tyre to Alexandria, from Alexandria to Venice, from Venice to Antwerp, from Antwerp to Amsterdam and London.' Our metropolis may not always be the mart of the world. Let us beware that pride and luxury and covetous speculation do not work our ruin. Our nation needs our prayers. The Tyrians are a beacon for us, for 'the like causes will always produce the like effects.' And Scott well remarks, 'that those who engage in commerce should remember that they are the servants of God, and learn to conduct their business according to the precepts of his word, in submission to his providence, and with an aim to his glory; and those who possess wealth should remember that they are his stewards.'—Domestic Bible by Rev. Ingram Cobbin.

CHAP. XXVIII.—22. I am against thee, O Zidon. All the magnificence of Sidon is gone, for "God has executed judgments in her," Eze. xxviii. 22. Again and again have its inhabitants been "judged in the midst of her by the sword on every side." There are no more any merchants worth mentioning in Sidon. In two or three shops fishing-rods were exposed for sale, but there were no signs of trade. "Be thou ashamed, O Zidon; for the sea hath spoken, even the strength of the sea, saying, I travail not nor bring forth children, neither do I nourish up young men, nor bring up virgins," Isa. xxiii. 4. The city, and the sea that laved its walls, now lament the want of its once crowded and stirring population. It no more can boast of a king. "All the kings of Zidon" have been made to drink the wine-cup of God's fury, even as it was foretold, Jer. xxv. 22.

CHAP. XXIX.—10. From the tower of Syene. Rather, from Migdol to Syene,' that is, the whole of the kingdom, for its northern extremity was Migdol, and its southern Syene. 15. It shall be the basest of the kingdoms. In Egypt there are only two classes—the conquerors and the vanquished. The former indulge in every crime which can disgrace the character of rulers—selfishness, rapacity, injustice. The latter are sunk into the most deplorable condition. Brutalized by the wars and revolutions which have for centuries surrounded them, exasperated by the injuries to which they are daily subject, stained by every vice, and groaning under every evil, the people of Egypt have fallen to an ineffable depth of wretchedness and meanness. Every traveller who speaks of them loads them with a profusion of the vilest terms which language supplies. Thevenot terms them 'exceedingly wicked, great rogues, cowardly, lazy, hypocrites.' Of the Mamelukes, the military body whom the Turks long employed in the government of the country, Volney says, 'Educated in ignorance and superstition, they become ferocious, from habitual murder; perfidious, from cabals; seditious, from riot; base, deceitful, and corrupted by every species of debauchery.' Of the people, Volney says: 'We may easily conceive that, in such a country, every thing is correspondent with its wretched government. The peasants are hired labourers, who only get what is barely sufficient to sustain life. Their habitations are mud-walled huts, where they are suffocated with heat and smoke, and often attacked with distempers, arising from uncleanness, dampness, and unwholesome food; and to these physical evils are added continual alarms, the dread of the robberies of the Arabs and the extortions of the Mamelukes, family quarrels, and all the miseries of constant civil wars. This is a faithful picture of all the villages, and no less so of the towns. Even at Cairo, the stranger, on his arrival, is struck with the appearance of universal wretchedness and misery. The crowds thronging the streets present nothing but filthy rags. Everything he sees or hears reminds him that he is in the abode of slavery and tyranny. Nothing is spoken of but intestine broils, public misery, pecuniary extortions, bastinadoes, and murders. There is no protection for life or property. Human blood is shed like that of the vilest animals. Justice herself condemns to death without form.' "It shall be the basest of the kingdoms; neither shall it exalt itself any more above the nations; for I will diminish them, and they shall no more rule over the nations." Can we not in this discern the righteous retribution of providence? Egypt was the first to impose a yoke upon the nations; not a yoke of dominion, but of a kind more degrading—a yoke of polytheism and gross idolatry. From her, as from a fountain, flowed all the superstition by which the earth was corrupted; and now, for ages, every people which have become the masters of the world have oppressed and despised her. But how amazing and inscrutable are the ways of God! As if to atone for the mischief she inflicted on the world in early time, Egypt is now conferring incalculable benefits upon it. Her monuments, inscribed with the history of the most early ages, are beginning to be deciphered; her temples and tombs to be explored; (see wood engravings in various parts of the work, especially in Psalms, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel;) and the first-fruits of a glorious harvest have been reaped, which, when the whole has been gathered in, will make one of the most magnificent offerings ever laid on the altar of revelation. It was only in the end of the last century that Voltaire affirmed that the Egypt of the Bible was a mistake; since that time, Egypt herself has been disinterred—the Egypt of four thousand years ago—and before this awful preacher from the dead the infidel stands silent and confounded.—Wylie's Journey over the Region of Fulfilled Prophecy.

CHAP. XXX.—3. The day of the Lord is near. The day when he would take vengeance on the oppressors of his people. 5. Ethiopia, &c. Meaning every land in league with Egypt. Mingled people. Arabians. Libya. A district of Africa. Lydia. This Lydia was in Upper Egypt. Chub. An Egyptian province in Mareotis. 7. Her cities, &c. Egypt was exceedingly populous, and more filled with cities than any other nation in the world at that time, which would render her desolation in this respect the more extraordinary. 8. A fire. So God's judgments are called. 9. Messengers in ships. Understood to refer to an expedition of Nebuchadnezzar, sent up the Nile, which awakened the fears of the Ethiopians. As in the day of Egypt. Boothroyd omits "as," which is better reading. 12. Rivers dry. The fertility of Egypt depended on the rise of the Nile; and this threatening implies that with the calamity of war would be that of famine. The wicked. The haughty and cruel Babylonians. 13. There shall be no more a prince of the land of Egypt. This has been wonderfully fulfilled during twenty-three centuries, in which long period the land has been the prey of the Persians, the Macedonians, the Romans, the Greeks, the Arabs, the Georgians, the Tartars, known as Ottoman Turks. The Mamelukes, purchased as slaves, and introduced as soldiers, soon usurped the power, and elected a leader; slaves brought from their original country replaced them. The sceptre of Egypt has departed. 13-18. Noph, &c. The chief places are here enumerated, and shew that all Egypt would be desolate. Noph. Perhaps Memphis, now Cairo, the ancient capital. Pathros. Thebais, a province and city. Zoan. Tanis, the metropolis in Moses' time, a noted city, Num. xiii. 22. No. Or Ammon, No, Jer. xlvi. 25. Sin. Pelusium, the key of Egypt and its strength, having had a safe harbour and many merchant ships. Aven. On, Gen. xli. 45. Pi-beseth. Bubastes, where was a splendid temple to the goddess of that name. Tehaphnehes. Or, Tahpanhes; supposed the same as Daphnæ-Pelusiacæ. 18. Yokes. Some read 'sceptres;' others understand the yokes imposed by the Egyptians.

CHAP. XXXII.—22. Ashur. Assyria. 23. Whose graves—the sides of the pit. Such are Eastern tombs; hewn out of the rock, with niches around to receive the bodies of the departed. 24. Elam. That is, Persia. 26. Meshech, Tubal, meaning Scythia. The Scythians were conquered by Babylon. The mode of sepulture in these countries is known by the name of barrow burial, which is actually described in ancient writings as practised by the very people of whom the prophet here speaks: see woodcut. 27. Not lie with the mighty. Who have died a natural death, and been buried with pomp. Have laid their swords under their heads. Many of the warriors of ancient times slept with their swords under their heads, and had them buried with them in the same manner. These customs still prevail in Mingrelia, the inhabitants of which are believed to be descendants of Meshech and Tubal. 29. There is Edom. See wood engraving in loc. See Supplementary Notes on Job iii. 14; on Isa. xxii. and xxxiv. See also wood engravings, Ps. lx.; the nead-piece to Isaiah, representing Petra, the capital of Edom; and in Isa. xxii.; ch. xxxii. 29. Some of the above, and of the other wood engravings in this work, have been suggested by those in the Pictorial Bible, and we gratefully take this opportunity of expressing our obligations. Referring to the monuments in Petra, the city of tombs, the learned editor remarks, 'However rich externally, they present nothing in the interior but coarsely chiselled walls. There is, however, one exception, noticed by Laborde, of a sepulchral chamber, with rows of sculptured pillars, which forms the finest interior to be found in the place. 'When the Bedouins descend into the valley, this tomb, which is easily closed, serves as a stable for their herds. Such are the uses to which the costly monuments of human vanity have been converted.'—Laborde. And such, too, we may add, are the fulfilments which the predictions of the prophets concerning the desolation of Edom have received.

CHAP. XXXIII.—30. Still talking against (or concerning) thee by the walls and in the doors of the houses. However severe the cold weather sometimes is in these countries, there are intervals even in the depth of winter when the sun shines and there is no wind, and when it is perfectly warm—sometimes almost hot—in the open air. At such seasons the poorer classes in the East enjoy the conversation of their friends, sauntering about in the air, and sitting under the walls of their dwellings; while the houses of the more opulent inhabitants having porches or gateways, with benches on each side, the master of the family receives visitors there, and dispatches his business—few persons (not even the nearest relations) having farther admission except on extraordinary occasions. These circumstances materially illustrate a difficult passage in the prophet Ezekiel. It appears from ch. xxxiii. 21, that these things were transacted in the tenth month, corresponding with the close of our December or the commencement of January. The poorer people, therefore, sat under their walls for the benefit of the sun, while those in better circumstances sat in their porches or gateways to enjoys its genial rays.—Horne's Introduction.

CHAP. XXXV.—15. Thou shalt be desolate, O mount Seir. See wood engraving, and reference made to Edom in Supplementary Note, ch. xxxii. 29.

CHAP. XXXVII.—11. Our hope is lost. 'Later in the evening a well-educated young Jew called on us. Hearing that we had been inquiring about the practicability of instituting schools among the Jews, he came to offer himself as a teacher.—He conversed with us in Latin, always addressing us by the title of "Dominatio vestra." When telling us that he had given up all expectation of the restoration of his own people to their own land, and of the coming of Messiah, he used this remarkable expression, "Despero, despero." often as necessary. A large house belonging to the sanctuary contains a very numerous collection of books, some of them as ancient as the second, some even coeval with the first Temple, it being customary that whoever dies childless bequeaths his books to the sanctuary. Even in time of war neither Jew nor Mohammedan ventures to despoil and profanate the sepulchre of Ezekiel' (Asher's Translation)." The literal accuracy of what Benjamin of Tudela says may be fairly questioned, but it shows the celebrity of the place seven centuries ago. Mr. Loftus, in his "Chaldea and Susiana," says the present edifice is comparatively modern and very plain. It consists of two vaulted apartments, one of which is supported by columns. The sepulchre is cased in wood, and when Mr. Loftus saw it, was decorated with a piece of chintz and red and green flags. The side walls of the square chamber were dirty and greasy, and the floor was covered with filthy matting. The ceiling was ornamented with scrolls of gold, silver, and bronze. An ancient Hebrew pentateuch that is, "I have no hope of it." The very term used by the prophet Ezekiel, when he foretold what would be the state of Israel before the breath should enter into them, "Behold, they say, Our bones are dried and our hope is lost."'—Bonar and M'Cheyne's Narrative. See also account of the Jews in their own land, in Volume II., 601 and following pages, of Dr. Wilson's Lands of the Bible, where it is said, 'It is not the destruction of the world, so much as the non-appearance or delay of the Messiah, which the Jews so much fear, and which they employ the devotees to prevent by mourning and supplication. The most affecting scene altogether which I witnessed in the Holy Land was the praying of the Khasidim at Tiberias. Their excitement and apparent importunity were frightful; and they appeared as if determined at once to take heaven by storm, springing upon their toes, beating their breasts, and groaning and crying simultaneously at the highest pitch of their voices. Mr. Graham, who was with me on the occasion, as well as myself, was quite overcome by the scene, and by the manifest delusion under which the poor Jews evidently laboured. Dr. Wolff has given us, in his journals, the prayers which the Karaim chant at Jerusalem, at the place of mourning, in sight of the great ancient stones in the western wall of the temple. "Early will I seek my congregation, that is exceedingly afflicted; and visit mine habitation, (to view) the dreadful destruction. The fences are thrown down, and the walls are demolished; (nothing is seen but) gloomy darkness, waste, and desolation—Where is the service, the testimony, the priesthood, and the Levites? Where is the kingdom that administered justice with purity without deceit? Where are the faithful, brought up in the lap of truth, lovely as the moon, and bright as the sun? They now witness their covenant with the grave; their dwellings are in the caverns of the young harts, and in the neglected depths. Over them spring up grass and herbage, forming pastures for the wild goats and kids. Morning and evening are they exposed to the cold and drought, or swept away by the strong flood, and carried over the sea, without (seeing) an end to their captivity, by which their souls are afflicted, and their souls consumed. For the sea through which they passed, destruction is its path, death is its pilot, and the grave its ship. (There is) horror, dread, and fear; for there is no voice, nor any that answereth in all the ship. The lovely congregation was sold to be cut off; bruised and cast to the stretched-out sword. And the seed are dispersed, oppressed, and trampled (under foot): born to plagues and dreadful wounds. Their father also abhorred them and their mother; and besides them married the daughters of strangers: even the Amorites, the Hittites, the Hagarites, the Chittites, the Midianites, and Moabites. Oh, may their Father in his infinite mercy compassionate his orphans, and gather his dispersed to the pure land! For he is high and exalted; he bringeth down and raiseth up; he woundeth and healeth; killeth and restoreth to life. O Lord, return to thy city! build thine oracle, dwell in thine house, and gather thy scattered (flock). O thou who renewest the months, collect the saints, both men and women, to the erected city! O may this month be renewed for good! and may it please God, who is mighty in works, thus to command."'

CHAP. XL.—2. Very high mountain. Moriah, say some, but this was not very high. Others think the Christian church. It is probable that the more immediate accomplishment of this prophecy will be subsequent to the conversion of the Jews, their restoration to their own land, the destruction of Gog and Magog, and the pouring out of the Spirit, mentioned in the close of the foregoing chapter; and it will perhaps continue through the thousand years, during which Satan will be chained up in the bottomless pit.—Scott. 3. He stood in the gate. He appeared in the character of a surveyor. 5. So he measured the breadth of the building, &c. There has never been any temple answering the description here given. Some think that the ground plan is nearly the same as that of Solomon's temple, and might be taken as a guide for the erection of the temple after the return from the captivity. But commentators have come to no decision as to what city, temple, and land are intended, or whether the reference is to former or future times; whether this and the subsequent chapters are to be understood literally or figuratively; or whether it relates to the church on earth or in heaven. The literal interpretation receives a strong check from the river of water springing from the threshold of the temple, enlarging till it reached the Dead Sea, and sweetening its waters; with the trees growing on the banks of the river, bearing fruit every month. Some yet future and extraordinary enlargement of the church seems to be here predicted. In the mean time we should learn that the great Builder of the spiritual temple, whose power and glory are infinite and eternal, always works by rule; and, whilst he performs his secret counsels, he requires us to compare all our works with the standard of his word. Every part of Scripture is Divine, useful, and important, in different ways or to different persons; but it may not all be so immediately useful to us; others have had, and others will have, the benefit of some portions which are to us not so intelligible or full of instruction. But if we cannot understand or edify by any part of Scripture, we should humbly acknowledge our own ignorance, and adore the Divine wisdom and knowledge, and not allow ourselves to start objections on that account. Yet, as some portions are more clear, and to us, at least, more important than others, so a fondness for the study of the obscure parts in preference to the obvious, is a folly, and a temptation sometimes even of godly men.—Scott.

CHAP. XLI.—1. Afterward he brought me, &c. This chapter introduces the reader into the sacred edifice, the exterior of which was before described. 18. Cherubims: were intended to symbolize the presence of Jehovah. Palm trees: were intended to symbolize the character of the true worshippers; denoting integrity, perseverance, victory, Ps. xcii. 12; Cant. vii. 7; Rev. vii. 9.

CHAP. XLII.—1. Then he brought me, &c. This is by some commentators supposed to describe buildings not before mentioned.

CHAP. XLIII.—4. And the glory of the Lord came into the house. All external institutions of religion derive their excellency and efficacy from the presence and manifested glory of God in them; and as this glory is displayed in Christ our "Sun of righteousness," we sinners may behold it with comfort. His voice, indeed, is very terrible to his enemies, and at first excites great commotion and consternation in the hearts of his chosen people; but when they are taught by the Holy Spirit they experience its power accompanied with peace and comfort to their souls. 7. Carcases of their kings. Michaelis supposed that some of their idolatrous kings might have been buried in the precincts of Solomon's temple, and perhaps afterwards idolized: see 2 Kin. xxi. 18—26. 8. In their setting of their threshold, &c. The thresholds of the idol temples are peculiarly sacred, and there they are wont to pay their humblest adorations.

CHAP. XLIV.—2. Gate shall be shut—because the Lord—hath entered in by it. Among other marks of respect paid to a sovereign in the East, this is one, that the gate whereby he enters is in future closed to all other persons. 25. And they shall come, &c. From this verse those to the end are repetitions of the Mosaic law, as ver. 26, Num. xix. 11; ver. 28, Deu. x. 9; ver. 29, Lev. xxvi.; xxvii. 28, Num. xviii. 14; ver. 30, Num. xv. 20; vi. 23, Deu. x. 8; ver. 31, Ex. xxii. 31, Lev. xxii. 8. All, says T. Scott, in his observations on this chapter, who are employed in the ministry should be of harmless and blameless conversation; sound in the faith, full of good works; of exemplary temperance, sobriety, and gravity; walking humbly before God, and circumspectly in the sight of men; not arrogating honour to themselves, or leading the people into a superstitious veneration of them, yet acting honourably, and maintaining a sober peculiarity in their whole conduct. They should perform the most common actions of life in a pious and sanctified manner; their apparel, and the whole of their style of living, should be plain, simple, frugal, and such as manifests their indifference about worldly things; they should be careful in forming connexions, and in the choice of wives, and prudent in the management of their families; and shew that they are governed by reason, conscience, and the fear of God, not by passion and humour, in all matters. Lord, increase the number of faithful and exemplary ministers, and enlarge and prosper the spiritual priesthood all over the whole earth!

CHAP. XLV.—1. Offer an oblation to the Lord. 15. Meat offering: more properly the bread offering, for it was made of fine flour mingled with oil, Lev. ii. 5, 6. It is the duty of Christians, according to their ability, to provide for the decent and comfortable subsistence of ministers, that they may attend to their work without distraction. But it becomes ministers to be content even with a scanty provision, and to "suffer all things rather than hinder the Gospel of Christ." Subjects, also, should willingly contribute what is requisite to the honourable support of their governors and the charges of government; and princes, especially the princes of Israel, ought to imitate the equity and lenity of Christ our King; they should use their authority for the good of the people, and lay no needless or oppressive burthens on them; and if any have deviated from these salutary rules, (as, alas, too many have and still do,) they must be warned to proceed no farther, but to remove all violence and spoil, and to terminate all exactions. These are the duties of men in every age; and the happy time is coming when all ranks in every part of the earth will attend to them. But our very best duties are polluted with sin; errors, ignorance, and simplicity, as well as our wilful sins, need the same cleansing in the fountain of the Redeemer's blood.—Scott.

CHAP. XLVI.—4. Six lambs. The Mosaic law appointed only two lambs, without a ram: see Num. xxviii. 8. The other proportions of the meat and drink offerings are also different: compare ver. 4, 6, 7, and 14, with Num. xxviii. 9, 11, 12. 14. Every morning. The morning offering only is mentioned; an important difference from the Jewish ritual: see Ex. xxix. 38—46.

CHAP. XLVII.—1. Waters issued, &c. Literally, no such waters were ever in the temple; and, because there were none, Solomon had the brazen sea made for the use of the temple. 5. Waters were risen. A beautiful representation of the gradual progress of the Gospel. 8. The waters shall be healed. This finely represents the tendency of the Gospel to heal the corruptions of human nature. 11. But the miry places, &c. Here the waters obtained no entrance representing the case of those who reject, neglect, or pervert the Gospel; or those countries which exclude it from them. 12. And by the river—grow all trees, &c. The writer of the Apocalypse has almost transcribed this part of the vision, and applied it to the salvation of Christ, as perfected in the felicity of heaven. 13. This shall be the border. Dr. Keith considers this as pointing out the boundaries and extent of the Holy Land, when it shall, as he conceives, be restored to the Jewish people. W. Lowth says, 'There is, without question, a mystical sense implied under this literal description.' 16. Hamath. A city and province of Syria, on the river Orontes, and the northern point of the land towards the west frontier.——The more carefully we examine the things of God and religion, the more interesting will be our discoveries concerning them. All our invaluable privileges and advantages are conveyed to us through the Gospel; they flow from Christ our temple, altar, and door of access to the Father; they all spring from the everlasting love and mercy of our God through his atoning sacrifice, and by the sanctification of the Holy Spirit; and the course of the greatest rivers might far more easily be stopped than the progress of his Gospel when God is pleased to prosper the labours of his servants. It has hitherto continued gradually to diffuse its influence; and it will still gradually run wider and deeper in its energy and effects, till it shall fill, heal, and fructify the whole earth.—Scott.

CHAP. XLVIII.—35. The name of the city—the Lord is there. The descriptive name here given to the city, Jehovah-Shammah, is sufficiently definite, as implying God's continual presence with his church under every dispensation.—Domestic Bible. Whether these latter chapters (says the Editor of the work last quoted) were written to aid in the erection of a new temple after the destruction of that built by Solomon, or to guide the builders of a temple yet to be erected, or to represent in mystical terms an unearthly temple, the church of God in which he is and shall be worshipped and adored—it ought to be considered as a portion of the inspired word of God, which is written for our instruction; and, in the absence of a better light than that which is at present shed upon it, we should view it as such, and endeavour to derive from it that edification which it is calculated to give; not indulging in vain fancies by spiritualizing, as it is called, every little particular in the sacred structure, and making the word of God a toy for our imaginations, but turning it to such account that we may be aided in ourselves "growing up a holy temple in the Lord—an habitation of God through the Spirit." For this purpose, the pious and judicious remarks of Scott have been used. The Lord make us meet to be "partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light," and inhabitants of "the holy Jerusalem," where "the Lord God Almighty and the Lamb are the temple of it," and where it may emphatically be said, as in the language of the prophet, "The Lord is there."

was built into one corner, and a lamp was constantly burning. Altogether the tomb and the village it stands in were in a wretched condition.

Chap. xx. 29. The Hebrew exhibits a play upon a word: "And I said, What is the Bamah which ye go to? and its name is called Bamah to this day." A bamah, i.e., a high or sacred place, was usually identified with paganism; hence we read in 1 Kings xi. 7 that Solomon built a bamah (high place) to Chemosh. The Hebrews were forbidden to resort to them, and yet they continued to do so, as this verse is designed to show.

ARMOUR OF THE WARLIKE EMPIRES.

AN EXPOSITION

OF THE BOOK OF

THE PROPHET DANIEL,

WITH

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

THE book of Ezekiel left the affairs of Jerusalem under a doleful aspect, all in ruins, but with a joyful prospect of all in glory again. This of Daniel fitly follows. Ezekiel told us what was seen, and what was foreseen, by him in the former years of the captivity; Daniel tells us what was seen, and foreseen, in the latter years of the captivity. When God employs different hands, yet it is about the same work. And it was a comfort to the poor captives that they had first one prophet among them and then another, to shew them how long, and a sign that God had not quite cast them off. Let us inquire,

I. Concerning this prophet. His Hebrew name was Daniel, which signifies, 'the judgment of God;' his Chaldean name was Belteshazzar. He was of the tribe of Judah, and, as it should seem, of the royal family; he was betimes eminent for wisdom and piety. Ezekiel, his contemporary, but much his senior, speaks of him as an oracle, when thus he upbraids the king of Tyre with his conceitedness of himself, "Thou art wiser than Daniel," Eze. xxviii. 3. He is likewise there celebrated for success in prayer, when Noah, Daniel, and Job are reckoned as three men who had the greatest interest in heaven of any other, Eze. xiv. 14. He began betimes to be famous, and continued long so. Some of the Jewish rabbins are loth to acknowledge him to be a prophet of the higher form, and therefore rank his book among the Hagiographa, not among the prophecies, and would not have their disciples pay much regard to it. One reason they pretend is, because he did not live such a mean mortified life as Jeremiah, and some other of the prophets, did, but lived like a prince, and was a prime minister of state; whereas we find him persecuted as other prophets were, ch. vi., and mortifying himself as other prophets did, when he ate no pleasant bread, ch. x. 3, and fainting and sick when he was under the power of the spirit of prophecy, ch. viii. 27. Another reason they pretend is, because he wrote his book in a heathen country, and there had his visions, and not in the land of Israel; but by the same reason Ezekiel also must be expunged out of the roll of prophets. But the true reason is, he speaks so plainly of the time of the Messiah's coming that the Jews cannot avoid the conviction of it, and therefore do not care to hear of it. But Josephus calls him one of the greatest of the prophets, nay, the angel Gabriel calls him "a man greatly beloved." He lived long an active life in the courts and councils of some of the greatest monarchs the world ever had,—Nebuchadnezzar, Cyrus, Darius; for we mistake if we confine the privilege of an intercourse with heaven to speculative men, or those who spend their time in contemplation. No; who was more intimately acquainted with the mind of God than Daniel, a courtier, a statesman, and a man of business? The Spirit, as the wind, blows where it lists And if those who have much to do in the world plead that as an excuse for the seldomness and slightness of their converse with God, Daniel will condemn them. Some have thought he returned to Jerusalem, and was one of the masters of the Greek synagogue, but nothing of that appears in Scripture; it is, therefore, generally concluded he died in Persia, at Susa, where he lived to be very old.

II. Concerning this book. The first six chapters of it are historical, and are plain and easy; the six last are prophetical, and in them are many things dark and hard to be understood, which yet would be more intelligible if we had a more complete history of the nations, and especially of the Jewish nation, from Daniel's time to the coming of the Messiah. Our Saviour intimates the difficulty of apprehending the sense of Daniel's prophecies, when speaking of them he saith, "Let him that readeth understand," Mat. xxiv. 15. The first chapter, and the three first verses of the second chapter, are in Hebrew; thence to the eighth chapter is in the Chaldee dialect; from thence to the end is in Hebrew. Mr. Broughton observes, that as the Chaldeans were kind to Daniel, and gave cups of cold water to him when he requested it, rather than the king's wine, God would not have them lose their reward, but made that language which they taught him to have honour in his writings through all the world unto this day. Daniel, according to his computation, continueth the holy story from the first surprising of Jerusalem by the Chaldean Babel, when he himself was carried away captive, until the last destruction of it by Rome, the mystical Babel, for so far forward his predictions look, ch. ix. 27. The fables of Susanna, and of Bel and the Dragon, in both which Daniel is made a party, are apocryphal stories, which we think we have no reason to give any credit to, they being never found in the Hebrew or Chaldee, but only in the Greek, nor ever admitted by the Jewish church. There are some, both of the histories and of the prophecies of this book, that bear date in the latter end of the Chaldean monarchy; and others, of both, that are dated in the beginning of the Persian monarchy; but both Nebuchadnezzar's dream which he interpreted and his own visions point at the Grecian and Roman monarchy, and very particularly at the Jews' troubles under Antiochus, which it would be of great use to them to prepare for, as his fixing the very time for the coming of the Messiah was to all them that waited for the consolation of Israel, and is to us for the confirming of our belief, that this is he who should come, and we are to look for no other.

A.M. 3397. B.C. 607.

CHAPTER I.

This chapter gives us a more particular account of the beginning of Daniel's life, his original and education, than we have of any other of the prophets. Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel, began immediately with Divine visions; but Daniel began with the study of human learning, and was afterwards honoured with Divine visions; such variety of methods has God taken in training up men for the service of his church. We have here, I. Jehoiakim's first captivity, ver. 1, 2, in which Daniel, with others of the seed royal, were carried to Babylon. II. The choice made of Daniel, and some other young men, to be brought up in the Chaldean literature, that they might be fitted to serve the government, and the provision made for them, ver. 3—7. III. Their pious refusal to eat of the portion of the king's meat, and their determining to live upon pulse and water, which, having tried it, the master of the eunuchs allowed them to do, finding that it agreed very well with them, ver. 8—16. IV. Their wonderful improvement above all their fellows in wisdom and knowledge, ver. 17—21.

IN the third year of the reign of Jehoiakim king of Judah came Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon unto Jerusalem, and besieged it. 2 And the Lord gave Jehoiakim king of Judah into his hand, with part of the vessels of the house of God: which he carried into the land of Shinar to the house of his god; and he brought the vessels into the treasure house of his god. 3 And the king spake unto Ashpenaz the master of his eunuchs, that he should bring certain of the children of Israel, and of the king's seed, and of the princes; 4 Children in whom was no blemish, but well favoured, and skilful in all wisdom, and cunning in knowledge, and understanding science, and such as had ability in them to stand in the king's palace, and whom they might teach the learning and the tongue of the Chaldeans. 5 And the king appointed them a daily provision of the king's meat, and of the wine which he drank: so nourishing them three years, that at the end thereof they might stand before the king. 6 Now among these were of the children of Judah, Daniel, Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah: 7 Unto whom the prince of the eunuchs gave names: for he gave unto Daniel the name of Belteshazzar; and

i. 2. Babylon was in the land of Shinar (Gen. x. 10). The vessels of the sanctuary at Jerusalem were deposited by Nebuchadnezzar in the temple of Bel at Babylon, perhaps for security, or perhaps as votive offerings, in accordance with an ancient and wide-spread practice.

i. 3. The chief eunuch, Ashpenaz, whose name is probably of Assyrian origin, was at the head of a class which was very numerous in that age and country. They frequently appear on the monuments as personal attendants on great men, and seem to have often occupied posts of confidence and honour. The word "children" here, as in verse 4 and elsewhere, seems to mean youths.

i. 4. The value attached to learning among the Chaldeans was celebrated, and hence the instruction here given. That they practised writing in various forms, and had more languages than one in use, is well known, through modern researches.

i. 7. The Hebrew names were changed for Chaldean ones, in accorto Hananiah, of Shadrach; and to Mishael, of Meshach; and to Azariah, of Abed-nego.

We have in these verses an account,

First. Of the first descent which Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, in the first year of his reign, made upon Judah and Jerusalem, in the third year of the reign of Jehoiakim, and his success in that expedition, ver. 1, 2. He besieged Jerusalem, soon made himself master of it, seized the king, took whom he pleased and what he pleased away with him, and then left Jehoiakim to reign as tributary to him, which he did about eight years longer, but then rebelled, and it was his ruin. Now from this first captivity most interpreters think the seventy years are to be dated, though Jerusalem was not destroyed, nor the captivity completed, till about nineteen years after. In that first year Daniel was carried to Babylon, and there continued the whole seventy years, (see ver. 21,) during which time all nations shall serve Nebuchadnezzar, and his son, and his son's son, Jer. xxv. 11. So that this one prophet saw, within the compass of his own time, the rise, reign, and ruin of that monarchy; so that it was res unius ætatis,—'the affair of a single age.' Such short-lived things are the kingdoms of the earth, but the kingdom of heaven is everlasting. The righteous, that see them taking root, shall see their fall, Job v. 3; Pr. xxix. 16. Mr. Broughton observes the proportion of times in God's government since the coming out of Egypt—thence to their entering Canaan forty years—thence seven years to the dividing of the land—thence seven jubilees to the first year of Samuel, in whom prophecy begun—thence to this first year of the captivity seven seventies of years (four hundred and ninety, ten jubilees)—thence to the return one seventy—thence to the death of Christ seven seventies more—and from thence to the destruction of Jerusalem forty years.

Secondly. The improvement he made of this success. He did not destroy the city or kingdom, but did that which just accomplished the first threatening of mischief by Babylon; it was that denounced against Hezekiah, for shewing his treasure to the king of Babylon's ambassadors, Isa. xxxix. 6, 7, that the treasures and the children should be carried away; and if they had been humbled and reformed by this, hitherto the king of Babylon's power and success should have gone, but no farther. If lesser judgments do the work, God will not send greater; but if not, he will heat the furnace seven times hotter. Let us see what was now done.

1. The vessels of the sanctuary were carried away, part of them, ver. 2. They fondly trusted to the temple to defend them, though they went on in their iniquity; and now, to shew them the vanity of that confidence, the temple is first plundered. Many of the holy vessels which used to be employed in the service of God were taken away by the king of Babylon, those of them, it is likely, that were most valuable, and he brought them as trophies of victory to the "house of his god," to whom, with a blind devotion, he gave the praise of his success; and, having appropriated these vessels in token of gratitude to his god, he put them in the treasury of his temple. See the righteousness of God; his people had brought the images of other gods into his temple, and now he suffers the vessels of the temple to be carried into the treasuries of those other gods. Note, When men profane the vessels of the sanctuary with their sins, it is just with God to profane them by his judgments. It is likely the treasures of the king's house were rifled, as was foretold; but particular mention is made of the taking away of the vessels of the sanctuary, because we shall find afterwards that the profanation of them was that which filled up the measure of the Chaldeans' iniquity, ch. v. 3. But observe, it was only part of them that went now, some were left them yet upon trial, to see if they would take the right course to prevent the carrying away of the remainder: see Jer. xxvii. 18.

2. The children and young men, especially such as were of noble or royal extraction, that were sightly and promising, and of good natural parts, were carried away. Thus was the iniquity of the fathers visited upon the children. These were taken away by Nebuchadnezzar, 1st. As trophies to be made a show of, for the evidencing and magnifying of his success. 2nd. As hostages for the fidelity of their parents in their own land, who would be concerned to carry themselves well, that their children might have the better treatment. 3rd. As a seed to serve him. He took them away to train them up for employments and preferments under him; either out of an unaccountable affectation, which great men often have, to be attended by foreigners, though they be blacks, rather than by those of their own nation, or because he knew that there were no such witty, sprightly, ingenious young men to be found among his Chaldeans as abounded among the youth of Israel; and, if that were so, it was much for the honour of the Jewish nation, as of an uncommon genius above other people, and a fruit of the blessing. But it was a shame that a people that had so much wit should have so little wisdom and grace. Now observe,

First. The directions which the king of Babylon gave for the choice of these youths, ver. 4. They must not choose such as were deformed in body, but comely and well-favoured, whose countenances were indexes of ingenuity and good humour. But that is not enough: they must be skilful in all wisdom and cunning, or well seen in knowledge, and understanding science; that were quick and sharp, and could give a ready and intelligent account of their own country, and of the learning they had hitherto been brought up in. He chose such as were young, because they would be pliable and tractable, would forget their own people and incorporate with the Chaldeans. He had an eye to what he designed them for; they must be such as had ability in them to stand in the king's palace, not only to attend his royal person, but to preside in his affairs. This is an instance of the policy of this rising monarch, now in the beginning of his reign, and was a good omen of his prosperity, that he was in care to raise up a succession of persons fit for public business. He did not, like Ahasuerus, appoint them to choose him out young women for the service of his lusts, but young men for the service of his government. It is the interest of princes to have wise men employed under them; it is, therefore, their wisdom to take care for the finding out and training up of such. It is the misery of this world that so many who are fit for public stations are buried in obscurity, and so many who are unfit for them are preferred to them.

Secondly. The care which he took concerning them. 1*st.* For their education. He ordered that they should be taught "the learning and the tongue of the Chaldeans." They are supposed to be wise and knowing young men, and yet they must be farther taught. "Give instructions to a wise man, and he will increase in learning." Note, Those who would do good in the world when they are grown up must learn when they are young—that is the learning age. If that time be lost, it will hardly be redeemed. What unlawful arts were used among the Chaldeans—magic and divination—it doth not appear that Nebuchadnezzar designed they should learn them; if he did, Daniel and his fellows would not defile themselves with them. Nay, we do not find that he ordered them to be taught the religion of the Chaldeans. By this it appears he was at this time no bigot; if men were skilful and faithful, and fit for his business, it was not material to him what religion they were of, provided they had but some religion. They must be trained up in the language and laws of the country, in history, philosophy, and mathematics; in the arts of husbandry, war, and navigation; in such learning as might qualify them to serve their generation. Note, It is real service to the public to provide for the good education of youth. 2*nd.* For their maintenance. He provided for them three years, not only necessaries, but dainties, for their encouragement in their studies. They had "daily provision of the king's meat, and of the wine which he drank," ver. 5. This was an instance of his generosity and humanity. Though they were his captives, he considered their birth and quality, their spirit and genius, and treated them honourably, and studied to make their captivity easy to them. There is a respect owing to those who are well born and bred, when they are fallen into distress. With a liberal education there should be a liberal maintenance.

Thirdly. A particular account of Daniel and his fellows. They were of the children of Judah, the royal tribe, and probably of the house of David, which was grown a numerous family. And God told Hezekiah, that of the children that should issue from him some should be taken and made eunuchs or chamberlains in the palace of the king of Babylon. The prince of the eunuchs changed the names of Daniel and his fellows, partly to shew his authority over them, and their subjection to him, and partly in token of their being naturalized and made Chaldeans. Their Hebrew names, which they received at their circumcision, had something of God or Jah in them. Daniel, 'God is my Judge;' Hananiah, 'the grace of the Lord;' Mishael, 'he that is the strong God;' Azariah, 'the Lord is a help.' To make them forget the God of their fathers, the guide of their youth, they give them names that smell of the Chaldean idolatry. Belteshazzar signifies 'the keeper of the hid treasures of Bel;' Shadrach, 'the inspiration of the sun,' which the Chaldeans worshipped; Meshach, 'of the goddess Shach,' under which name Venus was worshipped; Abed-nego, 'the servant of the shining fire,' which they worshipped also. Thus, though they would not force them from the religion of their fathers to that of their conquerors, yet they did what they could by fair means insensibly to wean them from the former, and instil the latter into them. Yet see how comfortably they were provided for; though they suffered for their fathers' sins they were preferred for their own merits, and the land of their captivity was made more comfortable to them than the land of their nativity at this time would have been.

8 But Daniel purposed in his heart that he would not defile himself with the portion of the king's meat, nor with the wine which he drank: therefore he requested of the prince of the eunuchs that he might not defile himself. 9 Now God had brought Daniel into favour and tender love with the prince of the eunuchs. 10 And the prince of the eunuchs said unto Daniel, I fear my lord the king, who hath appointed your meat and your drink: for why should he see your faces worse liking than the children which are of your sort? then shall ye make me endanger my head to the king. 11 Then said Daniel to Melzar, whom the prince of the eunuchs had set over Daniel, Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah, 12 Prove thy servants, I beseech thee, ten days; and let them give us pulse to eat, and water to drink. 13 Then let our countenances be looked dance with a custom still lingering in the East. There is considerable difference of opinion as to the meaning of the names given to Daniel and his three companions, but it is very probable that every one of them contained an idolatrous allusion: of Belteshazzar and Abed-nego this is certain. Nego was doubtless the name of a deity, but whether the same as Nebo, or a goddess who is compared with Venus, is not decided.

i. 8. It is not clear why Daniel and his friends expressed the opinions they did, but Rosenmüller probably points to one chief reason when he says, "It was customary among the ancients to bring a portion of that which was eaten and drunk as an offering to the gods, as a sign of thankful recognition that all which men enjoy is their gift. Among the Romans these gifts were called libamina, so that with each meal there was connected an act of offering. Hence Daniel and his friends regarded that which was brought from the royal table as food which had been offered to the gods, and therefore upon before thee, and the countenance of the children that eat of the portion of the king's meat: and as thou seest, deal with thy servants. 14 So he consented to them in this matter, and proved them ten days. 15 And at the end of ten days their countenances appeared fairer and fatter in flesh than all the children which did eat the portion of the king's meat. 16 Thus Melzar took away the portion of their meat, and the wine that they should drink; and gave them pulse.

We observe here, very much to our satisfaction,

First. That Daniel was a favourite with "the prince of the eunuchs," ver. 9, as Joseph was with the keeper of the prison. He had a tender love for him. No doubt Daniel deserved it, and recommended himself by his ingenuity and sweetness of temper; he was greatly beloved, ch. ix. 23; and yet it is said here it was God that brought him into favour with the prince of the eunuchs, for every one doth not meet with acceptance according to his merits. Note, The interest which we think we make for ourselves we must acknowledge to be God's gift, and must ascribe to him the glory of it. Whoever are in favour, it is God that has brought them into favour; and it is by him that they find good understanding. Herein was again verified that word, Ps. cvi. 46, "He makes them to be pitied of all those that carried them captives." Let young ones know that the way to be acceptable is to be tractable and dutiful.

Secondly. That Daniel was still firm to his religion. They had changed his name, but they could not change his nature; whatever they pleased to call him, he still retained the spirit of an Israelite indeed. He would apply his mind as closely as any of them all to his book, and took pains to make himself master of the "learning and tongue of the Chaldeans;" but he was resolved "he would not defile himself with the portion of the king's meat," he would not meddle with it, "nor with the wine which he drank," ver. 8. And having communicated his purpose, with the reasons of it, to his fellows, they concurred in the same resolution, as appears, ver. 11. This was not out of sullenness, or peevishness, or a spirit of contradiction, but from a principle of conscience. Perhaps it was not in itself unlawful for them to "eat of the king's meat," or to "drink of his wine;" but,

1. They were scrupulous concerning the meat, lest it should be sinful. Sometimes such meat would be set before them as was expressly forbidden by their law, as swine's flesh; or, they were afraid lest it should have been offered in sacrifice to an idol, or blessed in the name of an idol. The Jews were distinguished from other nations very much by their meats, Lev. xi. 45, 46, and these pious young men, being in a strange country, thought themselves obliged to keep up the honour of their being a peculiar people. Though they could not keep up their dignity as princes, they would not lose it as Israelites; for by that they most valued themselves. Note, When God's people are in Babylon they have need to take special care that they partake not in her sins. Providence seemed to lay this meat before them; being captives, they must eat what they could get, and must not disoblige their masters; yet, if the command be against it, they must abide by that. Though Providence saith, "Kill and eat," conscience saith, "Not so, Lord, for nothing common or unclean has come into my mouth."

2. They were jealous over themselves, lest, though it should not be sinful in itself, it should be an occasion of sin to them; lest, by indulging their appetites with these dainties, they should grow sinful and voluptuous, and in love with the pleasures of Babylon. They had learned David's prayer, "Let me not eat of their dainties," Ps. cxli. 4; and Solomon's precept, "Be not desirous of dainties, for they are deceitful meat," Pr. xxiii. 3; and accordingly they form their resolution. Note, It is very much the praise of all, and especially of young people, to be dead to the delights of sense, not to covet them, not to relish them, but to look upon them with an indifferency. Those that would excel in wisdom and piety must learn betimes to "keep under the body, and bring it into subjection."

3. However they thought it unreasonable now, when Jerusalem was in distress, and they themselves in captivity, they had no heart "to drink wine in bowls," so much were they "grieved for the affliction of Joseph." Though they had royal blood in their veins, yet they did not think it proper to have royal dainties in their mouths, when they were thus brought low. Note, It becomes us to be humble under humbling providences. "Call me not Naomi, call me Marah." See the benefit of affliction; by the account Jeremiah gives of the princes and great men now at Jerusalem it appears they were very corrupt and wicked, and defiled themselves with things offered to idols, while these young gentlemen that were in captivity would not defile themselves, no, not with their "portion of the king's meat." How much better is it with those that retain their integrity in the depths of affliction than with those that retain their iniquity in the heights of prosperity. Observe, the great thing that Daniel avoided was, defiling himself with the pollutions of sin. That is the thing we should be more afraid of than of any outward trouble. Daniel having taken up this resolution, he "requested of the prince of the eunuchs that he might not defile himself;" not only that he might not be compelled to do it, but that he might not be tempted to do it; that the bait might not be laid before him; that he might not see the portion appointed him of the king's meat, nor look upon the wine when it was red. It will be easier to keep the temptation at a distance than to suffer it to come near, and then be forced to put a knife to our throat. Note, We cannot better improve our interest in any with whom we have found favour than to make use of them to keep us from sin.

Thirdly. That God wonderfully owned him herein. When Daniel requested that he might have none of the king's meat or wine set before him, the prince of the eunuchs objected that, if he and his fellows were not found in as good case as any of their companions, he should be in danger of having anger, and of losing his head, ver. 10.

Daniel, to satisfy him that there would be no danger of any ill consequences, desires the matter might be put to a trial. He applies himself farther to the under-officer, Melzar, or the steward: Prove us for ten days; during that time let us have nothing but herbs and fruits, or parched peas or lentils, and nothing but water to drink, and see how we can live upon that, and proceed accordingly, ver. 13. People will not believe the benefit of abstemiousness and a spare diet, nor how much it contributes to the health of the body, unless they try it. Trial was accordingly made. Daniel and his fellows lived for ten days upon pulse and water. Hard fare for young men of genteel extraction and education, and which one would rather expect they should have contended against than petitioned for: but "at the end of the ten days" they were compared with the other children, and were found "fairer and fatter in flesh," of a more healthful look and a better complexion, than "all those which did eat the portion of the king's meat," ver. 15. This was in part a natural effect of their temperance, but it must be ascribed to the special blessing of God, which will make a little to go a great way, a dinner of herbs better than a stalled ox. By this it appears that "man lives not by bread alone." Pulse and water shall be the most nourishing food, if God speak the word. See what it is to keep ourselves pure from the pollutions of sin; it is the way to have that comfort and satisfaction which will be "health to the navel, and marrow to the bones," while the pleasures of sin are "rottenness to the bones."

Fourthly. That his master countenanced him. The steward did not force them to eat against their consciences, but, as they desired, "gave them pulse and water, ver. 16, the pleasures of which they enjoyed, and we have reason to think were not envied the enjoyment. Here is a great example of temperance, and contentment with mean things; and, as Epicurus said, 'He that lives according to nature will never be poor, but he that lives according to opinion will never be rich.' This wonderful abstemiousness of these young men in the days of their youth contributed to the fitting of them, 1. For their eminent services. Hereby they kept their minds clear and unclouded, and fit for contemplation, and saved for the best employments a great deal both of time and thought: and thus they prevented those diseases which indispose men for the business of age, that owe their rise to the intemperances of youth. 2. For their eminent sufferings. They that had thus inured themselves to hardship, and lived a life of self-denial and mortification, could the more easily venture upon the fiery furnace and the den of lions, rather than sin against God.

17 As for these four children, God gave them knowledge and skill in all learning and wisdom: and Daniel had understanding in all visions and dreams. 18 Now at the end of the days that the king had said he should bring them in, then the prince of the eunuchs brought them in before Nebuchadnezzar. 19 And the king communed with them; and among them all was found none like Daniel, Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah: therefore stood they before the king. 20 And in all matters of wisdom and understanding, that the king enquired of them, he found them ten times better than all the magicians and astrologers that were in all his realm. 21 And Daniel continued even unto the first year of king Cyrus.

Concerning Daniel and his fellows, we have here,

First. Their great attainments in learning, ver. 17. They were very sober and diligent, and studied hard; and, we may suppose, their tutors, finding them of an uncommon capacity, took a deal of pains with them; but, after all, their achievements are ascribed to God only. It was he that "gave them knowledge and skill in all learning and wisdom, for "every good and perfect gift is from above, from the Father of lights." It is the Lord our God that gives men power to get this wealth. The mind is furnished only by him that formed it. The great learning which God gave these four children was, 1. A balance for their losses. They had, for the iniquity of their fathers, been deprived of the honours and pleasures that would have attended their noble extraction; but, to make them amends for that, God, in giving them learning, gave them better honours and pleasures than those they had been deprived of. 2. A recompense for their integrity. They kept to their religion, even in the minutest instances of it, and would not so much as defile themselves with the king's meat or wine, but became in effect Nazarites, and now God rewarded them for it with an eminency in learning; for "God giveth to a man that is good in his sight wisdom and knowledge, and joy" with them, Eccl. ii. 26. To Daniel he gave a double portion; he "had understanding in visions and dreams." He knew how to interpret dreams, as Joseph, not by rules of art, such as are pretended to be given by the Oneirocritics, but by a Divine sagacity and wisdom which God gave him. Nay, he was endued with a prophetical spirit, by which he was enabled to converse with God, and to receive the notices of Divine things in dreams and visions, Num. xii. 6. According to this gift given to Daniel, we find him in this book all along employed about dreams and visions, interpreting or entertaining them; for "as every one has received the gift," so shall he have an opportunity, and so should he have a heart, to "minister the same," 1 Pet. iv. 10.

Secondly. Their great acceptance with the king. After three years spent in their education, (they being of some maturity, it is likely, when they came, perhaps about twenty years old,) they were presented to the king, with the rest that were of their standing, ver. 18; and the king examined them, and communed with them himself, ver. 19. He could do it, being a man of parts and learning himself, else he had not come to be so great; and he would do it, for it is the wisdom of princes, in the choice of the persons they employ, to see with their own eyes, to exercise their own judgment, and not trust too much to others' representation. The king examined them, not so much in the languages, in the rules of oratory or poetry, as "in all matters of wisdom and understanding," the rules of prudence and true politics; he inquired into their judgment about the due conduct of human life, and public affairs; not, Were they wits? but, Were they wise? And he found them to excel not only the young candidates for preferment that were of their own standing, but that they had "more understanding than the ancients, than all their teachers," Ps. cxix. 99, 100. So far was the king from being partial to his own countrymen, to seniors, to those of his own religion, and of an established reputation, that he freely owned that, upon trial, he found these poor young captive Jews ten times wiser and "better than all the magicians that were in all his realm," ver. 20. He was soon aware of something extraordinary in these young men; and, which gave him a surprising satisfaction, was soon aware that a little of their true divinity was preferable to a great deal of the divination he had been used to. "What is the chaff to the wheat?" the magicians' rods to Aaron's? There was no comparison between them. These four young students were better, were ten times better, than all the old practitioners, put them all together, that were in all his impure." There were also risks of being supplied with food not allowed by the law of Moses. This might happen not merely in respect of the actual food, but might arise from peculiar methods of preparing it for the table.

i. 10. "The children which are of your sort" is a peculiar phrase, and may mean "youths of your class." The last clause signifies "you will imperil my life." An Eastern despot would not hesitate to behead any officer who gave him offence.

i. 11. Melzar is perhaps not the name of a man, but of an office. On the refusal of Ashpenaz to endanger his life by compliance with the young Hebrews, they applied to Melzar, or the melzar who had charge of them. This name is thought to come from the old Persian, and to mean some one who is set over the wine, as a butler. Gesenius, however, says it may mean "prefect of the treasury." Both explanations may be reconciled if we understand a steward in charge of the commissariat.

realm, and we may be sure they were not a few. This contempt did God pour upon the pride of the Chaldeans, and this honour did he put upon the low estate of his own people. And thus did he make not only those persons, but the rest of their nation, for their sakes, the more respected in the land of their captivity. Lastly, This judgment being given concerning them, they "stood before the king," ver. 19. They attended in the presence chamber, nay, in the council chamber; for to see the king's face is the paraphrasis of a privy councillor, Est. i. 14. This confirms Solomon's observation, "Seest thou a man delight in his business," sober and humble, "he shall stand before kings, he shall not stand before mean men." Industry is the way to preferment. How long the other three were about the court we are not told; but Daniel, for his part, "continued to the first year of Cyrus," ver. 21, though not always alike in favour and reputation. He lived and prophesied after the first year of Cyrus, but that is mentioned to intimate that he lived to see the deliverance of his people out of their captivity, and their return to their own land. Note, Sometimes God favours his servants that mourn with Zion in her sorrows, to let them live to see better times with the church than they saw in the beginning of their days, and to share with her in her joys.

CHAPTER II.

It was said, ch. i. 17, that Daniel had understanding in dreams; and here we have an early and eminent instance of it, which soon made him famous in the court of Babylon, as Joseph by the same means came to be so in the court of Egypt. This chapter is a history, but it is the history of a prophecy, by a dream, and the interpretation of it. Pharaoh's dream, and Joseph's interpretation of it, related only to the years of plenty and famine, and the interest of God's Israel in them; but Nebuchadnezzar's dream here, and Daniel's interpretation of that, looks much higher, to the four monarchies, and the concerns of Israel in them, and the kingdom of the Messiah which should be set up in the world, upon the ruins of them. In this chapter we have, I. The great perplexity that Nebuchadnezzar was put into by a dream which he had forgotten, and his command to the magicians to tell him what it was, which they could not pretend to do, ver. 1—11. II. Orders given for the destroying of all the wise men of Babylon, and of Daniel among the rest, with his fellows, ver. 12—15. III. The discovery of this secret to him, in answer to prayer, and the thanksgiving he offered up to God thereupon, ver. 16—23. IV. His admission to the king, and the discovery he made to him, both of his dream and of the interpretation of it, ver. 24—45. V. The great honour which Nebuchadnezzar put upon Daniel, in recompense for this service, and the preferment of his companions with him, ver. 46—49.

AND in the second year of the reign of Nebuchadnezzar Nebuchadnezzar dreamed dreams, wherewith his spirit was troubled, and his sleep brake from him. 2 Then the king commanded to call the magicians, and the astrologers, and the sorcerers, and the Chaldeans, for to shew the king his dreams. So they came and stood before the king. 3 And the king said unto them, I have dreamed a dream, and my spirit was troubled to know the dream. 4 Then spake the Chaldeans to the king in Syriack, O king, live for ever: tell thy servants the dream, and we will shew the interpretation. 5 The king answered and said to the Chaldeans, The thing is gone from me: if ye will not make known unto me the dream, with the interpretation thereof, ye shall be cut in pieces, and your houses shall be made a dunghill. 6 But if ye shew the dream, and the interpretation thereof, ye shall receive of me gifts and rewards and great honour: therefore shew me the dream, and the interpretation thereof. 7 They answered again and said, Let the king tell his servants the dream, and we will shew the interpretation of it. 8 The king answered and said, I know of certainty that ye would gain the time, because ye see the thing is gone from me. 9 But if ye will not make known unto me the dream, there is but one decree for you: for ye have prepared lying and corrupt words to speak before me, till the time be changed: therefore tell me the dream, and I shall know that ye can shew me the interpretation thereof. 10 The Chaldeans answered before the king, and said, There is not a man upon the earth that can shew the king's matter: therefore there is no king, lord, nor ruler, that asked such things at any magician, or astrologer, or Chaldean. 11 And it is a rare thing that the king requireth, and there is none other that can shew it before the king, except the gods, whose dwelling is not with flesh. 12 For this cause the king was angry and very furious, and commanded to destroy all the wise men of Babylon. 13 And the decree went forth that the wise men should be slain; and they sought Daniel and his fellows to be slain.

We meet with a great difficulty in the date of this story. It is said to be in the second year of the reign of Nebuchadnezzar, ver. 1. Now Daniel was carried to Babylon in his first year, and it should seem he was three years under tutors and governors before he was presented to the king, ch. i. 5. How then could this happen in the second year? Perhaps, though three years were appointed for the education of other children, yet Daniel was so pregnant that he was taken into business when he had been but one year at school, and so in the second year he became thus considerable. Some make it to be the second year after he began to reign alone, but the fifth or sixth year since he began to reign in partnership with his father. Some read it, And in the second year (namely, the second after Daniel and his fellows stood before the king) in the kingdom of Nebuchadnezzar, or in his reign, this happened. As Joseph, in the second year after his skill in dreams, shewed and expounded Pharaoh's, so Daniel, in the second year after he commenced master in that art, did this service. I would much rather take it some of these ways than suppose, as some do, that it was in the second year after he had conquered Egypt, which was the thirty-sixth year of his reign, because it appears by what we meet with in Ezekiel, that Daniel was famous both for wisdom and prevalency in prayer long before that; and therefore this passage or story, which shews how he came to be so eminent for both these, must be laid early in Nebuchadnezzar's reign. Now here we may observe,

First. The loss that Nebuchadnezzar was in by reason of a dream which he had dreamed, but had forgotten; ver. 1, "He dreamed dreams;" that is, a dream consisting of divers distinct parts, or which filled his head as much as if it had been many dreams. Solomon speaks of a "multitude of dreams," strangely incoherent, in which there are divers vanities, Eccl. v. 7. This dream of Nebuchadnezzar had nothing in the thing itself but what might be paralleled in many a common dream, in which are often presented to men things as foreign as this here; but there was something in the impression it made upon him which carried with it an incontestable evidence of its Divine original, and its prophetic significancy. Note, The greatest of men are not exempt from, nay, they lie most open to, those cares and troubles of mind which disturb their repose in the night, while the sleep of the labouring man is sweet, and sound, and the sleep of the sober temperate man free from confused dreams. The abundance of the rich will not suffer them to sleep at all for care, and the excesses of gluttons and drunkards will not suffer them to sleep quietly for dreaming. But this here was not from natural causes: Nebuchadnezzar was a troubler of God's Israel, but God here troubled him; for he that made the soul can "make his sword to approach to it." He had his guards about him, but they could not keep trouble from his spirit. We know not the uneasiness of many that live in great pomp, and one would think in pleasure too. We look into their houses, and are tempted to envy them, but could we look into their hearts we should pity them rather. All the treasures, and all the delights of the children of men, which this mighty monarch had the command of, could not procure him a little repose, when by reason of the trouble of his mind his "sleep brake from him." But God giveth his beloved sleep, who return to him as their rest.

Secondly. The trial that he made of his magicians and astrologers, whether they could tell him what his dream was which he had forgotten. They were presently sent "for to shew the king his dream," ver. 2. There are many things which we retain the impressions of, and yet have lost the images of the things; though we cannot tell what the matter was, we know how we were affected with it—so it was with this king. His dream was slipped out of his mind, and he could not possibly recollect it, but was confident he should know it if he heard it again. God ordered it so, that Daniel might have the more honour, in him the God of Daniel. Note, God sometimes serves his own purposes by putting things out of men's minds, as well as by putting things into their minds. The magicians, it is likely, were proud of their being sent for into the king's bedchamber, to give him a taste of their office, not doubting but it would be for their honour. He tells them he had "dreamed a dream," ver. 3. They speak to him in the Syriac tongue, which was then the same with the Chaldee, but now they differ much. And from henceforward Daniel useth that language or dialect of the Hebrew, for the same reason that those words, Jer. x. 11, are in that language, because designed to convince the Chaldeans of the folly of their idolatry, and to bring them to the knowledge and worship of the true and living God, which the stories of these chapters have a direct tendency to. But ch. viii., and forward, being intended for the comfort of the Jews, is written in their peculiar language. They, in their answer, complimented the

i. 12. The word rendered "pulse" here may fairly be understood of sundry kinds of vegetables and green herbs.

i. 17. This does not mean that the Hebrew youths had no need to pursue their regular studies under the teachers set over them, but that God blessed and prospered their endeavours, and in the case of Daniel gave supernatural aid. Again, the words "all visions and dreams" do not mean that all dreams have a secret meaning, but that Daniel was enabled to explain all that had such a meaning.

i. 20. Magicians, astrologers, and others who professed to know the mysteries of nature and of events, were numerous and honoured in Babylonia, as in Egypt and elsewhere. They combined a certain real acquaintance with phenomena and fact, with superstitious and fanciful ideas and interpretations.

ii. 1. The mention of Nebuchadnezzar's second year, where the fourth would be expected, has caused some to doubt the genuineness of the book. The common explanation is that Nebuchadnezzar had king with their good wishes, desired him to tell his dream, and undertook with all possible assurance to interpret it, ver. 4. But the king insisted upon it that they must tell him the dream itself, because he had forgotten it, and could not tell it them; and if they could not do this they should all be put to death as deceivers, ver. 5; themselves cut to pieces, and their houses made a dunghill. If they could, they should be rewarded and preferred, ver. 6. And they know, as Balaam did concerning Balak, that he is able to promote them to great honour, and give them the wages of unrighteousness which, like him, they love so dearly. No question, therefore, they will do their utmost to gratify the king: if they do not, it is not for want of good-will, but for want of power, Providence so ordering it that the magicians of Babylon might now be as much confounded and put to shame as of old the magicians of Egypt had been; that, how much soever his people were both in Egypt and Babylon vilified and made contemptible, his oracles might in both be magnified and made honourable, by the silencing of those that set up in competition with them. The magicians, having reason on their side, insist upon it that the king must tell them the dream; and then, if they do not tell him the interpretation of it, it is their fault, ver. 7. But arbitrary power is deaf to reason; the king falls into a passion, gives them a parcel of hard words, and, without any colour of reason, suspects that they could tell him, but would not; and, instead of upbraiding them with impotency, and the deficiency of their art, as he might justly have done, he charges them with a combination to affront him; "Ye have prepared lying and corrupt words to speak before me." How unreasonable and absurd is this imputation! If they had undertaken to tell him what his dream was, and had imposed upon him with a sham, he might have charged them with lying and corrupt words. But to say this of them when they honestly confessed their own weakness only shews what senseless things indulged passions are, and how apt great men are to think it is their prerogative to pursue their humour in defiance of reason and equity, and all the dictates of both. When the magicians begged of him to tell them the dream, though the request was highly rational and just, he tells them they did but dally with him to "gain time," ver. 8, "till the time be changed," ver. 9; either till the king's desire to know his dream be over, and he, grown indifferent whether he be told it or no, though now he is so hot upon it, or till they may hope he has so perfectly forgot his dream (the remaining shades of which are slipping from him apace as he catcheth at them) that they may tell him what they please, and make him believe it was his dream; and when the thing which is going is quite gone from him, as it will be in a little time, he will not be able to disprove them. And therefore, without delay, they must tell him the dream. In vain do they plead,

1. That there is no man on earth that can retrieve the king's dream, ver. 10. There are settled rules by which to discover what the meaning of the dream was, (whether they will hold or no is the question,) but never were any rules offered to be given by which to discover what the dream was; they cannot work unless they have something to work upon. They acknowledge that the gods may indeed "declare unto man what is his thought," Am. iv. 13, for he "understandeth our thoughts afar off," Ps. cxxxix. 2, what they will be before we think them, what they are when we do not regard them, and what they have been when we have forgotten them. But those who can do this are gods that have not their dwelling with flesh, ver. 11; and it is they alone that can do this. As for men, their dwelling is with flesh. The wisest and greatest of men are clouded with a veil of flesh, which quite obstructs and confounds all their acquaintance with spirits, and their powers and operations; but the gods, that are themselves pure spirits, know what is in man. See here an instance of the ignorance of these magicians, that they speak of many gods, whereas there is but one, and can be but one Infinite; yet see their knowledge of that which even the light of nature teacheth, and the works of nature prove, that there is a God who is a Spirit, and perfectly knows the spirits of men, and all their thoughts, so as it is not possible any man should. This confession of the Divine omniscience is here extorted from these idolaters, to the honour of God and their own condemnation, who, though they know there is a God in heaven, to whom all hearts are open, all desires known, and from whom no secret is hid, yet offered up their prayers and praises to dumb idols, that have "eyes and see not, ears and hear not."

2. That there is no king on earth that would expect or require such a thing, ver. 10. This intimates, that they were kings, lords, or potentates, not ordinary people, that the magicians had most dealings with, and at whose devotion they were, while the oracles of God, and the Gospel of Christ, are dispensed to the poor. Kings and potentates have often required unreasonable things of their subjects, but they think never any required so unreasonable a thing as this, and therefore hope his imperial majesty will not insist upon it. But it is all in vain; when passion is in the throne reason is under foot. He was "angry and very furious," ver. 12. Note, It is very common for those that will not be convinced by reason to be provoked and exasperated by it, and to push on with fury what they cannot support with equity.

Thirdly, The doom passed upon all the magicians of Babylon. There is but one decree for them all, ver. 9; they all stand condemned, without exception or distinction. The decree has gone forth, they must every man of them be slain, ver. 13, Daniel and his fellows, though they knew nothing of the matter, not excepted. See here, 1. What are commonly the unjust proceedings of arbitrary power. Nebuchadnezzar is here a tyrant in true colours, speaking death when he cannot speak sense, and treating those as traitors whose only fault is, that they would serve him, but cannot. 2. What is commonly the just punishment of pretenders. How unrighteous soever Nebuchadnezzar was in this sentence, as to the ringleaders in the imposture, God was righteous. They that imposed upon men, in taking on them to do what they could not do, are now sentenced to death for not being able to do what they did not pretend to.

14 Then Daniel answered with counsel and wisdom to Arioch the captain of the king's guard, which was gone forth to slay the wise men of Babylon: 15 He answered and said to Arioch the king's captain, Why is the decree so hasty from the king? Then Arioch made the thing known to Daniel. 16 Then Daniel went in, and desired of the king that he would give him time, and that he would shew the king the interpretation. 17 Then Daniel went to his house, and made the thing known to Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah, his companions: 18 That they would desire mercies of the God of heaven concerning this secret, that Daniel and his fellows should not perish with the rest of the wise men of Babylon. 19 Then was the secret revealed unto Daniel in a night vision. Then Daniel blessed the God of heaven. 20 Daniel answered and said,

Blessed be the name of God for ever and ever:
For wisdom and might are his:
21 And he changeth the times and the seasons:
He removeth kings, and setteth up kings:
He giveth wisdom unto the wise,
And knowledge to them that know understanding:
22 He revealeth the deep and secret things:
He knoweth what is in the darkness,
And the light dwelleth with him.
23 I thank thee, and praise thee, O thou God of my fathers,
Who hast given me wisdom and might, [thee:
And hast made known unto me now what we desired of
For thou hast now made known unto us the king's matter.

When the king sent for his wise men to tell him his dream, and the interpretation of it, ver. 2, it seems Daniel was not summoned to appear among them. The king, though he was highly pleased with him when he examined him, and thought him ten times wiser than the rest of his wise men, yet forgot him when he had most occasion for him; and no wonder, when all was done in a heat, and nothing with a cool and deliberate thought. But Providence so ordered it that the magicians, being nonplussed, might be the more taken notice of, and so the more glory might redound to the God of Daniel. But though Daniel had not the honour to be consulted with the rest of the wise men, contrary to all law and justice, by an undistinguishing sentence, he stands condemned with them, and till he has notice brought him to prepare for execution knows nothing of the matter. How miserable is the case of those who live under an arbitrary government, as this of Nebuchadnezzar's! How happy we, whose lives are under the protection of the law and methods of justice, and lie not thus at the mercy of a peevish and capricious prince!

We have found already in Ezekiel that Daniel was famous both for prudence and prayer. As a prince he had power with God and man; by prayer he had power with God, by prudence he had power with man, and in both he prevailed. Thus did he "find favour and good understanding" in the sight of both. And in these verses we have a remarkable instance of both.

First, Daniel, by prudence, knew how to deal with men, and he prevailed with them. When Arioch, the captain of the guard, that was appointed to slay all the wise men of Babylon, the whole college of them, seized Daniel,—for the sword of tyranny, like the sword of war, devours one as well as another,—he "answered with counsel and wisdom," ver. 14. He did not fall into a passion, and reproach the king as unjust and barbarous, much less did he contrive how to make resistance, but mildly asked, "Why is the decree so hasty?" ver. 15. And whereas the rest of the wise men had insisted upon it that it was utterly impossible for him ever to have his demand gratified, which did but make him more outrageous, Daniel undertakes, if he may but have a little time allowed him, to give the king all the satisfaction he desired, ver. 16. The king, being now sensible of his error, in not sending for Daniel sooner, whose character he began to recollect, was soon prevailed with to respite the judgment, and make trial of Daniel. Note, The likeliest method to turn away wrath, even the wrath of a king, which is as the messenger of death, is by a soft answer—by that yielding which pacifies great offences. Thus, though where the word of a king is there is power, yet even that word may be repelled, and that so as to be repealed; and so some read it here, ver. 14. Then Daniel returned, and stayed the counsel and edict, through Arioch, the king's provost-marshal.

Secondly, Daniel knew how by prayer to converse with God, and he found favour with him, both in petition and in thanksgiving, which are the two principal parts of prayer. Observe,

1. His humble petition for this mercy, that God would discover to him what was the king's dream, and the interpretation of it. When he had gained time, he did not go to consult with the rest of the wise men, whether there was any thing in their art, in their books, that might be of use in this matter, but went to his house, there to be alone with his God; for from him alone, who is the Father of lights, he expected this great gift. Observe,

1st. He did not only pray for this discovery himself, but he engaged his companions to pray for it too. He made the thing known to them, who had been all along his bosom friends and associates, "that they would desire mercies of God concerning this secret," ver. 17, 18. Though Daniel was probably their senior, and every way excelled them, yet he engaged them as partners with him in this matter: vis unita fortior,—'the union of forces produces greater force:' see Est. iv. 16. Note, Praying friends are valuable friends; and it is good to have an intimacy with, and an interest in, those that have fellowship with God and an interest at the throne of grace. And it well becomes the greatest and best of men to desire the assistance of the prayers of others for them. St. Paul often bespeaks his friends to pray for him. Thus we must shew that we put a value upon our friends, upon prayer, upon their prayers.

2nd. He was particular in this prayer, but had an eye to, and a dependence upon, the general mercy of God, that "they would desire mercies of the God of heaven concerning this secret," ver. 18. We ought, in prayer, to look up to God as the "God of heaven," a God above us, and that has dominion over us, to whom we owe adoration and allegiance, a God of power, who can do every thing. Our Saviour has taught us to pray to God as "our Father in heaven;" and whatever good we pray for our dependence must be upon the mercies of God for it, and an interest in those mercies we must desire. We can expect nothing by way of recompense for our merits, but all as the gift of God's mercies. They desired mercy "concerning this secret." Note, Whatever is the matter of our care must be the matter of our prayer; we must desire mercy of God concerning this thing and the other thing that occasions us trouble and fear. God gives us leave to be humbly free with him, and in prayer to enter into the detail of our wants and burthens. Secret things belong to the Lord our God, and therefore, if there be any mercy we stand in need of that concerns only reached the second year of his sole monarchy. Dr. Pusey and others, who have laboriously investigated the peculiarities of the Book of Daniel, say there is no discrepancy between this verse and other statements. It appears that Nebuchadnezzar was, as Berosus says, sent by his father, Nabopolassar, on the expedition to Judea and other lands. It is therefore very probable that the years of Nebuchadnezzar's supreme or sole government are intended in this verse.

ii. 2. There were among the Babylonians several classes or orders of persons—here called magicians, astrologers, sorcerers, and Chaldeans— professed not only to teach ordinary knowledge, but to have the power of explaining ominous or prophetic events. The Chaldeans were a people so called; they were pre-eminently a learned race, and they became so prominent that the whole empire is often called Chaldean. They had a language of their own. They are celebrated by several of the writers of antiquity, as Diodorus Siculus, Strabo, Cicero, and Herodotus. There are passages in a secret, to him we must apply ourselves; and though we cannot in faith pray for miracles, yet we may in faith pray to him who has all hearts in his hand, and who in his providence does wonders without miracles, for the discovery of that which is out of our ken, and the obtaining of that which is out of our reach, as far as it is for his glory and our good, believing that to him nothing is hid, nothing is hard.

3rd. Their plea with God was the imminent peril they were in. They desired mercy of God in this matter, that so "Daniel and his fellows might not perish with the rest of the wise men of Babylon," that the righteous might not be destroyed with the wicked. Note, When the lives of good and useful men are in danger, it is time to be earnest with God for mercy for them, as for Peter in prison, Acts xii. 5.

4th. The mercy which Daniel and his fellows prayed for was bestowed. The secret was "revealed unto Daniel in a night vision," ver. 19. Some think he dreamed the same dream when he was asleep that Nebuchadnezzar had dreamed. It should rather seem that when he was awake, and continuing "instant in prayer," and "watching in the same," the dream itself, and the interpretation of it, was communicated to him by the ministry of an angel, abundantly to his satisfaction. Note, The "effectual fervent prayer of righteous men availeth much." There are mysteries and secrets which by prayer we are let into; with that key the cabinets of heaven are unlocked, for Christ hath said, Thus "knock, and it shall be opened to you."

2. His grateful thanksgiving for this mercy, when he had received it. "Then Daniel blessed the God of heaven," ver. 19. He did not stay till he had told it to the king, and seen whether he would own it to be his dream or no, but is confident it is so, and that he has gained his point, and therefore immediately turns his prayers into praises. As he had prayed in a full assurance that God would do this for him, so he gave thanks in a full assurance that he had done it, and in both he had an eye to God as the God of heaven. His prayer was not recorded, but his thanksgiving is. Observe,

1st. The honour he gives to God in his thanksgiving, which he studies to do in a great variety and copiousness of expression, "Blessed be the name of God for ever and ever." There is that for ever in God which is to be blessed and praised, it is unchangeably and eternally in him, and it is to be blessed for ever and ever. As the matter of praise is God's eternal perfection, so the work of praise shall be everlastingly in the doing. First. He gives to God the glory of what he is in himself; "Wisdom and might are his;" wisdom and courage, so some. Whatever is fit to be done he will do; whatever he will do and can do he dares do, and he will be sure to do it in the best manner, for he has infinite wisdom to design and contrive, and infinite power to execute and accomplish; "With him is strength and wisdom," which in men are often parted. Secondly. He gives him the glory of what he is to the world of mankind. He has an universal influence and agency upon all the children of men and all their actions and affairs. Are the times changed? Is the posture of affairs altered? Doth every thing lie open to mutability? It is God that "changeth the times and the seasons," and the face of them; no change comes to pass by chance, but according to the will and counsel of God. Are those that were kings removed and deposed? do they abdicate? are they laid aside? It is God that removes kings. Are the poor raised out of the dust to be set among princes? It is God that setteth up kings; and the making and unmaking of kings is a flower of his crown who is the fountain of all power, King of kings, and Lord of lords. Are there men that excel others in wisdom, philosophers and statesmen, that think above the common rate, contemplative, penetrating men? It is God that gives wisdom to the wise, whether they be so wise as to acknowledge it or no; they have it not of themselves, but it is he that "gives knowledge to them that know understanding," which is a good reason why we should not be proud of our knowledge, and why we should serve and honour God with it, and make it our business to know him. Thirdly. He gives him the glory of this particular discovery. He praiseth him, 1*st*. For that he could make such a discovery; ver. 22, "He revealeth the deep and secret things," which are hid from the eyes of all living. It was he that revealed to man what is true wisdom, when none else could, Job xxviii. 27, 28. It is he that reveals things to come to his servants the prophets; he doth himself perfectly discern and distinguish that which is most close and most industriously concealed, for he will "bring into judgment every secret thing;" the truth will be evident in the great day. He "knows what is in the darkness," and what is done in the darkness, for that "hides not from him," Ps. cxxxix. 11, 12; "The light dwells with him," and he "dwells in the light," 1 Tim. vi. 16, and yet as to us he "makes darkness his pavilion." Some understand it of the light of prophecy and Divine revelation, which dwells with God and is derived from him, for he is the Father of lights, of all lights; they are all at home in him. 2*nd*. For that he had made this discovery to him. Here he has an eye to God, the God of his fathers; for, though the Jews were now captives in Babylon, yet they were "beloved for their fathers' sake." He praiseth God, who is the fountain of wisdom and might, for the wisdom and might he had given him, wisdom to know this great secret and might to bear the discovery. Note, What wisdom and might we have we must acknowledge it to be God's gift; "Thou hast made this known to me," ver. 23. What was hid from the celebrated Chaldeans that made the interpreting of dreams their profession, is revealed to Daniel, a captive Jew, a babe, much their junior. God would hereby put honour upon the spirit of prophecy just when he was putting contempt upon the spirit of divination. Was Daniel thus thankful to God for making known that to him which was the saving of the life of him and his fellows? Much more reason have we to be thankful to him for making known to us the great salvation of the soul, to us and not to the world, to us and not to the wise and prudent.

2nd. The respect he puts upon his companions in his thanksgiving. Though it was by his prayers principally that this discovery was obtained, and to him that it was made, yet he owns their partnership with him; both in praying for it, It is what "we desired of thee," and in enjoying of it, "Thou hast made known unto us the king's matter." Either they were present with Daniel, when the discovery was made to him, or as soon as he knew it he told them, Εὕρηκα, Εὕρηκα, 'I have found it, I have found it;' that they who had assisted him with their prayers might assist him in their praises. His joining them with him is an instance of his humility and modesty, which well becomes those that are taken into communion with God. Thus St. Paul sometimes joins Sylvanus, Timotheus, or some other minister, with himself in the inscriptions to many of his epistles. Note, What honour God puts upon us we should be willing that our brethren may share with us in.

24 Therefore Daniel went in unto Arioch, whom the king had ordained to destroy the wise men of Babylon: he went and said thus unto him; Destroy not the wise men of Babylon: bring me in before the king, and I will shew unto the king the interpretation. 25 Then Arioch brought in Daniel before the king in haste, and said thus unto him, I have found a man of the captives of Judah, that will make known unto the king the interpretation. 26 The king answered and said to Daniel, whose name was Belteshazzar, Art thou able to make known unto me the dream which I have seen, and the interpretation thereof? 27 Daniel answered in the presence of the king, and said, The secret which the king hath demanded cannot the wise men, the astrologers, the magicians, the soothsayers, shew unto the king; 28 But there is a God in heaven that revealeth secrets, and maketh known to the king Nebuchadnezzar what shall be in the latter days. Thy dream, and the visions of thy head upon thy bed, are these; 29 As for thee, O king, thy thoughts came into thy mind upon thy bed, what should come to pass hereafter: and he that revealeth secrets maketh known to thee what shall come to pass. 30 But as for me, this secret is not revealed to me for any wisdom that I have more than any living, but for their sakes that shall make known the interpretation to the king, and that thou mightest know the thoughts of thy heart.

We have here the introduction to Daniel's declaring of the dream and the interpretation of it.

First. He immediately bespoke the reversing of the sentence against the wise men of Babylon, ver. 24. He went with all speed to Arioch, to tell him his commission was now superseded; "Destroy not the wise men of Babylon." Though there were those of them, perhaps, that deserved to die as magicians by the law of God, yet here that which they stood condemned for was not a crime worthy of death or of bonds, and therefore let them not die and be unjustly destroyed, but let them live and be justly ashamed, as having been nonplussed and unable to do that which a prophet of the Lord could do. Note, Since God shews common kindness to the evil and good, we should do so too, and be ready to save the lives even of bad men, Mat. v. 45. A good man is a common good; to Paul in the ship God gave the souls of all that sailed with him; they were saved for his sake. To Daniel was owing the preservation of all the wise men, who yet rendered not according to the benefit done to them, ch. iii. 8.

Secondly. He offered his service with great assurance to go to the king and tell him his dream and the interpretation of it, and was admitted accordingly, ver. 24, 25. Arioch brought him in haste to the king, hoping to ingratiate himself by introducing Daniel. He pretends he had sought him to interpret the king's dream, whereas really it was to execute upon him the king's sentence that he sought him. But courtiers' business is every way to humour the prince, and make their own services acceptable.

Thirdly. He contrived as much as might be to reflect shame upon the magicians, and to give honour to God upon this occasion. The king owned it was a bold undertaking, and questioned whether he could make it good; ver. 26. "Art thou able to make known unto me a dream?" What! such a babe in this knowledge, such a stripling as thou art, wilt thou undertake that which thy seniors despair of doing? The less likely it appeared to the king that Daniel should do this, the more God was glorified in enabling him to do it. Note, In transmitting Divine revelation to the children of men it has been God's usual way to make use of the "weak and foolish things" and persons "of the world," and such as were despised and despaired of, "to confound the wise and mighty," that the excellency of the power might be of him, 1 Cor. i. 27, 28. Daniel from this takes occasion,

1. To put the king out of conceit with his magicians and soothsayers, whom he had such great expectations from; ver. 27, This secret they cannot shew to the king; it is out of their power, the rules of their art will not reach it; therefore, let not the king be angry with them for not doing that which they cannot do, but rather despise them and cast them off because they cannot do it. Broughton reads it generally, 'This secret no sages, astrologers, enchanters, or entrail cookers, can shew unto the king; let not the king, therefore, consult them any more.' Note, The experience we have of the inability of all creatures to give us satisfaction should lessen our esteem of them, and lower our expectations from them. They are baffled in their pretensions, we are baffled in our hopes from them; hitherto they come, and no farther. Let us therefore say to them, as Job to his friends, "Now ye are nothing," miserable comforters are ye all.

2. To bring him to the knowledge of the one only living and true God, the God whom Daniel worshipped. Though they cannot find out the secret, let not the king despair of having it found out, for "there is a God in heaven that revealeth secrets," ver. 26. Note, The insufficiency of creatures should drive us to the all-sufficiency of the Creator. "There is a God in heaven," and it is well for us there is, who can do that for us, and make known that to us, which none on earth can, particularly the secret history of the work of our redemption and the secret designs of God's love to us therein, the mystery which was hid from ages and generations. Divine revelation helps us out there, where human reason leaves us quite at a loss, and makes known that not only to kings, but to the poor of this world, which none of the philosophers or politicians of the heathens, with all their oracles and arts of divination to help them, could ever pretend to give us any light into, Rom. xvi. 25, 26.

Fourthly. He confirmed the king in his opinion that the dream he Herodotus which show that the king only required what was in accordance with a common custom.

ii. 4. What is here called Syriac is in the original Aramean, in which language the writer now proceeds to express himself to the end of chap. vii.

ii. 5. It has been objected that this threat of the king is inconsistent with his character; but a reference to 2 Kings xxv. 7, 21 is a sufficient answer.

ii. 10, 11. The answer of the Chaldeans turns upon the fact that the king asked them to tell him his dream as well as the interpretation of it.

ii. 13. Some translate the first clause, "and the decree went forth, and the wise men were slain," which explanation may be correct if all that is meant is that the work of slaughter had actually commenced. Daniel and his friends ran the same risk, for obvious reasons.

solicitous to recover the idea of, was really well worth inquiring after, that it was of great value and of vast consequence; not a common dream, the idle disport of a ludicrous and luxuriant fancy, not worth remembering or telling again, but that it was a Divine discovery, a ray of light darted into his mind from the upper world, relating to the great affairs and revolutions of this lower world. God in it "made known to the king what shall be in the latter days," ver. 28, that is, in the times yet to come, reaching as far as the setting up of Christ's kingdom in the world, which was to be in the latter days, Heb. i. 1; and again, ver. 29, The thoughts which came into thy mind were not the repetitions of what had been before, as our dreams usually are.

Omnia quæ sensu voluntur vota diurno
Tempore sopito reddit amica quies,—

'The sentiments which we indulge throughout the day often mingle with the grateful slumbers of the night.'—Claudian. But they were predictions of "what should come to pass hereafter," which he that "revealeth secrets makes known unto thee," and therefore thou art in the right in taking the hint and pursuing it thus. Note, Things that are to come to pass hereafter are secret things, which God only can reveal; and what he has revealed of these things, especially with reference to the last days of all, to the end of time, ought to be very seriously and diligently inquired into and considered by every one of us. Some think the thoughts which are said to have come into the king's mind upon his bed, "what should come to pass hereafter," were his own thoughts when he was awake. Just before he fell asleep, and dreamt this dream, he was musing in his own mind what would be the issue of his growing greatness, what his kingdom would hereafter come to; and so the dream was an answer to those thoughts. What discoveries God intends to make he thus prepares men for.

Fifthly. He solemnly professeth that he could not pretend to have merited from God the favour of this discovery, or to have obtained it by any sagacity of his own; ver. 30, "But as for me," this secret is not found out by me, but is "revealed to me," and that "not for any wisdom that I have more than any living," to qualify me for the receiving of such a discovery. Note, It well becomes those whom God has highly favoured and honoured to be very humble and low in their own eyes, to lay aside all opinion of their own wisdom and worthiness, that God alone may have all the praise of the good they are, and have, and do, and that all may be attributed to the freeness of his good-will towards them, and the fulness of his good work in them. The secret was made known to him not for his own sake, but, 1. For the sake of his people; "For their sakes that shall make known the interpretation to the king;" for the sake of his brethren and companions in tribulation, who had by their prayers helped him to obtain this discovery, and so might be said to make known the interpretation; that their lives might be spared, that they might come into favour and be preferred, and all the people of the Jews might fare the better in their captivity for their sakes. Note, Humble men will be always ready to think that what God doth for them and by them is more for others' sakes than for their own. 2. For the sake of his prince; and some read the former clause in this sense: Not for any wisdom of mine, "but that the king may know the interpretation, and that thou mightest know the thoughts of thine heart;" that thou mightest have satisfaction given thee as to what thou wast before considering of, and thereby instruction given thee how to carry it towards the church of God. God revealed this thing to Daniel that he might make it known to the king. Prophets receive that they may give, that the discoveries made them may not be lodged with themselves, but communicated to the persons themselves that are concerned.

31 Thou, O king, sawest, and behold a great image. This great image, whose brightness was excellent, stood before thee; and the form thereof was terrible. 32 This image's head was of fine gold, his breast and his arms of silver, his belly and his thighs of brass, 33 His legs of iron, his feet part of iron and part of clay. 34 Thou sawest till that a stone was cut out without hands, which smote the image upon his feet that were of iron and clay, and brake them to pieces. 35 Then was the iron, the clay, the brass, the silver, and the gold, broken to pieces together, and became like the chaff of the summer threshingfloors; and the wind carried them away, that no place was found for them: and the stone that smote the image became a great mountain, and filled the whole earth. 36 This is the dream; and we will tell the interpretation thereof before the king. 37 Thou, O king, art a king of kings: for the God of heaven hath given thee a kingdom, power, and strength, and glory. 38 And wheresoever the children of men dwell, the beasts of the field and the fowls of the heaven hath he given into thine hand, and hath made thee ruler over them all. Thou art this head of gold. 39 And after thee shall arise another kingdom inferior to thee, and another third kingdom of brass, which shall bear rule over all the earth. 40 And the fourth kingdom shall be strong as iron: forasmuch as iron breaketh in pieces and subdueth all things: and as iron that breaketh all these, shall it break in pieces and bruise. 41 And whereas thou sawest the feet and toes, part of potters' clay, and part of iron, the kingdom shall be divided; but there shall be in it of the strength of the iron, forasmuch as thou sawest the iron mixed with miry clay. 42 And as the toes of the feet were part of iron, and part of clay, so the kingdom shall be partly strong, and partly broken. 43 And whereas thou sawest iron mixed with miry clay, they shall mingle themselves with the seed of men: but they shall not cleave one to another, even as iron is not mixed with clay. 44 And in the days of these kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom, which shall never be destroyed: and the kingdom shall not be left to other people, but it shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms, and it shall stand for ever. 45 Forasmuch as thou sawest that the stone was cut out of the mountain without hands, and that it brake in pieces the iron, the brass, the clay, the silver, and the gold; the great God hath made known to the king what shall come to pass hereafter: and the dream is certain, and the interpretation thereof sure.

Daniel here gives full satisfaction to Nebuchadnezzar concerning his dream, and the interpretation of it. That great prince had been kind to this poor prophet, in his maintenance and education; he had been brought up at the king's cost, preferred at court, and the land of his captivity had hereby been made much easier to him than to others of his brethren; and now the king is abundantly repaid for all the expense he had been at upon him; and for receiving this prophet, though not in the name of a prophet, he had a prophet's reward, such a reward as a prophet only could give, and for which that wealthy, mighty prince was now glad to be beholden to him. Here is,

First. The dream itself, ver. 31, 45. Nebuchadnezzar perhaps was an admirer of statues, and had his palace and gardens adorned with them; however, he was a worshipper of images, and now, behold, "a great image" is set before him in a dream, which might intimate to him what the images were which he bestowed so much cost upon, and paid such respect to; they were mere dreams. The creatures of fancy might do as well to please the fancy; by the power of imagination he might shut his eyes and represent to himself what forms he thought fit, and beautify them at his pleasure, without the expense and trouble of sculpture. This was the image of a man erect; it stood before him as a living man; and, because those monarchies which were designed to be represented by it were admirable in the eyes of their friends, the brightness of this image was excellent; and, because they were formidable to their enemies and dreaded by all about them, the form of this image is said to be terrible; both the features of the face and the postures of the body made it so. But that which was most remarkable in this image was the different metals of which it was composed. The head of gold, the richest and most durable metal; the breast and arms of silver, the next to it in worth; the belly and sides, or thighs, of brass; the legs of iron, still baser metals; and lastly the feet, part of iron and part of clay. See what the things of this world are; the farther we go in them, the less valuable they appear. In the life of man youth is a head of gold, but it grows less and less worthy of our esteem; and old age is half clay, a man is then as good as dead. It is so with the world; latter ages degenerate. The first age of the Christian church, of the reformation, was a head of gold but we live in an age that is iron and clay. Some allude to this in the description of a hypocrite, whose practice is not agreeable to his knowledge; he has a head of gold, but feet of iron and clay; knows his duty, but doth it not. Some observe that in Daniel's visions the monarchies were represented by four beasts, ch. vii.; for he looked upon that wisdom from beneath, by which they were turned to be earthly and sensual, and a tyrannical power, to have more in it of the beast than of the man, and so the vision agreed with his notions of the thing. But to Nebuchadnezzar, a heathen prince, they were represented by a gay and pompous image of a man; for he was an admirer of "the kingdoms of

ii. 14. Arioch was not merely captain of the king's guard, though that was part of his office; he was also the king's chief executioner. The name of Arioch is not Hebrew, but Assyrian, and is one of the many indications of the extreme accuracy of the inspired writer.

ii. 16. In reference to this courageous act, Barnes says, "Perhaps all that is meant is, not that he actually went into the presence of the monarch, but that he went into the palace, and through the interposition of some high officer of court, who had access to the sovereign, desired of him that he would give him time, and that he would make it known."

ii. 19. The Chaldee for "in a night vision" is "in a vision of the night," i.e., in a vision by night, but in what form is not shown.

ii. 23. "Wisdom and might" is a phrase meaning wisdom and ability. Daniel was able to solve the mystery because he knew it.

ii. 25. The confused haste of Arioch is shown by the abruptness with which he expresses himself to his lord and king, omitting all this world, and the glory of them." To him the sight was so charming that he was impatient to see it again.

For what became of this image? The next part of the dream shews it us calcined and brought to nothing. He saw a stone cut out of the quarry by an unseen power, without hands, and this stone fell upon the "feet of the image," that were of "iron and clay," and "broke them to pieces;" and then the image must fall of course, and so the gold, and silver, and brass, and iron, were all broken to pieces together, and beaten so small that they became like the "chaff of the summer threshingfloors," and there was not to be found any, the least, remains of them. But the stone cut out of the mountain became itself a great mountain, and filled the earth. See how God can bring about great effects by weak and unlikely causes; when he pleaseth a little one shall become a thousand. Perhaps the destruction of this image of gold, and silver, and brass, and iron, might be intended to signify the abolishing of idolatry out of the world in due time. The idols of the heathen are silver and gold, as this image was, and "they shall perish from off the earth, and from under these heavens," Jer. x. 11; Isa. ii. 18. And whatever power destroys idolatry is in the ready way to magnify and exalt itself, as this stone, when it had broken the image to pieces, "became a great mountain."

Secondly. The interpretation of this dream. Let us now see what is the meaning of this. It was from God, and therefore from him it is fit we take the explication of it. It should seem Daniel had his fellows with him, and speaks for them, as well as for himself, when he saith, "We will tell the interpretation," ver. 36. Now,

1. This image represented the kingdoms of the earth that should successively bear rule among the nations, and have influence on the affairs of the Jewish church. The four monarchies were not represented by four distinct statues, but by one image, because they were all of one and the same spirit and genius, and all more or less against the church. It was the same power, only lodged in four several nations; the two former lying eastward of Judea, the two latter westward.

1st. The "head of gold" signified the Chaldean monarchy, which is now in being; ver. 37, 38, "Thou, O king, art (or, rather, shalt be) "a king of kings," an universal monarch, to whom many kings and kingdoms shall be tributaries. Or, Thou art the highest of kings on earth at this time, (as a servant of servants is the meanest servant,) thou dost outshine all other kings. But let him not attribute his elevation to his own politics or fortitude; no, it is the God of heaven that has given thee a kingdom, power, and strength, and glory, a kingdom that exercises great authority, stands firm, and shines bright, acts by a puissant army with an arbitrary power. Note, The greatest of princes have no power but what is given them from above. The extent of his dominion is set forth, ver. 38, that "wheresoever the children of men dwell," in all the nations of that part of the world, he was ruler over them all, over them and all that belonged to them, all their cattle, not only those which they had a property in, but those that were feræ naturæ,—'wild,' the beasts of the field and the fowls of the heaven. He was lord of all the woods, forests, and chases, and none were allowed to hunt or fowl without his leave. Thus "thou art this head of gold," thou and thy son and thy son's son, for seventy years. Compare this with Jer. xxv. 9, 11, especially Jer. xxvii. 5—7. There were other powerful kingdoms in the world at this time, as that of the Scythians, but it was the kingdom of Babylon that reigned over the Jews, and that began the government which continued in the succession here described till Christ's time. It is called a head, for its wisdom, and eminency, and absolute power, a head of gold for its wealth, Isa. xiv. 4; it was a golden city. Some make this monarchy to begin in Nimrod, and so bring into it all the Assyrian kings, about fifty monarchs in all, and compute that it lasted above sixteen hundred years. But it had not been so long a monarchy of such vast extent and power as is here described, nor anything like it. Therefore others make only Nebuchadnezzar, Evil-merodach, and Belshazzar, to belong to this head of gold; and a glorious high throne they had, and perhaps exercised a more despotic power than any of the kings that went before them. Nebuchadnezzar reigned forty-five years current, Evil-merodach twenty-three years current, and Belshazzar three. Babylon was their metropolis, and Daniel was with them upon the spot during the seventy years.

2nd. The breast and arms of silver signified the monarchy of the Medes and Persians, of which the king is told no more than this, There shall arise another kingdom inferior to thee, ver. 39; not so rich, powerful, or victorious. This kingdom was founded by Darius the Mede, and Cyrus the Persian, in alliance with each other, and therefore represented by two arms, meeting in the breast. Cyrus was himself a Persian by his father, a Mede by his mother. Some reckon that this second monarchy lasted one hundred and thirty years, others two hundred and four years. The former computation agrees best with the Scripture chronology.

3rd. The belly and thighs of brass signified the monarchy of the Grecians, founded by Alexander, who conquered Darius Cedomannus, the last of the Persian emperors. This is the "third kingdom of brass," inferior in wealth and extent of dominion to the Persian monarchy, but in Alexander himself it shall, by the power of the sword, "bear rule over all the earth;" for Alexander boasted that he had conquered the world, and then sat down and wept because he had not another world to conquer.

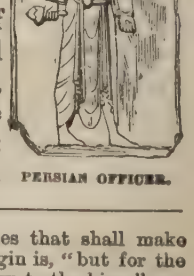
4th. The legs and feet of iron signified the Roman monarchy. Some make this to signify the latter part of the Grecian monarchy, the two empires of Syria and Egypt—the former governed by the family of the Seleucidæ, from Seleucus; the latter by that of the Lagidæ, from Ptolemæus Lagus; these they make the two legs and feet of this image; Grotius, and Junius, and Broughton, so this way. But it has been the more received opinion that it is the Roman monarchy that is here intended, because it was in the time of that monarchy, and when it was in its height, that the kingdom of Christ was set up in the world, by the preaching of the everlasting Gospel. The Roman kingdom was "strong as iron," ver. 40; witness the prevalency of that kingdom against all that contended with it for many ages. That kingdom broke in pieces the Grecian empire, and afterwards quite destroyed the nation of the Jews, ver. 46. Towards the latter end of the Roman monarchy it grew very weak, branched into ten kingdoms, which were as the toes of these feet, some of which were weak as clay, others strong as iron, ver. 42. Endeavours were used to unite and cement them, for the strengthening of the empire, but in vain; "They shall not cleave one to another," ver. 43. This empire divided the government for a long time between the senate and the people, the nobles and commons, but they did not entirely coalesce. There were civil wars between Marius and Sylla, Cæsar and Pompey, whose parties were as iron and clay. Some refer this to the declining times of that empire, when, for the strengthening of the empire against the irruptions of the barbarous nations, the branches of the royal family intermarried; but the politics had not the desired effect when the day of the fall of that empire came.

2. The stone "cut out without hands" represented the kingdom of Jesus Christ, which should be set up in the world in the time of the Roman empire, and upon the ruins of Satan's kingdom, in the "kingdoms of the world." This is the stone cut out of the mountain without hands, for it should be neither raised or supported by human power or policy; no visible hand should act in the setting of it up, but it should be done invisibly, by the "Spirit of the Lord of hosts." This was the "stone which the builders refused," because it was not cut out by their hands, but it is now become the "head stone of the corner."

1st. The gospel church is a kingdom which Christ is the sole and sovereign monarch of, in which he rules by his word and Spirit, to which he gives protection and law, and from which he receives homage and tribute. It is a kingdom not of this world, and yet set up in it; it is the kingdom of God among men.

2nd. The God of heaven was to set up this kingdom, to give authority to Christ to execute judgment, to set him as king upon his holy hill of Zion, and to bring into obedience to him a willing people. Being set up by the God of heaven, it is often in the New Testament called the kingdom of heaven, for its original is from above, and its tendency is upwards.

3rd. It was to be set up in the days of these kings, the kings of the fourth monarchy, which there is particular notice taken of, Lu. ii. 1, that Christ was born when, by the decree of the emperor of Rome, all the world was taxed, which was a plain indication that that empire was become as universal as any earthly empire ever was. When these kings are contesting with each other, and in all the struggles the contending parties each hope to find their own account, God will do his own work, and fulfil his own counsels. These kings are all enemies to Christ's kingdom, and yet it shall be set up in defiance of them.



4th. It is a kingdom that knows no decay, is in no danger of destruction, and will not admit any succession or revolution. It shall "never be destroyed" by any foreign force invading it, as many other kingdoms are; fire and sword cannot waste it; the combined powers of earth and hell cannot deprive either the subjects of their prince or the prince of his subjects. Nor shall this "kingdom be left to other people," as the kingdoms of the earth are. As Christ is a monarch that has no successor, for he himself shall reign for ever, so his kingdom is a monarchy that has no revolution. The kingdom of God was indeed taken from the Jews and given to the Gentiles, Mat. xxi. 43, but still it was Christianity that ruled the kingdom of the Messiah. The Christian church is still the same, it is fixed on a rock, much fought against, but never to be prevailed against, by the gates of hell.

5th. It is a kingdom that shall be victorious over all opposition. It shall "break in pieces and consume all those kingdoms," as the "stone cut out of the mountain without hands" broke in pieces the image, ver. 44, 45. The kingdom of Christ shall wear out all other kingdoms, shall outlive them, and flourish when they are sunk with their own weight, and so wasted that their place knows them no more. All the kingdoms that appear against the kingdom of Christ shall be broken with a rod of iron, as a potter's vessel, Ps. ii. 9. And in the kingdoms that submit to the kingdom of Christ, tyranny and idolatry, and every thing that is their reproach, as far as the Gospel of Christ gets ground, shall be broken. The day is coming when Jesus Christ shall have put down "all rule, principality, and power," and have made "all his enemies his footstool," and then this prophecy will have its full accomplishment, and not till then, 1 Cor. xv. 24, 25. Our Saviour seems to refer to this, Mat. xxi. 44, when, speaking of himself as the stone set at nought by the Jewish builders, he saith, "On whomsoever" this stone "shall fall, it will grind him to powder."

6th. It shall be an everlasting kingdom. Those kingdoms of the earth that had broken in pieces all about them yet at length it came to their turn to be in like manner broken; but the kingdom of Christ shall break other kingdoms in pieces, and shall itself stand for ever. His throne shall be as the days of heaven, his seed, his subjects, as the stars of heaven, not only so innumerable, but so immutable. Of the increase of Christ's government and peace there shall be no end. "The Lord shall reign for ever," not only to the end of time, but when time and days shall be no more, and "God shall be all in all" to eternity.

Daniel having thus interpreted the dream to the satisfaction of Nebuchadnezzar, who gave him no interruption,—so full was the interpretation that he had no question to ask, and so plain, that he had no objection to make,—he closes all with a solemn assertion, First. Of the Divine original of this dream, the great God, (so he calls him to express his own high thoughts of him, and to beget the like in the mind of this great king,) he has "made known to the king what shall come to pass hereafter," which the gods of the magicians could not do. And thus a full confirmation was given to that great argument which Isaiah had long before urged against idolaters, and particularly the idolaters of Babylon, when he challenged the gods they worshipped to "shew things that are to come hereafter, that we may know that ye are gods," Isa. xli. 23, and by this proved the God of Israel to be the true God, that he "declares the end from the beginning," Isa. xlvi. 10. Secondly. Of the undoubted certainty of the things foretold by this dream. He who makes known these things is the same that has himself designed and determined them, and will by his providence effect them, and we are sure his counsel shall stand, and cannot be altered, and therefore "the dream is certain, and the interpretation thereof sure." Note, Whatever God has made known we may depend upon.

46 Then the king Nebuchadnezzar fell upon his face, and worshipped Daniel, and commanded that they should offer an oblation and sweet odours unto him. 47 The king answered unto Daniel, and said, Of a truth it is, that your God is a God of gods, and a Lord of kings, and a revealer of secrets, seeing thou couldest reveal this secret. 48 Then the king made Daniel a great man, and gave him many great gifts, and made him ruler over the whole province of Babylon, and chief of the governors over all the wise men of Babylon. 49 Then Daniel requested of the king, and he set Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, over the affairs of the province of Babylon: but Daniel sat in the gate of the king.

formal titles, and not even mentioning the name of Daniel, whom he calls "a man of the children of the captivity of Judah."

ii. 27. The "soothsayers" of this verse are not mentioned before. According to Gesenius they are men who, "by casting nativities from the position of the stars at one's birth, and by various arts of calculation and divination, foretold the fortunes and destinies of individuals."

ii. 30. Our translators have here a better version in the margin than in the text. The text has, "for their sakes that shall make known the interpretation to the king;" the margin is, "but for the intent that the interpretation may be made known to the king."

ii. 31—33. Dr. Kitto correctly observes that "in ancient coins and medals nothing is more common than to see cities and nations represented by human figures, male and female;" and again, that "the idea of expressing the condition of things by metallic symbols was prevalent before the time of Daniel. Hesiod, who lived about

One might have expected that, when Nebuchadnezzar was contriving to make his own kingdom everlasting, he would have been enraged at Daniel, who foretold the fall of it, and that another kingdom, of another nature, should be the everlasting kingdom; but, instead of resenting it as an affront he received it as an oracle. And here we are told what the expressions were of the impressions it made upon him.

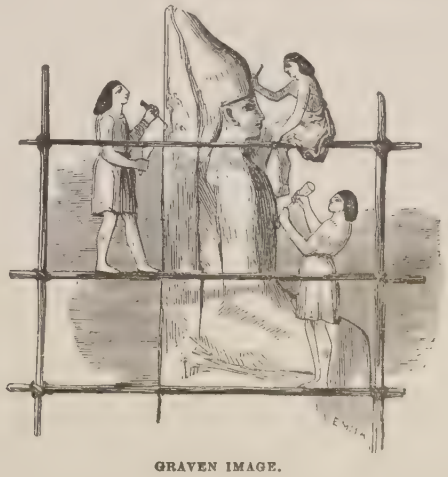
First. He was ready to look upon Daniel as a little god. Though he saw him to be a man, yet from this wonderful discovery he had made, both of his secret thoughts, in telling him the dream, and of things to come, in telling him the interpretation of it, he concluded that he had certainly a divinity lodged in him, worthy his adoration, and therefore he "fell upon his face and worshipped Daniel," ver. 46. It was the custom of the country by prostration to give honour to kings, because they have something of a Divine power in them; "I have said ye are gods." And therefore this king, who had often received such veneration from others, now paid the like to Daniel, whom he supposed to have in him a Divine knowledge, which he was so struck with an admiration of that he could not contain himself, but forgot both that Daniel was a man and that himself was a king. Thus did God magnify divine revelation, and make it honourable, extorting from a proud potentate such a veneration but for one glimpse of it. He worshipped Daniel, and "commanded that they should offer an oblation" to him, and burn incense. Herein he cannot be justified, but may very well be excused, when Cornelius was thus ready to worship Peter, and John the angel, who both knew better things. But though it is not here mentioned, yet we have reason to think that Daniel refused these honours that he paid him, and said, as St. Peter to Cornelius, "Stand up, I myself also am a man;" or, as the angel to St. John, "See thou do it not;" for it is not said that the oblation was offered unto him, though the king commanded it, or rather said it, for so the word is; he said in his haste, 'Let an oblation be offered to him.' And that Daniel did say something to him, which turned his eyes and thoughts another way, is intimated in what follows, ver. 47, "The king answered Daniel." Note, It is possible for those to express a great honour for the ministers of God's word who yet have no true love for the word. "Herod feared John," and "heard him gladly," and yet went on in his sins, Mar. vi. 20.

Secondly. He readily acknowledged the God of Daniel to be the great God, the true God, the only living and true God. If Daniel will not suffer himself to be worshipped, he will (as Daniel, it is likely, directed him) worship God, by confessing, ver. 47, "Of a truth your God is a God of gods," such a God as there is no other, above all gods in dignity, over all gods in dominion. He is "a Lord of kings," from whom they derive their power, and to whom they are accountable; and he is both a discoverer and revealer of secrets; what is most secret he sees and can reveal, and what he has revealed is what was secret and which none but he could reveal, 1 Cor. ii. 10.

Thirdly. He preferred Daniel, made him a "great man," ver. 48. God made him a great man indeed when he took him into communion with himself, a greater man than Nebuchadnezzar could make him; but because God had magnified him, therefore the king magnified him. Doth wealth make men great? The king "gave him many great gifts;" and he had no reason to refuse them, when they all put him into so much the greater capacity of doing good to his brethren in captivity. These gifts were grateful returns for the good services he had done, and not aimed at or bargained for by him, as the rewards of divination were by Balaam. Doth power make a man great? He made him "ruler over the whole province of Babylon," which no doubt had a mighty influence upon the other provinces; he made him likewise chancellor of the university, "chief of the governors, over all the wise men of Babylon," to instruct them whom he had thus outdone; and since they could not do what the king would have them do, they shall be obliged to do what Daniel would have them do. Thus it is fit "the fool should be servant to the wise in heart." Seeing Daniel could reveal this secret, ver. 47, the king thus advanced him. Note, It is the wisdom of princes to advance and employ those that receive Divine revelation, and are much conversant with it, even as Daniel here shewed himself to be well acquainted with the kingdom of heaven. Joseph, like Daniel here, was advanced in the court of the king of Egypt, for his interpreting of his dreams; and he called him Zaphnath-paaneah,—'a revealer of secrets,' as the king of Babylon here calls Daniel; so that the preambles to their patents of honour are the same,—for and in consideration of their good services done to the crown in revealing secrets.

Fourthly. He preferred his companions for his sake, and upon his special instance and request, ver. 49. Daniel himself "sat in the gate of the king," as president of the council, chief justice, or prime minister of state, or perhaps chamberlain of the household; but he used his interest for his friends as became a good man, and procured places in the government for Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego. They that had helped him with their prayers shall share with him in his honours, such a grateful sense had he even of that service. The preferring of them would be a great stay and help to Daniel in his place and business. And these pious Jews being thus preferred in Babylon, had great opportunity of serving their brethren in captivity, and of doing them many good offices, which, no doubt, they were ready to do. Thus, sometimes, before God brings his people into trouble, he prepares it that it may be easy to them.

CHAPTER III.



In the close of the foregoing chapter we left Daniel's companions, Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, in honour and power, princes of the provinces, and preferred for their relation to the God of Israel, and the interest they had in him; I know not whether I should say, 'It were well if this honour had all the saints; no, there are many whom it would not be good for; the saints' honour is reserved for another world. But here we have those same three men as much under the king's displeasure as then they were in his favour, and yet more truly, more highly honoured by their God, than there they were honoured by their prince, both by the grace wherewith he enabled them rather to suffer than to sin, and by the miraculous, glorious deliverance he wrought for them out of their sufferings.' It is a very memorable story, a glorious instance of the power and goodness of God, and a great encouragement to the constancy of his people in trying times. The apostle refers to it when he mentions among the believing heroes those who by faith quenched the violence of fire, Heb. xi. 34. We have here, I. Nebuchadnezzar's erecting and dedicating a golden image, and his requiring all his subjects, of what rank or degree soever, to fall down and worship it, and the general compliance of his people with that command, ver. 1—7. II. Information given against the Jewish princes for refusing to worship this golden image, ver. 8—12. III. Their constant persisting in that refusal, notwithstanding his rage and menaces, ver. 13—18. IV. The casting of them into the fiery furnace for their refusal, ver. 19—23. V. Their miraculous preservation in the fire by the power of God, and their invitation out of the fire by the favour of the king, who was by this miracle convinced of his error in casting them in, ver. 24—27. VI. The honour which the king gave to God hereupon, and the favour he shewed to those faithful worthies, ver. 28—30.

NEBUCHADNEZZAR the king made an image of gold, whose height was threescore cubits, and the breadth thereof six cubits: he set it up in the plain of Dura, in the province of Babylon. 2

PLAINS NEAR BABYLON—DURA.

Then Nebuchadnezzar the king sent to gather together the princes, the governors, and the captains, the judges, the treasurers, the counsellors, the sheriffs, and all the rulers of the provinces, to come to the dedication of the image which Nebuchadnezzar the king had set up. 3 Then the princes, the governors, and captains, the judges, the treasurers, the counsellors, the sheriffs, and all the rulers of the provinces, were gathered together unto the dedication of the image that Nebuchadnezzar the king had set up; and they stood before the image that Nebuchadnezzar had set up. 4 Then an herald cried aloud, To you it is commanded, O people, nations, and languages, 5 That at what time ye hear the sound of the cornet, flute, harp, sackbut, psaltery, dulcimer, and all kinds of musick, ye fall down and worship the golden image that Nebuchadnezzar the king hath set up: 6 And whoso falleth not down and worshippeth shall the same hour be cast into the midst of a burning fiery furnace. 7 Therefore at that time, when all the people heard the sound of the cornet, flute, harp, sackbut, psaltery, and all kinds of musick, all the people, the nations, and the languages, fell down and worshipped the golden image that Nebuchadnezzar the king had set up.

We have no certainty concerning the date of this story, only that if this image that Nebuchadnezzar dedicated had any relation to that which he dreamed of, it is probable it happened not long after that; some reckon it to be about the seventh year of Nebuchadnezzar, a year before Jehoiachin's captivity, in which Ezekiel was carried away. Observe, two centuries before Daniel, characterised the succession of ages (four) by the very same metals—the ages of gold, silver, brass, and iron."

ii. 34. A stone "cut out without hands" is one not cut out by hands, i.e., not by men. That it smote the feet of the image means that it struck the fourth of the empires of which the image was a symbol. The destruction of the fourth was the end of the whole.

ii. 36—45. That the image was symbolical of four empires is plainly declared, and it is affirmed that the first of the four was that over which Nebuchadnezzar himself ruled. We must look to history for the others, and we shall find that the Babylonian or Chaldean Empire was followed by that of the Medes and Persians; this was succeeded by the empire of Alexander the Great and his successors, after whom came the Romans. It is generally conceded that the power by which the vast pagan series was terminated was the kingdom of Jesus Christ. Even the Jews admit that the last

First. A golden image set up to be worshipped. Babylon was full of idols already, yet nothing will serve this imperious prince but they must have one more; for those who have forsaken the one only living God, and begin to set up many gods, will find the gods they set up so unsatisfying, and their desire after them so insatiable, that they will multiply them without measure, wander after them endlessly, and never know when they have enough. Idolaters are fond of novelty and variety; "They choose new gods;" they that have many will wish to have more. Nebuchadnezzar the king, that he might exert the prerogative of his crown, to make what gods he thought fit, set up this image, ver. 1. Observe, 1. The valuableness of it. It was an "image of gold," not all gold, sure; as rich as he was it is likely he could not afford that, but overlaid with gold. Note, The worshippers of false gods are not wont to stick at charges in setting up images, and worshipping them; they lavish gold out of the bag for that purpose, Isa. xlvi. 6, which shames our niggardliness in the worship of the true God. 2. The vastness of it. It was threescore cubits high and six cubits broad. It exceeded the ordinary stature of a man fifteen times, for that is reckoned but four cubits, or six feet, as if its being monstrous would make amends for its being lifeless. But why did Nebuchadnezzar set up this image? Some suggest it was to clear himself from the imputation of being turned Jew, because he had lately spoken with great honour of the God of Israel, and had preferred some of his worshippers. Or perhaps he set it up as an image of himself, and designed to be himself worshipped in it. Proud princes affect to have Divine honours paid them. Alexander did so, pretending himself to be the son of Jupiter Olympus. He was told that in the image he had seen in his dream he was represented by the head of gold, who was to be succeeded by kingdoms of baser metal; but here he sets up to be himself the whole image, for he makes it all of gold. See here, 1st. How the good impressions that were then made upon him were quite lost, and quickly. He then acknowledged that the God of Israel is of a truth a God of gods and a Lord of kings, and yet now, in defiance of the express law of that God, he sets up an image to be worshipped; not only continues in his former idolatries, but contrives new ones. Note, Strong convictions often come short of a sound conversion. Many in a pang have owned the absurdity and dangerousness of sin, and yet have gone on in it. 2nd. How that very dream, and the interpretation of it, which then made such good impressions upon him, now had a quite contrary effect. Then it made him fall down as a humble worshipper of God; now it made him set up for a bold competitor with God. Then he thought it a great thing to be the golden head of the image, and owned himself obliged to God for it; but, his mind rising with his condition, now he thinks that too little, and, in contradiction to God himself and his oracle, he will be all in all.

Secondly. A general convention of the states summoned to attend the solemnity of the dedication of this image, ver. 2, 3. Messengers are dispatched to all parts of the kingdom to gather together the princes, dukes, and lords, all the peers of the realm, with all officers, civil and military, the captains and commanders of the forces, the judges, the treasurers or general receivers, the counsellors, and the sheriffs, and all the rulers of the provinces, they must all come to the dedicating of this image, upon pain and peril of what shall fall thereon. He summons the great men, for the greater honour of his idol; it is therefore mentioned to the glory of Christ that kings shall bring presents unto him. If he can bring them to pay homage to his golden image, he doubts not but the inferior people will follow of course. In obedience to the king's summons, all the magistrates and officers of that vast kingdom leave the services of their particular countries, and come to Babylon to the dedicating of this golden image: long journeys many of them took, and expensive ones, upon a very foolish errand; but as the idols are senseless things, such are the worshippers.

Thirdly. A proclamation made, commanding all manner of persons present before the image, upon the signal given, to fall down prostrate, and worship the image, under the style and title of, "The golden image which Nebuchadnezzar the king had set up." A herald proclaims this aloud throughout this vast assembly of grandees, with their numerous train of servants and attendants, and a great crowd of people, no doubt, that were not sent for; let them all take notice: 1. That the king doth strictly charge and command all manner of persons to fall down and worship the golden image; whatever other gods they worship at other times, now they must worship this. 2. That they must all do this just at the same time, in token of their communion with each other in this idolatrous service. And that, in order hereunto, notice shall be given by a concert of music, which would likewise serve to adorn the solemnity, and to sweeten and soften the minds of those that were loth to yield, and to bring them to comply with the king's command. This mirth and gaiety in the worship would be very agreeable to carnal, sensual minds, that are strangers to that spiritual worship which is owing to God, who is a Spirit.

Fourthly. The general compliance of the assembly with this command, ver. 7. They heard the sound of the musical instruments, both wind instruments and hand instruments, the cornet and flute, with the harp, sackbut, psaltery, and dulcimer, the melody of which they thought was ravishing,—and fit enough it was to excite such a devotion as they were then to pay,—and immediately they all, as one man, as soldiers that are wont to be exercised by beat of drum, "all the people, nations, and languages, fell down and worshipped the golden image." And no marvel, when it was proclaimed that whosoever would not worship this golden image should be immediately thrown "into the midst of a burning, fiery furnace," ready prepared for that purpose, ver. 6. Here were the charms of music to allure them into a compliance, and the terrors of the fiery furnace to frighten them into a compliance. Thus beset with temptations, they all yielded. Note, That way that sense directs the most will go; there is nothing so bad which the careless world will not be drawn to by a concert of music, or driven to by a fiery furnace. And by such methods as these false worship hath been set up and maintained.

8 Wherefore at that time certain Chaldeans came near, and accused the Jews. 9 They spake and said to the king Nebuchadnezzar, O king, live for ever. 10 Thou, O king, hast made a decree, that every man that shall hear the sound of the cornet, flute, harp, sackbut, psaltery, and dulcimer, and all kinds of musick, shall fall down and worship the golden image: 11 And whoso falleth not down and worshippeth, that he should be cast into the midst of a burning fiery furnace. 12 There are certain Jews whom thou hast set over the affairs of the province of Babylon, Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego; these men, O king, have not regarded thee: they serve not thy gods, nor worship the golden image which thou hast set up. 13 Then Nebuchadnezzar in his rage and fury commanded to bring Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego. Then they brought these men before the king. 14 Nebuchadnezzar spake and said unto them, Is it true, O Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, do not ye serve my gods, nor worship the golden image which I have set up? 15 Now if ye be ready that at what time ye hear the sound of the cornet, flute, harp, sackbut, psaltery, and dulcimer, and all kinds of musick, ye fall down and worship the image which I have made; well: but if ye worship not, ye shall be cast the same hour into the midst of a burning fiery furnace; and who is that God that shall deliver you out of my hands? 16 Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, answered and said to the king, O Nebuchadnezzar, we are not careful to answer thee in this matter. 17 If it be so, our God whom we serve is able to deliver us from the burning fiery furnace, and he will deliver us out of thine hand, O king. 18 But if not, be it known unto thee, O king, that we will not serve thy gods, nor worship the golden image which thou hast set up.

It was strange that Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego should be present at this assembly, when it is likely they knew for what intent it was called together. Daniel, we may suppose, was absent, either his business calling him away or having leave from the king to withdraw, unless we suppose that he stood so high in the king's favour that none durst complain of him for his non-compliance. But why did not his companions keep out of the way? Surely because they would obey the king's orders as far as they could, and would be ready to bear a public testimony against this gross idolatry. They did not think it enough not to bow down to the image, but being in office thought themselves obliged to stand up against it, though it was the image which the king their master set up, and would be a golden image to them that worshipped it. Now,

First. Information is brought to the king, by certain Chaldeans, against these three gentlemen, that they did not obey the king's edict, ver. 8. Perhaps these Chaldeans that accused them were some of those magicians or astrologers that were particularly called Chaldeans, ch. ii. 2, 4, who bore a grudge to Daniel's companions for his sake, because he had eclipsed them, and so had these his companions. They, by their prayers, had obtained the mercy which saved the lives of these Chaldeans, and behold how they requite them, evil for good; for their love they are their adversaries. Thus "Jeremiah stood before God to speak good for them" who afterwards "digged a pit for his life," Jer. xviii. 20. We must not think it strange if we meet with such ungrateful men. Or, perhaps they were such of the Chaldeans as expected the places to which they were advanced, and envied them their preferments; "and who can stand before envy?" They appeal to the king himself concerning the edict, with all due respect to his majesty, and the usual compliment, "O king, live for ever," as if they aimed at nothing but his honour, and to serve his interest, when really they were putting upon him that which would endanger the ruin of him and his kingdom. They beg leave, 1. To put him in mind of the law he had lately made, that all manner of persons, without exception of nation or language, should "fall down and worship the golden image;" they put him in mind also of the penalty which, by the law, was to be inflicted upon recusants, that they were to be "cast into the midst of the burning fiery furnace," ver. 10, 11. It cannot be denied but that this was the law; whether a righteous law or no, ought to be considered. 2. To inform him that these three men, Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, had not conformed to this edict, ver. 12. It is likely Nebuchadnezzar had no particular design to ensnare them in making the law, for then he would himself have had his eye upon them, and would not have needed this information; but their enemies, that sought an occasion against them, laid hold on this, and were forward to accuse them. To aggravate the matter, and incense the king the more against them, 1st. They put him in mind of the dignity to which the criminals had been preferred. Though they were Jews, foreigners, captives, men of a despised nation and religion, yet the king had "set them over the affairs of the province of Babylon;" it was therefore very ungrateful, and an insufferable piece of insolence, for them to disobey the king's command that had shared so much of the king's favour. And besides, the high station they were in would make their refusal the more scandalous, to be of ill example, and to have an ill influence upon others, and therefore it was necessary it should be severely animadverted upon. Thus princes that are incensed enough against innocent people commonly want not those about them who do all they can to make them worse. 2nd. They suggest that it was done maliciously, contumaciously, and in contempt of him and his authority: They have "set no regard upon thee," for they serve not the gods thou servest, and which thou requirest them to serve, nor "worship the golden image which thou hast set up."

Secondly. These three pious Jews are immediately brought before the king, and arraigned and examined upon this information. Nebuchadnezzar fell into empire is that of their expected Messiah, so that they practically agree with Christians as to the idea. Dr. Pusey says, "Of the last of these empires (strange enough) no one has been found to doubt that it is the kingdom of Christ."

ii. 46–49. Extraordinary as the incidents recorded in these verses are, they are in perfect accordance with all we know. That Nebuchadnezzar should even render divine honours to Daniel is only what might be expected from a poor heathen as he was. The offices conferred upon Daniel were high and honourable, but he secured a part in them for his three companions.

iii. 1. It is unknown when Nebuchadnezzar made this image, though the Greek version says it was in his eighteenth year. Much has been written about the possibility of an image of such a size and with the width alleged. Mr. Boyle and many others think that the image was plated with gold. The whole height, if the common cubit of twenty-one inches is intended, would be 105 feet, hence it is a great passion, and "in his rage and fury commanded" them to be seized, ver. 13. How little was it the honour of this mighty prince that he had rule over so many nations, when at the same time he had no "rule over his own spirit," that there were so many who were subjects and captives to him, when he himself was a perfect slave to his own brutish passions, and led captive by them; how unfit was he to rule reasonable men who could not himself be ruled by reason! It needed not be a surprise to him to hear that these three men did not now serve his gods, for he knew very well they never had done it; and their religion, which they had always adhered to, forbade them to do it. Nor had he any reason to think they did it in contempt of his authority, who had in all instances shewed themselves respectful and dutiful to him as their prince; but it was especially unseasonable at this time, when he was in the midst of his devotions, dedicating his golden image, to be in such a rage and fury, and so much to discompose himself. The discretion of a man, one would think, should at least have deferred this anger. True devotion calms the spirit, quiets and meekens it; but superstition, and a devotion to false gods, inflames men's passions, inspires them with rage and fury, and turns them into brutes. "The wrath of a king is as the roaring of a lion," so was the wrath of this king; and yet, when he was in such a heat, these three men were brought before him, and appeared with an undaunted courage and unshaken constancy.

Thirdly. The case is laid before them in short, and it is put to them whether they will comply or no? 1. The king asked them whether it was true that they had not worshipped the golden image when others did, ver. 14. 'Is it of purpose?' so some read it; was it designedly and deliberately done, or was it only through inadvertency that you have not served my gods? What! you that I have nourished and brought up, that have been educated and maintained at my charge, that I have been so kind to, and done so much for, you that have been in such reputation for wisdom, and therefore should better have known your duty to your prince; what! "Do not you serve my gods, nor worship the golden image which I have set up?" Note, The faithfulness of God's servants to him has often been the wonder of their enemies and persecutors, who think it strange that they run not with them to the same excess of riot. 2. He was willing to admit them to a new trial. If they did on purpose not do it before, yet, it may be, upon second thoughts they will change their mind; it is therefore repeated to them upon what terms they now stand, ver. 15. 1st. The king is willing that music shall play again only for their sakes, to soften them into a compliance; and if they will not, like the deaf adder, stop their ears, but will hearken to the voice of the charmers, and will worship the golden image, well and good, their former omission shall be pardoned. But, 2nd. The king is resolved, if they persist in their refusal, that they shall immediately be "cast into the fiery furnace," and shall not have so much as an hour's reprieve. Thus doth the matter lie in a little compass,—turn or burn; and because he knew they buoyed themselves up in their refusal with a confidence in their God, he insolently sets him at defiance; and "Who is that God that shall deliver you out of my hands?" let him, if he can. Now he forgot what he himself once owned, that their God was a "God of gods," and a "Lord of kings," ch. ii. 47. Proud men are still ready to say, as Pharaoh, "Who is the Lord, that I should obey his voice?" or as Nebuchadnezzar, Who is the Lord, that I should fear his power?

Fourthly. They give in their answer, which they all agree in, that they still adhere to their resolution, not to worship the golden image, ver. 16—18. We have here such an instance of fortitude and magnanimity as is scarce to be paralleled. We call these the three children, and they were indeed young men; but we should rather call them the three champions, the first three of the worthies of God's kingdom among men. They did not break out into any intemperate heat or passion against those that did worship the golden image, did not insult or affront them; nor did they rashly thrust themselves upon the trial, or go out of their way to court martyrdom; but, when they were duly called to the fiery trial, they quitted themselves bravely, with a conduct and courage that became sufferers for so good a cause. The king was not so daringly bad in making this idol but they were as daringly good in witnessing against it. They keep their temper admirably well, do not call the king a tyrant or an idolater,—the cause of God needs not the wrath of man; but, with an exemplary calmness and sedateness of mind they deliberately give in their answer, which they resolve to abide by. Observe,

1. Their gracious and generous contempt of death, and the noble negligence with which they look upon the dilemma that they are put to: "O Nebuchadnezzar, we are not careful to answer thee in this matter." They do not in sullenness deny him an answer, nor stand mute, but they tell him they are in no care about it. 'There needs not an answer,' so some read it; they are resolved not to comply, and the king is resolved they shall die if they do not. The matter therefore is determined, and what needs it be disputed? But it is better read, 'We want not an answer for thee,' nor have it to seek, but come prepared. 1st. They needed no time to deliberate concerning the matter of their answer, for they did not in the least hesitate whether they should comply or no. It was a matter of life and death, and one would think they might have considered awhile before they had resolved; life is desirable, and death is dreadful. But when the sin and duty that were in the case were immediately determined by the letter of the second commandment, and no room was left to question that, the life and death that were in the case were not to be considered. Note, Those that would avoid sin must not parley with temptation; when that which we are allured or affrighted to is manifestly evil, the motion is rather to be rejected with indignation and abhorrence than reasoned with. Stand not to pause about it, but say as Christ has taught us, "Get thee behind me, Satan." 2nd. They needed no time to contrive how they should word it; while they were advocates for God, and were called out to witness in his cause, they doubted not but it should be "given them in that same hour what they should speak," Mat. x. 19. They were not contriving an evasive answer, when a direct answer was expected from them; no, nor would they seem to court the king not to insist upon it. Here is nothing in their answer that looks like compliment; they begin not as their accusers did, with, "O king, live for ever;" no artful insinuation, ad captandam benevolentiam,—'to put him into a good humour;' but every thing that is plain and downright: "O Nebuchadnezzar, we are not careful to answer thee." Note, Those that make their duty their main care need not be careful concerning the event.

2. Their believing confidence in God, and their dependence upon him, ver. 18. This was it that enabled them to look with so much contempt upon death, death in pomp, death in all its terrors. They trusted in the living God, and by that faith chose rather to suffer than to sin; they therefore feared not the wrath of the king, but endured, because by faith they had an eye to him that is invisible, Heb. xi. 25, 27. "If it be so," if we are brought to this strait, if we must be thrown into the fiery furnace unless we serve thy gods, know then, 1st. That though we worship not thy gods, yet we are not atheists; there is a God, whom we can call ours, to whom we faithfully adhere. 2nd. That we serve this God, we have devoted ourselves to his honour, we employ ourselves in his work, and depend upon him to protect us, provide for us, and reward us. 3rd. Thus we are well assured this God is "able to deliver us from the burning fiery furnace;" whether he will or no we are sure he can either prevent our being cast into the furnace or rescue us out of it. Note, The faithful servants of God will find him a master able to bear them out in his service, and control and overrule all the powers that are armed against them; "Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst." 4th. That we have reason to hope he will deliver us, partly because, in such a vast appearance of idolaters, it would be very much for the honour of his great name to deliver them, and partly because Nebuchadnezzar had defied him to do it, "Who is that God that shall deliver you?" God sometimes appears wonderfully for the silencing of the blasphemies of the enemy, as well as for the answering of the prayers of his people, Ps. lxxv. 18—22; Deu. xxxii. 27. But if he do not deliver us from the fiery furnace, he will deliver us out of thy hand. He can but torment and kill the body, and after that there is no more that he can do; then they are got out of his reach, delivered out of his hand. Note, Good thoughts of God will help very much to carry us through sufferings, and a full assurance that he is with us while we are with him; and if he be for us we need not fear what man can do unto us. Let him do his worst, God will deliver us either from death or in death.

3rd. Their firm resolution however to stick to their principles; ver. 18, "But if not," though God should not think fit to deliver us from the fiery furnace, which yet we know he can do,—if he should suffer us to fall into thy hand, and fall by thy hand,—yet be it known unto thee, O king, we will not serve these gods, though they are thy gods, nor worship this golden image, though thou thyself hast set it up. They are neither ashamed nor afraid to own their religion, and tell the king to his face that they do not fear him, they will not yield to him. Would they have consulted with flesh and blood, much might have been said to bring them to a compliance, especially when there was no other way of avoiding death, so great a death. 1st. They were not required to abjure their own God, or to renounce his worship, no, nor by any verbal profession or declaration to own this golden image to be a god, but only to bow down before it, which they might do with a secret reserve of their hearts for the God of Israel, inwardly detesting this idolatry, as Naaman bowed in the house of Rimmon. 2nd. They were not to fall into a course of idolatry; it was but one single act that was required of them, which would be done in a minute, and the danger was over, and they might afterwards declare their sorrow for it. 3rd. The king that commanded it had an absolute power; they were under it, not only as subjects but as captives, and if they did it, it was purely by coercion and duress, and that would serve to excuse them. 4th. He had been their benefactor, had educated and preferred them, and in gratitude to him they ought to go as far as they could, though it were to strain a point, a point of conscience. 5th. They were now driven into a strange country, and to those that were so driven out it was in effect said, "Go and serve other gods," 1 Sam. xxvi. 19; it was taken for granted that in their disposition they would serve other gods, and it was made a part of the judgment, Deu. iv. 28. They might be excused if they go down the stream, when it is so strong. 6th. Did not their kings, and their princes, and their fathers, yea, and their priests too, set up idols even in God's temple, and worship them there, and not only bow down to them, but erect altars, burn incense, and offer sacrifices, even their own children, to them? Did not all the ten tribes for many ages worship gods of gold at Dan and Bethel? and shall they be more precise than their fathers? Communis error facit jus,—'What all do must be right.' 7th. If they should comply they would save their lives and keep their places, and so be in a capacity to do a great deal of service to their brethren in Babylon, and to do it long, for they were young men, and rising men. But there is enough in that one word of God wherewith to answer and silence these, and many more such like carnal reasonings, "Thou shalt not bow down thyself to any images, nor worship them." They know they must obey God rather than man. They must rather suffer than sin, and must not do evil that good may come, and therefore none of these things move them; they are resolved rather to die in their integrity than live in their iniquity. While their brethren, who yet remained in their own land, were worshipping images of theirs, these here in Babylon would not be brought to it by constraint; but as if they were good by antiperistasis, were most zealous against idolatry in an idolatrous country. And truly, all things considered, the saving of them from this sinful compliance was as great a miracle in the kingdom of grace as the saving of them out of the fiery furnace was in the kingdom of nature. These were they who formerly resolved not to defile themselves with the king's meat, and now they as bravely resolved not to defile themselves with his gods. Note, A steadfast, self-denying adherence to God and duty in lesser instances, will qualify and prepare us for the like in greater; and in this we must be resolute, never under any pretence whatsoever to worship images, or to yield our consent with them that do so.

19 Then was Nebuchadnezzar full of fury, and the form of his visage was changed against Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego: therefore he spake, and commanded that they should heat the furnace one seven times more than it was wont to be heated. 20 And he commanded the most mighty men that were in his army to bind Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, and to cast them into the burning fiery furnace. 21 Then these men were bound in their coats, their hosen, and their hats, and their other garments, and were cast into the midst of the burning fiery furnace. 22 Therefore because the king's commandment was urgent, and the furnace exceeding hot, the flame of the fire slew those men that took up Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego. 23 And these three men, Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, fell down bound into the midst of the burning fiery furnace. 24 Then Nebuchadnezzar the king was astonied, and rose up in haste, and spake, and said unto his counsellors, Did not we cast inferred that the image proper stood upon a lofty pedestal. Diodorus Siculus says Semiramis made a statue of gold representing Belus, or Bel forty feet high. Herodotus also mentions an immense statue of gold at Babylon. These references at least show that colossal golden statues were not unknown to the Babylonians. It is doubtful where the plain of Dura was, but M. Oppert supposes it was to the south-east of Babylon.

iii. 2. There is a little doubt as to the precise functions of some of the officers here described. The terms are not all of Chaldee origin.

iii. 5. Much needless discussion has been raised about the names of the musical instruments here mentioned. It has been alleged that most of them are Greek, and that this proves the spuriousness of the book, because the Babylonians in Daniel's time could know nothing of Greek. Several replies may be made, as, that only two of the names are with any plausibility ascribed to a Greek origin; that the three men bound into the midst of the fire? They answered and said unto the king, True, O king. 25 He answered and said, Lo, I see four men loose, walking in the midst of the fire, and they have no hurt; and the form of the fourth is like the Son of God. 26 Then Nebuchadnezzar came near to the mouth of the burning fiery furnace, and spake, and said, Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, ye servants of the most high God, come forth, and come hither. Then Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, came forth of the midst of the fire. 27 And the princes, governors, and captains, and the king's counsellors, being gathered together, saw these men, upon whose bodies the fire had no power, nor was an hair of their head singed, neither were their coats changed, nor the smell of fire had passed on them.

COAT, HOSEN, AND HATS.—FROM PERSEPOLIS.—ver. 21.

In these verses we have,

First. The casting of these three faithful servants of God into the fiery furnace. Nebuchadnezzar had himself known and owned so much of the true God, that one would have thought, though his pride and vanity carried him to make this golden image, and set it up to be worshipped, yet that what these young men now said, (whom he had formerly found to be wiser than all his wise men,) should have revived his convictions, and at least have engaged him to dispense with them; but it proved quite otherwise.

1. Instead of being convinced by what they said, he was exasperated, and made more outrageous, ver. 19. It made him "full of fury," and the "form of his visage was changed" against these men. Note, Brutish passions, the more they are indulged, the more violent they grow, and even change the countenance, to the great reproach of the wisdom and reason of a man. Nebuchadnezzar in this heat exchanged the awful majesty of a prince upon his throne, or a judge upon the bench, for the frightful fury of a wild bull in a net. Would men in a passion but see their faces in a glass, they would blush at their own folly, and turn all their displeasure against themselves.

2. Instead of mitigating their punishment in consideration of their quality, and the posts of honour they were in, he ordered it to be heightened,—that they should "heat the furnace seven times more than it was wont to be heated" for other malefactors; that is, that they should put seven times more fuel to it, which, though it would not make their death more grievous, but rather dispatch them the sooner, yet was designed to signify that the king looked upon their crime as seven times more heinous than the crimes of others, and so made their death the more ignominious. But God brought glory to himself out of this foolish instance of the tyrant's rage; for, though it would not have made their death the more grievous, yet it did make their deliverance much the more illustrious.

3. He ordered them to be bound in their clothes, and cast into the midst of the burning fiery furnace, which was done accordingly, ver. 20, 21. They were bound that they might not struggle or make any resistance, were bound in their clothes, for haste, or that they might be consumed the more slowly and gradually. But God's providence ordered it for the increase of the miracle, in that their clothes were not so much as singed. They were bound in their coats or mantles, their hosen or breeches, and their hats or turbans; as if, in detestation of their crime, they would have their clothes to be burnt with them. What a terrible death was this! to be "cast bound into the midst of a burning fiery furnace," ver. 23. It makes one's flesh tremble to think of it, and horror to take hold on one. It is amazing that the tyrant was so hard-hearted as to inflict such a punishment, and the confessors so stout-hearted as to submit to it, rather than sin against God; but what is this to the second death? to that furnace into which the tares shall be cast in bundles? to that lake which burns eternally with fire and brimstone? Let Nebuchadnezzar heat his furnace as hot as he can, a few minutes will finish the torment of those who are cast into it. But hell-fire tortures, and doth not kill. The pain of damned sinners is more exquisite, and "the smoke of their torment ascends for ever and ever;" and "they have no rest," no intermission, no cessation of their pain, "who have worshipped the beast, and his image," Rev. xiv. 10, 11; whereas their pain would be soon over that were cast into this furnace for not worshipping this Babylonian beast and his image.

4. It was a remarkable providence that the men, the mighty men, that bound them and threw them into the furnace, were themselves consumed or suffocated by the flame, ver. 22. The king's commandment was urgent, that they should dispatch them quickly, and be sure to do it effectually, and therefore they resolved to go to the very mouth of the furnace, that they might throw them into the midst of it, but were in such haste that they would not take time to arm themselves accordingly. The apocryphal additions to Daniel say that the flame ascended forty-nine cubits above the mouth of the furnace. Probably God ordered it so that the wind blew it directly upon them with such violence that it smothered them. God did thus immediately plead the cause of his injured servants, and take vengeance for them on their persecutors, whom he punished, not only in the very act of their sin, but by it. But these men were only the instruments of cruelty, he that bade them do it had the greater sin; yet they suffered justly for executing an unjust decree, and it is very likely they did it with pleasure, and were glad to be so employed; and Nebuchadnezzar himself was reserved for a farther reckoning. There is a day coming when proud tyrants will be punished, not only for the cruelties they have been guilty of, but for employing those about them in their cruelties, and so exposing them to the judgments of God.

Secondly. The deliverance of these three faithful servants of God out of the furnace. When they were cast bound into the midst of that devouring fire we might well conclude we should hear no more of them, that their very bones would be calcined; but to our amazement we here find that Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego are yet alive.

1. Nebuchadnezzar finds them walking in the fire. "He was astonied, and rose up in haste," ver. 24. Perhaps the slaying of the men that executed his sentence was that which astonied him, as well it might, for he had reason to think his own turn would be next, or it was some unaccountable impression upon his own mind that astonied him, and made him rise up in haste, and go to the furnace to see what was become of those he had cast into it. Note, God can strike those with astonishment whose hearts are most hardened, both against him and against his people. He that made the soul can make his sword to approach to it, even to that of the greatest tyrant. In his astonishment he calls his counsellors about him, and appeals to them, whether we did not cast three men bound into the fire. It seems it was done by order, not only by the king, but of the council. They durst not but concur with him, which he forced them to do, that they might share with him in the guilt and odium. "True, O king," say they, we did order such an execution to be done, and it was done; but now, saith the king, I have been looking into the furnace, and "I see four men loose, walking in the midst of the fire," ver. 25. 1st. They were loosed from their bonds. The fire, which did not so much as singe their clothes, burnt the cords wherewith they were tied, and set them at liberty. Thus God's people have their hearts enlarged, through the grace of God, by those very troubles with which their enemies designed to straiten and hamper them. 2nd. They had no hurt, made no complaint, felt no pain or uneasiness in the least. The flame did not scorch them, the smoke did not stifle them, they were alive, and as well as ever, in the midst of the flames. See how the God of nature can, when he pleaseth, control the powers of nature, to make them serve his purposes. Now was fulfilled in the letter that gracious promise, Isa. xliii. 2, "When thou walkest through the fire thou shalt not be burnt, neither shall the flame kindle upon thee." By faith they "quench the violence of the fire, quench the fiery darts of the wicked." 3rd. They "walked in the midst of the fire." The furnace was large, so that they had room to walk; they were unhurt, so that they were able to walk; their minds were easy, so that they were disposed to walk, as in a paradise or garden of pleasure: "Can a man walk upon hot coals, and his feet not be burnt?" Pr. vi. 28. Yes, they did it with as much pleasure as the king of Tyrus "walked up and down in the midst of his stones of fire," his precious stones, that sparkled as fire, Eze. xxviii. 14. They were not striving to get out, finding themselves unhurt; but, leaving it to that God who preserved them in the fire to bring them out of it, they walked up and down in the midst of it, unconcerned. One of the apocryphal writings relates at large the prayer which Azariah, one of the three, prayed in the fire, wherein he laments the calamities and iniquities of Israel, and entreats God's favour to his people; and the song of praise, which they all three sung in the midst of the flames; in both which there are remarkable strains of devotion. But we have reason to think, with Grotius, that they were composed by some Jew of a later age, not as what were used, but only as what might have been used, on this occasion, and therefore we justly reject them as no part of holy writ. 4th. There was a fourth seen with them in the fire, whose form, in Nebuchadnezzar's judgment, was "like the Son of God;" he appeared as a Divine person, a messenger from heaven, not as a servant, but as a Son. 'Like an angel,' so some; and angels are called "sons of God," Job xxxviii. 7. In the apocryphal narrative of this story it is said, "The angel of the Lord came down into the furnace;" and Nebuchadnezzar here saith, (ver. 28,) that God sent his angel and delivered them; and it was an angel that shut the lions' mouths when Daniel was in the den, ch. vi. 22. But some think it was the eternal Son of God, the angel of the covenant, and not a created angel. He appeared often in our nature before he assumed it for good and all; and never more seasonably, nor to give a more proper indication and presage of his great errand into the world, in the fulness of time, than now, when to deliver his chosen out of the fire he came and walked with them in the fire. Note, Those that suffer for Christ have his gracious presence with them in their sufferings, even in the fiery furnace, even in the valley of the shadow of death, and therefore even there they need fear no evil. Hereby Christ shewed that what is done against his people he takes as done against himself; whoever throws them into the furnace doth in effect throw him in; "I am Jesus, whom thou persecutest," Acts ix. 5.

2. Nebuchadnezzar calls them out of the furnace, ver. 26. He "came near to the mouth of the burning fiery furnace; bids them "come forth, and come hither;" 'Come forth, come,' so some read it. He speaks with a great deal of tenderness and concern, and stands ready to lend them his hand, and help them out. He is convinced, by their miraculous preservation, that he did ill to cast them into the furnace, and therefore he doth not "thrust them out privily; nay, verily, but he will come himself and fetch them out," Acts xvi. 37. Observe the respectful title that he gives them; when he was in the heat of his fury and rage against them it is likely he called them rebels and traitors, and all the ill names he could invent, but now he owns them for "the servants of the most high God," a God who now appears "able to deliver them out of his hand." Note, Sooner or later God will convince the proudest of men that he is the most high God, and above them, and too hard for them, even in those things wherein they deal proudly and presumptuously, Ex. xviii. 11. He will likewise let them know who are his servants, and that he owns them, and will stand by them; Elijah prayed, 1 Kin. xviii. 36, "Let it be known that thou art God, and that I am thy servant." Nebuchadnezzar now embraces those whom he had

Greeks derived their knowledge of certain instruments, and the names for them, from Oriental sources; and that there was important intercourse between Greece and the East long before Daniel. The question has been invested with an importance to which it has no rational claim, for the presence of foreign musical instruments in Babylon 600 years before Christ, and the fact that they bore foreign names, can raise no real difficulty in the minds of reflecting men if documents recording such things are in consequence to be suspected, there is not a writing of importance in ancient Greek literature from Homer downwards which must be relied on or received.

iii. 15. "It would seem probable from this," as Barnes observes, "that the ceremonies of the consecration of the image were prolonged for a considerable period, so that there was still an opportunity for them to unite in the service if they would." Some such explanation is in fact implied, and we also know that paganism has very generally availed itself of musical adjuncts at its solemn services. The sudden abandoned, and is very officious about them, now he perceives them to be the favourites of heaven. Note, What persecutors have done against God's servants, when God opens their eyes they must, as far as they can, undo again.

How the fourth, whose "form was like the Son of God," withdrew, and whether he vanished away or visibly ascended, we are not told; but of the other three we are informed, 1st. That they "came forth out of the midst of the fire," as Abraham their father out of Ur, that is, the fire of the Chaldees, into which, saith this tradition of the Jews, he was cast, for refusing to worship idols, and out of which he was delivered as those his three children were When they had their discharge they did not tempt God by staying in any longer, but came forth as brands out of the burning. 2nd. That it was made to appear, to the full satisfaction of all the amazed spectators, that they had not received the least damage by the fire, ver. 27. All the great men came together to view them, and found that there was not so much as "a hair of their head singed." Here that was true in the letter which our Saviour spoke figuratively, for an assurance to his suffering servants, that they should sustain no real damage; Lu. xxi. 18, "There shall not a hair of your head perish." Their clothes did not so much as change colour, or smell of fire, much less were their bodies in the least scorched or blistered. No, "the fire had no power on them." The Chaldeans worshipped the fire as a sort of an image of the sun; so that, in restraining the fire now, God put contempt, not only upon their king, but upon their god too, and shewed that "his voice divides the flames of fire," as well as the floods of water, Ps. xxix. 7, when he pleaseth to make a way for his people through the midst of it. It is our God only that is the consuming fire, Heb. xii. 29; other fire, if he but speak the word, shall not consume.

28 Then Nebuchadnezzar spake, and said, Blessed be the God of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, who hath sent his angel, and delivered his servants that trusted in him, and have changed the king's word, and yielded their bodies, that they might not serve nor worship any god, except their own God. 29 Therefore I make a decree, That every people, nation, and language, which speak any thing amiss against the God of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, shall be cut in pieces, and their houses shall be made a dunghill: because there is no other God that can deliver after this sort. 30 Then the king promoted Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, in the province of Babylon.

The strict observations that were made, super visum corporis,—'on inspecting their bodies,' by the princes and governors, and all the great men who were present upon this public occasion, and who could not be supposed partial in favour of the confessors, contributed much to the clearing of this miracle, and the magnifying of the power and grace of God in it. "That indeed a notable miracle has been done is manifest, and we cannot deny it," Acts iv. 16. Let us now see what effect it had upon Nebuchadnezzar.

First. He gives glory to the God of Israel, as a God able and ready to protect his worshippers; ver. 28, "Blessed be the God of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego." Let him have the honour, both of the faithful allegiance which his subjects bear to him and the powerful protection he grants to them, neither of which can be paralleled between any other nation and their gods. The king doth himself acknowledge and adore him, and thinks it is fit he should be acknowledged and adored by all; "Blessed be the God of Shadrach." Note, God can extort confessions of his blessedness, even from those that have been ready to "curse him to his face." 1. He gives him the glory of his power, that he was able to protect his worshippers against the most mighty and malignant enemies; "There is no other god that can deliver after this sort," ver. 29; no, not this golden image which he had set up. For this reason there was no other god that obliged his worshippers to cleave to him only, and to suffer death rather than worship any other, as the God of Israel did; for they could not engage to bear them out in so doing, as he could. If God can work such deliverance as no other can, he may demand such obedience as no other may. 2. He gives him the glory of his goodness, that he was ready to do it; ver. 28, "He hath sent his angel and delivered his servants." Bel could not save his worshippers from being burnt at the mouth of the furnace, but the God of Israel saved his from being burnt when they were cast into the midst of the furnace, because they refused to worship any other god. By this Nebuchadnezzar was plainly given to understand that all the great success which he had had, and should yet have, against the people of Israel, which he gloried in, as if he had therein overpowered the God of Israel, was owing purely to their sin. If the body of that nation had faithfully adhered to their own God, and the worship of him only, as these three men did, they should all have been delivered out of his hand, as these three men were. And this was a necessary instruction for him at this time.

Secondly. He applauds the constancy of these three men in their religion, and describes it to their honour, ver. 28. Though he is not himself persuaded to own their God for his, and to worship him, because if he do so he knows he must worship him only, and renounce all others, and he calls him the God of Shadrach, not, My God, yet he commends them for sticking to him, and not serving or worshipping any other god but their own. Note, There are many who are not religious themselves, and yet will own they are clearly in the right that are religious, and are stedfast in their religion. Though they are not themselves persuaded to close with it, they will commend those who, having closed with it, cleave to it. If men have given up their names to that God who will alone be served, let them stick to their principles, and serve him only, whatever it cost them. Such a constancy in the true religion will turn to men's praise, even among them that are without, when unsteadiness, treachery, and double dealing, are what all men will cry shame on. He commends them that they did this, 1. With a generous contempt of their lives, which they valued not in comparison with the favour of God, and the testimony of a good conscience. They yielded their own bodies to be cast into the fiery furnace, rather than they would not only not forsake their God, but not affront him by once paying that homage to any other which is due to him alone. Note, Those shall have their praise, if not of men, yet of God, who prefer their souls before their bodies, and will rather lose their lives than forsake their God. Those know not the worth and value of religion that do not think it worth suffering for. 2. They did it with a glorious contradiction to their prince. They 'changed the king's word,' that is, they went contrary to it; and thereby put contempt upon both his precepts and threatenings, and made him repent and revoke both. Note, Even kings themselves must own that when their commands are contrary to the commands of God, he is to be obeyed, and not they. 3. They did it with a gracious confidence in their God. They trusted in him that he would stand by them in what they did, that he would either bring them out of the fiery furnace back to their place on earth or lead them through the fiery furnace forward to their place in heaven; and in this confidence they became fearless of the king's wrath, and regardless of their own lives. Note, A stedfast faith in God will produce a stedfast faithfulness to God. Now this honourable testimony, thus publicly borne by the king himself, to these servants of God, we may well think would have a good influence upon the rest of the Jews that were, or should be, captives in Babylon. Their neighbours could not with any confidence urge them to do that, nor could they for shame do it, which their brethren were so highly applauded by the king himself for not doing. Nay, and what God did for these his servants would help not only to keep the Jews close to their religion while they were in captivity, but to cure them of their inclination to idolatry, for which end they were sent into captivity; and when it had had that blessed effect upon them, they might be assured God would deliver them out of that furnace, as now he delivered their brethren out of this.

Thirdly. He issues out a royal edict, strictly forbidding any to speak evil of the God of Israel, ver. 29. We have reason to think that both the sins and the troubles of Israel had given great occasion, though no just occasion, to the Chaldeans to blaspheme the God of Israel, and it is likely Nebuchadnezzar himself had encouraged it. But now, though he is no true convert, nor is wrought upon to worship him, yet he resolves never to speak ill of him again, nor to suffer others to do so. "Whoever shall speak any thing amiss," 'any error,' so some; or, rather, any reproach or blasphemy; whoever shall speak with contempt of the God of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, they shall be counted the worst of malefactors, and dealt with accordingly; they shall be cut in pieces,—as Agag was by the sword of Samuel,—and their houses shall be demolished and made a dunghill. The miracle now wrought by the power of this God, in defence of his worshippers, publicly in the sight of the thousands of Babylon, was a sufficient justification of this edict; and it would contribute much to the ease of the Jews in their captivity, to be by this law screened from the fiery darts of reproach and blasphemy, with which otherwise they would have been continually annoyed. Note, It is a great mercy to the church, and a good point gained, when its enemies, though they have not their hearts turned, yet have their mouths stopped, and their tongues tied. If a heathen prince laid such a restraint upon the proud lips of blasphemers, much more should Christian princes do it. Nay, in this thing, one would think men should be a law to themselves, and that those who have so little love to God that they care not to speak well of him, yet could never find in their hearts, for we are sure they could never find cause, to speak any thing amiss of him.

Fourthly. He not only reverseth the attainder of these three men, but restores them to their places in the government; 'makes them to prosper,' so the word is, and prefers them to greater and more advantageous trusts than they had been in before. He promoted them in the province of Babylon, which was so much to their honour, and the comfort of their brethren in captivity there. Note, It is the wisdom of princes to prefer and employ men of stedfastness in religion; for those are most likely to be faithful to them who are faithful to God, and it is likely to be well with them when God's favourites are made theirs.

CHAPTER IV.

The penman of this chapter is Nebuchadnezzar himself; the story concerning him here recorded is given us in his own words, as he himself drew it up and published it; but Daniel, a prophet by inspiration, inserts it in his history, and so it has become a part of sacred writ, and a very observable part. Nebuchadnezzar was as daring a rival with God Almighty for the sovereignty as perhaps any mortal man ever was: but here he fairly owns himself conquered, and gives it under his hand that the God of Israel is above him. Here is, I. The preface to his narrative wherein he acknowledges God's dominion over him, ver. 1—3. II. The narrative itself, wherein he relates, 1. His dream, which puzzled the magicians, ver. 1—18: 2. The interpretation of his dream by Daniel, who shewed him that it was a prognostication of his own fall advising him therefore to repent and reform, ver. 19—27; 3 The accomplishment of it in his running stark mad for seven years, and then recovering the use of his reason again, ver 28—36; 4. The conclusion of the narrative, with an humble acknowledgment and adoration of God as Lord of all, ver. 37. This was extorted from him by the overruling power of that God who hath all men's hearts in his hand, and stands upon record a lasting proof of God's supremacy, a monument of his glory, a trophy of his victory, and a warning to all not to think of prospering while they lift up or harden their hearts against God.

NEBUCHADNEZZAR the king, unto all people, nations, and languages, that dwell in all the earth; Peace be multiplied unto you. 2 I thought it good to shew the signs and wonders that the high God hath wrought toward me. 3 How great are his signs! and how mighty are his wonders! his kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and his dominion is from generation to generation.

Here is, First. Something of form, which was usual in writs, proclamations, or circular letters, issued out by the king, ver. 1. The royal style which Nebuchadnezzar makes use of has nothing in it of pomp or fancy, but plain and short, and unaffected—Nebuchadnezzar the king. If at other times he made use of great swelling words of vanity in his title, now he laid them all aside, for he was old, he was lately recovered from a distraction which had humbled and mortified him, and was now in the actual contemplation of God's greatness and sovereignty. The declaration is directed not only to his own subjects, but to all to whom this present writing shall come, to "all people, nations, and languages, that dwell in all the earth." He is not only willing they should all hear of it, though it carry the account of his own infamy, (which perhaps none durst have published, if he had not done it himself, and therefore Daniel publisheth the original paper,) but he strictly chargeth and commandeth all manner of persons to take notice of it; for all are concerned, and it may be profitable to all. He salutes those to whom he writes in the usual form, "Peace be multiplied unto you." Note, It becomes kings, with their commands, outburst of music would, under the circumstances, be as well understood a signal as our ringing of church bells.

iii. 21. The specification of apparel here is curious. Max Müller remarks that the word rendered "coats" is of Persian origin. It was perhaps an under-garment. The name for "hosen" is Aramaic, and describes an outer garment. There is, however, some uncertainty as to the precise character of both vestments. In like manner expositors are doubtful as to the exact form and character of the so-called "hats" or turbans. The evidence we have from ancient monuments and writers is not altogether decisive.

iii. 23. In the Greek, Latin, and Syriac there is introduced after this verse a long ode or thanksgiving; but since the passage is not found in any copy of the original, it is generally treated as apocrypbal. The English translators have put it among the Apocrypha, as "The Song of the Three Holy Children." There is strong critical reason for believing it a spurious addition, which was first written in Greek, and to disperse their good wishes, and, as fathers of their country, to bless their subjects. So the common form with us, 'We send greeting.' Omnibus quibus hæ presentes liter, pervenerintæ salutem,—'To all to whom these presents shall come, health;' and sometimes, salutem sempiternam,—'health and salvation everlasting.'

Secondly. Something of substance and matter. He writes this,

1. To acquaint others with the providences of God that had been concerning him; ver. 2, "I thought it good to shew the signs and wonders that the high God" (so he calls the true God) "hath wrought toward me." He thought it seemly, so the word is,—that it was his duty, and did well become him, that it was a debt he owed to God and the world, now he was recovered from his distraction,—to relate to distant places, and record for future ages, how justly God had humbled him, and how graciously he had at length restored him. All the nations, no doubt, had heard what befel Nebuchadnezzar, and rang of it; but he thought it fit that they should have a distinct account of it from himself, that they might know the hand of God in it, and what impressions were made upon his own spirit by it, and might speak of it not as a matter of news, but a matter of religion. The events concerning him were not only wonders to be admired, but signs to be instructed by, signifying to the world that Jehovah is greater than all gods. Note, We ought to shew to others God's dealings with us, both the rebukes we have been under, and the favours we have received; and though the account hereof may reflect disgrace upon ourselves, as this here did upon Nebuchadnezzar, yet we must not conceal it, as long as it may redound to the glory of God. Many will be forward to tell what God has done for their souls, because that turns to their own praise, who care not for telling what God has done against them, and how they deserved it; whereas we ought to give glory to God, not only by praising him for his mercies, but by confessing our sins, accepting the punishment of our iniquity, and in both taking shame to ourselves, as this mighty monarch here doth.

2. To shew how much he was himself affected with them, and convinced by them, ver. 3. We should always speak of the word and works of God with concern and seriousness, and shew ourselves affected with those great things of God which we desire others should take notice of. 1st. He admires God's doings. He speaks of them as one amazed; "How great are his signs, and how mighty are his wonders!" Nebuchadnezzar was now old, had reigned above forty years, and had seen as much of the world, and the revolutions of it, as most men ever did, and yet never till now, when himself was nearly touched, was he brought to admire surprising events as God's signs, and his wonders. Now, how great, how mighty, are they! Note. The more we see events to be the Lord's doing, and see in them the product of a Divine power, and the conduct of a Divine wisdom, the more marvellous they will appear in our eyes, Ps. cxviii. 23. 2nd. He infers from thence God's dominion. This is that he is at length brought to subscribe to, "His kingdom is an everlasting kingdom;" and not like his own kingdom, which he saw, and long since foresaw in a dream, hastening towards a period. He now owns there is a God that governs the world, and has an universal, incontestable, absolute dominion in and over all the affairs of the children of men. And it is the glory of this kingdom that it is everlasting; other reigns are confined to one generation, and other dynasties to a few generations, but "God's dominion is from generation to generation." It should seem Nebuchadnezzar here refers to what Daniel had foretold of a kingdom which the God of heaven would set up that should never be destroyed, ch. ii. 44, which, though meant of the kingdom of the Messiah, he understood of the providential kingdom. Thus we may make a profitable, practical use and application of those prophetical Scriptures which yet we do not fully, and perhaps not rightly, take the meaning of.

4 I Nebuchadnezzar was at rest in mine house, and flourishing in my palace: 5 I saw a dream which made me afraid, and the thoughts upon my bed and the visions of my head troubled me. 6
Therefore made I a decree to bring in all the wise men of Babylon before me, that they might make known unto me the interpretation of the dream. 7
Then came in the magicians, the astrologers, the Chaldeans, and the soothsayers: and I told the dream before them; but they did not make known unto me the interpretation thereof. 8 But at the last Daniel came in before me, whose name was Belteshazzar, according to the name of my god, and in whom is the spirit of the holy gods: and before him I told the dream, saying, 9 O Belteshazzar, master of the magicians, because I know that the spirit of the holy gods is in thee, and no secret troubleth thee, tell me the visions of my dream that I have seen, and the interpretation thereof. 10 Thus were the visions of mine head in my bed; I saw, and behold a tree in the midst of the earth, and the height thereof was great. 11 The tree grew, and was strong,

BANYAN TREE.

and the height thereof reached unto heaven, and the sight thereof to the end of all the earth: 12 The leaves thereof were fair, and the fruit thereof much, and in it was meat for all: the beasts of the field had shadow under it, and the fowls of the heaven dwelt in the boughs thereof, and all flesh was fed of it. 13 I saw in the visions of my head upon my bed, and, behold, a watcher and an holy one came down from heaven; 14 He cried aloud, and said thus, Hew down the tree, and cut off his branches, shake off his leaves, and scatter his fruit: let the beasts get away from under it, and the fowls from his branches: 15 Nevertheless leave the stump of his roots in the earth, even with a band of iron and brass, in the tender grass of the field; and let it be wet with the dew of heaven, and let his portion be with the beasts in the grass of the earth: 16 Let his heart be changed from man's, and let a beast's heart be given unto him; and let seven times pass over him. 17
This matter is by the decree of the watchers, and the demand by the word of the holy ones: to the intent that the living may know that the most High ruleth in the kingdom of men, and giveth it to whomsoever he will, and setteth up over it the basest of men.
18 This dream I king Nebuchadnezzar have seen.
Now thou, O Belteshazzar, declare the interpretation thereof, forasmuch as all the wise men of my kingdom are not able to make known unto me the interpretation: but thou art able; for the spirit of the holy gods is in thee.

Nebuchadnezzar, before he relates the judgments of God that had been brought upon him for his pride, gives an account of the fair warning he had of them before they came, which if he had duly regarded they might have been prevented. But therefore he was told of them, and of the issue of them before they came to pass, that when they did come to pass, by comparing them with the prediction of them, he might see and say that they were the Lord's doing; and might be brought to believe that there is a Divine revelation in the world, as well as a Divine providence, and that the works of God agree with his word.

Now in the account he here gives of his dream, by which he had notice of what was coming, we may observe,

First. The time when this alarm was given him, ver. 4. It was when he was "at rest in his house, and flourishing in his palace." He had newly conquered Egypt, and with it completed his victories, and ended his wars, and made himself monarch of all those parts of the world,—which was about the thirty-fourth then got inserted into other versions. Jerome only put it in the Latin under protest, or, as he expresses himself, by "prefixing a dagger, and cutting its throat." The Romish Church now receives it as canonical.

POSTURE OF HUMILIATION BEFORE A SUPERIOR.

iii. 25. Inasmuch as the Chaldee for "like the Son of God" may also be rendered "like a son of God," or "like a son of the gods," the sense has been disputed. All that we can positively affirm is that it denotes "like a divine person;" and we think this may be all Nebuchadnezzar meant, as he was a pagan, and would naturally speak from his own point of view. That he saw a superhuman being is undeniable, but whether the person was an angel or the Messiah is disputed.

iii. 28. In reference to the words "who hath sent his angel" it has been strongly urged that they prove the sense in which the king used the words "like a son of God." On the whole, we think the words favour the alleged interpretation or thirty-fifth year of his reign, Eze. xxix. 17,—then he had this dream, which was accomplished about a year after. Seven years his distraction continued, upon his recovery from which he penned this declaration, lived about two years after, and died in his forty-fifth year. He had undergone a long fatigue in his wars, had made many a tedious and dangerous campaign in the field; but now at length he is at rest in his house, and there is no adversary nor evil occurrent. Note, God can reach the greatest of men with his terrors then when they are most secure, and think themselves at rest and flourishing.

Secondly. The impression it made upon him; ver. 5, "I saw a dream which made me afraid." One would think no little thing would frighten him that had been a man of war from his youth, and used to look the perils of war in the face without change of countenance; yet, when God pleaseth, a dream strikes a terror upon him. His bed, no doubt, was soft and easy, and well guarded, and yet his own "thoughts upon his bed" make him uneasy, and the "visions of his head," the creatures of his own imagination, "trouble him." Note, God can make the greatest of men uneasy, even then when they say to their souls, "Take your ease, eat, drink, and be merry;" can make those that have been the troublers of the world, and have tormented thousands, to be their own troublers, their own tormentors, and those that have been the terror of the mighty a terror to themselves. By the consternation which this dream put him into, and the impression it made upon him, he perceived it to be not an ordinary dream, but sent of God on a special errand.

Thirdly. His consulting in vain with the magicians and astrologers concerning the meaning of it. He had not now forgot the dream, as before, ch. 2; he had it ready enough, but he wanted to know the interpretation of it, and what was prefigured by it, ver. 6. Orders are immediately given to summon "all the wise men of Babylon," that were such fools as to pretend by magic, divination, inspecting the entrails of beasts, or observations of the stars, to predict things to come; they must all come together to see if any or all of them in consultation could interpret the king's dream. It is likely these people had sometimes, in a like case, given the king some sort of satisfaction, and, by the rules of their art, had answered the king's queries so as to please him, whether it were right or wrong, hit or missed; but now his expectation from them was disappointed. He told them the dream, ver. 7, but they could not tell him the interpretation of it, though they had boasted with great assurance, ch. ii. 4, 7, that if they had but the dream told them they would, without fail, interpret it. But the key of this dream was in a sacred prophecy, Eze. xxxi. 3, &c., where the Assyrian is compared, as Nebuchadnezzar here, to a tree cut down for his pride; and that was a book they had not studied, or acquainted themselves with, else they might have been let into the mystery of this dream. Providence ordered it so, that they should be first puzzled with it, that Daniel's interpreting it afterwards might redound to the glory of the God of Daniel. Now was fulfilled what Isaiah foretold, ch. xlvii. 12, 13, that when the ruin of Babylon was drawing on, her enchantments and sorceries, her astrologers and star-gazers, should not be able to do her any service.

Fourthly. The court he made to Daniel to engage him to expound his dream to him. "At the last Daniel came in," ver. 8. Either he declined associating with the rest, because of their badness; or they declined his company, because of his goodness; or the king would rather his own magicians should have the honour of doing it, if they could, than that Daniel should have it; or Daniel being governor of the wise men, ch. ii. 48, was, as is usual, last consulted. Many make God's word their last refuge, and never have recourse to it till they are driven off from all other succours. He compliments Daniel very highly, takes notice of the name which he had himself given him, in the choice of which he thinks he was very happy, and that it was a good omen. His name was Belteshazzar, from Bel, the name of my god. He applauds his rare endowments, he has the spirit of the holy gods, so he tells him to his face, ver. 9, with which we may suppose Daniel was so far from being puffed up, that he was rather very much grieved, to hear that which he had by gift from the God of Israel, the true and living God, ascribed to Nebuchadnezzar's god, a dunghill deity. Here is a strange medley in Nebuchadnezzar, but such as is commonly found in those that side with their corruptions against their convictions.

1. He retains the language and dialect of his idolatry, and therefore it is to be feared is no convert to the faith and worship of the living God. He is an idolater, and his speech bewrayeth him; for he speaks of many gods, and is not brought to acquiesce in one as sufficient, no, not in Him who is all-sufficient. And some think, when he speaks of the spirit of the holy gods, he supposeth that there are some evil, malignant deities, whom men are concerned to worship only to prevent their doing them a mischief, and some that are good, beneficent deities, and that by the spirit of them Daniel was animated. He also owns that Bel was his god still, though he had once and again acknowledged the God of Israel to be Lord of all, ch. ii. 47; iii. 29. He also applauds Daniel, not as a servant of God, but as master of the magicians, ver. 9, supposing his knowledge to differ from theirs, not in kind, but only in degree; and he consulted him not as a prophet, but as a topping magician, so endeavouring to save the credit of the art, when those blundered and were nonplussed who were masters of the art. See how close his idolatry sat to him. He has got a notion of many gods, and hath chosen Bel for his god, and he cannot persuade himself to quit either his notion or his choice, though the absurdity of both had been evidenced to him more than once, beyond contradiction. He, like other heathens, would not change his gods, though they were no gods, Jer. ii. 11. Many persist in a false way, only because they think they cannot in honour leave it. See how loose his convictions sat, and how easily he had dropped them. He once called the God of Israel "a God of gods," ch. ii. 47; now he sets him upon a level with the rest of those whom he calls the holy gods. Note, If convictions be not speedily prosecuted, it is a thousand to one but in a little time they are quite lost and forgotten. Nebuchadnezzar, not going forward with the acknowledgments he had been brought to make of the sovereignty of the true God, soon went backward, and relapsed to the same veneration he had always had for his false gods. And yet,

2. He professeth a great opinion of Daniel, whom he knows to be a servant of the true God, and of him only. He looked upon him as one that had such an insight, such a foresight, as none of his magicians had; "I know that no secret troubleth thee." Note, The spirit of prophecy quite outdoes the spirit of divination, even the enemies themselves being judges; for so it was adjudged here upon a fair trial of skill.

Fifthly. The particular account he gives him of his dream.

1. He saw a stately, flourishing tree, remarkable above all the trees of the wood. This tree was planted "in the midst of the earth," ver. 10, fitly representing him who reigned in Babylon, which was about the midst of the then known world. His dignity and eminence above all his neighbours was signified by the height of this tree, which was exceeding great, it "reached unto heaven." He overtopped those about him, and aimed to have Divine honours given him; nay, he overpowered those about him, and the potent armies he had the command of, with which he carried all before him, is signified by the strength of this tree. It grew and was strong; and so much was Nebuchadnezzar and his growing greatness the talk of the nations, so much had they their eye upon him, —some a jealous eye, all a wondering eye,—that the sight of this tree is said to be "to the end of all the earth." This tree had every thing in it that was pleasant to the eye, and good for food; ver. 12, "The leaves thereof were fair;" noting the pomp and splendour of Nebuchadnezzar's court, which was the wonder of strangers, and the glory of his own subjects. Nor was this tree for sight and state only, but for use. 1st. For protection. The boughs of it were for shelter, both to the beasts and to the fowls. Princes should be a screen to their subjects from the heat and from the storm, should expose themselves to secure them, and study how to make them safe and easy. If the bramble be promoted over the trees, he invites them to come and trust in his shadow, such as it is, Jud. ix. 15. It is protection that draws allegiance. The kings of the earth are to their subjects but as the shadow of a great tree; but Christ is to his subjects as the "shadow of a great rock," Isa. xxxii. 2. Nay, because that, though strong, yet may be cold, they are said to be hid under the "shadow of his wings," Ps. xvii. 8, where they are not only safe, but warm. 2nd. For provision. The Assyrian was compared to a cedar, Eze. xxxi. 6, which affords shadow only; but this tree here had much fruit, in it was "meat for all," and "all flesh was fed of it." This mighty monarch, it should seem by this, not only was great, but did good; he did not impoverish, but enrich his country, and by his power and interest abroad brought wealth and trade to it. They that exercise authority would be called benefactors, Lu. xxii. 25; and the most effectual course they can take to support their authority is to be really benefactors. And see what is the best that great men with their wealth and power can attain to, and that is, to have the honour of having many to live upon them, and to be maintained by them; for, as goods are increased, they are increased that eat them.

2. He heard the doom of this tree read, which he perfectly remembered, and relates it here, perhaps word for word as he heard it. The sentence was passed upon it by an angel, whom he saw come down from heaven, and heard him proclaim this sentence aloud. This angel is here called "a watcher," or watchman; not only because angels by their nature are spirits, and therefore neither slumber nor sleep, but because by their office they are ministering spirits, and attend continually to their ministrations, watching all opportunities of serving their great Master. They, as watchers, encamp round them that fear God, to deliver them, and bear them up in their hands. This angel was a messenger, or ambassador, so some read it, and "a holy one." Holiness becomes God's house, therefore angels that attend, and are employed by him, are holy ones; they preserve the purity and rectitude of their nature, and are in every thing conformable to the Divine will. Let us review the doom passed upon the tree.

1st. Orders are given that it be cut down, ver. 14. Now also the axe is laid to the root of this tree. Though it is never so high, never so strong, that cannot secure it when its day comes to fall; the beasts and fowls, that are sheltered in and under the boughs of it, are driven away and dispersed. The branches are cropped, the leaves shaken off, and the fruit scattered. Note, Worldly prosperity, in its highest degree, is a very uncertain thing; and it is no uncommon thing for those that have lived in the greatest pomp and power to be stripped of all that which they trusted to and gloried in. By the turns of providence those that made a figure become captives; those that lived in plenty, and above what they had, are reduced to straits, and live far below what they had; and those, perhaps, are brought to be beholden to others, who, when time was, had many depending upon them, and making suit to them. But "the trees of righteousness" that are "planted in the house of the Lord," and bring forth fruit to him, shall not be cut down, nor shall their leaf wither.

2nd. Care is taken that the root be preserved; ver. 15, "Leave the stump of it in the earth," exposed to all weathers; there let it lie neglected and buried in the grass. Let the beasts, that formerly sheltered themselves under the boughs now repose themselves upon the stump; but that it may not be raked to pieces, or trodden to dirt, and to shew that it is yet reserved for better days, let it be hooped round with "a band of iron and brass," to keep it firm. Note, God in judgment remembers mercy, and may yet have good things in store for those whose condition seems most forlorn. There is "hope of a tree, if it be cut down, that it will sprout again, that, through the scent of water, it will bud," Job xiv. 7—9.

3. The meaning of this is explained by the angel himself to Nebuchadnezzar, ver. 16. Whoever is the person signified by this tree he is sentenced to be deposed from the honour, state, and dignity of a man, to be deprived of the use of his reason, and to be and live like a brute, till "seven times pass over him." "Let a beast's heart be given unto him." This is surely the saddest and sorest of all temporal judgments, worse a thousand times than death, and though, like it, least felt by those that lie under it, yet to be dreaded and deprecated more than any others. Nay, whatever outward affliction God is pleased to lay upon us, we have reason to bear it patiently, and to be thankful that he continues to us the use of our reason, and the peace of our consciences. But those proud tyrants who "set their heart as the heart of God," Eze. xxviii. 2, justly may be deprived of the heart of man, and have a beast's heart given them.

4. The truth of it is confirmed; ver. 17, "This matter is by the decree of the watchers, and the demand by the word of the holy ones." God has determined it; as a righteous Judge he has signed this edict; pursuant to his eternal counsel the decree is gone forth. And, 1st. The angels in heaven have subscribed to it, as attesting it, approving it, and applauding it. It is by the decree of the watchers; not that the great God needs the counsel or concurrence of the angels in any thing he determines or doth, but, as he useth their ministration in executing his counsels, so he is sometimes represented after the manner of men, as if he advised with them: "Whom shall I send?" Isa. vi. 8; "Who shall persuade Ahab?" 1 Kin. xxii. 20. So it notes the solemnity of this sentence. The king's breves, or short writs, pass, teste me ipso,—'in my presence;' but charters used to be signed, his testibus,—'in presence of us whose names are under-written;' such was Nebuchadnezzar's doom, it was by the decree of the watchers. 2nd. The saints on earth petitioned for it as well as the angels in heaven; the demand is by the word of the holy ones. God's suffering people, that had long groaned under the heavy yoke of Nebuchadnezzar's tyranny, cried to him for vengeance. They made the demand, and God gave this answer to it; for when the "oppressed cry to God he will hear," Ex. xxii. 27. This sentence was passed in Ahab's time, that there should be no more rain, at Elijah's word, when he "made intercession against Israel," 1 Kin. xvii. 1.

5. The design of it is declared. Therefore orders are given for the cutting down of this tree, to the intent that the living may know that the Most High rules. This judgment must be executed, to convince the unthinking, unbelieving world, that verily there is a God that judgeth in the earth, a God that governs the world, that not only has a kingdom of his own in it, and administers the affairs of that kingdom, but rules also in the kingdom of men, in the dominion that one man has over another, and giveth that to whomsoever he will; from him promotion comes, Ps. lxxv. 6, 7. He advanceth men to power and dominion that little expected it, and crosseth the projects of the ambitious and aspiring. Sometimes he sets up the basest of men, and serves his own purposes by them; mean men, as David from the sheepfold; "raiseth the poor out of the dust, to set them among princes," Ps. cxiii. 7, 8. Nay, sometimes he sets up ill men, to be a scourge to a provoking people. Thus he can do, thus he may do, thus he often doth, and gives not account of any of his matters. By humbling Nebuchadnezzar it was designed that the living should be made to know this; the

iv. 1. This chapter, like other portions of the Book of Daniel, has been exposed to the assaults of sceptical criticism. The general sense of the chapter raises but few difficulties, but it is maintained that we have not sufficient evidence of its historical accuracy, and that some of the incidents are incredible. With respect to the latter point it must be noticed that the narrative partakes of the high colouring usual in Oriental writings; that a believer in divine interference in human affairs expects such interference to assume unwonted forms; and that the miraculous elements of this account must stand or fall with miracle as a whole. As to external testimony, let it be observed that ancient writers record very little about Nebuchadnezzar; that some, as Berosus and Abydenus, allude to a peculiar experience of Nebuchadnezzar's; and that the silence of some writers does not disprove the statements of others. The statement of Abydenus, or rather of Megastnenes, from whom he borrowed it, is so remarkable that Mr. Boyle says, "Even Bertholdt is obliged dead know it, that are gone to the world of spirits, the world of retribution, they know that the Most High rules; but the living must be made to know it, and lay it to heart, that they may make their peace with God before it be too late.

Thus has Nebuchadnezzar fully and faithfully related his dream, what he saw, and what he heard, and then demands of Daniel the interpretation of it, ver. 18, for he found no one else was able to do it, but is confident he was, "for the spirit of the holy gods is in thee;" or, of the holy God, the proper title of the God of Israel. Much may be expected from those that have in them the spirit of the holy God. Whether Nebuchadnezzar had any jealousy that it was his own doom that was read by this dream, doth not appear. Perhaps he was so vain and secure as to imagine that it was some other prince that was rival with him, whose fall he had the pleasing prospect of given him in this dream; but, be it for him or against him, he is very solicitous to know the true meaning of it, and depends upon Daniel to give it him. Note, When God gives us general warnings of his judgments, we should be desirous to understand his mind in them, to hear "the Lord's voice crying in the city."

19 Then Daniel, whose name was Belteshazzar, was astonied for one hour, and his thoughts troubled him. The king spake, and said, Belteshazzar, let not the dream, or the interpretation thereof, trouble thee. Belteshazzar answered and said, My lord, the dream be to them that hate thee, and the interpretation thereof to thine enemies. 20 The tree that thou sawest, which grew, and was strong, whose height reached unto the heaven, and the sight thereof to all the earth; 21 Whose leaves were fair, and the fruit thereof much, and in it was meat for all; under which the beasts of the field dwelt, and upon whose branches the fowls of the heaven had their habitation: 22 It is thou, O king, that art grown and become strong: for thy greatness is grown, and reacheth unto heaven, and thy dominion to the end of the earth. 23 And whereas the king saw a watcher and an holy one coming down from heaven, and saying, Hew the tree down, and destroy it; yet leave the stump of the roots thereof in the earth, even with a band of iron and brass, in the tender grass of the field; and let it be wet with the dew of heaven, and let his portion be with the beasts of the field, till seven times pass over him; 24 This is the interpretation, O king, and this is the decree of the most High, which is come upon my lord the king: 25 That they shall drive thee from men, and thy dwelling shall be with the beasts of the field, and they shall make thee to eat grass as oxen, and they shall wet thee with the dew of heaven, and seven times shall pass over thee, till thou know that the most High ruleth in the kingdom of men, and giveth it to whomsoever he will. 26 And whereas they commanded to leave the stump of the tree roots; thy kingdom shall be sure unto thee, after that thou shalt have known that the heavens do rule. 27 Wherefore, O king, let my counsel be acceptable unto thee, and break off thy sins by righteousness, and thine iniquities by shewing mercy to the poor; if it may be a lengthening of thy tranquillity.

We have here the interpretation of Nebuchadnezzar's dream, which, when once it is applied to himself, and it is declared that he is the tree in the dream, (mutato nomine de te fabula narratur,—'change but the name, the fable speaks of thee,') when once it is said, Thou art the man, there needs little more to be said for the explication of the dream; out of his own mouth he is judged; so shall his doom be, himself has decided it. The thing was so plain, that Daniel, upon hearing the dream, was "astonied for one hour," ver. 19. He was struck with amazement and terror at so great a judgment coming upon so great a prince; his flesh trembled for fear of God. He was likewise struck with confusion when he found himself under a necessity of being the man that must bring to the king these heavy tidings, which, having received so many favours from the king, he had rather he should have heard from any one else; so far is he from desiring the woful day, that he dreads it, and the thoughts of it trouble him. They that come after the ruined sinner are said to be astonished at his day, as they that went before and saw his coming, as Daniel here, were affrighted, Job xviii. 20.

First. The preface to the interpretation is a civil compliment, which, as a courtier, he passeth upon the king. The king observed him to stand as one astonished, and thinking he was loth to speak out for fear of offending him, he encouraged him to deal plainly and faithfully with him. "Let not the dream or the interpretation thereof trouble thee." This he speaks, either, 1. As one that sincerely desired to know the truth. Note, Those that consult the oracles of God must be ready to receive them as they are, whether they be for them or against them, and must accordingly give their ministers leave to be free with them. Or, 2. As one that despised the truth, and set it at defiance. When we see how regardless he was of this warning afterwards, we are tempted to think this was his meaning,—Let it not trouble thee, for I am resolved it shall not trouble me, nor will I lay it to heart. But whether he have any concern for himself or no, Daniel is concerned for him, and therefore wishes "the dream be to them that hate thee." Let the ill it bodes light on the head of thine enemies, not on thine head. Though Nebuchadnezzar was an idolater, a persecutor, and an oppressor of the people of God, yet he was at present Daniel's prince, and therefore, though he foresees, and is now going to foretell, ill concerning him, he dare not wish ill to him.

Secondly. The interpretation itself is only a repetition of the dream, with application to the king. As for the tree which thou sawest flourishing, ver. 20, 21, "It is thou, O king," ver. 22; and willing enough would the king be to hear this, as before to hear, "Thou art the head of gold," but for that which follows. He shews the king his present prosperous state in the glass of his own dream, "Thy greatness is grown," and reacheth as near heaven as human greatness can do, "and thy dominion is to the end of the earth," ch. ii. 37, 38. As for the doom passed upon the tree, ver. 23, it is "the decree of the Most High, which comes upon my lord the king," ver. 24. He must not only be deposed from his throne, but driven from men, and, being deprived of his reason, and having a beast's heart given him, his dwelling shall be "with the beasts of the field," and with them he shall be a fellow-commoner, he shall "eat grass as oxen," and like them lie out all weathers, and be "wet with the dew of heaven," and this till "seven times" pass over him, that is, seven years, and then he shall know that the "Most High ruleth;" and when he is brought to know and own that, he shall be restored to his dominion again; ver. 26, "Thy kingdom shall be sure unto thee," shall remain as firm as "the stump of the tree" in the ground, and thou shalt have it, "after thou shalt have known that the heavens do rule." God is here called the heavens, because it is in heaven that he hath "prepared his throne," Ps. ciii. 19, from thence he "beholdeth all the sons of men," Ps. xxxiii. 13. "The heavens, even the heavens, are the Lord's;" and the influence which the visible heavens have upon this earth is intended as a faint representation of the dominion the God of heaven has over this lower world. We are said to "sin against heaven," Lu. xv. 19. Note, Then only we may expect comfortably to enjoy our right in, and government of, both ourselves and others, when we dutifully acknowledge God's title to and dominion over us, and all we have.

Thirdly. The close of the interpretation is the pious counsel which Daniel, as a prophet, gave the king, ver. 27. Whether he appeared concerned or not at the interpretation of the dream, a word of advice would be very seasonable; if careless, to awaken him; if troubled, to comfort him. And it is not inconsistent with the dream, and the interpretation of it, for Daniel knew not but it might be conditional, like the prediction of Nineveh's destruction. Observe, 1. How humbly he gives his advice, and with what tenderness and respect; "O king, let my counsel be acceptable unto thee." Take it in good part, as coming from love, and well meant, and let it not be misinterpreted. Note, Sinners need to be courted to their own good, and spoken fair to do well for themselves. The apostle beseeches men to "suffer a word of exhortation," Heb. xiii. 22. We think it a good point gained if people will be persuaded to take good counsel kindly, nay, if they will take it patiently. 2. What his advice is. He doth not counsel him to enter into a course of physic, for the preventing of the distemper in his head, but to break off a course of sin that he was in, to reform his life. He wronged his own subjects, and dealt unfairly with his allies, and he must break off this by righteousness, by rendering to all their due, making amends for wrong done, and not triumphing over right with might. He had been cruel to the poor, to God's poor, to the poor Jews, and he must break off this iniquity by shewing mercy to those poor, pitying those oppressed ones, setting them at liberty, or making their captivity easy to them. Note, It is necessary, in repentance, that we not only cease to do evil, but learn to do well; not only do no wrong to any, but do good to all. 3. What the motive is with which he backs this advice; "If it may be a lengthening of thy tranquillity." Though it should not wholly prevent the judgment, yet by this means a reprieve may be obtained, as by Ahab's humbling himself, 1 Kin. xxi. 29; either the trouble may be the longer before it comes, or the shorter when it doth come: yet he cannot assure him of this, but it may be it may prove so. Note, The very probability of preventing a temporal judgment is inducement enough to a work so good in itself as the leaving of our sins, and reforming of our lives, much more the certainty of preventing our eternal ruin. 'That will be a healing of thine error,' so some read it. Thus the quarrel will be taken up, and all will be well again.

28 All this came upon the king Nebuchadnezzar. 29 At the end of twelve months he walked in the palace of the kingdom of Babylon. 30 The king spake, and said, Is not this great Babylon, that I have built for the house of the kingdom by the might of my power, and for the honour of my majesty? 31 While the word was in the king's mouth, there fell a voice from heaven, saying, O king Nebuchadnezzar, to thee it is spoken; The kingdom is departed from thee. 32 And they shall drive thee from men, and thy dwelling shall be with the beasts of the field: they shall make thee to eat grass as oxen, and seven times shall pass over thee, until thou know that the most High ruleth in the kingdom of men, and giveth it to whomsoever he will.

to confess that 'this rare legend is in its chief points identical with our account.'" Professor Hengstenberg also has shown the agreement in four chief particulars, so that the objection is fairly removed.

iv. 13. "A watcher and a holy one" must not be taken for two visitants, and might be rendered "a watcher, even a holy one." The expression denotes an angelic being, and we have good reason for holding that the belief in angels, under divers forms, aspects, and names, prevailed in the west of Asia among other nations than Israel, where it was very prominent. Among the fire-worshippers, Zoroastrians, or Parsees, ideas were prevalent resembling some advanced in this book, and hence it has been fancied that the author of it was to some extent indebted to them. All this has been abundantly refuted by recent critics.

iv. 16. Various opinions have been held as to the duration of the "seven times" or seasons, but years are with reason commonly understood.

33 The same hour was the thing fulfilled upon Nebuchadnezzar: and he was driven from men, and did eat grass as oxen, and his body was wet with the dew of heaven, till his hairs were grown like eagles' feathers, and his nails like birds' claws.

We have here Nebuchadnezzar's dream accomplished, and Daniel's application of it to him justified and confirmed. How he took it we are not told, whether he was pleased with Daniel, or displeased; but here we have,

First. God's patience with him. All this came upon him, but not till twelve months after, ver. 29. So long there was a "lengthening of his tranquillity," though it doth not appear that he broke off his sins, or shewed any mercy to the poor captives; for this was still God's quarrel with him, that he "opened not the house of his prisoners," Isa. xiv. 17. Daniel having counselled him to repent, God so far confirmed his word that he gave him space to repent; he let him alone this year also, this one year more, before he brought this judgment upon him. Note, God is therefore longsuffering with provoking sinners, because he is not willing that "any should perish, but that all should come to repentance," 2 Pet. iii. 9.

Secondly. His pride and haughtiness, and abuse of that patience. He walked upon the "palace of the kingdom of Babylon," in pomp and pride, pleasing himself with the view of that vast city, which, with all the territories thereunto belonging, was under his command, and he said, either to himself or to those about him, perhaps some foreigners to whom he was shewing his kingdom, and the glory of it, "Is not this great Babylon?" Yes; it is great, of vast extent, no less than forty-five miles compass within the walls. It is full of inhabitants, and they full of wealth; it is a golden city, and that is enough to speak it great, Isa. xiv. 4. See the grandeur of the houses, walls, towers, and public edifices, (every thing in Babylon he thinks looks great,) and this great Babylon "I have built." Babylon was built many ages before he was born, but because he had fortified and beautified it,—and we may suppose much of it was rebuilt during his long and prosperous reign,—he boasts that he has built it; as Augustus Cæsar boasted concerning Rome, Lateritiam inveni, marmoream reliqui,—'I found it brick, but I left it marble.' He boasts that he built it "for the house of the kingdom," that is, the metropolis of his empire. This vast city, compared with the countries that belonged to his dominions, was but as one house. He built it with the assistance of his subjects, yet boasts that he did it by the might of his power; he built it for his security and convenience, yet, as if he had no occasion for it, boasts that he built it purely "for the honour of his majesty." Note, Pride and self-conceitedness is a sin that most easily besets great men, who have great things in the world. They are apt to take the glory to themselves which is due to God only,

Thirdly. His punishment for his pride. When he was thus strutting and vaunting himself, and adoring his own shadow, while the proud "word was in the king's mouth," the powerful word came from heaven, by which he was immediately deprived, 1. Of his honour as a king; "The kingdom is departed from thee." When he thought he had erected impregnable bulwarks for the preserving of his kingdom, now, in an instant, it is departed from him. When he thought it so well guarded that none could take it from him, behold, it departs of itself. As soon as he becomes utterly incapable to manage it, it is of course taken out of his hands. 2. He is deprived of his honour as a man; he loseth his reason, and, by that means, loseth his dominion; "They shall drive thee from men," ver. 32. And it was fulfilled, ver. 33, he "was driven from men the same hour;" that is, on a sudden he fell stark mad, distracted in the highest degree that ever any man was. His understanding and memory were gone, and all the faculties of a rational soul broken, so that he became a perfect brute in the shape of a man. He went naked, and on all fours, like a brute; did himself shun the society of reasonable creatures, and run wild in the fields and woods, and was driven out by his own servants, who, after some time of trial, despairing of his return to his right mind, abandoned him, and looked after him no more. He had not the spirit of a beast of prey, not that of the royal lion, but of the abject and less honourable species, for he was made to eat grass as oxen, and probably he did not speak with human voice, but lowed like an ox. Some think his body was all covered with hair; however, the hair of his head and beard, being never cut or combed, grew "like eagles' feathers, and his nails like birds' claws."

Let us pause a little and view this miserable spectacle, and let us receive instruction from it. 1st. Let us see here what a mercy it is to have the use of our reason; how thankful we ought to be for it; and how careful we ought to be not to do any thing which may either provoke God or may have a natural tendency to put us out of the possession of our own souls. Let us learn how to value our own reason, and to pity the case of those that are under the prevailing power of melancholy, or distraction, or are delirious, and to be very tender in our censures of them, and carriage towards them; for it is a temptation common to men, and a case which some time or other may be our own. 2nd. Let us see here the vanity of human glory and greatness. Is this Nebuchadnezzar the Great? What! this despicable animal, that is meaner than the poorest beggar? Is this he that looked so glorious in the throne, so formidable in the camp, that had politics enough to subdue and govern kingdoms, and now not so much sense as to keep his own clothes on his back? "Is this the man that made the earth to tremble, that did shake kingdoms?" Isa. xiv. 16. Never let the "wise man then glory in his wisdom," or "the mighty man in his strength." 3rd. Let us see here how God resists the proud, and delights to abase them, and put contempt upon them. Nebuchadnezzar would be more than a man, and therefore God justly makes him less than a man; and puts him upon a level with the beasts that sets up for a rival with his Maker: see Job xl. 11—13.

34 And at the end of the days I Nebuchadnezzar lifted up mine eyes unto heaven, and mine understanding returned unto me, and I blessed the most High, and I praised and honoured him that liveth for ever, whose dominion is an everlasting dominion, and his kingdom is from generation to generation: 35 And all the inhabitants of the earth are reputed as nothing: and he doeth according to his will in the army of heaven, and among the inhabitants of the earth: and none can stay his hand, or say unto him, What doest thou? 36 At the same time my reason returned unto me; and for the glory of my kingdom, mine honour and brightness returned unto me; and my counsellors and my lords sought unto me; and I was established in my kingdom, and excellent majesty was added unto me. 37 Now I Nebuchadnezzar praise and extol and honour the King of heaven, all whose works are truth, and his ways judgment: and those that walk in pride he is able to abase.

We have here Nebuchadnezzar's recovery from his distraction, and his return to his right mind, "at the end of the days" prefixed, that is, of the seven years. So long he continued a monument of God's justice, and a trophy of his victory over the children of pride, and he was made more so by being struck mad than if he had been in an instant struck dead with a thunderbolt. Yet it was a mercy to him that he was kept alive; for while there is life there is hope, that we may yet praise God, as he did here. "At the end of the days," saith he, "I lifted up mine eyes unto heaven," ver. 34, looked no longer down towards the earth as a beast, but began to look up as a man. Os homini sublime dedit,—'Heaven gave to man an erect countenance.' But there was more in it than this; he looked up as a devout man, as a penitent, as an humble petitioner for mercy, being perhaps never till now made sensible of his own misery. And now,

First. He hath the use of his reason so far restored to him that with it he glorifies God, and humbles himself under his mighty hand. He was told that he should continue in that forlorn case till he should know that "the Most High rules;" and here we have him brought to the knowledge of that, "Mine understanding returned to me, and I blessed the Most High." Note, Those may justly be reckoned void of understanding that do not bless and praise God; nor do men ever rightly use their reason till they begin to be religious, nor live as men till they live to the glory of God. As reason is the substratum, or subject of religion, so that creatures which have no reason are not capable of religion, so religion is the crown and glory of reason; and we have our reason in vain, and shall one day wish we had never had it, if we do not glorify God with it. This was the first act of Nebuchadnezzar's returning reason; and when this became the employment of it he was then, and not till then, qualified for all the other enjoyments of it. And till he was for a great while disabled to exercise it in other things he never was brought to apply it to this, which is the great end for which our reason is given us. His folly was the means whereby he became wise; he was not recovered by his dream of this judgment,—that was soon forgotten, like a dream,—but he is made to feel it, and then his ear is opened to discipline. To bring him to himself he must first be beside himself. And by this it appears that what good thoughts there were in his mind, and what good work was wrought there, was not of himself, for he was not his own man, but it was the gift of God. Let us see what Nebuchadnezzar is now at length effectually brought to the acknowledgment of; and we may learn from it what to believe concerning God.

1. That the Most High God lives for ever, and his being knows neither changing or period, for he has it of himself. His flatterers often complimented him with, O king, live for ever; but he is now convinced there is no king lives for ever, but the God of Israel only, who is still the same.

2. That his kingdom is like himself, everlasting, and his "dominion from generation to generation." There is no succession, no revolution in his kingdom. As he lives, so he reigns, for ever, and of his government there is no end.

3. That all nations before him are as nothing; he has no need of them, he makes no account of them. The greatest of men, in comparison with him, are less than nothing. Those that think highly of God think meanly of themselves.

4. That his kingdom is universal, and both the armies of heaven and the inhabitants of the earth are his subjects, and under his check and control. Both angels and men are employed by him, and accountable to him; the highest angel is not above his command, nor the meanest of the children of men beneath his cognizance. The angels of heaven are his armies, the inhabitants of the earth his tenants.

5. That his power is irresistible, and his sovereignty uncontrollable, for "he doth according to his will," according to his design and purpose, according to his decree and counsel. Whatever he pleaseth, that he doth; whatever he appointeth, that he performeth; and none can resist his will, change his counsel, or "stay his hand, or say unto him, What doest thou?" None can arraign his proceedings, inquire into the meaning of them, or demand a reason for them. Woe to him that strives with his Maker, that saith to him, What doest thou? or, Why doest thou so?

6. That every thing that God doth is well done. His works are truth, for they all agree with his word; his ways are judgment, both wise and righteous, exactly consonant to the rules both of prudence and equity, and no fault to be found with them.

7. That he has power to humble the haughtiest of his enemies that act in contradiction to him or competition with him. Those that walk in pride, he is able to abase them, ver. 37; he is able to deal with those that are most confident of their own sufficiency to contend with him.

Secondly. He has the use of his reason so far restored to him as with it to re-enjoy himself, and the pleasures of his re-established prosperity; ver. 36, "At the same time my reason returned to me." He had said before, ver. 34, that his "understanding returned" to him, and here he mentions it again, for the use of our reason is a mercy we can never be enough thankful for. Now his lords sought to him,—he did not need to seek to them; and they soon perceived, not only that he had recovered his reason and was fit to rule, but that he had recovered it with advantage, and was more fit to rule than ever. It is likely the dream and the interpretation of it was well known, and much talked of at court; and the former part of the prediction being fulfilled, that he should go distracted, they doubted not but that, according to the prediction, he should come to himself again at seven years' end, and, in confidence of that, when the time was expired, were ready to receive him; and then his "honour and brightness returned" to him, the same he had before his madness seized him. He is now established in his kingdom as firm as if there had been no such interruption given him; he becomes a fool that he may be wise, wiser than ever; and he that but the other day was in the depth of disgrace and ignominy has now

iv. 17. The "decree of the watchers" is not one of which they are the authors, but that which they are commissioned to publish. The "basest of men" has no reference to personal character, but to a low and humble position, "the lowliest," or least in dignity.

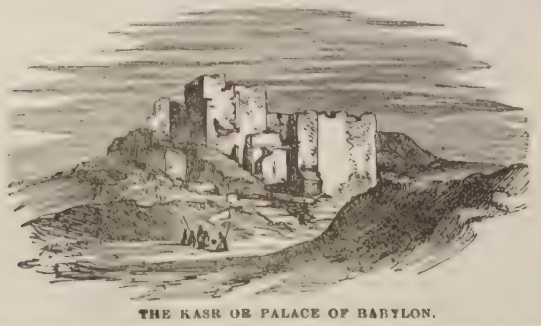
iv. 25. It is generally admitted that this refers to insanity, under the influence of which Nebuchadnezzar would wander abroad, feed upon herbage, and be exposed to all kinds of hardship. As an insane person he would be left to his own will.

iv. 30. The magnitude of Babylon is famous, and much was due to Nebuchadnezzar. "He greatly enlarged the city, built a new city on the west side of the river, reared a magnificent palace, and constructed the celebrated hanging gardens and in fact made the city so different from what it was, and so greatly increased its splendour, that he could say without impropriety that he had 'built' it." As Dr. Kitto says, the ancient world regarded it with equal wonder and admiration.

"excellent majesty" added to him, beyond what he had when he went from kingdom to kingdom conquering and to conquer. Note, 1. When men are brought to honour God, particularly by a penitent confession of sin, and a believing acknowledgment of his sovereignty, then, and not till then, they may expect that God will put honour upon them—will not only restore them to the dignity they lost by the sin of the first Adam, but add excellent majesty to them from the righteousness and grace of the second Adam. 2. Afflictions shall last no longer than till they have done the work for which they were sent. When this prince is brought to own God's dominion over him he is then restored to a dominion over himself. 3. All the accounts we take and give of God's dealing with us ought to conclude with praises to him. When Nebuchadnezzar is restored to his kingdom, he praises, and extols, and honours the King of heaven, ver. 37, before he applies himself to his secular business. Therefore we have our reason, that we may be in a capacity of praising him; and therefore our prosperity, that we may have cause to praise him.

It was not long after this that Nebuchadnezzar ended his life and reign. Abydenus, quoted by Eusebius, (Præp. Evang. i. 9,) reports from the tradition of the Chaldeans, that upon his deathbed he foretold the taking of Babylon by Cyrus. Whether he continued in the same good mind that here he seems to have been in, we are not told, nor doth any thing appear to the contrary but that he did; and if so great a blasphemer and persecutor did find mercy he was not the last. And if our charity may reach so far as to hope he did, we must admire free grace, by which he lost his wits for awhile, that he might save his soul for ever.

CHAPTER V.



The destruction of the kingdom of Babylon had been long and often foretold when it was at a distance. In this chapter we have it accomplished, and a prediction of it the very same night that it was accomplished. Belshazzar now reigned in Babylon; some compute he had reigned seventeen years, others but three; we have here the story of his exit and the period of his kingdom. We must know that, about two years before this, Cyrus king of Persia, a growing monarch, came against Babylon with a great army. Belshazzar met him, fought him, and was routed by him in a pitched battle. He and his scattered forces retired into the city, where Cyrus besieged them; they were very secure, because the river Euphrates was their bulwark, and they had twenty years' provision in the city; but in the second year of the siege he took it, as is here related. We have in this chapter, I. The riotous, idolatrous, and sacrilegious feast which Belshazzar made, in which he filled up the measure of his iniquity, ver. 1—4. II. The alarm given him in the midst of his jollity, by a handwriting on the wall, which none of his wise men could read, or tell him the meaning of, ver. 5—9. III. The interpretation of the mystical characters by Daniel, who was at length brought in to him, and dealt plainly with him, and shewed him his doom written, ver. 10—28. IV. The immediate accomplishment of the interpretation in the slaying of the king and seizing of the kingdom, ver. 30, 31.

BELSHAZZAR the king made a great feast to a thousand of his lords, and drank wine before the thousand. 2 Belshazzar, whiles he tasted the wine, commanded to bring the golden and silver vessels which his father Nebuchadnezzar had taken out of the temple which was in Jerusalem; that the king, and his princes, his wives, and his concubines, might drink therein. 3 Then they brought the golden vessels that were taken out of the temple of the house of God which was at Jerusalem; and the king, and his princes, his wives, and his concubines, drank in them. 4 They drank wine, and praised the gods of gold, and of silver, of brass, of iron, of wood, and of stone. 5 In the same hour came forth fingers of a man's hand, and wrote over against the candlestick upon the plaister of the wall of the king's palace: and the king saw the part of the hand that wrote. 6 Then the king's countenance was changed, and his thoughts troubled him, so that the joints of his loins were loosed, and his knees smote one against another. 7 The king cried aloud to bring in the astrologers, the Chaldeans, and the soothsayers. And the king spake, and said to the wise men of Babylon, Whosoever shall read this writing, and shew me the interpretation thereof, shall be clothed with scarlet, and have a chain of gold about his neck, and shall be the third ruler in the kingdom. 8 Then came in all the king's wise men: but they could not read the writing, nor make known to the king the interpretation thereof. 9 Then was king Belshazzar greatly troubled, and his countenance was changed in him, and his lords were astonied.

WINE-BEARERS.

THE KASR OR PALACE OF BABYLON.

We have here Belshazzar the king very gay, but all of a sudden very gloomy, and in straits in the fulness of his sufficiency. See how he affronts God, and God affrights him; and wait what will be the issue of this contest, and whether he that hardened his heart against God prospered.

First. See how the king affronted God, and put contempt upon him. He "made a great feast," or banquet of wine; probably it was some anniversary solemnity in honour of his birthday, or coronation day, or of some of their idols. Historians say that Cyrus, who was now with his army besieging Babylon, knew of this feast, and presuming that they then would be off their guard, somno vinoque sepulti,—'buried in sleep and wine,' took that opportunity to attack the city, and so with the more ease made himself master of it. Belshazzar upon this occasion invited "a thousand of his lords" to come and drink with him; perhaps they were such as had signalised themselves in defence of the city against the besiegers. Or these were his great council of war, with whom, when they had well drunk, he would advise what was farther to be done. And they were to look upon it as a great favour that he drank wine before them, for it was the pride of those eastern kings to be seldom seen. He drank wine before them, for he made this feast, as Ahasuerus did, to shew the honour of his majesty. Now, in this sumptuous feast,

1. He put an affront upon the providence of God, and bid defiance to his judgments. His city was now besieged, a powerful enemy was at his gates, his life and kingdom lay at stake; in all this the hand of the Lord was gone out against him, and by it he called him to "weeping and mourning, and girding with sackcloth." God's voice cried in the city, as Jonah to Nineveh, "Yet forty days," or fewer, and Babylon shall be destroyed. He should therefore, like the king of Nineveh, have proclaimed a fast; but, as one resolved to walk contrary to God, he proclaims a feast, and behold, "joy and gladness, slaying oxen, killing sheep, eating flesh, and drinking wine," as if he dared the Almighty to do his worst, Isa. xxii. 12, 13 To shew how little fear he had of being forced to surrender for want of provisions, he spent thus extravagantly. Note, Security and sensuality are sad presages of approaching ruin. Those that will not be warned by the judgments of God may expect to be wounded by them.

2. He put an affront upon the temple of God, and bid defiance to his sanctuary; ver. 2, "While he tasted the wine he commanded to bring" the vessels of the temple, that they might drink in them. When he tasted how rich and fine the wine was, 'O,' said he, 'it is a pity but we should have holy vessels to drink such delicate wine as this in;' which was looked upon as a piece of wit, and, to carry on the humour, the vessels of the temple were presently sent for. Nay, there seems to have been something more in it than a frolic, and that it was done in a malicious despite to the God of Israel. The heart of his people was very much upon these sacred vessels, as appears by Jer. xxvii. 16, 18; their principal care in their return was about these, Ezr. i. 7. Now we may suppose they had an expectation of their deliverance approaching, reckoning the seventy years of their captivity near a period, and some of them might perhaps have given out some words to that purpose, that shortly they should have the vessels of the sanctuary restored to them; in defiance of which, Belshazzar here proclaims them to be his own, will keep them in store no longer, but make use of them among his own plate. Note, That mirth is sinful indeed, and fills the measure of men's iniquity apace, which profanes sacred things, and jests with them. This ripened Babylon for ruin, that no songs would serve them but the songs of Zion, Ps. cxxxvii. 3, no vessels but the vessels of the sanctuary. Let those who thus sacrilegiously alienate what is dedicated to God and his honour know that he will not be mocked.

3. He put an affront upon God himself, and bid defiance to his deity; for "they drank wine, and praised the gods of gold and silver," ver. 4. They gave that glory to images, the work of their own hands, and creatures of their own fancy, which is due to the true and living God only. They praised them, either with sacrifices offered to them or with songs sung in honour of them. When their heads were giddy, and their hearts merry with wine, they were in the fittest frame to praise the gods of gold and silver, wood and stone; for one would think men in their senses, that had the command of a clear and sober thought, could not be guilty of so gross an absurdity; they must be intoxicated ere they could be so infatuated. Drunken worshippers, that are not men, but beasts, are the most proper for the service of dunghill deities, that are not gods, but devils. "They have erred through wine," Isa. xxviii. 7. They drank wine, and praised their idol gods, as if they had been the founders of their feast, and the givers of all good things to them. Or, when they were drinking wine, they praised their gods, by drinking healths to them. And the king drank wine before them, ver. 1, that is, he began the health, first to this god, and then to the other, till they went through the beadroll, or farrago, of them, those of wood and stone not excepted. Note, Immorality and impiety, vice and profaneness, strengthen the hands, and advance the interests one of another. Drunken frolics were an introduction to idolatry, and then idolatrous healths were a shoeing-horn to farther drunkenness.

Secondly. See how God affrighted the king, and struck a terror upon him. Belshazzar and his lords are in the midst of their revels, the cups going round apace, and all disposed to merriment—drinking confusion, it may be, to Cyrus and his army, and roaring out huzzas in confidence of the speedy raising of the siege. But the hour was come when that must be fulfilled which had been

v. 1. The great objections to this chapter were formerly two:—1. That no king of Babylon was anywhere mentioned as bearing the name of Belshazzar. 2. That on the fall of Babylon the king was not in the city, but in the open field. Various answers were devised to remove these difficulties, but modern discoveries have rendered it almost needless to have recourse to conjecture. The deciphering of the cuneiform inscriptions has shown that the last chief king of Babylon had associated with him his son Belsharezer, or Belshazzar. This great fact vindicates the historical reputation of Daniel so far, and it is easy to answer the objection that in verse 2 of this chapter he calls Nebuchadnezzar the father of Belshazzar. "Father," in the Hebrew and kindred languages, is very often indeed put for ancestor or forefather, and may therefore mean grandfather in the place under consideration. This use of the word father and the corresponding terms, son, daughter, &c., is so well known and established as to be unquestioned by any criticism which is in the least degree honest long ago said of the king of Babylon, when his city should be besieged by the Persians and Medes; Isa. xxi. 2—4, "The night of my pleasures has he turned into fear to me." The mirth of this ball at court must be spoiled, and a damp cast upon their jollity, though the king himself be master of the revels; presently, when God speaks the word, we have him and all his guests in the utmost confusion, and the end of their mirth heaviness.

1. There appear the "fingers of a man's hand" writing "on the plaster of the wall," before the king's face, ver. 5; the angel Gabriel, say the rabbins, directing these fingers, and writing by them. 'That Divine hand (saith a rabbin of our own, Dr. Lightfoot,) that had written the two tables for a law to his people now writes the doom of Babel and Belshazzar upon the wall.' Here was nothing sent to frighten them which made a noise, or threatened their lives; no claps of thunder or flashes of lightning; no destroying angel with his sword drawn in his hand; only a pen in the hand, writing upon the wall, "over against the candlestick," where they might all see it by the light of their own candle. Note, God's written word is sufficient to put the proudest, boldest sinner into a fright, when he is pleased to give it the setting on. "The king saw the part of the hand that wrote," but saw not the person whose hand it was, which made the thing more frightful. Note, What we see of God, the part of the hand that writes in the book of the creatures and the book of the Scriptures, ("Lo, these are parts of his ways," Job xxvi. 14,) may serve to possess us with awful thoughts concerning that of God which we do not see. If this be the finger of God, what is his arm made bare? And what is he?

2. The king is immediately seized with a panic fear; ver. 6, "His countenance was changed." His colour went and came, "the joints of his loins were loosed," so that he had no strength in them, but was struck with a pain in his back, as is usual in a great fright; "his knees smote one against another," so violently did he tremble, like an aspen leaf. But what was the matter? Why is he in such a fright? He perceives not what is written, and how doth he know but it may be some happy presage of deliverance to him and to his kingdom. But the business was his thoughts troubled him; his own guilty conscience flew in his face, and told him he had no reason to expect any good news from heaven, and that the hand of an angel could write nothing but terror to him. He that knew himself liable to the justice of God presently concludes this is an arrest in his name, a summons to appear before him. Note, God can soon awaken the most secure, and make the heart of the stoutest sinner to tremble; and there needs no more to do it but to let loose his own thoughts upon him; they will soon play the tyrant, and give him trouble enough.

3. The wise men of Babylon are presently called in to see what they can make of this writing upon the wall, ver. 7. The king cried aloud, as one in haste, as one in earnest, to bring the whole college of magicians to try if they can read this writing, and shew the interpretation of it; for the king and all his lords cannot pretend to it, it is out of their sphere. The study of Divine revelation (such as they had, or thought they had,) and converse with the world of spirits was, by the heathen, confined to one profession, and none other meddled with it; but what is written to us by the finger of God is legible to all. Whoever will may read the mind of God in the Scriptures. To engage these wise men to exert the utmost of their skill in this matter, and provoke them to an emulation in the attempt, he promiseth that whoever would give him a satisfactory account of this writing should be dignified with the highest honours of the court. He knew what these pretenders to wisdom aimed at, and what would please them, and therefore promiseth them a scarlet robe and a gold chain—glorious things in their eyes that know no better. Nay, he should be primus par regni,—'chief minister of state;' the third ruler in the kingdom, next to the king and his heir apparent.

4. The king is disappointed in his expectations from them. They could none of them read the writing, much less interpret it, ver. 8; which increaseth the king's confusion, ver. 9. He likes the thing yet worse and worse, and fears that mischief is towards him. His lords also, that had been partners with him in his jollity, are now sharers with him in his terrors; they also were astonished, and at their wits' end. And neither their numbers nor their refreshment by wine would serve to keep up their spirits. The reason why the wise men could not read the writing, was not because it was written in any language or characters unknown to them, but God either cast a mist before their eyes or put such confusion upon their spirits that they could not read it, that the honour of expounding this mystical writing might be reserved for Daniel. Note, The terror of an awakened, convinced conscience may justly be increased by the utter insufficiency of all creatures to give it ease or satisfaction.

10 Now the queen by reason of the words of the king and his lords came into the banquet house: and the queen spake and said, O king, live for ever: let not thy thoughts trouble thee, nor let thy countenance be changed: 11 There is a man in thy kingdom, in whom is the spirit of the holy gods; and in the days of thy father light and understanding and wisdom, like the wisdom of the gods, was found in him; whom the king Nebuchadnezzar thy father, the king, I say, thy father, made master of the magicians, astrologers, Chaldeans, and soothsayers; 12 Forasmuch as an excellent spirit, and knowledge, and understanding, interpreting of dreams, and shewing of hard sentences, and dissolving of doubts, were found in the same Daniel, whom the king named Belteshazzar: now let Daniel be called, and he will shew the interpretation. 13 Then was Daniel brought in before the king. And the king spake and said unto Daniel, Art thou that Daniel, which art of the children of the captivity of Judah, whom the king my father brought out of Jewry? 14 I have even heard of thee, that the spirit of the gods is in thee, and that light and understanding and excellent wisdom is found in thee. 15 And now the wise men, the astrologers, have been brought in before me, that they should read this writing, and make known unto me the interpretation thereof: but they could not shew the interpretation of the thing: 16 And I have heard of thee, that thou canst make interpretations, and dissolve doubts: now if thou canst read the writing, and make known to me the interpretation thereof, thou shalt be clothed with scarlet, and have a chain of gold about thy neck, and shalt be the third ruler in the kingdom. 17 Then Daniel answered and said before the king, Let thy gifts be to thyself, and give thy rewards to another; yet I will read the writing unto the king, and make known to him the interpretation. 18 O thou king, the most high God gave Nebuchadnezzar thy father a kingdom, and majesty, and glory, and honour: 19 And for the majesty that he gave him, all people, nations, and languages, trembled and feared before him: whom he would he slew; and whom he would he kept alive; and whom he would he set up; and whom he would he put down. 20 But when his heart was lifted up, and his mind hardened in pride, he was deposed from his kingly throne, and they took his glory from him: 21 And he was driven from the sons of men; and his heart was made like the beasts, and his dwelling was with the wild asses: they fed him with grass like oxen, and his body was wet with the dew of heaven; till he knew that the most high God ruled in the kingdom of men, and that he appointeth over it whomsoever he will. 22 And thou his son, O Belshazzar, hast not humbled thine heart, though thou knewest all this; 23 But hast lifted up thyself against the Lord of heaven; and they have brought the vessels of his house before thee, and thou, and thy lords, thy wives, and thy concubines, have drunk wine in them; and thou and intelligent. A common English concordance will supply several examples.

v. 5. Mr. Layard not only intimates the discovery of walls lined with carved alabaster slabs, but he observes, in his "Nineveh and Babylon," that there were chambers in the palace of Sennacherib, as well as in those of Nimroud and Khorsabad, whose walls were simply coated with plaster, like the walls of Belshazzar's palace at Babylon. Mr. Gosse says, "The bricks above the alabaster slabs were covered with a thin coat of plaster, on which the design was painted in brilliant colours. Only a few fragments have been discovered of this fragile material, enough to reveal the nature of the decoration, but insufficient to enable us to judge of its merits." The "candlestick" was probably an elevated stand on which a lamp was placed; of such lamps examples in bronze and terra cotta are in the British Museum.

v. 8. The fact that the wise men could not read the writing suggests that it was not in any of the characters in ordinary use.

hast praised the gods of silver, and gold, of brass, iron, wood, and stone, which see not, nor hear, nor know: and the God in whose hand thy breath is, and whose are all thy ways, hast thou not glorified: 24 Then was the part of the hand sent from him; and this writing was written. 25 And this is the writing that was written, MENE, MENE, TEKEL, UPHARSIN. 26 This is the interpretation of the thing: MENE; God hath numbered thy kingdom, and finished it. 27 TEKEL; Thou art weighed in the balances, and art found wanting. 28 PERES; Thy kingdom is divided, and given to the Medes and Persians. 29 Then commanded Belshazzar, and they clothed Daniel with scarlet, and put a chain of gold about his neck, and made a proclamation concerning him, that he should be the third ruler in the kingdom.

Here is, First. The information given to the king by the queen-mother, concerning Daniel, how fit he was to be consulted in this difficult case. It is supposed this queen was the widow of Evil-merodach, and was the famous Nitocris, whom Herodotus mentions as a woman of extraordinary prudence. She was not present at the feast, as the king's wives and concubines were, ver. 2; it was not agreeable to her age and gravity to keep a merry night. But tidings of the fright which the king and his lords were put into being brought to her apartment, she came herself to the banqueting house, to recommend to the king a physician for his melancholy. She bespeaks him not to be discouraged by the insufficiency of his wise men to solve this riddle, for there was a man in his kingdom that had more than once helped his grandfather in such exigences, and no doubt could help him, ver. 11, 12. She could not undertake to read the writing herself, but directs him to one that could; let Daniel be called now, who should have been called first. Now observe,

1. The high character she gives of Daniel. He is a man "in whom is the spirit of the holy gods," who has something in him more than human; not only the spirit of a man, which in all is the candle of the Lord, but a Divine spirit. According to the language of her country and religion she could not give a higher encomium of any man; she speaks honourably of him, as a man that had, 1st. An admirably good head. "Light, and understanding, and wisdom, like the wisdom of the gods, was found in him." Such an insight had he into things secret, and such a foresight of things to come, that it was evident he was Divinely inspired; he had "knowledge and understanding" beyond all the other wise men for "interpreting of dreams," explaining of enigmas or hard sentences, untying knots, and dissolving doubts. Solomon had a wonderful sagacity of this kind, but it should seem that in these things Daniel had more of an immediate Divine direction; behold, a greater than Solomon himself is here. Yet what was the wisdom of them both, compared with the treasures of wisdom hid in Christ? 2nd. He had an admirably good heart. "An excellent spirit" was found in him, which was a great ornament to his wisdom and knowledge, and qualified him to receive that gift; for "God giveth to a man that is good in his sight, wisdom, and knowledge, and joy." He was of an humble, holy, heavenly spirit, had a devout and gracious spirit, a spirit of zeal for the glory of God and the good of men. This was indeed an excellent spirit.

2. The account she gives of the respect that Nebuchadnezzar had for him. He was much in his esteem, and was preferred by him. "The king thy father," that is, thy grandfather; but even to many generations Nebuchadnezzar might well be called the father of that royal family, for he it was that raised it to such a pitch of grandeur. "The king, I say, thy father, made him master of the magicians." Perhaps Belshazzar had sometimes in his pride spoken slightly of Nebuchadnezzar and his politics, and the methods of his government, and the ministers he employed, and thought himself wiser than he, and therefore his mother harps upon that. "The king, I say, thy father," to whose good management all thou hast is owing, he pronounced him chief of, and gave him dominion over, all the wise men of Babylon, and named him Belteshazzar, according to the name of his god, thinking thereby to put honour upon him. But Daniel, by constantly making use of his Jewish name himself, (which he resolved to stick to, in token of his faithful adherence to his religion,) had worn out that name; only the queen dowager remembered it, otherwise he was generally called Daniel. Note, It is a very good office to revive the remembrance of the good services of worthy men, who are themselves modest, and willing they should be forgotten.

3. The motion she makes concerning him; "Let Daniel be called, and he will shew the interpretation." By this it appears that Daniel was now forgotten at court; Belshazzar was a stranger to him, knew not that he had such a jewel in his kingdom; with the new king there came in a new ministry, and the old one was laid aside. Note, There are a great many valuable men, and such as might be made very useful, that lie long buried in obscurity, and some that have done eminent services, that lived to be overlooked, and taken no notice of; but, whatever men are, God is not unrighteous to forget the services done to his kingdom. Daniel, being turned out of his place, lived privately, and sought not any opportunity to be reinstated therein; yet he lived near the court, and within call,—though Babylon was now besieged,—that he might be ready, if there were occasion, to do any good office, by what interest he had among the great ones, for the children of his people. But providence so ordered it that now, just at the fall of that monarchy, he should by the queen's means be brought to court again, that he might lie there ready for preferment in the ensuing government. Thus do the righteous shine forth out of obscurity, and before honour is humility.

Secondly. The introducing of Daniel to the king, and his request to him to read and expound the writing. Daniel was "brought in before the king," ver. 13. He was now near ninety years of age, so that his years and honours, and former preferments, might have entitled him to a free admission into the king's presence, yet he was willing to be conducted in as a stranger by the master of the ceremonies. Now, 1. The king asks, with an air of haughtiness, "Art thou that Daniel who art of the children of the captivity?" Being a Jew, and a captive, he was loth to be beholden to him, if he could have helped it. 2. He tells him what an encomium he had heard of him, ver. 14, that "the spirit of the gods" was in him; and he had sent for him to try whether he deserved so high a character or no. 3. He acknowledgeth that all his wise men of Babylon were baffled; they could not read this writing, nor shew the interpretation, ver. 15. But, 4. He promiseth him the same rewards he had promised them, if he would do it, ver. 16. It was strange the magicians, when now, and in Nebuchadnezzar's time once and again, they were nonplussed, did not offer at something to save their credit. If they had with a good assurance said, This is the meaning of such a dream, such a writing, who could disprove them? But God so ordered it that they had nothing at all to say, as when Christ was born the heathen oracles were struck dumb.

Thirdly. The interpretation which Daniel gave of these mystic characters, which was so far from easing the king of his fears, that we may suppose it increased them rather. Daniel was now in years, and Belshazzar was young, and therefore he seems to take a greater liberty of dealing plainly and roundly with him than he had done upon the like occasions with Nebuchadnezzar. In reproving any man, especially great men, there is need of wisdom to consider all circumstances, for they are the reproofs of instruction that are the way of life. In Daniel's discourse here,

1. He undertakes to read the writing which gave them this alarm, and to shew them the interpretation of it, ver. 15. He slights the offer he made him of rewards, is not pleased that it was mentioned, for he is none of those that divine for money; what gratuities Nebuchadnezzar gave him afterwards he thankfully accepted them, but he scorned to indent for them, or to read the writing to the king for, and in consideration of, such and such honours promised him. No, "let thy gifts be to thyself," for they will not be long thine, and give thy fee to another,—to any of the wise men whom thou hadst most mind should have earned it; I value it not. Daniel sees his kingdom now at this last gasp, and therefore looks with contempt upon his gifts and rewards. And thus should we despise all the gifts and rewards this world can give, did we see, as we may by faith, its final period hastening on. Let it give its perishing gifts to another, there are better gifts which we have our eyes and hearts upon; but let us do our duty in the world, do it all the real service we can, read God's writing to it in a profession of religion, and by an agreeable conversation make known the interpretation of it, and then trust God for his gifts, his rewards, in comparison of which all the world can give is mere trash and trifles.

2. He largely recounts to the king God's dealings with his father Nebuchadnezzar, which were intended for instruction and warning to him, ver. 18—21. This is not intended for a flourish or an amusement, but is a necessary preliminary to the interpretation of the writing. Note, That we may understand aright what God is doing with us, it is of use to us to review what he has done with others.

1st. He describes the great dignity and power to which the Divine providence had advanced Nebuchadnezzar, ver. 18, 19. He had "a kingdom, and majesty, and glory, and honour," for aught we know, above what any heathen prince ever had before him. Now he thought he got it by his own extraordinary conduct and courage, and ascribed his successes to a projecting active genius of his own; but Daniel tells him, who now enjoyed what he had laboured for, that it was the Most High God, the God of gods, and Lord of kings, as Nebuchadnezzar himself had called him, that gave him that kingdom, that vast dominion, that majesty wherewith he presided in the affairs of it, and that glory and honour which by his prosperous management he acquired. Note, Whatever degree of outward prosperity any arrive to, they must own it is of God's giving, not their own getting. Let it never be said, "My might, and the power of my hand, hath gotten me this wealth," this preferment; but let it always be remembered that it is God that gives men power to get wealth, and gives success to their endeavours. Now, the power which God gave to Nebuchadnezzar is here described to be very great, in respect both of ability and of authority. First. His ability was so strong that it was irresistible; such was the majesty that God gave him, so numerous the forces he had at command, and such an admirable dexterity he had at commanding them, that which way soever his sword turned it prospered; he could captivate and subdue nations by threatening them, without striking a stroke, for "all people trembled and feared before him," and would compound with him for their lives upon any terms. See what force is, and what the fear of it doth. It is that by which the brutal part of the world, even of the world of mankind, both governs and is governed. Secondly. His authority was so absolute that it was uncontrollable. The power which was allowed him, which descended upon him, or which at least he assumed, was without contradiction, was absolute and despotic. None shared with him either in the legislative or the executive part of it; but in dispensing punishments he condemned or acquitted at pleasure; "whom he would he slew, and whom he would he saved alive," though both were equally innocent, or equally guilty. The jus vitæ et necis,—'the power of life and death,' was entirely in his hand. In dispensing rewards he granted or denied preferments at pleasure; "whom he would set up, and whom he would put down," merely for a humour, and without giving a reason so much as to himself; but it is all ex mero motu,—'of his own good pleasure,' and stat pro ratione voluntas,—'his will stands for a reason.' Such was the constitution of the Eastern monarchies, such the manner of their kings.

2nd. He sets before him the sins which Nebuchadnezzar had been guilty of, whereby he had provoked God against him. First. He carried it insultingly towards those that were under him, and grew tyrannical and oppressive. The description given of his power intimates his abuse of his power, and that he was directed in what he did by humour and passion, not by reason and equity; so that he often condemned the innocent and acquitted the guilty, both which are an abomination to the Lord. He deposed men of merit, and preferred unworthy men, to the great detriment of the public, and for this he is accountable to the Most High God, that gave him his power. Note, It is a very hard and rare thing for men to have an absolute arbitrary power, and not to make an ill use of it. Camden has a distich of Giraldus, wherein he speaks of it as a rare instance concerning our King Henry the Second of England, that never any man had so much power and did so little hurt with it.

Glorior hoc uno, quod nunquam vidimus unum,
Nec potuisse magis, nec nocuisse minus,—

'Of him I can say, exulting, that with the same power to do harm no one was ever more inoffensive.'

But that was not all. Secondly. He carried it insolently towards the God above him, and grew proud and haughty, ver. 20. His heart was lifted up, and there his sin and ruin began; his mind was hardened in pride, hardened against the commands of God, and his judgments, he was wilful and obstinate, and neither God's word nor rod made any lasting impression upon him. Note, Pride is a sin that hardens the heart in all other sins, and renders the means of repentance and reformation ineffectual.

3rd. He reminds him of the judgments of God that were brought upon him for his pride and obstinacy. How he was deprived of his reason, and so "deposed from his kingly throne," ver. 20; driven from among men, to dwell with the wild asses, ver. 21. He that would not govern his subjects by rules of

v. 16. The king's promise that Daniel should be the third ruler in the kingdom is now rendered quite intelligible by the discovery above mentioned of the actual existence of two monarchs, of whom Belshazzar would be the second, and his father the first.

v. 25—28. The Chaldee words in this passage individually cause no difficulty. "Mene" signifies "numbered;" "Tekel" means "weighed;" and "Upharsin" "and they divide," or "carry away," as it is explained by some. "Peres," in verse 28, is either "divided" or "carried away," and is another form of "Upharsin." The idea of weighing as a test of character seems to have been as common as it is appropriate. The empire of Babylon was subjugated by Cyrus, at the head of the Medes and Persians, as is fully proved by ancient records.

v. 31. Darius is here mentioned because Cyrus, his nephew, acted under his authority and in his name. This explanation is not, however, universally received; and it is still disputed whether Darius reason had not reason sufficient for the government of himself. Note, Justly doth God deprive men of their reason when they become unreasonable, and will not use it, and of their power when they become oppressive, and use it ill. He continued like a brute till he knew and embraced that first principle of religion, "that the most high God rules;" and it is rather by religion than reason that man is distinguished from and dignified above the beasts; and it is more his honour to be a subject to the supreme Creator than to be lord of inferior creatures. Note, Kings must know, or shall be made to know, that the Most High God rules in their kingdoms—that is an imperium in imperio,—'an empire within an empire,' not to be excepted against—and that he appoints over them whomsoever he will. As he makes heirs, so he makes princes.

3. In God's name he exhibits articles of impeachment against Belshazzar. Before he reads him his doom from the handwriting on the wall, he shews him his crime, that God may be justified when he speaks, and clear when he judgeth. Now that which he lays to his charge is,

1st. That he had not taken warning by the judgments of God upon his father; ver. 22, "Thou his son, O Belshazzar, hast not humbled thine heart, though thou knewest all this." Note, It is a great offence to God if our hearts be not humbled before him to comply both with his precepts and with his providences, humbled by repentance, obedience, and patience; nay, he expects from the greatest of men that their hearts should be humbled before him by an acknowledgment that, as great as they are, to him they are accountable. And it is a great aggravation of the unhumbleness of our hearts when we know enough to humble them, but do not consider and improve it, particularly when we know how others have been broken that would not bend, how others have fallen that would not stoop, and yet we continue stiff and inflexible. It makes the sin of children the more heinous if they tread in the steps of their parents' wickedness, though they have seen how dear it has cost them, and how pernicious the consequences of it have been. Do we know this, do we know all this, and yet are we not humbled?

2nd. That he had affronted God more impudently than Nebuchadnezzar himself had done. Witness the revels of this very night in the midst of which he was seized with this horror: ver. 23, "Thou hast lifted up thyself against the Lord of heaven," hast swelled with rage against him, and taken up arms against his crown and dignity in this particular instance, that thou hast profaned the vessels of his house, and made the utensils of his sanctuary instruments of thine iniquity, and, in an actual designed contempt of him, hast "praised the gods of silver and gold, which see not, nor hear, nor know" any thing, as if they were to be preferred before the God that sees, and hears and knows every thing. Sinners that are resolved to go on in sin are well enough pleased with gods that neither see, nor hear, nor know, for then they may sin securely; but they will find to their confusion that, though those are the gods they choose, those are not the gods they must be judged by, but One to whom all things are naked and open.

3rd. That he had not answered the end of his creation and maintenance; "The God in whose hand thy breath is, and whose are all thy ways, hast thou not glorified." This is a general charge, which stands good against us all; look how we shall answer it. Observe, First. Our dependence upon God as our creator, preserver, benefactor, owner, and ruler. Not only from his hand our breath was at first, but in his hand our breath is still; it is he that holds our souls in life, and if he take away our breath we die. Our times being in his hand, so is our breath, by which our times are measured. "In him we live, and move, and have our being;" we live by him, live upon him, and cannot live without him. The way of man is not in himself, not at his own command, at his own disposal, but his are all our ways; for our hearts are in his hand, and so are the hearts of all men, even of kings, who seem to act most as free agents. Secondly. Our duty to God in consideration of this dependence. We ought to glorify him, to devote ourselves to his honour, and employ ourselves in his service, to make it our care to please him, and our business to praise him. Thirdly. Our default in this duty notwithstanding that dependence; we have not done it; for we "have all sinned, and have come short of the glory of God." This is the indictment against Belshazzar. There needs no proof, it is made good by the notorious evidence of the fact, and his own conscience cannot but plead guilty to it; and, therefore,

4th. He now proceeds to read the sentence as he found it written upon the wall. Then, saith Daniel, when thou wast come to such a height of impiety as thus to trample upon the most sacred things, then when thou wast in the midst of thy sacrilegious idolatrous feast, then was the part of the hand, the writing fingers sent from him, from that God whom thou didst so daringly affront, and who had borne so long with thee, but would bear no longer; he sent them, and this writing thou now seest was written, ver. 24. It is he that now "writes bitter things against thee," and "makes thee to possess thine iniquities," Job xiii. 26. Note, as the sin of sinners is written in the book of God's omniscience, so the doom of sinners is written in the book of God's law; and the day is coming when those books shall be opened, and they shall be judged by them.

Now the writing was "Mene, Mene, Tekel, Upharsin," ver. 25. It is well we have an authentic exposition of them annexed, else we could make little of them, so concise are they; the signification of them is, 'he hath numbered, he hath weighed, and they divide.' The Chaldean wise men, because they knew not that there is but one God only, could not understand who this 'He' should be, and for that reason, some think, the writing puzzled them.

First, Mene; that is repeated, for the thing is certain: Mene, Mene, that signifies, both in Hebrew and Chaldee, 'he hath numbered and finished;' which Daniel explains thus, ver. 26, "God hath numbered thy kingdom," that is, the years and days of the continuance of it; these were numbered in the counsel of God, and now they are finished; the term has expired for and during which thou wast to hold it, and now it must be surrendered. Here is an end of thy kingdom.

Secondly. Tekel; that signifies in Chaldee, "thou art weighed;" and in Hebrew, 'thou art too light;' so Dr. Lightfoot. For this king and his actions are weighed in the just and unerring balances of Divine equity. God doth as perfectly know his true character as the goldsmith knows the weight of that which he has weighed in the nicest scales. God doth not give judgment against him till he has first pondered his actions, and considered the merits of his case: But thou art "found wanting," unworthy to have such a trust lodged in thee, a vain, light, empty man, a man of no weight or consideration.

Thirdly. Upharsin, which should be rendered, and Pharsin, or Peres; Pharsin, in Hebrew, signifies 'the Persians;' Paresin, in Chaldee, signifies 'dividing.' Daniel put both together, ver. 28, "Thy kingdom is divided," is rent from thee, and "given to the Medes and Persians," as a prey to be divided among them.

Now this may, without any force, be applied to the doom of sinners; mene, tekel, peres, may easily be made to signify 'death, judgment, and hell.' At death the sinner's days are numbered and finished; after death the judgment, when he will be "weighed in the balance and found wanting;" and after judgment the sinner will be cut asunder, and given as a prey to the devil and his angels. Daniel doth not here give Belshazzar such advice and encouragement to repent as he had given Nebuchadnezzar, because he saw the decree was gone forth, and he would not be allowed any space to repent.

One would have thought Belshazzar would have been exasperated against Daniel, and, seeing his own case desperate, would have been in a rage against him. But he was so far convicted by his own conscience of the reasonableness of all he said, that he objected nothing against it, but, on the contrary, gave Daniel the reward he promised him, put on him the scarlet gown and the gold chain, and proclaimed him the "third ruler in the kingdom," ver. 29, because he would be as good as his word, and because it was not Daniel's fault if the exposition of the handwriting was not such as he desired. Note, Many shew great respect to God's prophets who yet have no regard to his word. Daniel did not value these titles and ensigns of honour, yet would not refuse them, because they were tokens of his prince's goodwill. But we have reason to think he received them with a smile, foreseeing how soon they would all wither with him that bestowed them. They were like Jonah's gourd, which came up in a night, and perished in a night, and therefore it was folly for him to be exceeding glad of them.

30 In that night was Belshazzar the king of the Chaldeans slain. 31 And Darius the Median took the kingdom, being about threescore and two years old.

Here is, First. The death of the king. Reason enough he had to tremble, for he was just falling into the hands of the king of terrors; ver. 30, "In that night," when his heart was merry with wine, the besiegers broke into the city, aimed at the palace; there they found the king, and gave him his death wound; he could not find any place so secret as to conceal him, or so strong as to protect him. Heathen writers speak of Cyrus's taking Babylon by surprise, with the assistance of two deserters that shewed him the best way into the city. And it was foretold what a consternation it would be to the court, Jer. li. 11, 39. Note, Death comes as a snare upon those whose hearts are overcharged with surfeiting and drunkenness.

Secondly. The transferring of the kingdom into other hands. From the head of gold we now descend to the breast and arms of silver. "Darius the Mede took the kingdom" in partnership with, and by the consent of, Cyrus, who had conquered it, ver. 31. They were partners in war and conquest, and so they were in dominion, ch. vi. 28. Notice is taken of his age, that he was now sixty-two years old; for which reason Cyrus, who was his nephew, gave him the precedency. Some observe that, he being now sixty-two years old in the last year of the captivity, he was born in the eighth year of it, and that was the year when Jeconiah was carried captive, and all the nobles, &c: see 2 Kin. xxiv. 13—15. Just at that time, when the most fatal stroke was given, was a prince born, that, in process of time, should avenge Jerusalem upon Babylon, and heal the wound that was now given. Thus deep are the counsels of God concerning his people, thus kind are his designs towards them.

CHAPTER VI.

Daniel doth not give a continued history of the reigns in which he lived, nor of the state affairs of the kingdoms of Chaldea and Persia, though he was himself a great man in those affairs; for what are those to us? But he selects such particular passages of story as serve for the confirmation of our faith in God, and the encouragement of our obedience to him; for the things written aforetime were written for our learning. It is a very observable, improvable story that we have in this chapter, how Daniel by faith "stopped the mouth of lions," and so obtained a good report, Heb. xi. 33. The three children were cast into the fiery furnace for not committing a known sin; Daniel was cast into the lion's den for not omitting a known duty; and God's miraculous delivering both them and him is left upon record for the encouragement of his servants in all ages to be resolute and constant, both in their abhorrence of that which is evil and in their adherence to that which is good, whatever it cost them. In this chapter we have, I. Daniel's preferment in the court of Darius, ver. 1—3. II. The envy and malice of his enemies against him, ver. 4, 5. III. The decree they obtained against prayer for thirty days, ver. 6—9. IV. Daniel's continuance and constancy in prayer, notwithstanding that decree, ver. 10. V. Information given against him for it, and the casting of him into the den of lions, ver, 11—17. VI. His miraculous preservation in the lions' den, and deliverance out of it, ver. 18—23. VII. The casting of his accusers into the den, and their destruction there, ver. 24. VIII. The decree which Darius made upon this occasion in honour of the God of Daniel, and the prosperity of Daniel afterwards, ver. 25—28. And this God is our God for ever and ever.

IT pleased Darius to set over the kingdom an hundred and twenty princes, which should be over the whole kingdom; 2 And over these three presidents; of whom Daniel was first: that the princes might give accounts unto them, and the king should have no damage. 3 Then this Daniel was preferred above the presidents and princes, because an excellent spirit was in him; and the king thought to set him over the whole realm. 4 Then the presidents and princes sought to find occasion against Daniel concerning the kingdom; but they could find none occasion nor fault; forasmuch as he was faithful, neither was there any error or fault found in him. 5 Then said these men, We shall not find any occasion against this Daniel, except we find it against him concerning the law of his God.

We are here told, concerning Daniel,

First. What a great man he was. When Darius, upon his accession to the crown of Babylon by conquest, new-modelled the government, he made Daniel prime minister of state,—set him at the helm, and made him first commissioner both of the treasury and of the great seal. Darius's dominion was very large All he got by his conquests and acquests was, that he had so many more was not subordinate to Cyrus. Dr. Pusey thinks the verse means that Cyrus placed Darius the Mede, as a vice-king, over the newly-conquered Babylon. As the question requires more space than can be given to it here, the reader may consult what is said in "Cassell's Bible Dictionary," article "Darius," where several theories are discussed.

vi. 1—3. The so-called "princes" bear in the original a title which is of Persian derivation, and probably the very word from which the modern term "satrap" comes. They were procurators or prefects. The presidents are also called in the original by a name which Max Müller and others say may not be either Hebrew or Aramaic. Such details are important, because they show that when Daniel comes to the setting-up of the Medo-Persian Empire, he uses titles and terms befitting the language of the conquerors.

vi. 7. It may seem strange that men should venture to indirectly ascribe divine honour to the king, by suggesting that nobody for countries to take care of. No more can be expected from himself than what one man can do, and therefore others must be employed under him. He "set over the kingdom an hundred and twenty princes," ver. 1, and appointed them their districts in which they were to administer justice, preserve the public peace, and levy the king's revenue. Note, Inferior magistrates are ministers of God to us for good, as well as the sovereign, and therefore we must submit ourselves both to the king as supreme and to the governors that are constituted and commissioned by him, 1 Pet. ii. 13, 14. Over these princes there was a triumvirate, or three presidents, who were to take and state the public accounts, to receive appeals from the princes, or complaints against them in case of maladministration, that "the king should have no damage," ver. 2, that he should not sustain loss in his revenue, and that the power he delegated to the princes might not be abused to the oppression of the subject; for by that the king, whether he think so or no, receives real damage, both as it alienates the affections of his people from him and provokes the displeasure of his God against him. Of these three Daniel was the chief, because he was found to go beyond them all, in all manner of princely qualifications. He was "preferred above the presidents and princes," ver. 3; and so wonderfully well pleased the king with his management that he "thought to set him over the whole realm," and let him place and displace at his pleasure. Now,

1. We must take notice of it to the praise of Darius, that he would prefer a man thus, purely for his personal merit, and his fitness for business; and those sovereigns that would be well served must go by that rule. Daniel had been a great man in the kingdom that was conquered, and for that reason, one would think, would have been looked upon as an enemy, and, as such, imprisoned or banished. He was a native of a foreign kingdom, and a ruined one, and upon that account might have been despised as a stranger and captive. But Darius it seems was very quicksighted in judging of men's capacities, and was soon aware that this Daniel had something extraordinary in him, and therefore, though no doubt he had creatures of his own not a few, that expected preferment in this new conquered kingdom, and were gaping for it, and those that had been long his confidants would depend upon it that they should be now his presidents, yet so well did he consult the public welfare that, finding Daniel to excel them all in prudence and virtue, and probably having heard of his being Divinely inspired, he made him his right hand.

2. We must take notice of it, to the glory of God, that, though Daniel was now very old, (it is above seventy years since he was brought a captive to Babylon,) yet he was as able as ever for business, both in body and mind; and that he who had continued faithful to his religion, notwithstanding all the temptations of the foregoing reigns, in a new government was as much respected as ever. He kept in by being an oak, not by being a willow; by a constancy in virtue, not by a pliableness to vice. Such honesty is the best policy, for it secures a reputation; and those who thus honour God he will honour them.

Secondly. What a good man he was. "An excellent spirit was in him," ver. 3. And he was faithful to every trust, dealt fairly between the sovereign and the subject, and took care that neither should be wronged, so that there was no error or fault to be found in him, ver. 4. He was not only not chargeable with any treachery or dishonesty, but not with any mistake or indiscretion. He never made any blunder, nor had any occasion to plead inadvertency or forgetfulness for his excuse. This is recorded for an example to all that are in places of public trust, to approve themselves both careful and conscientious, that they may be free not only from fault but error; not only from crime, but from mistake.

Thirdly. What ill-will was borne him, both for his greatness and for his goodness. The presidents and princes envied him because he was advanced above them, and probably hated him because he had a watchful eye upon them, and took care they should not wrong the government to enrich themselves. See here, 1. The cause of envy, and that is every thing that is good. Solomon complains of it as a vexation, that "for every right work a man is envied of his neighbour," Eccl. iv. 4, that the better a man is the worse he is thought of by his rivals; Daniel is envied because he has a more excellent spirit than his neighbours. 2. The effect of envy, and that is every thing that is bad. Those that envied Daniel sought no less than his ruin; his disgrace would not serve them, it was his death they desired. "Wrath is cruel, and anger is outrageous; but who can stand before envy?" Pr. xxvii. 4. Daniel's enemies set spies upon him to observe him in the management of his place; they "sought to find occasion" against him, something on which to ground an accusation "concerning the kingdom," some instance of neglect or partiality, some hasty word spoken, some person borne hard upon, or some necessary business overlooked; and if they could but have found the mote, the mole-hill of a mistake, it would have been soon improved to the beam, to the mountain of an unpardonable misdemeanour. But they could find no occasion against him; they owned they could not. Daniel always acted honestly, and now the more warily, and stood the more upon his guard, because of his observers, Ps. xxvii. 11. Note, We have all need to walk circumspectly, because we have many eyes upon us, and some that watch for our halting. Those especially have need to carry their cup even that have it full. They concluded at length they should not find any occasion against him, except "concerning the law of his God," ver. 5. It seems, then, Daniel kept up the profession of his religion and held it fast, without wavering or shrinking, and yet that was no bar to his preferment; there was no law requiring him to be of the king's religion, or incapacitating him to bear office in the state unless he would. It was all one to the king what God he prayed to, so long as he did the business of his place faithfully and well; he was at the king's service usque ad aras,—'as far as the altars,' but there he left him. In this matter, therefore, his enemies hoped to ensnare him. Quærendum est crimen læsæ religionis ubi majestatis deficit,—'When treason could not be charged upon him he was charged with impiety.'—Grot. Note, It is an excellent thing, and much for the glory of God, when those who profess religion carry themselves so inoffensively in their whole conversation that their most watchful, spiteful enemies may find no occasion of blaming them, save only in the matters of their God, in which they walk according to their consciences. It is observable, that when Daniel's enemies could find no occasion against him concerning the kingdom, they had so much sense of justice left that they did not suborn witnesses against him to accuse him of crimes he was innocent of, and to swear treason upon him, wherein they shame many that were called Jews and are called Christians.

6 Then these presidents and princes assembled together to the king, and said thus unto him, King Darius, live for ever. 7 All the presidents of the kingdom, the governors, and the princes, the counsellors, and the captains, have consulted together to establish a royal statute, and to make a firm decree, that whosoever shall ask a petition of any God or man for thirty days, save of thee, O king, he shall be cast into the den of lions. 8 Now, O king, establish the decree, and sign the writing, that it be not changed, according to the law of the Medes and Persians, which altereth not. 9 Wherefore king Darius signed the writing and the decree. 10 Now when Daniel knew that the writing was signed, he went into his house; and his windows being open in his chamber toward Jerusalem, he kneeled upon his knees three times a day, and prayed, and gave thanks before his God, as he did aforetime.

PRINCES OF PERSIA.—FROM PERSEPOLIS.

Daniel's adversaries could have no advantage against him by any law now in being, they therefore contrive a new law, by which they hope to ensnare him, and in such a matter as they knew they should be sure of him; and such was his fidelity to his God that they gained their point. Here is,

First. Darius's impious law. I call it Darius's, because he gave the royal assent to it, and otherwise it had not been of force; but it was not properly his,—he contrived it not, and was perfectly wheedled to consent to it. The presidents and princes framed the edict, brought in the bill, and by their management it was agreed to by the convention of the states, who, perhaps, were met at this time upon some public occasion. It is pretended that this bill, which they would have to pass into a law, was the result of mature deliberation, that "all the presidents of the kingdom, the governors, princes, counsellors, and captains had consulted together" about it, and that they not only agreed to it, but advised it, for divers good causes and considerations, that they had done what they could to establish it for a firm decree; nay, they intimate to the king that it was carried nemine contradicente,—'unanimously.' "All the presidents" are of this mind, and yet we are sure that Daniel, the chief of the three presidents, did not agree to it, and have reason to think that many more of the princes excepted against it, as absurd and unreasonable. Note, It is no new thing for that to be represented, and with great assurance too, as the sense of the nation, which is far from being so; and that which few approve of is sometimes confidently said to be that which all agree to. But, O the infelicity of kings, who, being under the necessity of seeing and hearing with other people's eyes and ears, are many times wretchedly imposed upon! These designing men, under colour of doing honour to the king, but really intending the ruin of his favourite, press him to pass this into a law, and make it a royal statute, "that whosoever shall ask a petition of any god or man for thirty days," save of the king, should be put to death after the most barbarous manner, should "be cast into the den of lions," ver. 7. This is the bill they have been hatching, and they lay it before the king to be signed and passed into a law. Now,

1. There is nothing in it that has the least appearance of good, but that it magnifies the king, and makes him seem both very great and very kind to his subjects, which they suggest will be of good service to him now he is newly come to his throne, and will confirm his interests. All men must be made to believe that the king is so rich, and withal so ready to all petitioners, that none in any want or distress need to apply themselves either to God or man for relief, but to him only. And for thirty days together he will be ready to give audience to all that have any petition to present to him. It is indeed much for the honour of kings to be benefactors to their subjects, and to have their ears open to their complaints and requests; but if they pretend to be their sole benefactors, and undertake to be to them instead of God, and challenge that respect from them which is due to God only, it is their disgrace, and not their honour. But, thirty days to come should ask anything of "God or man" except himself. The implied deification is incomplete, however, because it is to continue only for a certain number of days. Yet this is precisely one of the features which indicate the peculiar harmony of the book with the course of events. Mr. J. M. Fuller, in his work on the authenticity of Daniel, says, "It is generally allowed that by the time of Darius Hystaspes (521—485 B.C.), several years later than the events of this chapter, the apotheosis of the reigning monarch was a recognised act. His deification was the highest stage in that scale of exaggerated veneration illustrated to the modern European by the sculptures of Persepolis." After citing various testimonies explanatory and confirmatory of his statements, the author last named says, "The account of Daniel in this chapter is exactly that which might be expected from an eye-witness and participator in the scenes he describes. Had the writer lived after the days of Darius Hystaspes, such limited deification would have been unknown to him."

2. There is a great deal in it that is apparently evil. It is bad enough to forbid asking a petition of any man,—must not a beggar ask an alms? or one neighbour beg a kindness of another? if the child want bread, must not he ask it of his parents, or be cast into the den of lions if he do? nay, they that have business with the king, may they not petition those about him to introduce them? but it was much worse, and an impudent affront to all religion, to forbid asking a petition of any god. It is by prayer that we give glory to God, fetch in mercy from God, and so keep our communion with God; and to interdict prayer for thirty days is for so long to rob God of all the tribute he has from man, and to rob man of all the comfort he has in God. When the light of nature teacheth us that the providence of God has the ordering and disposing of all our affairs, doth not the law of nature oblige us, by prayer, to acknowledge God and seek to him? Doth not every man's heart direct him, when he is in want or distress, to call upon God? and must this be made high treason? We could not live a day without God; and can man live thirty days without prayer? Will the king himself be tied up for so long from praying to God? or, if it be allowed him, will he undertake to do it for all his subjects? Did ever any nation thus slight their gods? But see what absurdities malice will drive men to. Rather than not bring Daniel into trouble for praying to his God, they will deny themselves and all their friends the satisfaction of praying to theirs. Had they proposed only to prohibit the Jews from praying to their God, Daniel would have been as effectually ensnared; but they knew the king would not pass such a law, and therefore made it thus general. And the king, puffed up with a fancy that this would set him up as a little god, was fond of the feather in his cap, (for so it was, and not a flower in his crown,) and "signed the writing and the decree," ver. 9, which, being once done, according to the constitution of the united kingdom of the Medes and Persians, it was not upon any pretence whatsoever to be altered or dispensed with, or the breach of it pardoned.

Secondly. Daniel's pious disobedience to this law, ver. 10. He did not retire into the country, or abscond for some time, though he knew the law was levelled against him; but, because he knew it was so, therefore he stood his ground, knowing that he had now a fair opportunity of honouring God before men, and shewing that he preferred his favour, and his duty to him, before life itself. "When Daniel knew that the writing was signed," he might have gone to the king and expostulated with him about it; nay, he might have remonstrated against it, as grounded upon a misinformation that all the presidents had consented to it, whereas he that was chief of them had never been consulted about it; but he went to his house and applied himself to his duty, cheerfully trusting God with the event. Now observe,

1. Daniel's constant practice, which we had not been told but upon this occasion; but we have reason to think it was the general practice of the pious Jews. 1st. He prayed in his house sometimes himself alone, and sometimes with his family about him, and made a solemn business of it. Cornelius was a man that "prayed in his house," Acts x. 30. Note, Every house not only may be, but ought to be, a house of prayer; where we have a tent, God must have an altar, and on it we must offer spiritual sacrifices. 2nd. In every prayer he gave thanks. When we pray to God for the mercies we want we must praise him for those we have received. Thanksgiving must be a part of every prayer. 3rd. In his prayer and thanksgiving he had an eye to God as his God, his in covenant, and set himself as in his presence. He did this before his God, and with a regard to him. 4th. When he prayed and gave thanks he "kneeled upon his knees," which is the most proper gesture in prayer, and most expressive of humility, and reverence, and submission to God. Kneeling is a begging posture, and we come to God as beggars, beggars for our lives, whom it concerns to be importunate. 5th. He "opened the windows of his chamber," that the sight of the visible heavens might affect his heart with an awe of that God who dwells above the heavens. But that was not all; he opened them towards Jerusalem, the holy city, though now in ruins, to signify the affection he had for its very stones and dust, Ps. cii. 14, and the remembrance he had of its concerns daily in his prayers. Thus, though he himself lived great in Babylon, yet he testified his concurrence with the meanest of his brethren the captives, in remembering Jerusalem and preferring it before his chief joy, Ps. cxxxvii. 5, 6. Jerusalem was the place which God had chosen to put his name there; and, when the temple was dedicated, Solomon's prayer to God was, that if the people should, in the land of their enemies, pray unto him with their eye towards the land which he gave them and the city he had chosen, and the house that was built to his name, that then he would hear and maintain their cause, 1 Kin. viii. 48, 49, to which prayer Daniel had reference in this circumstance of his devotions. 6th. He did this three times a day, three times every day, according to the example of David; Ps. lv. 17, "Morning, evening, and at noon I will pray." It is good to have our hours of prayer, not to bind but to mind conscience; and if we think our bodies require refreshment by food thrice a day, can we think seldomer will serve our souls? This is, sure, as little as may be to answer the command of praying always. 7th. He did this so openly and avowedly that all that knew him knew it to be his practice; and he thus shewed it, not because he was proud of it,—in the place where he was there was no room for that temptation, for it was not reputation but reproach that attended it,—but because he was not ashamed of it. Though Daniel was a great man, he did not think it below him to be thrice a day upon his knees before his Maker, and to be his own chaplain; though he was an old man, he did not think himself past it, nor, though it had been his practice from his youth up, was he weary of this well-doing. Though he was a man of business, vast business, for the service of the public, he did not think that would excuse him from the daily exercises of devotion. How inexcusable, then, are they who have but little to do in the world, and yet will not do thus much for God and their souls! Daniel was a man famous for prayer and for success in it, Eze. xiv. 14, and he came to be so by thus making a conscience of prayer, and making a business of it daily; and in thus doing God blessed him wonderfully.

2. Daniel's constant adherence to this practice, even when it was made by the law a capital crime. When he "knew that the writing was signed" he continued to do as he did aforetime, and altered not one circumstance of the performance. Many a man, yea, and many a good man, would have thought it prudence to omit it for these thirty days, when he could not do it without hazard of his life. He might have prayed so much the oftener when those days were expired, and the danger was over; or he might have performed the duty at another time and in another place, so secretly that it would not be possible for his enemies to discover it, and so he might both satisfy his conscience and keep up his communion with God, and yet avoid the law, and continue in his usefulness. But if he had done so it would have been thought, both by his friends and by his enemies, that he had thrown up the duty for this time through cowardice and base fear, which would have tended very much to the dishonour of God, and the discouragement of his friends. Others that moved in a lower sphere might well enough act with caution; but Daniel, that has so many eyes upon him, must act with courage, and the rather because he knows the law, when it was made, was particularly levelled against him. Note, We must not omit duty for fear of suffering, no, nor so much as seem to come short of it. In trying times great stress is laid upon our confessing Christ before men, Mat. x. 32; and we must take heed, lest, under pretence of discretion, we be found guilty of cowardice in the cause of God. If we do not think this example of Daniel obligeth us to do likewise, yet I am sure it forbids us to censure those that do, for God owned him in it. By his constancy to his duty now it appears he had never been used to admit any excuse for the omission of it; for if ever any excuse would have served to put it by, this would have served now, 1st. That it was forbidden by the king, his master, and in honour of the king too. But it is an undoubted maxim, in answer to that,—we are to obey God rather than men. 2nd. That it would be the loss of his life; but it is an undoubted maxim, in answer to that, that they who throw away their souls (as those certainly do that live without prayer) to save their lives, make but an ill bargain for themselves; and, though herein they make themselves, like the king of Tyre, wiser than Daniel, at their end they will be fools.

11 Then these men assembled, and found Daniel praying and making supplication before his God. 12 Then they came near, and spake before the king concerning the king's decree; Hast thou not signed a decree, that every man that shall ask a petition of any God or man within thirty days, save of thee, O king, shall be cast into the den of lions? The king answered and said, The thing is true, according to the law of the Medes and Persians, which altereth not. 13 Then answered they and said before the king, That Daniel, which is of the children of the captivity of Judah, regardeth not thee, O king, nor the decree that thou hast signed, but maketh his petition three times a day. 14 Then the king, when he heard these words, was sore displeased with himself, and set his heart on Daniel to deliver him: and he laboured till the going down of the sun to deliver him. 15 Then these men assembled unto the king, and said unto the king, Know, O king, that the law of the Medes and Persians is, That no decree nor statute which the king establisheth may be changed. 16 Then the king commanded, and they brought Daniel, and cast him into the den of lions. Now the king spake and said unto Daniel, Thy God whom thou servest continually, he will deliver thee. 17 And a stone was brought, and laid upon the mouth of the den; and the king sealed it with his own signet, and with the signet of his lords; that the purpose might not be changed concerning Daniel.

Here is, First. Proof made of Daniel's praying to his God, notwithstanding the late ediet to the contrary; ver. 11, "These men assembled," they came 'tumultuously together,' so the word is, the same that was used ver. 6, borrowed from Ps. ii. 1, "Why do the heathen rage?" They came together to visit Daniel, perhaps under pretence of business, at that time which they knew to be his usual hour of devotion; and if they had not found him so engaged they would have upbraided him with his faint-heartedness and distrust of his God; but, which they rather wished to do, they found him on his knees, "praying and making supplication before his God." "For his love they are his adversaries," but, like his father David, he "gives himself unto prayer," Ps. cix. 4.

Secondly. Complaint made of it to the king. When they had found occasion against Daniel concerning the law of his God, they lost no time, but applied themselves to the king, ver. 12; and having appealed to him whether there was not such a law made, and gained from him a recognition of it, and that it was so ratified as that it might not be altered, they proceeded to accuse Daniel, ver. 13. They describe him so, in the information they give, as to exasperate

With reference to "the den of lions," as it is commonly styled, the natural explanation is that it was a place where lions were kept alive, as in this country lions were kept at the Tower of London. Barnes quotes the German critic Bertholdt as saying, "The enclosures of wild beasts, especially of lions, which the kings of Asia and of North-Western Africa formerly had, as they have at the present day, were generally constructed underground, but were ordinarily caves which had been excavated for the purpose, walled up at the sides, enclosed within a wall through which a door led from the outer wall to the space lying between the walls, within which persons could pass round and contemplate the wild beasts." That lions were kept and preserved alive for grand hunting occasions is demonstrated by the sculptures, where a man is represented in the act of letting out of a cage a lion, one of a number, for the sport of the king in the field.

vi. 8. The permanence of royal decrees or decisions in Persia is confirmed by other evidence. It is stated by Diodorus Siculus that the king, and incense him the more against him; He is "of the children of the captivity of Judah." He is of Judah, that despicable people, and now a captive in a despicable state, that can call nothing his own but what he has by the king's favour, and yet he "regardeth not thee, O king, nor the decree that thou hast signed." Note, It is no new thing for that which is done faithfully in conscience towards God to be misrepresented as done obstinately, and in contempt of the civil powers; that is, for the best saints to be reproached as the worst men. Daniel regarded God, and therefore prayed, and we have reason to think prayed for the king and his government, yet this is construed as not regarding the king. That excellent spirit which Daniel was endued with, and that established reputation which he had gained, could not protect him from these poisonous darts. They do not say he makes his petition to his God, lest Darius should take notice of that to his praise, but only he makes his petition, which is a thing the law forbids.

Thirdly. The great concern the king was in hereupon. He now perceived that, whatever they pretended, it was not to honour him, but in spite to Daniel, that they had proposed that law, and now is "sore displeased with himself" for gratifying them in it, ver. 14. Note, When men indulge a proud, vain-glorious humour, and please themselves with that which feeds it, they know not what vexations they are preparing for themselves. Their flatterers may prove their tormentors, and are but spreading a net for their feet. Now the king sets his heart to deliver Daniel; both by argument and by authority he labours "till the going down of the sun to deliver him;" that is, to persuade his accusers not to insist upon his prosecution. Note, We often do that through inconsideration which afterwards we see cause a thousand times to wish undone again, which is a good reason why we should ponder the path of our feet, for then all our ways will be established.

Fourthly. The violence with which the prosecutors demanded judgment, ver. 15. We are not told what Daniel said. The king himself is his advocate, he needs not plead his own cause, but silently commits himself and it to Him that judges righteously; but the prosecutors insist upon it that the law must have its course. It is a fundamental maxim in the constitution of the government of the Medes and Persians, which is now become the universal monarchy, that "no decree or statute which the king establisheth may be changed." The same we find, Est. i. 19; viii. 8. The Chaldeans magnified the will of their king by giving him a power to make and unmake laws at his pleasure, to slay and keep alive whom he would. The Persians magnified the wisdom of their king by supposing that, whatever law he solemnly ratified, it was so well made that there could be no occasion to alter it, or dispense with it,—as if any human foresight could, in forming a law, guard against all inconveniences. But if this maxim be duly applied to Daniel's case, (as I am apt to think it is not, but perverted,) while it honours the king's legislative power it hampers his executive power, and incapacitates him to shew that mercy which upholds the throne, and to pass acts of indemnity, which are the glories of a reign. Those who allow not the sovereign's power to dispense with a disabling statute yet never question his power to pardon an offence against a penal statute: but Darius is denied this power. See what need we have to pray for princes that God would give them wisdom, for they are often embarrassed with great difficulties, even the wisest and best are.

Fifthly. The executing of the law upon Daniel. The king himself, with the utmost reluctancy, and against his conscience, signs the warrant for his execution, and Daniel, that venerable grave man, that carried such a mixture of majesty and sweetness in his countenance, that had so often looked great upon the bench, and at the council board, and greater upon his knees, that had power with God and man, and had prevailed, purely for worshipping his God is brought, as if he had been one of the vilest of malefactors, and thrown into the den of lions, to be devoured by them, ver. 16. One cannot think of it without the utmost compasssion of the gracious sufferer, and the utmost indignation at the malicious prosecutors. To make sure work, the stone laid upon the mouth of the den is sealed, and the king (an over-easy man) is persuaded to do it with his own signet, ver. 17, that unhappy signet with which he had confirmed the law that Daniel falls by. But his lords cannot trust him, unless they add their signet too. Thus, when Christ was buried, his adversaries sealed the stone that was rolled to the door of his sepulchre.

Sixthly. The encouragement which Darius gave to Daniel to trust in God. "Thy God, whom thou servest continually, he will deliver thee," ver. 16. 1. He justifies Daniel from guilt, owning all his crime to be serving his God continually, and continuing to do so even when it was made a crime. 2. He leaves it to God to free him from punishment, since he could not prevail to do it. He will deliver thee. He is sure his God can deliver him, for he believes him to be an Almighty God; and he has reason to think he will do it, having heard of his delivering Daniel's companions, in a like case, from the fiery furnace, and concluding him to be always faithful to those who approve themselves faithful to him. Note, Those who serve God continually he will continually preserve, and will bear them out in his service.

18 Then the king went to his palace, and passed the night fasting: neither were instruments of musick brought before him: and his sleep went from him. 19 Then the king arose very early in the morning, and went in haste unto the den of lions. 20 And when he came to the den, he cried with a lamentable voice unto Daniel: and the king spake and said to Daniel, O Daniel, servant of the living God, is thy God, whom thou servest continually, able to deliver thee from the lions? 21 Then said Daniel unto the king, O king, live for ever. 22 My God hath sent his angel, and hath shut the lions' mouths, that they have not hurt me: forasmuch as before him innocency was found in me; and also before thee, O king, have I done no hurt. 23 Then was the king exceeding glad for him, and commanded that they should take Daniel up out of the den. So Daniel was taken up out of the den, and no manner of hurt was found upon him, because he believed in his God. 24 And the king commanded, and they brought those men which had accused Daniel, and they cast them into the den of lions, them, their children, and their wives; and the lions had the mastery of them, and brake all their bones in pieces or ever they came at the bottom of the den.

Here is, First. The melancholy night which the king had upon Daniel's account, ver. 18. He had said, indeed, that God would deliver him out of the danger, but at the same time he could not forgive himself for throwing him into the danger, and justly might God deprive him of a friend whom he had himself used so barbarously. He went to his palace vexed at himself for what he had done, and calling himself unwise and unjust for not adhering to the law of God and nature, with a non obstante,—'a negative,' to the law of the Medes and Persians. He ate no supper, but passed the night fasting; his heart was already full of grief and fear; he forbade the music—nothing more unpleasing than songs sung to a heavy heart—he went to bed, but got no sleep; was full of tossings to and fro till the dawning of the day. Note, The best way to have a good night is to keep a good conscience; then we may lay us down in peace.

Secondly. The solicitous inquiry he made concerning Daniel the next morning, ver. 19, 20. He was up early, very early; for how could he lie in bed when he could not sleep for dreaming of Daniel, nor lie awake quietly for thinking of him? And he was no sooner up but he went in haste to the den of lions,—for he could not satisfy himself to send a servant, that would not sufficiently testify his affection to Daniel, nor had he patience to stay so long as till a servant would return. When he comes to the den, not without some hopes that God had graciously undone what he had wickedly done, he cries with a lamentable voice, as one full of concern and trouble, O Daniel, art thou alive? He longs to know, yet trembles to ask the question, fearing to be answered with the roaring of the lions after more prey; "O Daniel, servant of the living God," has "thy God whom thou servest" made it to appear that he is "able to deliver thee from the lions?" If he rightly understood himself when he called him the living God, he could not doubt of his ability to keep Daniel alive, for he that has life in himself quickens whom he will; but has he thought fit, in this case, to exert his power? What he doubted of, we are sure of, that the servants of the living God have a master who is well able to protect them and bear them out in his service.

Thirdly. The joyful news he meets with, that Daniel is alive, is safe and well, and unhurt in the lions' den, ver. 21, 22. Daniel knew the king's voice, though it was now a lamentable voice, and spoke to him with all the deference and respect that was due to him, "O king, live for ever." He doth not reproach him for his unkindness to him, and his easiness in yielding to the malice of his prosecutors; but, to shew that he has heartily forgiven him, he meets him with his good wishes. Note, We should not upbraid those with the unkindnesses they have done us, who we know did them with reluctancy, and are very ready to upbraid themselves with them. The account Daniel gives the king is very pleasant—it is triumphant.

1. God has preserved his life by a miracle. Darius had called him Daniel's God, thy God whom thou servest; to which Daniel doth, as it were, echo back, Yea, he is my God, whom I own, and who owns me, for he hath sent his angel. The same bright and glorious being that was seen in the form of the Son of God with the three children in the fiery furnace, had visited Daniel, and, it is likely, in a visible appearance, had enlightened the dark den, and kept Daniel company all night, and had shut the lions' mouths, that they had not in the least hurt him. The angel's presence made even the lions' den his stronghold, his palace, his paradise; he never had had a better night in his life. See the power of God over the fiercest creatures, and believe his power to restrain the roaring lion that goes about continually seeking to devour from hurting those that are his. See the care God takes of his faithful worshippers, especially when he calls them out to suffer for him. If he keep their souls from sin, comfort their souls with peace, and receive their souls to himself, he doth in effect stop the lions' mouths, that they cannot hurt them. See how ready the angels are to minister for the good of God's people, for they own themselves their fellow-servants.

2. God has therein pleaded his cause. He was represented to the king as disaffected to him and his government. We do not find he said any thing in his own vindication, but left it to God to clear up his integrity as the light, and he did it effectually, by working a miracle for his preservation. Daniel, in what he had done, had not offended either God or the king. "Before him" whom I prayed to "innocency was found in me." He pretends not to a meritorious excellency, but the testimony of his conscience concerning his sincerity is his comfort, as also that "Before thee, O king, I have done no hurt," nor designed thee any affront.

Fourthly. The discharge of Daniel from his confinement. His prosecutors cannot but own that the law is satisfied, though they are not; or, if it be altered, it is by a power superior to that of the Medes and Persians, and therefore no cause can be shewn why Daniel should not be fetched out of the den; ver. 23, "The king was exceeding glad" to find him alive, and gave orders immediately that they should take him out of the den, as Jeremiah out of the dungeon; and when they searched "no manner of hurt was found upon him;" he was nowhere crushed or scarred, but was kept perfectly well, "because he believed in his God." Note, Those who boldly and cheerfully trust in God to protect them in the way of their duty shall never be made ashamed of their confidence in him, but shall always find him a present help.

Fifthly. The committing of his prosecutors to the same prison, or place of execution rather, ver. 24. Darius is animated by this miracle wrought for Daniel, and now begins to take courage and act like himself. Those that would not suffer him to shew mercy to Daniel, now God has done it for him, shall be made to feel his resentment, and he will do justice for God, who hath shewn mercy for him. Daniel's accusers, now his innocency is cleared, and Heaven itself is become his compurgator, have the same punishment inflicted upon them which they designed against him, according to the law of retaliation, made against false accusers, Deu. xix. 18, 19; such they were to be reckoned, now Daniel was proved innocent, for, though the fact was true, yet it was not a fault. They were cast into the den of lions, which perhaps was a punishment newly invented by themselves; however, it was what they maliciously designed for Daniel. Nec lex est justior ulla quam necis artifices arte perire sua.—'No law can be more just than that which adjudges the devisers of barbarity to perish by it.' Ps. vii. 15, 16; ix. 15, 16. And now Solomon's observation is verified, Pr. xi. 8 "The righteous is delivered out of trouble, and the wicked cometh in the Darius who was the last king of the ancient Persian Empire would have recalled the sentence of death which had been pronounced on Charidemus, but could not reverse what the law had endorsed. Sir John Malcolm also says of a modern Persian monarch, that having said he would not move from his camp till the snow was off a neighbouring mountain, he was compelled to stay there with his army much longer than he expected, because his word was law. It is by no means clear that Darius was expected to write his name on the decree, as the use of a seal in such cases has always obtained in the East, and to some extent in other parts of the world. The signature, however, was needful and sufficient for validity.

vi. 10. It is well known that at present the Mahometans, wherever they are, are expected to turn towards Mecca when they pray. Some such custom seems to have obtained among the exiled Jews in Babylon, perhaps in conformity with texts like 1 Kings viii. 44—49.

vi. 17. The mention of the stone upon the mouth of the lions' den his stead." In this execution we may observe, 1. The king's severity in ordering their wives and children to be thrown to the lions with them. How righteous are God's statutes above those of the nations, for God commanded that the children should not die for the fathers' crimes, Deu. xxiv. 16. Yet it was done in extraordinary cases, as that of Achan, and Saul, and Haman. 2. The lions' fierceness. They had the mastery of them immediately, and tore them to pieces before they "came to the bottom of the den." This verified and magnified the miracle of their sparing Daniel; for hereby it appeared that it was not because they had not appetite, but because they had not leave. Mastiffs that are kept muzzled are the more fierce when the muzzle is taken off; so were these lions. And the Lord is known by those judgments which he executeth.

25 Then king Darius wrote unto all people, nations, and languages, that dwell in all the earth; Peace be multiplied unto you. 26 I make a decree, That in every dominion of my kingdom men tremble and fear before the God of Daniel: for he is the living God, and stedfast for ever, and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed, and his dominion shall be even unto the end. 27 He delivereth and rescueth, and he worketh signs and wonders in heaven and in earth, who hath delivered Daniel from the power of the lions. 28 So this Daniel prospered in the reign of Darius, and in the reign of Cyrus the Persian.

Darius here studies to make some amends for the dishonour he had done both to God and Daniel, in casting Daniel into the lions' den, by doing honour to both.

First. He gives honour to God by a decree published to all nations, by which they are required to fear before him. And this is a decree which is indeed fit to be made unalterable, according to the law of the Medes and Persians, for it is the everlasting Gospel preached to them that dwell on the earth; Rev. xiv. 7, "Fear God, and give glory to him." Observe,

1. To whom he sends this decree. "To all people, nations, and languages that dwell in all the earth," ver. 25. These are big words, and it is true that all the inhabitants of the earth are obliged to that which is here decreed; but here they mean no more but "every dominion of his kingdom," which, though it contained many nations, yet not all nations. But so it is, those that have much are ready to think they have all.

2. What the matter of the decree is. That "men tremble and fear before the God of Daniel." This goes farther than Nebuchadnezzar's decree upon the like occasion, for that only restrained people from speaking amiss of this God, but this requires them to fear before him, to keep up and express awful, reverend thoughts of him. And well might this decree be prefaced as it is, with "Peace be multiplied unto you," for the only foundation of true and abundant peace is laid in the fear of God, for that is true wisdom. If we live in the fear of God, and walk according to that rule, peace shall be upon us, peace shall be multiplied to us. But though this decree goes far it doth not go far enough. Had he gone right, and come up to his present convictions, he should have commanded all men not only to tremble and fear before this God, but to love him and trust in him, to forsake the service of their idols, and to worship him only, and call upon him, as Daniel did. But idolatry had been so long and so deeply rooted, that it was not to be extirpated by the edicts of princes, nor by any power less than that which went along with the glorious Gospel of Christ.

3. What are the causes and considerations moving him to make this decree. They are sufficient to have justified a decree for the total suppression of idolatry, much more will they serve to support this. There is good reason why all men should fear before this God; for, 1st. His being is transcendent. He is the "living God," lives as a God; whereas the gods we worship are dead things, have not so much as an animal life. 2nd. His government is incontestable. He has a kingdom and a dominion; he not only lives, but reigns, as an absolute sovereign. 3rd. Both his being and his government are unchangeable. He is himself "stedfast for ever," and "with him is no shadow of turning." And his kingdom, too, is "that which shall not be destroyed" by any external force, nor has his dominion any thing in itself that threatens a decay, or tends towards it, and therefore "it shall be even to the end." 4th. He has an ability sufficient to support such an authority, ver. 27. He delivereth his faithful servants from trouble, and rescueth them out of trouble; he worketh signs and wonders, quite above the utmost power of nature to effect, both in heaven and in earth, by which it appears that he is sovereign Lord of both. 5th. He has given a fresh proof of all this in delivering his servant "Daniel from the power of the lions." This miracle, and that of the delivering of the three children, were wrought in the eyes of the world, were seen, published, and attested by two of the greatest monarchs that ever were, and were illustrious confirmations of the first principles of religion, abstracted from the narrow scheme of Judaism, effectual confutations of all the errors of heathenism, and very proper preparations for pure catholic Christianity.

Secondly. He puts honour upon Daniel; ver. 28, "So this Daniel prospered." See how God brought to him good out of evil. This bold stroke which his enemies made at his life was a happy occasion of taking them off, and their children too, who otherwise would still have stood in the way of his preferment, and have been upon all occasions vexatious to him; and now he prospered more than ever, was more in favour with his prince and reputation with the people, which gave him a great opportunity of doing good to his brethren. Thus "out of the eater" (and that was a lion too) "came forth meat, and out of the strong sweetness."

CHAPTER VII.

The six former chapters of this book were historical; we now enter, with fear and trembling, upon the six latter, which are prophetical, wherein are many things dark and hard to be understood, which we dare not positively determine the sense of; and yet many things plain and profitable, which I trust God will enable us to make a good use of. In this chapter we have, I. Daniel's vision of the four beasts, ver. 1—8. II. His vision of God's throne of government and judgment, ver. 9—14. III. The interpretation of these visions given him by an angel that stood by, ver. 15—28. Whether those visions look as far forward as the end of time, or whether they were to have a speedy accomplishment, is hard to say, nor are the most judicious interpreters agreed concerning it.

IN the first year of Belshazzar king of Babylon Daniel had a dream and visions of his head upon his bed: then he wrote the dream, and told the sum of the matters. 2 Daniel spake and said, I saw in my vision by night, and, behold, the four winds of the heaven strove upon the great sea. 3 And four great beasts came up from the sea, diverse one from another. 4 The first was like a lion, and had eagle's wings: I beheld till the wings thereof were plucked, and it was lifted up from the earth, and made stand upon the feet as a man, and a man's heart was given to it. 5 And behold another beast, a second, like to a bear, and it raised up itself on one side, and it had three ribs in the mouth of it between the teeth of it: and they said thus unto it, Arise, devour much flesh. 6 After this I beheld, and lo another, like a leopard, which had upon the back of it four wings of a fowl; the beast had also four heads; and dominion was given to it. 7 After this I saw in the night visions, and behold a fourth beast, dreadful and terrible, and strong exceedingly; and it had great iron teeth: it devoured and brake in pieces, and stamped the residue with the feet of it: and it was diverse from all the beasts that were before it; and it had ten horns. 8 I considered the horns, and, behold, there came up among them another little horn, before whom there were three of the first horns plucked up by the roots: and, behold, in this horn were eyes like the eyes of man, and a mouth speaking great things.

The date of this chapter placeth it before ch. v., which was in the last year of Belshazzar, and ch. vi., which was in the first of Darius; for Daniel had those visions in the first year of Belshazzar, when the captivity of the Jews in Babylon was drawing near a period. Belshazzar's name here is in the original spelt differently from what it used to be: before it was Bel-she-azar, 'Bel is he that treasures up riches;' but this is Bel-eshe-zar, 'Bel is on fire by the enemy.' Bel was the god of the Chaldeans; he had prospered, but is now to be consumed.

We have in these verses Daniel's vision of the four monarchies that were oppressive to the Jews. Observe,

First. The circumstances of this vision. Daniel had interpreted Nebuchadnezzar's dream, and now he is himself honoured with like Divine discoveries, ver. 1. He had visions of his head upon his bed, when he was asleep; so God sometimes revealed himself and his mind to the children of men, when deep sleep fell upon them, Job xxxiii. 15; for when we are most retired from the world, and taken off from the things of sense, we are most fit for communion with God. But when he was awake he wrote the dream for his own use, lest he should forget it, as a dream which passeth away; and he told the sum of the matters to his brethren the Jews, for their use, and gave it them in writing, that it might be communicated to those at a distance, and preserved for their children after them, who should see these things accomplished. The Jews, misunderstanding some of the prophecies of Jeremiah and Ezekiel, flattered themselves with hopes that, after their return to their own land, they should enjoy a complete and uninterrupted tranquillity; but that they might not so deceive themselves, and their calamities be made doubly grievous by the disappointment, God, by this prophet, lets them know that they shall have tribulation. Those promises of their prosperity were to be accomplished in the spiritual blessings of the kingdom of grace; as Christ has told his disciples they must expect persecution, and the promises they depend upon will be accomplished in the eternal blessings of the kingdom of glory. Daniel both wrote these things and spake them, to intimate that the church should be taught both by the Scriptures and by ministers' preaching,—both by the written word and by word of mouth; and ministers in their preaching are to tell the sum of the matters that are written.

Secondly. The vision itself, which foretells the revolutions of government in those nations which the church of the Jews, for the following ages, was to be under the influence of.

1. He observed the four winds to strive upon the great sea, ver. 2. They strove which should blow strongest, and at length blow alone. This represents the contests among princes for empire, and the shakings of the nations by these contests, to which those mighty monarchies he was now to have a prospect of owed their rise. One wind from any point of the compass if it blow hard, will cause a great commotion in the sea; but what a tumult must needs be raised when the four winds strive for mastery! That is it which the kings of the nations are contending for in their wars, which are as noisy and violent as the battle of the winds. But how is the poor sea tossed and torn, how terrible are its concussions, how violent its convulsions, while the winds are at strife which seems to imply that it was upon the top. This does not compel us to believe that the only entrance was from the top. There may have been, and perhaps also was, a door in the side; and the hole at the top, closed by means of a slab, would be that through which food was thrown to the lions within, or for other purposes. The attaching of the seals was manifestly to prevent any attempt to rescue the victim.

vi. 23. The law had been honoured, and without any violation of it, Daniel was ordered to be set free.

vi. 24. Severe and even unjust as it may have been to punish the wives and children of the conspirators against Daniel, it seems to have been in accordance with Persian customs. We are not required to vindicate the act. Ammianus Marcellinus notes that among the Persians, when men were convicted of certain crimes, the whole of their kindred perished.

vi. 26. As Mr. Barnes observes, "There is no certain evidence that Darius meant that the Lord should be honoured as the only shall have the sole power of troubling it? Note, This world is like a stormy tempestuous sea; thanks to the proud ambitious winds that vex it.

2. He saw "four great beasts come up from the sea," from the troubled waters, in which aspiring minds love to fish. The monarchs and monarchies are represented by beasts, because too often it is by brutish rage and tyranny that they are raised and supported. These beasts were diverse one from another, ver. 3, of different shape, to note the different genius and complexion of the nations in whose hands they were lodged.

1st. The first beast was "like a lion," ver. 4. This was the Chaldean monarchy, that was fierce and strong, and made the kings absolute. This lion had eagle's wings, with which to fly upon the prey. It notes the wonderful speed that Nebuchadnezzar made in his conquest of kingdoms. But he soon sees the wings plucked, a full stop put to the career of their victorious arms. Divers countries, that had been tributaries to them, revolt from them, and make head against them, so that this monstrous animal, this winged lion, is made to stand upon the feet as a man, and a man's heart is given to it. It has lost the heart of a lion, which it had been famous for, (one of our English kings was called Cœur de Lion,) hath lost his courage, and is become feeble and faint, dreading every thing, and daring nothing; they are put in fear, and made to know themselves to be but men. Sometimes the valour of a nation strangely sinks and becomes cowardly and effeminate, so that what was the head of the nations in an age or two becomes the tail.

2nd. The second beast was "like a bear," ver. 5. This was the Persian monarchy, less strong and generous than the former, but no less ravenous. This bear "raised up itself on one side" against the lion, and soon mastered it. 'It raised up one dominion,' so some read it. Persia and Media, which in Nebuchadnezzar's image were the two arms in one beast, now set up a joint government. This bear had "three ribs in the mouth of it between the teeth," the remains of those nations it had devoured, which were the marks of its voraciousness, and yet an indication that, though it had devoured much, it could not devour all; there were some ribs still stuck in the teeth of it, which it could not conquer. Whereupon it was said to it, Arise, devour much flesh; let the bones, the ribs, alone that cannot be conquered, and set upon that which will be an easier prey. The princes will stir up both the kings and the people to push on their conquests, and let nothing stand before them. Note, Conquests unjustly made are but like those of the beasts of prey, and in this much worse, that the beasts prey not upon those of their own kind, as wicked and unreasonable men do.

3rd. The third beast was like a leopard, ver. 6. This was the Grecian monarchy founded by Alexander the Great; active, crafty, and cruel, "like a leopard." He had "four wings of a fowl;" the lion seems to have had but two wings, but the leopard has four; for, though Nebuchadnezzar made great dispatch in his conquests, Alexander made much greater. In six years' time he gained the whole empire of Persia, a great part beside of Asia, made himself master of Syria, Egypt, India, and other nations. This beast had four heads; upon Alexander's death his conquests were divided among his four chief captains—Seleucus Nicanor had Asia the Great; Perdiccas, and after him Antigonus, had Asia the Less; Cassander had Macedonia, and Ptolemeus had Egypt. Dominion was given to this beast; it was given of God, from whom alone promotion comes.

4th. The fourth beast was more fierce, and formidable, and mischievous than any of them, unlike any of the other, nor is there any among the beasts of prey to which it might be compared, ver. 7. The learned are not agreed concerning this anonymous beast. Some make it to be the Roman empire, which when it was in its glory comprehended ten kingdoms, Italy, France, Spain, Germany, Britain, Sarmatia, Pannonia, Asia, Greece, and Egypt; and then the little horn which rose by the fall of three of the other horns, ver. 8, they make to be the Turkish empire, which rose in the room of Asia, Greece, and Egypt. Others make this fourth beast to be the kingdom of Syria, the family of the Seleucidæ, which was very cruel and oppressive to the people of the Jews, as we find in Josephus and the history of the Maccabees. And herein that empire was diverse from those that went before, that none of the preceding powers compelled the Jews to renounce their religion, but the kings of Syria did, and used them barbarously. Their armies and commanders were the great iron teeth with which they devoured and brake in pieces the people of God; and they trampled upon the residue of them. The ten horns are then supposed to be ten kings that reigned successively in Syria; and then the little horn is Antiochus Epiphanes, the last of the ten, who by one means or other undermined three of the kings, and got the government. He was a man of great ingenuity, and therefore is said to have eyes like the eyes of a man; and was very bold and daring,—had a mouth speaking great things. We shall meet with him again in these prophecies.

9 I beheld till the thrones were cast down, and the Ancient of days did sit, whose garment was white as snow, and the hair of his head like the pure wool:
his throne was like the fiery flame, and his wheels as burning fire. 10 A fiery stream issued and came forth from before him: thousand thousands ministered unto him, and ten thousand times ten thousand stood before him: the judgment was set, and the books were opened. 11 I beheld then because of the voice of the great words which the horn spake:
I beheld even till the beast was slain, and his body destroyed, and given to the burning flame. 12 As concerning the rest of the beasts, they had their dominion taken away: yet their lives were prolonged for a season and time. 13 I saw in the night visions, and, behold, one like the Son of man came with the clouds of heaven, and came to the Ancient of days, and they brought him near before him. 14 And there was given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations, and languages, should serve him: his dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed.

Whether we understand the fourth beast to signify the Syrian empire or the Roman, or the former as a figure of the latter, it is plain these verses are intended for the comfort and support of the people of God, in reference to the persecutions they were likely to sustain, both from the one and from the other, and from all their proud enemies in every age; for it is written for their learning on whom the ends of the world are come, that they also, through patience and comfort of this Scripture, might have hope. Three things are here discovered that are very encouraging:

First. That there is a judgment to come, and God is the judge. Now men have their day, and every pretender thinks he should have his day, and struggles for it. But "he that sits in heaven laughs at them," for he sees that "his day is coming," Ps. xxxvii. 13; ver. 9, "I beheld till the thrones were cast down," not only the thrones of these beasts, but all rule, authority, and power that is set up in opposition to the kingdom of God among men, 1 Cor. xv. 24. Such are the thrones of the kingdoms of the world in comparison with God's kingdom; they that see them set up need but wait awhile, and they will see them cast down. 'I beheld till thrones were set up,' so it may as well be read, Christ's throne, and the throne of his Father. One of the rabbins confesseth that these thrones are set up, one for God, another for the Son of David. It is the judgment that is here set, ver. 10. Now this is intended, 1st. To speak God's wise and righteous government of the world by his providence; and an unspeakable satisfaction it gives to all good men in the midst of the convulsions and revolutions of states and kingdoms, that the "Lord has prepared his throne in the heavens, and his kingdom ruleth over all," Ps. ciii. 19; that, "verily there is a God that judgeth in the earth," Ps. lviii. 11. 2nd. Perhaps it points at the destruction brought by the providence of God upon the empire of Syria, or that of Rome, for their tyrannizing over the people of God. But, 3rd. It seems principally designed to describe the last judgment; for, though it follow not immediately upon the dominion of the fourth beast, nay, though it be yet to come, perhaps many ages to come, yet it was intended that in every age the people of God should encourage themselves under their troubles with the belief and prospect of it. Enoch, the seventh from Adam, prophesied of it, Jude 14. Doth the mouth of the enemy speak great things? ver. 8. Here are far greater things which the mouth of the Lord has spoken. Many of the New Testament predictions of the judgment to come have a plain allusion to this vision here, especially St. John's vision of it, Rev. xx. 11, 12.

1. The judge is the "Ancient of days" himself, God the Father, the glory of whose presence is here described. He is called the "Ancient of days," because he is God from everlasting to everlasting. Among men we reckon that "with the ancient is wisdom," and days shall speak. Shall not all flesh then be silent before him who is the "Ancient of days?" The glory of the Judge is here set forth by his garment, which was white as snow, noting his splendour and purity in all the administrations of his justice, and the hair of his head clean and white, as the pure wool, that, as the white and hoary head, he may appear venerable.

2. The throne is very formidable. It is "like the fiery plain," dreadful to the wicked that shall be summoned before it. And the throne being moveable upon wheels, or at least the chariot in which he rode his circuit, the wheels thereof are as burning fire, to devour the adversaries; for "our God is a consuming fire," and with him are "everlasting burnings," Isa. xxxiii. 14. This is enlarged upon, ver. 10. As to all his faithful friends there "proceeds out of the throne of God and the Lamb a pure river of water of life," Rev. xxii. 1, so to all his implacable enemies there issues and comes forth from his throne a fiery stream of brimstone," Isa. xxx. 33; a fire that shall devour before him. He is a swift witness, and his word a word upon the wheels.

3. The attendants are numerous and very splendid. The Shechinah is always attended with angels; it is so here, ver. 10, a "thousand thousand minister to him," and "ten thousand times ten thousand stand before him." It is his glory that he has such attendance, but much more his glory that he neither needs them nor can be benefited by them. See how numerous the heavenly hosts are,—there are thousands of angels; and how obsequious they are,—they stand before God, ready to go on his errands, and to take the first intimation of his will and pleasure. They will particularly be employed as ministers of his justice in the last judgment, when the Son of Man shall come, and all the holy angels with him. Enoch prophesied that the Lord should come with his holy myriads.

4. The process is fair and unexceptionable; the judgment is set, publicly and openly, that all may have recourse to it, and the books are opened. As in courts of judgment, among men, the proceedings are in writing, and upon record, which is laid open when the cause comes to a hearing, the examination of witnesses is produced, and affidavits read to clear the matter of fact, the statute and common law books consulted to find out what is the law,—so in the judgment of the great day the equity of the sentence will be as incontestably evident as if there were books opened to justify it.

Secondly. That the proud and cruel enemies of the church of God will certainly be reckoned with and brought down in due time, ver. 11, 12. This is here represented to us,

1. In the destroying of the fourth beast. God's quarrel with this beast is, "because of the voice of the great words which the horn spake," bidding defiance to heaven, and triumphing over all that is sacred. This provokes God more than any thing, for the "enemy to behave himself proudly," Deu. xxxii. 27. Therefore Pharaoh must be humbled, because he hath said, "Who is the Lord?" and hath said, "I will pursue, I will overtake." Enoch foretold that therefore the Lord would come to judge the world, that he might "convince all that are ungodly of their hard speeches," Jude 15. Note, Great words are but idle words, for which men must give account in the great day. And see what comes of this beast that talks so big: he is slain, and "his body destroyed and given to the burning flame." The Syrian empire, after Antiochus, was destroyed; he himself died of a miserable disease, his family was rooted out, the kingdom wasted by the Parthians and Armenians, and at length made a province of the Roman empire by Pompey. And the Roman empire itself, (if we take that for the fourth beast,) after it began to persecute Christianity, declined and wasted away, and the body of it was destroyed. "So shall all thine enemies perish, O Lord, and be slain before thee."

2. In the diminishing and weakening of the other three beasts, ver. 12. They had their dominion taken away, and so were disabled to do the mischiefs they had done to the church and people of God; but a prolonging in life was given them, for a time and a season, a set time, the bounds of which they could not pass. The power of the foregoing kingdoms was quite broken, but the people of them still remain in a mean, and weak, and low condition. We may allude to this in describing the remainders of sin in the hearts of good people: they

God, though he probably meant that he should be honoured as a God of great power and glory, and worthy of universal reverence."

vii. 1. On this important chapter volumes have been written. Dr. Pusey says, "It is allowed on all hands that the four beasts in Daniel's vision in the first year of Belshazzar correspond exactly to the four empires represented in the image exhibited to Nebuchadnezzar." And again he says, "The dream of Nebuchadnezzar is confessed on all hands to be expanded in the first vision of Daniel." But while there is this general agreement, there are variations in detail which are very numerous. The ordinary reader of the chapter will see that amid incidents so many and so figurative there is room for much difference of opinion.

vii. 4. The representation of a winged lion is not uncommon, and specimens from Nimroud have the face of a man. Other lions without the wings, and standing upon their hind feet, are also depicted or carved on various relics from the Babylonian ruins.

have corruptions in them, the lives of which are prolonged, so that they are not perfectly free from sin, but the dominion of them is taken away, so that sin doth not reign in their mortal bodies. And thus God deals with his church's enemies; sometimes he breaks the teeth of them (Ps. iii. 7) when he doth not break the neck of them; crusheth the persecution, but reprieves the persecutors, that they may have space to repent. And it is fit that God, in doing his own work, should take his own time and way.

Thirdly. That the kingdom of the Messiah shall be set up and kept up in the world, in despite of all the opposition of the powers of darkness. Let the heathen rage and fret as long as they please, God will "set his king upon his holy hill of Zion." Daniel sees this in vision, and comforts himself and his friends with the prospect of it. This is the same with Nebuchadnezzar's foresight of the 'stone cut out of the mountain without hands," which broke in pieces the image; but in this vision there is much more of pure Gospel than jn that.

1. The Messiah is here called, "the Son of man," "one like unto the Son of man;" for he was made in the likeness of sinful flesh, was found in fashion as a man: "I saw one like unto the Son of man," one exactly agreeing with the idea formed in the Divine counsels of him who, in the fulness of time, was to be the Mediator between God and man. He is "like unto the Son of man," but is indeed the Son of God. Our Saviour seems plainly to refer to this vision when he saith, Jno. v. 27, that the Father has therefore "given him authority to execute judgment," because he is "the Son of man," and because he is the person whom Daniel saw in vision, to whom a kingdom and dominion were to be given.

2. He is said to come with the clouds of heaven. Some refer this to his incarnation. He descended in the clouds of heaven, came into the world unseen, as the glory of the Lord took possession of the temple in a cloud. The empires of the world were beasts that rose out of the sea; but Christ's kingdom is from above, he is the Lord from heaven. I think it is rather to be referred to his ascension; when he returned to the Father, the eye of his disciples followed him till "a cloud received him out of their sight," Acts i. 9. He made that cloud his chariot, wherein he rode triumphantly to the upper world. He comes swiftly, irresistibly, and comes in state, for he comes with the clouds of heaven.

3. He is here represented as having a mighty interest in heaven. When the cloud received him out of the sight of his disciples, it is worth while to inquire, (as the sons of the prophets, concerning Elijah in a like case,) whither it carried him, where it lodged him; and here we are told abundantly to our satisfaction that he came to the "Ancient of days," for he ascended to "his Father and our Father, to his God and our God," Jno. xx. 17; from him he came forth, and to him he returns to be glorified with him, and to sit down at his right hand. It was with a great deal of pleasure that he said, "Now I go to him that sent me." But was he welcome? Yes, no doubt he was; for they brought him near before him: he was introduced into his Father's presence with the attendance and adorations of "all the angels of God," Heb. i. 6. God caused him to draw near and approach to him, as an advocate and undertaker for us, Jer. xxx. 31, that we through him might be made nigh. By this solemn near approach he made to the "Ancient of days" it appears that the Father accepted the sacrifice he offered, and the satisfaction he made, and was entirely well pleased with all he had done. He was brought near, as our High Priest, who for us enters within the pale, and as our forerunner.

4. He is here represented as having a mighty influence upon this earth, ver. 14. When he went to be glorified with his Father he had a "power given him over all flesh," Jno. xvii. 2, 5. With the prospect of this Daniel and his friends are here comforted, that not only the dominion of the church's enemies shall be taken away, ver. 12, but the church's Head and best friend shall have the dominion given him; to him "every knee shall bow, and every tongue confess," Phil. ii. 9, 10. To him is given glory and a kingdom; and it is given by him who has an unquestionable right to give it, which, some think, with an eye to these words, our Saviour teaches us to acknowledge in the close of the Lord's Prayer, "For thine is the kingdom, the power and the glory." It is here foretold that the kingdom of the exalted Redeemer shall be, 1st. A universal kingdom; the only universal monarchy, whatever others have pretended to, or aimed at. All people, nations, and languages shall fear him, and be under his jurisdiction, either as his willing subjects or as his conquered captives, to be either ruled or overruled by him. One way or other the kingdoms of the world shall all become his kingdoms. 2nd. An everlasting kingdom. His dominion shall not pass away to any successor, much less to any invader, and his kingdom is that which shall not be destroyed. Even the gates of hell, all the infernal powers and policies, shall not prevail against it. The church shall continue militant to the end of time, and triumphant to the endless ages of eternity.

15 I Daniel was grieved in my spirit in the midst of my body, and the visions of my head troubled me. 16 I came near unto one of them that stood by, and asked him the truth of all this. So he told me, and made me know the interpretation of the things. 17 These great beasts, which are four, are four kings, which shall arise out of the earth. 18 But the saints of the most High shall take the kingdom, and possess the kingdom for ever, even for ever and ever. 19 Then I would know the truth of the fourth beast, which was diverse from all the others, exceeding dreadful, whose teeth were of iron, and his nails of brass; which devoured, brake in pieces, and stamped the residue with his feet; 20 And of the ten horns that were in his head, and of the other which came up, and before whom three fell; even of that horn that had eyes, and a mouth that spake very great things, whose look was more stout than his fellows. 21 I beheld, and the same horn made war with the saints, and prevailed against them; 22 Until the Ancient of days came, and judgment was given to the saints of the most High; and the time came that the saints possessed the kingdom. 23 Thus he said, The fourth beast shall be the fourth kingdom upon earth, which shall be diverse from all kingdoms, and shall devour the whole earth, and shall tread it down, and break it in pieces. 24 And the ten horns out of this kingdom are ten kings that shall arise: and another shall rise after them; and he shall be diverse from the first, and he shall subdue three kings. 25 And he shall speak great words against the most High, and shall wear out the saints of the most High, and think to change times and laws: and they shall be given into his hand until a time and times and the dividing of time. 26 But the judgment shall sit, and they shall take away his dominion, to consume and to destroy it unto the end. 27 And the kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven, shall be given to the people of the saints of the most High, whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and all dominions shall serve and obey him. 28 Hitherto is the end of the matter. As for me Daniel, my cogitations much troubled me, and my countenance changed in me: but I kept the matter in my heart.

Here is, First. The deep impressions which these visions made upon the prophet. God, in them, put honour upon him, and gave him satisfaction, yet not without a great alloy of pain and perplexity; ver. 15, "I Daniel was grieved in my spirit, in the midst of my body." The word here used for the body properly signifies a sheath or scabbard, for the body is no more to the soul; that is the weapon, it is that which we are principally to take care of. "The visions of my head troubled me;" and again, ver. 28, "my cogitations much troubled me." The manner in which these things were discovered to him quite overwhelmed him, and put his thoughts so much to the stretch that his spirits failed him, and the trance he was in tired him, and made him faint. The things themselves that were discovered amazed and astonished him, and put him into a confusion till by degrees he recollected and conquered himself, and set the comforts of the vision over against the terrors of it.

Secondly. His earnest desire to understand the meaning of them; ver. 16, "I came near to one of them that stood by," to one of the angels that appeared attending the Son of man in his glory, and asked him the truth; that is, the true intent and meaning of all this. Note, It is a very desirable thing to take the right and full sense of what we see and hear from God; and those that would know must ask by faithful and fervent prayer, and by accomplishing a diligent search.

Thirdly. The key that was given him to let him into the understanding of this vision. The angel told him, and told him so plainly that he made him know the interpretation of the thing, and so made him somewhat more easy.

1. The great beasts are great kings and their kingdoms, great monarchs and their monarchies, which shall "arise out of the earth," as those beasts did out of the sea, ver. 17. They are but terræ filii,—'from beneath,' savour of the earth, and their foundation is in the dust; they are of the earth earthy, and they are written in the dust, and to the dust they shall return.

2. Daniel pretty well understands the first three beasts, but concerning the fourth desires to be better informed; because it differed so much from the rest, and was exceeding dreadful, and not only so, but very mischievous, for it "devoured and brake in pieces," ver. 19. Perhaps this was it that put Daniel into such a fright, and this part of the visions of his head troubled him more than any of the rest. But especially he desired to know what the little horn was that had eyes, and a mouth that spake very great things, and whose countenance was more fearless and formidable than that of any of his fellows, ver. 20. And this he was most inquisitive about, because it was this horn that "made war with the saints, and prevailed against them," ver. 21. While no more is intimated but that the children of men make war with one another, and prevail against one another, the prophet doth not shew himself so much concerned,—"Let the potsherds strive with the potsherds of the earth," and be dashed in pieces one against another; but when they make war with the saints, when the precious sons of Zion, comparable to fine gold, are broken as earthen pitchers, it is time to ask, What is the meaning of this? Will the Lord cast off his people? Will he suffer their enemies to trample upon them, and triumph over them? What is this same horn that shall prevail so far against the saints? To this his interpreter answers, ver. 23—25, that this fourth beast is a fourth kingdom, that shall "devour the whole earth," or, as it may be read, the whole land; that the ten horns are ten kings, and the little horn is another king that shall subdue three kings, and shall be very abusive to God and his people; shall carry it, 1st. Very impiously toward God; he shall speak great words against the Most High, setting him, and his authority and justice, at defiance. 2nd. Very imperiously towards the people of God; he shall "wear out the saints of the Most High." He will not cut them off at once, but "wear them out" by long oppressions, and a constant course of hardships put upon them; ruining their estates, and weakening their families. The design of Satan has been to wear

vii. 5. The bear, like the lion, is much less common in Western Asia than formerly, but it is still found in Armenia, Northern Persia, Hermon, Lebanon, and other districts. "Three ribs" are regarded as typifying the three principal victims of Medo-Persian conquest—viz., the kingdoms of Lydia, Babylonia, and Egypt, as understood by Dr. Pusey, &c.; but this is not quite certain.

vii. 6. The leopard is not very rare in some parts of Western Asia. Here it is a symbol of the Alexandrian domination, and the appropriateness of the symbol has been often pointed out. The four wings may denote the rapid spread of Alexander's conquests in every direction, and the four heads may figure the fourfold monarchy after Alexander's death.

vii. 7, 8. This emblem is, of course, wholly imaginative. The Roman power, its character and some of its divisions, are usually supposed to be meant by it. To this we may assent, but it is curious to note the vast number of variations which expositors have devised out the saints of the Most High, that they may be no more in remembrance; but the attempt is vain, for while the world stands God will have a church in it. He shall "think to change times and laws," to abolish all the ordinances and institutions of religion, and to bring everybody to say and do just as he would have them; he shall trample upon laws and customs, human and Divine, (Diruit, ædificat, mutat quadrata rotundis,—'He pulls down, he builds, he changeth square into round,') as if he meant to alter even the ordinances of heaven themselves. And in these daring attempts he shall for a time prosper and have success; they shall be given into his hand until time, times, and half a time, that is, for three years and a half; that famous prophetical measure of time which we meet with in the Revelation, which is sometimes called forty-two months, sometimes twelve hundred and sixty days, which shall come all to one. But at the end of that time the "judgment shall sit, and take away his dominion," ver. 26; which he expounds, ver. 11, "The beast was slain and his body destroyed." And, as Mr. Mede reads ver. 12, 'As to the rest of the beast,' that is, the ten horns, especially the little ruling horn, as he calls it, they had their dominion taken away.

Now, the question is, Who is this enemy, whose rise, reign, and ruin, is here foretold? Interpreters are not agreed; some will have the fourth kingdom to be that of the Seleucidæ, and the little horn to be Antiochus, and shew the accomplishment of all this in the history of the Maccabees,—so Junius Piscator, Polanus, Broughton, and many others; but others will have the fourth kingdom to be that of the Romans, and the little horn to be Julius Cæsar and the succeeding emperors, saith Calvin; the antichrist, the papal kingdom, saith Mr. Joseph Mede, that wicked one which, as this little horn, is to be consumed by the brightness of Christ's second coming. And the pope assumes a power to change times and laws, that is, 'an absolute despotic power;' 'potestas, αὐτοκρατορικὴ,' as he calls it. Others make the little horn to be the Turkish empire; so Luther, Vatablus, and others. Now I cannot prove either side to be in the wrong, and therefore, since prophecies sometimes have many fulfillings, and we ought to give Scripture its full latitude in this, as in many other controversies, I am willing to allow that they are both in the right; and that this prophecy has primary reference to the Syrian empire, and was intended for the encouragement of the Jews that suffered under Antiochus, that they might see even these melancholy times foretold, but it might foresee a glorious issue of them at last, and the final overthrow of their proud oppressors; and, which is best of all, might foresee, not long after, the setting up of the kingdom of the Messiah in the world, with the hopes of which it was usual with the former prophets to comfort the people of God in their distresses: but yet it has a farther reference, and foretells the like persecuting power and rage in Rome heathen, and no less in Rome papal, against the Christian religion, that was in Antiochus against the pious Jews and their religion. And St. John, in his visions and prophecies, which point primarily at Rome, has plain reference, in many particulars, to these visions here.

3. He has a joyful prospect given him of the prevalency of God's kingdom among men, and its victory over all opposition at last. And it is very observable, that, in the midst of the predictions of the force and fury of the enemies, this is brought in abruptly, ver. 18, and again ver. 22, before it comes in the course of the vision to be interpreted, ver. 26, 27. And this also refers, 1st. To the prosperous days of the Jewish church after it had weathered the storm under Antiochus, and the power which the Maccabees obtained over their enemies. 2nd. To the setting up of the kingdom of the Messiah in the world by the preaching of the Gospel. "For judgment Christ comes into this world," to rule by his Spirit, and to make all his saints "kings and priests to their God." 3rd. To the second coming of Jesus Christ, when the saints shall judge the world, shall sit down with him on his throne, and triumph in the complete downfall of the devil's kingdom.

Let us see what is here foretold. First. The "Ancient of days shall come," ver. 22. God shall judge the world by his Son, to whom he hath committed all judgment; and, as an earnest of that, he comes for the deliverance of his oppressed people, comes for the setting up of his kingdom in the world. Secondly. "The judgment shall sit," ver. 26. God will make it to appear that he judgeth in the earth, and will, both in wisdom and equity, plead his people's righteous cause. At the great day he will judge the "world in righteousness by that man whom he has ordained." Thirdly. The dominion of the enemy shall be taken away, ver. 26. All Christ's enemies shall be made his footstool, and shall be consumed and destroyed to the end. These words the apostle useth concerning the man of sin; 2 Thes. ii. 8, he shall be consumed with the "spirit of Christ's mouth," and "destroyed with the brightness of his coming." Fourthly. Judgment is "given to the saints of the Most High." The apostles are intrusted with the preaching of a Gospel by which the world shall be judged. All the saints, by their faith and obedience, condemn an unbelieving, disobedient world; in Christ their head they shall judge the world, shall "judge the twelve tribes of Israel," Mat. xix. 28. See what reason we have to honour them that fear the Lord; how mean and despicable soever the saints now appear in the eye of the world, and how much contempt soever is poured upon them, they are "the saints of the Most High," they are near and dear to God, and he owns them for his, and judgment is given to them. Fifthly. That which is most insisted upon is, that "the saints of the Most High shall take the kingdom, and possess the kingdom for ever," ver. 18. And again, ver. 22, "The time came that the saints possessed the kingdom;" and again, ver. 27, "The kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven, shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High." Far be it from us to infer from hence that dominion is founded on grace, or that this will warrant any, under pretence of saintship, to usurp kingship. No, Christ's kingdom is not of this world; but this speaks the spiritual dominion of the saints over their own lusts and corruptions, and their victories over Satan and his temptations, and the triumphs of the martyrs over death and its terrors. It likewise promiseth that the gospel kingdom shall be set up, a kingdom of light, holiness, and love; a kingdom of grace, the privileges and comforts of which now under the heavens shall be the earnest and firstfruits of the kingdom of glory in the heavens. When the empire became Christian, and princes used their power for the defence and advancement of Christianity, then the saints possessed the kingdom. The saints rule by the Spirit's ruling in them, and "this is the victory overcoming the world, even their faith," and by the making of the kingdoms of this world to become Christ's kingdom. But the full accomplishment of this will be in the everlasting happiness of the saints, the kingdom that cannot be moved, which we, according to his promise, look for, that is "the greatness of the kingdom," the crown of glory that fades not away—that is the "everlasting kingdom." See what an emphasis is laid upon this, ver. 18: the saints shall possess the kingdom for ever, even for ever and ever; and the reason is, because He whose saints they are is the Most High, and "his kingdom is an everlasting kingdom," ver. 27. He is so, and therefore theirs shall be so; "Because I live, you shall live also," Jno. xiv. 19. His kingdom is theirs; they reckon themselves exalted in his exaltation, and desire no greater honour and satisfaction to themselves than that all dominions should serve and obey him as they shall do, ver. 27. They shall either be brought into subjection to this golden sceptre or brought to destruction by this iron rod.

Daniel, in the close, when he ends that matter, tells us what impressions this vision made upon him. It overwhelmed his spirits to that degree that his countenance was changed, and it made him look pale; but he kept the matter in his heart. Note, The heart must be the treasury and storehouse of Divine things; there we must hide God's word, as the Virgin Mary kept the sayings of Christ, Lu. ii. 51. Daniel kept the matter in his heart, with design not to keep it from the church, but to keep it for the church, that what he had received from the Lord he might fully and faithfully deliver to the people. Note, It concerns God's prophets and ministers to treasure up the things of God in their minds, and there to digest them well. If we would have God's word ready in our mouths when we have occasion for it, we must keep it in our hearts at all times.

CHAPTER VIII.

The visions and prophecies of this chapter look only and entirely at the events that were then shortly to come to pass in the monarchies of Persia and Greece, and seem to have no farther reference at all. Nothing is here said of the Chaldean monarchy, for that was now just at its period, and therefore this chapter is not written in Chaldee, as the six foregoing chapters were, for the benefit of the Chaldeans, but in Hebrew, and so are the rest of the chapters to the end of the book, for the service of the Jews, that they might know what troubles were before them, and what the issue of them would be, and might provide accordingly. In this chapter we have, I. The vision of the ram, and the he-goat, and the little horn, that should fight and prevail against the people of God, for a certain limited time, ver. 1—14. II. The interpretation of this vision by an angel, shewing that the ram signified the Persian empire, the he-goat the Grecian, and the little horn a king of the Grecian monarchy, that should set himself against the Jews and religion, which was Antiochus Epiphanes, ver. 15—27. The Jewish church from its beginning had been all along more or less blessed with prophets, men Divinely inspired, to explain God's mind to them in his providences, and give them some prospect of what was coming upon them; but soon after Ezra's time Divine inspiration ceased, and there were no more any prophets till the gospel day dawned. And therefore the events of that time were here foretold by Daniel, and left upon record, that even then God might not leave himself without witness, or them without a guide.

IN the third year of the reign of king Belshazzar a vision appeared unto me, even unto me Daniel, after that which appeared unto me at the first. 2 And I saw in a vision; and it came to pass, when I saw, that I was at Shushan in the palace, which is in the province of Elam; and I saw in a vision, and I was by the river of Ulai. 3 Then I lifted up mine eyes, and saw, and, behold, there stood before the river a ram which had two horns: and the two horns were high; but one was higher than the other, and the higher came up last. 4 I saw the ram pushing westward, and northward, and southward; so that no beasts might stand before him, neither was there any that could deliver out of his hand; but he did according to his will, and became great. 5 And as I was considering, behold, an he goat came from the west on the face of the whole earth, and touched not the ground: and the goat had a notable horn between his eyes. 6 And he came to the ram that had two horns, which I had seen standing before the river, and ran unto him in the fury of his power. 7 And I saw him come close unto the ram, and he was moved with choler against him, and smote the ram, and brake his two horns: and there was no power in the ram to stand before him, but he cast him down to the in reference to the lesser details. The "great things" mentioned in verse 8 must be words of boasting pride and arrogance.

vii. 9. The thrones were certainly not "cast down," if overthrown is meant, but they were set down or placed in position. The Syriac has, "I saw thrones were set," and the same idea is conveyed by the Greek and Latin, and by numerous modern versions. The remarkable analogies between some portions of this chapter and some of the Revelation of St. John must not be overlooked. The wheels are, of course, those of the throne, and instead of "his wheels" we must substitute the more modern expression, "its wheels." It may here be noted that what is called the old version of the English Bible has in the first clause the correct sense, "till the thrones were set up."

vii. 11. The declaration that the beast was slain and its body burnt is symbolical: after the overthrow of that which is typified by the beast, there shall be a destruction of its relics as complete and effectual as if those relics had been burned to ashes.

ground, and stamped upon him: and there was none that could deliver the ram out of his hand. 8 Therefore the he goat waxed very great: and when he was strong, the great horn was broken; and for it came up four notable ones toward the four winds of heaven. 9 And out of one of them came forth a little horn, which waxed exceeding great, toward the south, and toward the east, and toward the pleasant land. 10 And it waxed great, even to the host of heaven; and it cast down some of the host and of the stars to the ground, and stamped upon them. 11 Yea, he magnified himself even to the prince of the host, and by him the daily sacrifice was taken away, and the place of his sanctuary was cast down. 12 And an host was given him against the daily sacrifice by reason of transgression, and it cast down the truth to the ground; and it practised, and prospered. 13 Then I heard one saint speaking, and another saint said unto that certain saint which spake, How long shall be the vision concerning the daily sacrifice, and the transgression of desolation, to give both the sanctuary and the host to be trodden under foot? 14 And he said unto me, Unto two thousand and three hundred days; then shall the sanctuary be cleansed.

Here is, First. The date of this vision, ver. 1. It was "in the third year of the reign of Belshazzar," which proved to be his last year, as many reckon; so that this chapter also should be, in order of time, before the fifth. That Daniel might not be surprised at the destruction of Babylon now at hand, God gives him a foresight of the destruction of other kingdoms hereafter, that in their day had been as potent as that of Babylon. Could we foresee the changes that shall be hereafter, when we are gone, we should the less admire, and be less affected with, the changes in our own days; for "that which is done is that which shall be done," Eccl. i. 9. Then it was that "a vision appeared to me, even to me Daniel." Here he solemnly attests the truth of it: it was to him, even to him, that the vision was shewn; he was the eye-witness of it. And this vision puts him in mind of a former vision, which "appeared to him at the first," in the first year of this reign, which he makes mention of, because this vision was an explication and confirmation of that, and points at many of the same events. That seems to have been a dream, a vision in his sleep; this seems to have been when he was awake.

Secondly. The scene of this vision. The place where that was laid was in "Shushan the palace," one of the royal seats of the kings of Persia, situated on the banks of the river Ulai, which surrounded the city. It was in the province of Elam, that part of Persia which lay next to Babylon. Daniel was not there in person, for he was now in Babylon, a captive, in some employment under Belshazzar, and might not go to such a distant country, especially being now an enemy's country, but he was there in vision; as Ezekiel, when a captive in Babylon, was often brought in the spirit to the land of Israel. Note, The soul may be at liberty when the body is in captivity; for when we are bound the spirit of the Lord is not bound. The vision related to that country, and therefore there he was made to fancy himself to be, as strongly as if he had really been there.

Thirdly. The vision itself, and the process of it.

1. He saw a ram with two horns, ver. 3. This was the second monarchy, of which the kingdom of Media and Persia were the two horns. The horns were very high, but that which came up last was the higher, and got the start of the former; so the last shall be first, and the first last. The kingdom of Persia, which rose last, in Cyrus, became more eminent than that of the Medes.

2. He saw this ram pushing all about him with his horns, ver. 4. Westward, towards Babylon, Syria, Greece, and the lesser Asia; northward, towards the Lydians, Armenians, and Scythians; and southward, towards Arabia, Ethiopia, and Egypt, for all these nations did the Persian empire, one time or other, make attempts upon, for the enlarging of their dominion. And at last he became so powerful that no beasts might stand before him. This ram, that is of a species of animals that are often preyed upon, becomes formidable even to the beasts of prey themselves, so that there was no standing before him, no escaping him, none that could deliver out of his hand, but all must yield to him. The kings of Persia did according to their will, prospered in all their ways abroad, and had an uncontrollable power at home, and became great. He thought himself great, because he did what he would; but to do good is that which makes men truly great.

3. He saw this ram overcome by a he-goat. He was considering the ram, and wondering so weak an animal should come to be so prevalent, with expectation what would be the issue, and behold a "he-goat came," ver. 5. This was Alexander the Great, the son of Philip, king of Macedonia; he came from the west, from Greece, which lay west from Persia. He fetched a great compass with his army; he came upon "the face of the whole earth." He did, in effect, conquer the world, and then sat down and wept because there was not another world to be conquered. Unus Pellæo juveni non sufficit orbis,—'One world was too little for the youth of Pellæ.' This he-goat (a creature famed for comeliness in going, Pr. xxx. 31,) went on with incredible swiftness, so that he "touched not the ground," so lightly did he move; he rather seemed to fly above the ground than to go upon the ground; or, 'none touched him in the earth,' that is, he met with little or no opposition. This he-goat, or buck, had a notable horn between his eyes, like a unicorn. He had strength, and knew his own strength; he saw himself a match for all his neighbours. Alexander pushed his conquests on so fast, and with so much fury, that none of the kingdoms he attacked had courage to make a stand, or give check to the progress of his victorious arms. In six years he made himself master of the greatest part of the then known world. Well might he be called a notable horn, for his name still lives in history as one of the most celebrated commanders in war that ever the world knew. Alexander's victories and achievements are still the entertainment of the ingenious. This he-goat came to the "ram that had two horns," ver. 6. Alexander, with his victorious army, attacked the kingdom of Persia, an army consisting of no more than thirty thousand foot and five thousand horse. He ran unto him, to surprise him ere he could get intelligence of his motions. "In the fury of his power" he came "close to the ram." Alexander, with his army, came up with Darius Codomannus, then emperor of Persia, being "moved with choler against him," ver. 7. It was with the greatest violence that Alexander pushed on his war against Darius, who, though he brought vast numbers into the field, yet, for want of conduct, was an unequal match for him; so that Alexander was too hard for him whenever he engaged him, "smote him, cast him down to the ground, and stamped upon him," which three expressions, some think, refer to the three famous victories that Alexander obtained over Darius, at Granicus, at Issus, and at Arbela, by which he was at length totally routed, having in the last battle had six hundred thousand men killed,—so that Alexander became absolute master of all the Persian empire—broke his two horns, the kingdoms of Media and Persia. The ram, that had destroyed all before him, ver. 4, is now himself destroyed. Darius has no power to stand before Alexander, nor has he any friends or allies to help to deliver him out of his hand. Note, Those kingdoms that, when they had power, abused it, and, because none could oppose them, withheld not themselves from the doing of any wrong, may expect to have their power at length taken from them, and to be served in their own kind, Isa. xxxiii. 1.

4. He saw that he-goat made hereby very considerable, but the great horn that had done all this execution was broken, ver. 8. Alexander was about twenty years old when he began his wars. When he was about twenty-six he conquered Darius, and became master of the whole Persian empire; but when he was about thirty-two or thirty-three years of age, when he was strong, in his full strength, he was broken—not killed in war, in the bed of honour, but died of a drunken surfeit, or, as some suspect, by poison, and left no child living behind him to enjoy that which he had endlessly laboured for

vii. 13. The phrase "Son of man" here has been much discussed, and certainly not without reason, because in Aramaic it is common in the sense of "man." In Ezekiel it occurs in the Hebrew form with this signification. It should be noted, however, that the really important question is not whether the phrase simply means "a man," but who is indicated by it. That the Messiah is pointed out has been held by Jews and Christians, but there have been some who have thought differently. Judas Maccabeus, the Romans, Israel, and God's people generally have been suggested, but what follows applies to none of them, and it is difficult to produce even the semblance of a reason in favour of any application of the expression except to the Messiah.

vii. 18. The word for Most High is in the plural, but this is no reason why God should not be intended, as plural titles are often given to him. This verse is not inconsistent with verse 14, because it is often declared that saints shall reign with Christ for ever.

but left a lasting monument of the vanity of worldly pomp and power, and their insufficiency to make a man happy.

5. He saw this kingdom divided into four parts, and that, instead of that one great horn, there came up "four notable ones,"—Alexander's four captains, to whom he bequeathed his conquests; and he had so much that, when it was divided among four, they had each of them enough for any one man. These four notable horns were towards the "four winds of heaven," the same with the four heads of the leopard, ch. vii. 6. The kingdoms of Syria and Egypt, Asia and Greece; Syria lying to the east, and Greece to the west, Asia Minor to the north, and Egypt to the south. Note, Those that heap up riches know not who shall gather them, nor whose all those things shall be which they have provided.

6. He saw a little horn that became a great persecutor of the church and people of God; and this was the principal thing that was intended to be shewed him in this vision, as afterwards, ch. xi. 30, &c. All agree that this was Antiochus Epiphanes, (so he called himself,) the illustrious; but others called him Antiochus Epimanes, Antiochus the furious. He is called here, as before, ch. vii. 8, a little horn, because he was in his original contemptible. There were others between him and the kingdom, and he was of a base, servile disposition, and had nothing in him of princely qualities, and had been for some time a hostage and prisoner at Rome, from whence he made his escape, and, though the youngest brother, and his elder living, got the kingdom. He waxed exceeding great "toward the south," for he seized upon Egypt; and "toward the east," for he invaded Persia and Armenia. But that which is here especially taken notice of is, the mischief that he did to the people of the Jews. They are not expressly named, for prophecies must not be too plain; but they are here described so that it would be easy for those who understood Scripture language to know who were meant; and the Jews, having notice of this before, might be awakened to prepare themselves and their children beforehand for these suffering, trying times.

1st. He set himself against "the pleasant land;" that is, the land of Israel, so called because it was the glory of all lands for fruitfulness, and all the delights of human life, but especially for the tokens of God's presence in it, and its being blessed with Divine revelations and institutions. It was mount Zion that was "beautiful for situation," and the "joy of the whole earth," Ps. xlviii. 2. The pleasantness of that land was, that there the Messiah was to be born, who would be both the consolation and the glory of his people Israel. Note, We have reason to reckon that a pleasant place which is a holy place, in which God dwells, and where we may have opportunity of communion with him. Surely "it is good to be here."

2nd. He fought against the host of heaven; that is, the people of God, the church, which is the kingdom of heaven, the church militant here on earth. The saints being born from above, and citizens of heaven, and doing the will of God, by his grace, in some measure, as the angels of heaven do it, may be well called a heavenly host. Or, the priests and Levites, who were employed in the service of the tabernacle, and there warred a good warfare, were this host of heaven. These Antiochus set himself against; he "waxed great to the host of heaven," in opposition to them, and in defiance of them.

3rd. He "cast down some of the host," that is, "of the stars," (for they are called the host of heaven,) "to the ground, and stamped upon them." Some of those that were most eminent both in church and state, that were burning and shining lights in their generation, he either forced to comply with his idolatries or put them to death. He got them into his hands, and then trampled upon them, and triumphed over them; as good old Eleazar and the seven brethren, whom he put to death with cruel tortures, because they would not eat swine's flesh, 2 Mac. vi. 7. He gloried in it, that herein he insulted Heaven itself, and "exalted his throne above the stars of God," Isa. xiv. 13.

4th. He "magnified himself even to the prince of the host." He set himself against the high priest Onias, whom he deprived of his dignity; or, rather, against God himself, who was Israel's king of old, who reigns for ever as Zion's king, who himself heads his own hosts that fight his battles. Against him Antiochus magnified himself; as Pharaoh, when he said, Who is the Lord? Note, Those who persecute the people of God persecute God himself.

5th He took away "the daily sacrifice." The morning and evening lamb, which God appointed to be offered every day upon his altar to his honour, Antiochus forbade and restrained the offering of. No doubt he took away all other sacrifices; but the daily sacrifice only is mentioned, because that was the greatest loss of all other, for in that they kept up their constant communion with God, which they preferred before that which is only occasional. God's people reckon their daily sacrifice, their morning and evening exercises of devotion, to be the most needful of their daily business, and the most delightful of their daily comforts, and would not for all the world part with them.

6th. He cast down "the place of his sanctuary." He did not burn and demolish the temple, but he cast it down, when he profaned it, made it the temple of Jupiter Olympus, and set up his image in it. He also "cast down the truth to the ground," trampled upon the book of the law, that word of truth, tore it and burnt it, and did what he could to have destroyed it quite, that it might have been lost and forgotten for ever. These were the projects of that wicked prince. In these he practised; and—would you think it?—in these he prospered. He carried the matter very far, seemed to have gained his point, and went near to have extirpated that holy religion which God's right hand had planted.

But, lest he or any other should triumph, as if herein he had prevailed against God himself, and been too hard for him, the matter is here explained, and set in a true light. First. He could not have done this if God had not permitted him to do it; could have had no power against Israel unless it had been given him from above. God put this power into his hand, and gave him "an host against the daily sacrifice." God's providence put that sword into his hand by which he was enabled thus to bear down all before him. Note, We ought to eye and own the hand of God in all the enterprises and all the successes of the church's enemies against the church. They are but the rod in God's hand. Secondly. God would not have permitted it if his people had not provoked him to do so. It is by reason of transgression, the transgression of Israel, to correct them for that, that Antiochus is employed to give them all this trouble. Note, When the pleasant land, and all its pleasant things, are laid waste, it must be acknowledged that sin is the procuring cause of all the desolation. "Who gave Jacob to the spoil? Did not the Lord, he against whom we have sinned?" Isa. xlii. 24. The great transgression of the Jews, after the captivity, (when they were cured of idolatry,) was a contempt and profanation of the holy things; snuffing at the service of God, "bringing the torn and the lame for sacrifice," as if the table of the Lord were a contemptible thing: so we find, Mal. i. 7, 8, &c., and that the priests were guilty of this, Mal. ii. 1, 8; and therefore God sent Antiochus to "take away the daily sacrifice, and cast down the place of his sanctuary." Note, It is just with God to deprive those of the privileges of his house that despise and profane them, and make them know the worth of ordinances by the want of them that would not know it by the enjoyment of them.

7. We heard the time of this calamity limited and determined. Not the time "when it should come," that is not here fixed, (because God would have his people always prepared for it,) but how long it should last, that, when they had no more any prophets to "tell them how long," (Ps. lxxiv. 9, which psalm seems to have been calculated for this dark and doleful day,) they might have this prophecy to give them a prospect of deliverance in due time. Now concerning this, we have here,

1st. The question asked concerning it, ver. 13. Observe, First. By whom the question was put. "I heard one saint speaking" to this purpose, and then another saint seconded him, O that we knew how long this trouble will last! The angels here are called saints, for they are holy ones, ch. iv. 13; the holy myriads, Jude 14. The angels concern themselves in the affairs of the church, and inquire concerning them; if, as here, concerning its temporal salvation, much more do they desire to look into the great salvation, 1 Pet. i. 12. One saint spoke of the thing, and another inquired concerning it. Thus John, that lay in Christ's bosom, was beckoned to by Peter to ask Christ a question, Jno. xiii. 23, 24. Secondly. To whom the question was put. He said, 'unto Palmoni that spake.' Some make this certain saint to be a superior angel that understood more than the rest, to whom, therefore, they came with their inquiries. Others make it to be the eternal Word, the Son of God. He is the unknown one. Palmoni seems to be compounded of Peloni Almoni, which is used, Ru. iv. 1, for 'Ho such a one;' and, 2 Kin. vi. 8, for 'such a place.' Christ was yet the nameless one; "Wherefore askest thou after my name, seeing it is secret?" Jud. xiii. 18. He is the 'numberer of secrets,' as some translate it, for from him there is nothing hid. 'The wonderful numberer,' so others. His name is called "Wonderful." Note, If we would know the mind of God, we must apply ourselves to Jesus Christ, who lay in the bosom of the Father, and "in whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge," not hid from us, but hid for us. Thirdly. The question itself that was asked, "How long shall be the vision concerning the daily sacrifice?" that is, how long shall the prohibition of it continue? How long shall the pleasant land be made unpleasant by that severe interdict? How long shall the "transgression of desolation," that is, the image of Jupiter, that great transgression which makes all our sacred things desolate, how long shall that stand in the temple? How long shall "the sanctuary and the host," the holy place, and the holy persons that minister in it, be trodden under foot by the oppression? Note, Angels are concerned for the prosperity of the church on earth, and desirous to see an end of its desolations. The angel asked for the satisfaction of Daniel, not doubting but he was desirous to know how long these calamities should last. The question takes it for granted that they should not last always. "The rod of the wicked shall not rest upon the lot of the righteous," though it may come upon their lot. Christ comforted himself in his sufferings with this, "The things concerning me have an end," Lu. xxii. 37, and so may the church in hers. But it is desirable to know how long they shall last, that we may provide accordingly.

2nd. The answer given to this question, ver. 14. Christ gives instruction to the holy angels, for they are our fellow-servants; but here the answer was given to Daniel, because for his sake the question was asked: "He said unto me." God sometimes gives in great favours to his people, in answer to the inquiries and requests of their friends for them. Now Christ assures him, First. That the trouble shall end; it shall continue "two thousand and three hundred days," and no longer. So many 'evenings and mornings,' so the word is, ὁ ἀριθμὸς νυχθημέραι, so many natural days, reckoned, as in the beginning of Genesis, by the evenings and mornings; because it was the evening and the morning sacrifice that they most lamented the loss of, and thought the time passed very slowly while they wanted them. Some make the morning and the evening in this number to stand for two, and then two thousand three hundred evenings, and as many mornings, will make but one thousand one hundred and fifty days; and about so many days it was that the daily sacrifice was interrupted. And this comes nearer to the computation, ch. vii. 26, of a "time, times, and the dividing of a time." But it is less forced to understand them of so many natural days. Two thousand three hundred days make six years and three months, and about eighteen days; and just so long they reckon from the defection of the people, procured by Menelaus the high priest, in the one hundred and forty-second year of the kingdom of the Seleucidæ, the sixth month of that year, and the sixth day of the month, (so Josephus dates it,) to the cleansing of the sanctuary, and the re-establishment of religion among them, which was in the one hundred and forty-eighth year, the ninth month, and the twenty-fifth day of the month, 1 Mac. iv. 52. God reckons the time of his people's affliction by days, for in all their afflictions he is afflicted; Rev. ii. 10, "Thou shalt have tribulation ten days." Secondly. He assures him that they should see better days after; "Then shall the sanctuary be cleansed." Note, The cleansing of the sanctuary is a happy token for good to any people; when they begin to be reformed they will soon be relieved. Though the righteous God may, for the correction of his people, suffer his sanctuary to be profaned for awhile, yet the jealous God will for his own glory see to the cleansing of it in due time. Christ died to cleanse his church, and he will so cleanse it as at length to present it blameless to himself.

15 And it came to pass, when I, even I Daniel, had seen the vision, and sought for the meaning, then, behold, there stood before me as the appearance of a man. 16 And I heard a man's voice between the banks of Ulai, which called, and said, Gabriel, make this man to understand the vision. 17 So he came near where I stood: and when he came, I was afraid, and fell upon my face: but he said unto me, Understand, O son of man: for at the time of the end shall be the vision. 18 Now as he was speaking with me, I was in a deep sleep on my face toward the ground: but he touched me, and set me upright. 19 And he said, Behold, I will make thee know what shall be in the last end of the indignation: for at the time appointed the end shall be. 20 The ram which thou sawest having two horns are the kings of Media and Persia.

The historical development of the whole of this latter portion of the chapter has occupied many learned men, and it is generally clear that the fulfilment extends over a wide range, the limits of which are not yet reached, as the last events remain unaccomplished.

viii. 2. Shushan, the capital of Elam, was near the river Eulæus, or Ulai. The site was explored by Mr. Loftus, who made many remarkable discoveries, confirming in a singular manner the various indications of Scripture. Among other things he traced the plan and found the ruins of the palace, the pillars of which bore a lily-like decoration, in allusion to the name Shushan, which means a lily.

viii. 3, 4. The ram with two horns denoted the Medo-Persian power (see verse 20). Its conquests are also clearly indicated.

viii. 5. The goat with one horn is the power which subdued the Persian Empire, or that of Alexander of Macedon. It has been observed that a goat with one horn was a symbol of ancient Macedon, and it appears upon coins and other relics from that country.

21 And the rough goat is the king of Grecia: and the great horn that is between his eyes is the first king. 22 Now that being broken, whereas four stood up for it, four kingdoms shall stand up out of the nation, but not in his power. 23 And in the latter time of their kingdom, when the transgressors are come to the full, a king of fierce countenance, and understanding dark sentences, shall stand up. 24 And his power shall be mighty, but not by his own power: and he shall destroy wonderfully, and shall prosper, and practise, and shall destroy the mighty and the holy people. 25 And through his policy also he shall cause craft to prosper in his hand; and he shall magnify himself in his heart, and by peace shall destroy many: he shall also stand up against the Prince of princes; but he shall be broken without hand. 26 And the vision of the evening and the morning which was told is true: wherefore shut thou up the vision; for it shall be for many days. 27 And I Daniel fainted, and was sick certain days; afterward I rose up, and did the king's business; and I was astonished at the vision, but none understood it.

Here is, First. Daniel's earnest desire to have this vision explained to him; ver. 15, "I sought the meaning." Note, Those that rightly know the things of God cannot but desire to know more and more of them, and to be led farther into the mystery of them. And those that would find the meaning of what they have seen or heard from God must seek it, and seek it diligently; "Seek and ye shall find." Daniel considered the thing, compared it with former discoveries, to try if he could understand it; but especially he sought by prayer, as he had done, ch. ii. 18, and he did not seek in vain.

Secondly. Orders given to the angel Gabriel to inform him concerning this vision. One in "the appearance of a man," who some think was Christ himself, for who but he could command angels? He orders Gabriel to make Daniel "understand this vision." Sometimes God is pleased to make use of the ministration of angels, not only to protect his children, but to instruct them; to serve the kind intentions not only of his providence, but of his grace.

Thirdly. The consternation that Daniel was in upon the approach of his instructor; ver. 17, "When he came near I was afraid." Though Daniel was a man of great prudence and courage, and had been conversant with the visions of the Almighty, yet the approach of an extraordinary messenger from heaven put him into this fright. He fell upon his face, not to worship the angel, but because he could no longer bear the dazzling lustre of his glory. Nay, being prostrate upon the ground, he fell into a deep sleep, ver. 18, which came not from any neglect of the vision, or indifferency towards it, but was the effect of his faintness, and the oppression of spirit he was under, through the abundance of revelations. The disciples in the garden slept for sorrow. And as there so here, the spirit was willing, but the flesh was weak. Daniel would have kept awake, but could not.

Fourthly. The relief which the angel gave to Daniel, with great encouragement to him to expect a satisfactory discovery of the meaning of this vision. 1. He touched him, and set him upon his feet, ver. 18. Thus, when John, in a like case, was in a like consternation, Christ laid his right hand upon him, Rev. i. 17. It was a gentle touch that the angel here gave to Daniel, to shew that he came not to hurt him, not to "plead against him with his great power," or with a hand heavy upon him, but to help him, to "put strength into him," Job xxiii. 6, which God can do with a touch. When we are slumbering and grovelling on this earth we are very unfit to hear from God and to converse with him. But if God design instruction for us he will by his grace awaken us out of our slumber, raise us from things below, and set us upright. 2. He promiseth to inform him. "Understand, O son of man," ver. 17; that is, thou shalt understand if thou wilt but apply thy mind to understand. He calls him, Son of man, to intimate that he would consider his frame, and would deal tenderly with him, accommodating himself to his capacity as a man. Or, thus he preaches humility to him; though he be admitted to converse with angels he must not be puffed up with it, but must remember that he is a son of man. Or, perhaps this title puts an honour upon him: the Messiah was lately called the Son of man, ch. vii. 13, and Daniel is akin to him, is a figure of him as a prophet and one greatly beloved. He assures him that he shall be made to know "what shall be in the last end of the indignation," ver. 19. Let it be laid up for a comfort to those who shall live to see these calamitous times, that there shall be an end of them; "the indignation shall cease," Isa. x. 25; "it shall be overpast," Isa. xxvi. 20. It may intermit and return again, but the last end shall be glorious; good will follow it, nay, and good will be brought out of it. He tells him, ver. 17, "At the time of the end shall be the vision;" that is, when that last end of the indignation comes, when the course of this providence is completed, then the vision shall be made plain and intelligible by the event, as the event shall be made plain and intelligible by the vision. Or, "at the time of the end" of the Jewish church, in the latter days of it, shall this vision be accomplished, three or four hundred years hence; understand it therefore, that thou mayest leave it on record for the generations to come. But if he ask more particularly, When is the time of the end? and, How long to it? let this answer suffice, ver. 19, "At the time appointed the end shall be;" it is fixed in the Divine counsels, which cannot be altered, and which must not be pried into.

Fifthly. The exposition which he gave him of the vision.

1. Concerning the two monarchies of Persia and Greece, ver. 20—22. The ram signified the succession of the kings of Media and Persia. The rough goat signified the kings of Greece. The great horn was Alexander; the four horns that rose in his room were the four kingdoms into which his conquests were cantoned, of which before, ver. 8. They are said to "stand up out of the nations, but not in his power." None of them ever made the figure that Alexander did. Josephus relates, that when Alexander had taken Tyre, and subdued Palestine, and was upon his march to Jerusalem, Jaddus, who was then high priest, (who is named in Neh. xii. 11,) fearing his rage, had recourse to God by prayer and sacrifice for the common safety, and was by him warned in a dream that upon Alexander's approach he should throw open the gates of the city, and that he and the rest of the priests should go forth to meet him in their habits, and all the people in white. Alexander, seeing this company at a distance, went himself alone to the high priest, and having prostrated himself before that God whose name was engraven in the golden plate of his mitre, he first saluted him; and being asked by one of his own captains why he did so, he said, that while he was yet in Macedon, musing on the conquest of Asia, there appeared to him a man like unto this, and thus attired, who invited him into Asia, and assured him of success in the conquest of it. The priests led him to the temple, where he offered sacrifice to the God of Israel, as they directed him; and there they shewed him this book of the prophet Daniel, that it was there foretold that a Grecian should come and destroy the Persians, which animated him very much in the expedition he was now meditating against Darius. Hereupon he took the Jews and their religion under his protection, promised to be kind to those of their religion in Babylon and Media, whither he was now marching, and in honour of him all the priests that had sons born that year called them Alexander: Joseph. lib. 11.

2. Concerning Antiochus, and his oppression of the Jews. This is said to be in the latter time of the kingdom of the Greeks, "when the transgressors are come to the full," ver. 23; that is, when the degenerate Jews have filled up the measure of their iniquity, and are ripe for this destruction, so that God cannot in honour bear with them any longer, then shall stand up this king, to be flagellum Dei,—'the rod in God's hand' for the chastising of the Jews. Now observe here,

1st. His character. He shall be a "king of fierce countenance," insolent and furious, neither fearing God nor regarding man, "understanding dark sentences," or rather, versed in dark practices, the hidden things of dishonesty. He was master of all the arts of dissimulation and deceit, and knew the depths of Satan as well as any man. He was wise to do evil.

3rd. His success. He shall make dreadful havoc of the nations about him; "His power shall be mighty," bear down all before it; but "not by his own power," ver. 24, but partly by the assistance of his allies, Eumenes and Attalus, partly by the baseness and treachery of many of the Jews, even of the priests that came into his interests, and especially by the Divine permission. It was not by his own power, but by a power given him from above, that he destroyed wonderfully, and thought he made himself a great man by being a great destroyer. He destroys wonderfully, indeed, for he destroys, First. The mighty people, and they cannot resist him by their power. The princes of Egypt cannot stand before him with all their forces, but he practiseth against them and prospereth. Note, The mighty ones of the earth commonly meet with those, at length, that are too hard for them, that are more mighty than they. Let not the strong man, then, glory in his strength, be it never so great, unless he could be sure there were none stronger than he. Secondly. He destroys the "holy people," or, the people of the holy ones, and their sacred character doth neither deter him from destroying them nor defend them from being destroyed. All things come alike to all, and there is one event to the mighty and to the holy in this world.

3rd. The methods by which he will gain this success. Not by true courage, wisdom, or justice, but by his policy and craft, ver. 25; by fraud and deceit, and serpentine subtlety; he shall "cause craft to prosper;" so cunningly shall he carry on his projects, that he shall gain his point by the art of wheedling. "By peace he shall destroy many," as others do by war; under the pretence of treaties, leagues, and alliances with them, he shall encroach on their rights, and trick them into a subjection to him. Thus, sometimes, what a nation truly brave has gained in a righteous war a nation truly base has regained in a treacherous peace, and craft has been caused to prosper.

4th. The mischief that he shall do to religion. "He shall magnify himself in his heart," and think himself fit to prescribe and give law to every body, so that he shall "stand up against the Prince of princes;" that is, against God himself. He will profane his temple and altar, prohibit his worship, and persecute his worshippers. See what a height of impudence some men's impiety brings them to; they openly bid defiance to God himself, though he is the King of kings.

5th. The ruin that he shall be brought to at last. "He shall be broken without hand;" that is, without the hand of man. He shall not be slain in war, nor shall he be assassinated, as tyrants commonly were; but he shall fall into the hands of the living God, and die by an immediate stroke of his vengeance. He, hearing that the Jews had cast the image of Jupiter Olympus out of the temple, where he had placed it, was so enraged at the Jews, that he vowed he would make Jerusalem a common burying-place, and determined to march thither immediately. But no sooner had he spoken these proud words but he was struck with an incurable plague in his bowels, worms bred so fast in his body that whole flakes of flesh sometimes dropped from him; his torments were violent, and the stench of his disease such that none could endure to come near him. He continued in this misery very long. At first he persisted in his menaces against the Jews; but at length, despairing of his recovery, he called his friends together, and acknowledged all those miseries to have fallen upon him for the injuries he had done to the Jews, and his profaning the temple at Jerusalem; then he wrote courteous letters to the Jews, and vowed that if he recovered he would let them have the free exercise of their religion. But, finding his disease grow upon him, when he could no longer endure his own smell, he said, 'It is meet to submit to God, and for man, which is mortal, not to set himself in competition with God;' and so died miserably in a strange land, on the mountains of Pacata, near Babylon, (so Usher's Annals,) A.M. 3840, about one hundred and sixty years before the birth of Christ.

3. As to the time fixed for the continuance of the cessation of the daily sacrifice, it is not explained here, but only confirmed, ver. 26. That "vision of the evening and morning is true," in the proper sense of the words, and needs no explication. How unlikely soever it might be that God should suffer his own sanctuary to be thus profaned, yet it is true, it is too true, so it shall be.

Sixthly. Here is the conclusion of this vision; and here,

1. The charge given to Daniel to keep it private for the present. "Shut thou up the vision;" let it not be publicly known among the Chaldeans, lest the Persians, who were now shortly to possess the kingdom, should be incensed against the Jews by it, because the downfall of their kingdom was foretold by it, which would be unseasonable now the edict for their release was expected from the king of Persia. Shut it up, for "it shall be for many days;" it was about three hundred years from the time of this vision to the time of the accomplishment of it, therefore he must shut it up for the present, even from the viii. 8. The one power of Alexander the Great was divided into four after his death, by the erection of four kingdoms out of his one.

viii. 9. It is an old opinion, and one which is highly probable, that the power the rise of which is here named was that of Antiochus Epiphanes, whose violent and profane doings are pointed out in the next three verses. The first chapter of the First Book of Maccabees should be consulted here.

viii. 13. The words, "Then I heard one saint speaking, and another saint said unto that certain saint which spake," merely mean, "I heard a saint speaking, and a saint said to the somebody who spoke." For "that certain saint," as they translate "the somebody," our translators have put in the margin a note which is wrong every way: "Palmoni, or the numberer of secrets, or the wonderful numberer." Palmoni means "somebody," "such a one."

viii. 14. Two thousand and three hundred days are six years and people of the Jews, lest it should amaze and perplex them; but let it be kept safe for the generations to come, that should live about the time of the accomplishment of it, for to them it would be both most intelligible and most serviceable. Note, What we know of the things of God should be carefully laid up, that hereafter, when there is occasion, it may be faithfully laid out: and what we have not now any use for yet we may have another time. Divine truths should be sealed up among our treasures, that we may find them again after many days.

2. The care he took to keep it private, having received such a charge, ver. 27. He "fainted, and was sick," with the multitude of his thoughts within him, occasioned by this vision, which oppressed and overwhelmed him the more because he was forbidden to publish what he had seen, so that "his belly was as wine which has no vent;" he was "ready to burst like new bottles," Job xxxii. 19. However, he kept it to himself, stifled and smothered the concern he was in, so that those he conversed with could not perceive it; but he "did the king's business" according to the duty of his place, whatever it was. Note, As long as we live in this world we must have something to do in it; and those whom God has most dignified with his favours yet must not think themselves above their business; nor must the pleasure of communion with God take us off from the duties of our particular callings, but still we must in them abide with God. Those especially that are intrusted with public business must see to it that they conscientiously discharge their trust.

CHAPTER IX.

In this chapter we have, I. Daniel's prayer for the restoration of the Jews who were now in captivity, in which he confesseth sin, acknowledgeth the justice of God in their calamities, but pleads God's promises of mercy which he had yet in store for them, ver. 1—19. II. An immediate answer sent him by an angel to his prayer, in which, 1. He is assured of the discharge of the Jews out of their captivity presently, ver. 20—23; and, 2. Is informed concerning the redemption of the world by Jesus Christ, of which that was a type, what should be the nature of it, and when it should be accomplished, ver. 24—27; and it is the clearest, brightest prophecy of the Messiah in all the Old Testament.

IN the first year of Darius the son of Ahasuerus, of the seed of the Medes, which was made king over the realm of the Chaldeans; 2 In the first year of his reign I Daniel understood by books the number of the years, whereof the word of the LORD came to Jeremiah the prophet, that he would accomplish seventy years in the desolations of Jerusalem. 3 And I set my face unto the Lord God, to seek by prayer and supplications, with fasting, and sackcloth, and ashes:

We left Daniel, in the close of the foregoing chapter, employed in the king's business, but here we have him employed in better business than any the king had for him, speaking to God and hearing from him, not for himself only, but for the church, whose mouth he was to God, and for whose use the oracles of God were committed to him, relating to the days of the Messiah. Observe,

First. When it was that Daniel had this communion with God; ver. 1, "In the first year of Darius" the Mede, who was newly made king of the Chaldeans, Babylon being conquered by him and his nephew, or grandson, Cyrus. In this year the seventy years of the Jewish captivity ended, but the decree for their release was not yet issued out, so that this address of Daniel's to God seems to have been ready in that year, and probably before he was cast into the lions' den. And one powerful inducement, perhaps, it was to him then to stick so close to the duty of prayer, though it cost him his life, that he had so lately experienced the benefit and comfort of it.

Secondly. What occasioned his address to God by prayer, ver. 2. He "understood by books" that seventy years was the time fixed for the continuance of "the desolations of Jerusalem," ver. 2. The book by which he understood this was the book of the prophecies of Jeremiah, in which he found it expressly foretold, Jer. xxix. 10, "After seventy years be accomplished in Babylon," (and therefore they must be reckoned from the first captivity, in the third year of Jehoiakim, which Daniel had reason to remember by a good token, for it was in that captivity that he was carried away himself, ch. i. 1,) "I will visit you, and perform my good works towards you." It was likewise said, Jer. xxv. 11, "This whole land shall be seventy years a desolation," chorbath, the same word that Daniel here useth for the desolations of Jerusalem, which shews he had that prophecy before him when he wrote this. Though Daniel was himself a great prophet, and one that was well acquainted with the visions of God, yet he was a diligent student in the Scripture, and thought it no disparagement to him to consult Jeremiah's prophecies. He was a great politician and prime minister of state to one of the greatest monarchs upon earth, and yet could find both heart and time to converse with the word of God. The greatest and best men in the world must not think themselves above their Bibles.

Thirdly. How serious and solemn his address to God was, when he understood that the seventy years were just upon expiring, (for it appears by Ezekiel's dating of his prophecies that they exactly computed the years of their captivity,) then he set his face to seek God by prayer. Note, God's promises are intended not to supersede but to excite and encourage our prayers; and when we see the day of the performance of them approaching, we should the more earnestly plead them with God and put them in suit. So Daniel did here; he prayed three times a day, and no doubt in every prayer made mention of the desolations of Jerusalem; yet he did not think that enough, but even in the midst of his business set time apart for an extraordinary application to heaven on Jerusalem's behalf. God had said to Ezekiel, that though Daniel, among others, stood before him, his intercession should not prevail to prevent the judgment, Eze. xiv. 14, yet he hopes, now "the warfare is accomplished," Isa. xl. 2, his prayer may be heard for the removing of the judgment. When the day of deliverance dawns it is time for God's praying people to bestir themselves; something extraordinary is then expected and required from them besides their daily sacrifice. Now Daniel sought, "by prayer and supplications," for fear lest the sins of the people should provoke him to defer their deliverance longer than was intended; or, rather, that the people might be prepared, by the grace of God, for the deliverance, now the providence of God was about to work it out for them. Now observe, 1. The intenseness of his mind in this prayer; "I set my face unto the Lord God to seek him," which notes the fixedness of his thoughts, the firmness of his faith, and the fervour of his devout affections in the duty. We must in prayer set God before us, and set ourselves as in his presence; to him we must direct our prayer, and must look up. Probably, in token of his setting his face towards God, he did, as usual, set his face towards Jerusalem, to affect his own heart the more with the desolations of it. 2. The mortification of his body in this prayer. In token of his deep humiliation before God, for his own sins and the sins of his people, and the sense he had of his unworthiness, when he prayed he fasted, put on sackcloth, and lay in ashes, the more to affect himself with the desolations of Jerusalem, which he was praying for the repair of, and to make himself sensible that he was now about an extraordinary work.

4 And I prayed unto the LORD my God, and made my confession, and said, O Lord, the great and dreadful God, keeping the covenant and mercy to them that love him, and to them that keep his commandments; 5 We have sinned, and have committed iniquity, and have done wickedly, and have rebelled, even by departing from thy precepts and from thy judgments: 6 Neither have we hearkened unto thy servants the prophets, which spake in thy name to our kings, our princes, and our fathers, and to all the people of the land. 7 O Lord, righteousness belongeth unto thee, but unto us confusion of faces, as at this day; to the men of Judah, and to the inhabitants of Jerusalem, and unto all Israel, that are near, and that are far off, through all the countries whither thou hast driven them, because of their trespass that they have trespassed against thee. 8 O Lord, to us belongeth confusion of face, to our kings, to our princes, and to our fathers, because we have sinned against thee. 9 To the Lord our God belong mercies and forgivenesses, though we have rebelled against him; 10 Neither have we obeyed the voice of the LORD our God, to walk in his laws, which he set before us by his servants the prophets. 11 Yea, all Israel have transgressed thy law, even by departing, that they might not obey thy voice; therefore the curse is poured upon us, and the oath that is written in the law of Moses the servant of God, because we have sinned against him. 12 And he hath confirmed his words, which he spake against us, and against our judges that judged us, by bringing upon us a great evil: for under the whole heaven hath not been done as hath been done upon Jerusalem. 13 As it is written in the law of Moses, all this evil is come upon us: yet made we not our prayer before the LORD our God, that we might turn from our iniquities, and understand thy truth. 14 Therefore hath the LORD watched upon the evil, and brought it upon us: for the LORD our God is righteous in all his works which he doeth: for we obeyed not his voice. 15 And now, O Lord our God, that hast brought thy people forth out of the land of Egypt with a mighty hand, and hast gotten thee renown, as at this day; we have sinned, we have done wickedly. 16 O Lord, according to all thy righteousness, I beseech thee, let thine anger and thy fury be turned away from thy city Jerusalem, thy holy mountain: because for our sins, and for the iniquities of our fathers, Jerusalem and thy people are become a reproach to all that are about us. 17

110 days. A good deal of difficulty has been felt in explaining this passage. If years are meant, the sanctuary would be desolate until after A.D. 2124. If days are meant, the time is twice as long as that given by Josephus for the profanation of the sanctuary under Antiochus. Perhaps, however, days may be meant, and the period be intended to include the series of events of which the profanation by law formed a part. This latter application has been strongly debated, and is now less in favour. That which makes the days years, and supposes the Romans are meant, finds some able supporters. That which on similar principles regards the Turkish power as the little horn is much controverted. Amid the numerous expositions it is hard to choose, and we must leave the problem as still doubtful.

viii. 16. The italics show that the Hebrew words rendered "between the banks of Ulai" are really "between Ulai." They might mean between the palace and the river, which was at some distance, but Mr. Loftus threw upon it a new and cheering light when he

Now therefore, O our God, hear the prayer of thy servant, and his supplications, and cause thy face to shine upon thy sanctuary that is desolate, for the Lord's sake. 18 O my God, incline thine ear, and hear; open thine eyes, and behold our desolations, and the city which is called by thy name: for we do not present our supplications before thee for our righteousnesses, but for thy great mercies. 19 O Lord, hear; O Lord, forgive; O Lord, hearken and do; defer not, for thine own sake, O my God: for thy city and thy people are called by thy name.

We have here Daniel's prayer to God, as his God, and the confession which he joined with that prayer, "I prayed and made my confession." Note, In every prayer we must make confession not only of the sins we have been guilty of, which we commonly call confession, but of our faith in God and dependence upon him, our sorrow for sin, and our resolutions against it. It must be our confession, must be the language of our own convictions, and that which we ourselves do heartily subscribe to.

Let us go over the several parts of this prayer, which we have reason to think he offered up much larger than is here recorded, and that these are only the heads of it.

First. Here is his humble, serious, reverent address to God, in which he gives glory to God, 1. As a God to be feared, and whom it is our duty always to stand in awe of; "O Lord, the great and dreadful God," that art able to deal with the greatest and most terrible of the church's enemies! 2. As a God to be trusted, and whom it is our duty to depend upon and put a confidence in; "keeping the covenant and mercy to them that love him," and, as a proof of their love to him, "keep his commandments." If we do our part of the bargain he will not fail to do this. He will be to his people as good as his word, for he keeps covenant with them, and not one iota of his promise shall fall to the ground: nay, he will be better than his word, for he keeps mercy to them something more than was in the covenant. It was proper for Daniel to have his eye upon God's mercy, now he was to lay before him the miseries of his people; and upon God's covenant, now he was to sue for the performance of a promise. Note, We should, in prayer, look both at God's greatness and his goodness, his majesty and mercy in conjunction.

Secondly. Here is a penitent confession of sin, the procuring cause of all the calamities which his people had for so many years been groaning under, ver. 5, 6. When we seek to God for national mercies we ought to humble ourselves before him for national sins. These are the sins Daniel here laments; and it is observable what variety of words he makes use of to set forth the greatness of their provocations, for it becomes penitents to lay loads upon themselves; "We have sinned" in many particular instances, nay, we "have committed iniquity," we have driven a trade of sin, we "have done wickedly" with a hard heart and a stiff neck, and herein we have rebelled, have taken up arms against the King of kings, his crown and dignity. Two things aggravated their sins:

1. That they had violated the express laws God had given them by Moses. We have "departed from thy precepts and from thy judgments," and have not conformed to them; and, ver. 10, We have not "obeyed the voice of the Lord our God." That which speaks the nature of sin, that it is the transgression of the law, doth sufficiently speak the malignity of it. If sin be made to appear sin, it cannot be made to appear worse: its sinfulness is its greatest hatefulness, Rom. vii. 13. God has set his laws before us plainly and fully, as the copy we should write after, yet we have not walked in them, but turned aside, or turned back.

2. That they had slighted the fair warnings God had given them by the prophets, which in every age he had sent to them, "rising up betimes and sending them," ver. 6. "We have not hearkened to thy servants the prophets," who have put us in mind of thy laws and of thy sanctions of them; though they "spake in thy name," we have not regarded them; though they delivered their message faithfully, with a universal respect to all orders and degrees of men, to our kings and princes, whom they had the courage and confidence to speak to, to our fathers, and to all the people of the land whom they had the condescension and compassion to speak to, yet we have not hearkened to them, not heard them, or not heeded them, or not complied with them. Mocking God's messengers, and despising his words, were Jerusalem's measure-filling sins, 2 Chr. xxxvi. 16. This confession of sin is repeated here, and much insisted on; penitents should again and again accuse and reproach themselves, till they find their hearts thoroughly broken. "All Israel have transgressed thy law," ver. 11. It is Israel, God's professing people, that have known better, and from whom better is expected—Israel, God's peculiar people, whom he has surrounded with his favours; not here and there one, but it is all Israel, the generality of them, the body of the people, that has transgressed by departing, and getting out of the way, that they might not hear, and so might not obey thy voice. This disobedience is that which all true penitents do most sensibly charge upon themselves; ver. 14, "We obeyed not his voice;" and, ver. 15, "We have sinned, we have done wickedly." Those that would find mercy must thus confess their sins.

Thirdly. Here is a self-abasing acknowledgment of the righteousness of God in all the judgments that were brought upon them. And it is evermore the way of true penitents thus to justify God, that he may be clear when he judgeth, and the sinner may bear all the blame.

1. He acknowledgeth that it was sin that plunged them in all these troubles. Israel is dispersed through all the countries about, and so weakened, impoverished, and exposed. God's hand has driven him hither and thither, some near where they are known, and therefore the more ashamed, others afar off, where they are not known, and therefore the more abandoned; and it is "because of their trespass that they have trespassed," ver. 7. They mingled themselves with the nations, that they might be debauched by them; and now God mingles them with the nations, that they may be stripped by them.

2. He owns the righteousness of God in it, that he had done them no wrong in all he had brought upon them, but had dealt with them as they deserved; ver. 7, "O Lord, righteousness belongeth to thee." We have no fault to find with thy providence, no exceptions to make against thy judgments; for, ver. 14, "The Lord our God is righteous in all his works which he doth," even in these sore calamities we are now under, for we obeyed not the words of his mouth, and therefore justly feel the weight of his hand. This seems to be borrowed from Lam. i. 18.

3. He takes notice of the fulfilling of the Scripture in what was brought upon them. In very faithfulness he afflicted them, for it was according to the word which he had spoken; "The curse is poured upon us, and the oath;" that is, the curse that was ratified by an oath in the law of Moses, ver. 11. This farther justifies God in his troubles, that he did but inflict the penalty of the law, and which he had given them fair notice of. It was necessary for the preserving of the honour of God's veracity, and saving his government from contempt, that the threatenings of his word should be accomplished, otherwise they look but as bugbears; nay, they seem not at all frightful. Therefore "he hath confirmed his words which he spake against us," because we broke his laws, "and against our judges that judged" us, because they did not, according to the duty of their place, punish the breach of God's laws. He told them many a time that if they did not execute justice, as terrors to evil-workers, he must and would take the work into his own hands. And now he has confirmed what he said, "by bringing upon us a great evil," in which the princes and judges themselves deeply shared. Note, It contributes very much to our profiting by the judgments of God's hand to observe how exactly they agree with the judgments of his mouth.

4. He aggravates the calamities they were in, lest they should seem, having been long used to them, to make light of them, and so to lose the benefit of the chastening of the Lord by despising it. It is not some of the common troubles of life that we are complaining of, but that which has in it some special marks of Divine displeasure; "for under the whole heaven has not been done as hath been done upon Jerusalem," ver. 12. It is Jeremiah's lamentation, in the name of the church, "Was ever sorrow like unto my sorrow?" which must suppose another like question, Was ever sin like unto my sin?

5. He puts shame upon the whole nation, from the highest to the lowest, and if they will say Amen to his prayer, as it was fit they should, if they would come in for a share in the benefit of it, they must all put their hand upon their mouth, and their mouth in the dust; to us belong "confusion of face, as at this day," ver. 7. We lie under the shame of the punishment at this day, and we ought to accommodate ourselves to it, and to accept of the punishment of our iniquity, for shame is our due. If Israel had retained their character, and had continued a holy people, they had been "high above all nations in praise, and name, and honour," Deu. xxvi. 19. But now they have "sinned and done wickedly," confusion and disgrace belong to them, to "the men of Judah and the inhabitants of Jerusalem," the inhabitants both of the country and the city, for they have been all alike guilty before God; it belongs to all Israel, both to the two tribes that are near by the rivers of Babylon, and to the ten tribes that are afar off in the land of Assyria. Confusion belongs not only to the common people of our land, but to our kings, our princes, and our fathers, ver. 8, who should set a better example, and have used their authority and influence for the checking of the threatening torrent of vice and profaneness.

6. He imputes the continuance of the judgment to their incorrigibleness under it; ver 13, 14, "All this evil is come upon us," and has lain long upon us, "yet made we not our prayer before the Lord our God," not in a right manner, as we should have made it, "with an humble, lowly, penitent, and obedient heart." We have been smitten, but have not returned to him that smote us; 'we have not intreated the face of the Lord our God,' so the word is; we have taken no care to make our peace with God, and reconcile ourselves to him. Daniel set his brethren a good example of praying continually, but he was sorry to see how few there were that followed his example. In their affliction it was expected they would seek God early, but they sought him not, that they might "turn from their iniquities, and understand his truth." The errand upon which afflictions are sent is, to bring men to turn from their iniquities, and to understand God's truth; so Elihu had explained them, Job xxxvi. 10. God, by them, "opens men's ears to discipline, and commandeth that they turn from iniquity." And if men were brought rightly to understand God's truth, and to submit to the power and authority of it, they would turn from the error of their ways. Now the first step towards this is, to "make our prayer before the Lord our God," that the affliction may be sanctified before it is removed, and that the grace of God may go along with the providence of God, to make it answer the end. Those that in their affliction make not their prayer to God, that cry not when he bindeth them, are not likely to turn from iniquity, or to understand his truth. Therefore, because we have not improved the affliction, "the Lord hath watched upon the evil," as the judge takes care that execution be done according to the sentence; because we have not been melted, he hath kept us still in the furnace, and watched over it, to make the heat yet more intense; for when God judgeth he will overcome, and will be justified in all his proceedings.

Fourthly. Here is a believing appeal to the mercy of God, and to the ancient tokens of his favour to Israel, and the concern of his own glory in their interests.

1. It is some comfort to them, (and not a little,) that God has been always ready to pardon sin; ver. 9, "To the Lord our God belong mercies and forgivenesses." This refers to that proclamation of his name, Ex. xxxiv. 6, 7, "The Lord God, gracious and merciful, forgiving iniquity." Note, It is very encouraging to poor sinners that mercies belong to God, as it is convincing and humbling to them that righteousness belongs to him; and they who give him the glory of his righteousness may take to themselves the comfort of his mercies, Ps. lxii. 12. There are abundant mercies in God, and not only forgiveness but forgivenesses; he is a God of pardon, Neh. ix. 17; he multiplies to pardon, Isa. lv. 7, "Though we have rebelled against him," yet with him there is mercy, pardoning mercy, even for the rebellious.

2. It is likewise a support to them to think that God had formerly glorified himself by delivering them out of Egypt; so far he looks back for the encouragement of his faith; ver. 15, "Thou hast" formerly "brought thy people out of Egypt with a mighty hand," and wilt thou not now with the same mighty hand bring them out of Babylon? Were they then formed into a people? and shall they not now be reformed, and newly formed? Are they now sinful and unworthy? and were they not so then? Are their oppressors now mighty and haughty? and were they not so then? And hath not God said, that their deliverance out of Babylon shall outshine even that out of Egypt? Jer. xvi. 14, 15. The force of this plea lies in that, "Thou hast gotten thee renown," hast "made thee a name," so the word is, "as at this day," that is, even to this day, by bringing us out of Egypt; and wilt thou lose the credit of that, by letting us perish in Babylon? Didst thou get a renown by that deliverance we have so often commemorated, and wilt thou not now get thee a renown by this which we have so often prayed for, and so long waited for?

Fifthly. Here is a pathetical complaint of the reproach that God's people lay under, and the ruins that God's sanctuary lay in, both which redounded very much to the dishonour of God, and the diminution of that name and renown which God had gained by bringing them out of Egypt.

1. God's holy people were despised. By their "sins and the iniquities of their fathers" they had profaned their crown, and made themselves despicable; and then, though they are in name and profession God's people, and upon that account truly great and honourable, yet they are become a "reproach to all announced that the Eulæus or Ulai anciently ran in two channels, and said if we understand the passage to mean "between the two streams of the Eulæus, nothing can be more lucid or intelligible." One of the two ancient channels is now dry. Gabriel is mentioned by name only in this book of the Old Testament, here and in chap. ix. 21. In the New Testament he is expressly called an angel (Luke i. 26). Later ages have conferred on him a higher title, and he appears as one of the four or seven archangels of Jews and Christians.

viii. 23. What the "dark sentences" or enigmas are, which the king "of fierce countenance" would understand, is itself obscure. Some who regard the king as Julian the Apostate, or the like, think the words mean skill in the knowledge and practice of arts which might induce men to apostacy. Others, who suppose a kingdom or government is intended, explain it of certain forms of statecraft. On the whole we incline to the opinion that the imagery points to an empire rather than to an individual, to Rome rather than to that are round about them." Their neighbours laugh them to scorn, and triumph in their disgrace. Note, Sin is a reproach to any people, but especially to God's people, that have more eyes upon them, and have more honour to lose, than other people.

2. God's holy place was desolate. Jerusalem the holy city was a reproach, ver. 16; when it lay in ruins it was an astonishment and a hissing to all that passed by. The sanctuary, the holy house, was desolate, ver. 17; the altars demolished, and all the buildings laid in ashes. Note, The desolations of the sanctuary are the grief of all the saints, who reckon all their comforts in this world buried in the ruins of the sanctuary.

Sixthly. Here is an importunate request to God for the restoring of the poor captive Jews to their former enjoyments again. The petition is very pressing, for God gives us leave in prayer to wrestle with him; "O Lord, I beseech thee," ver. 16. If ever thou wilt do any thing for me, do this; it is my heart's desire and prayer. "Now, therefore, O our God, hear the prayer of thy servant, and his supplication," ver. 17, and grant an answer of peace to it. Now what are his petitions? what are his requests?

1. That God would turn away his wrath from them,—that is it which all the saints dread and deprecate more than any thing; O let "thine anger be turned away from thy Jerusalem, thy holy mountain," ver. 16. He doth not pray for the turning again of their captivity,—let the Lord do with them as seemeth good in his eyes; but they pray first for the turning away of God's wrath. Take away the cause, and the effect will cease.

2. That he would lift up the light of his countenance upon them; ver. 17, "Cause thy face to shine upon thy sanctuary that is desolate," that is, return in mercy to us and shew that thou art reconciled to us, and then all shall be well. Note, The shining of God's face upon the desolations of the sanctuary is all in all towards the repair of it, and upon that foundation it must be rebuilt. If, therefore, its friends would begin their work at the right end, they must first be earnest with God in prayer for his favour, and recommend his desolate sanctuary to his smiles. "Cause thy face to shine, and then we shall be saved," Ps. lxxx. 3.

3. That he would forgive their sins, and then hasten their deliverance; ver. 19, "O Lord hear, O Lord forgive." That the mercy prayed for may be granted in mercy, let the sin that threatens to come between us and it be removed; "O Lord, hearken and do." Not hearken and speak only, but hearken and do; do that for us which none else can, and that speedily; "defer not, O my God." Now he saw the appointed day approaching he could in faith pray that God would make haste to them, and not defer. David often prays, "Make haste, O God, to help me."

Seventhly. Here are several pleas and arguments to enforce the petitions. God gives us leave not only to pray, but to plead with him; which is not to move him,—he himself knows what he will do,—but to move ourselves, to excite our fervency and encourage our faith.

1. They disdain a dependence upon any righteousness of their own, they pretend not to merit any thing at God's hand but wrath and the curse; ver. 18, "We do not present our supplications before thee," with hope to speed for our righteousness, as if we were worthy to receive thy favour for any good in us, or done by us, or could demand any thing as a debt; we cannot insist upon our own justification, no, though we were more righteous than we are; nay, though we knew nothing amiss by ourselves, yet are we not thereby justified, nor would we answer, but we would make supplication to our Judge. Moses had told Israel long before, that, whatever God did for them, it was not for their righteousness, Deu. ix. 4, 5. And Ezekiel had of late told them that their return out of Babylon would be "not for their sakes," Eze. xxxvi. 22, 32. Note, Whenever we come to God for mercy we must lay aside all conceit of, and confidence in, our own righteousness.

2. They take their encouragement in prayer from God only, as knowing that his reasons of mercy are fetched from within himself; and, therefore, from him we must borrow all our pleas for mercy, and so give honour to him when we are suing for grace and mercy from him. 1st. Do it "for thine own sake," ver. 19: for the accomplishment of thine own counsel, the performance of thine own promise, and the manifestation of thine own glory. Note, God will do his own work, not only in his own way and time, but for his own sake; and so we must take it. 2nd. Do it "for the Lord's sake;" that is, for the Lord Christ's sake, for the sake of the Messiah promised, who is the Lord: so the most and best of our Christian interpreters understand it. For the sake of Adonai, so David called the Messiah, Ps. cx. 1. And mercy is prayed for, for the church, for the sake of the Son of man, Ps. lxxx. 17, and "for thy word's sake," 2 Sam. vii. 21. Note, Christ is the Lord, he is Lord of all; it is for his sake that God causeth his face to shine upon sinners, when they repent and turn to him, because of the satisfaction he has made. In all our prayers, that therefore must be our plea, we must "make mention of his righteousness, even of his only," Ps. lxxi. 16; "Look upon the face of thy anointed." He has himself directed us to ask in his name. 3rd. Do it "according to all thy righteousness," ver. 16; that is, plead for us against our persecutors and oppressors according to thy righteousness. Though we are ourselves unrighteous before God, yet with reference to them we have a righteous cause, which we leave it with the righteous God to appear in the defence of. Or rather, by the righteousness of God here is meant his faithfulness to his promise. God had according to his righteousness executed the threatening, ver. 11. Now, Lord, wilt thou not do according to all thy righteousness? Wilt thou not be as true to thy promises as thou hast been to thy threatenings, and accomplish them also? 4th. Do it "for thy great mercies," ver. 18; to make it to appear that thou art a merciful God. The good things we ask of God we call mercies, because we expect them purely from God's mercy. And because misery is the proper object of mercy, the prophet here spreads the deplorable condition of the church before God, as it were to move his compassion; "Open thine eyes, and behold our desolations," especially the desolations of the sanctuary. O look with pity upon a piteous case! Note, The desolations of the church must in prayer be laid before God, and then left with him. 5th. Do it for the sake of the relation we stand in to them. The sanctuary that is desolate is thy sanctuary, ver. 17; dedicated to thine honour, employed in thy service, and the place of thy residence. Jerusalem is thy city, and thy holy mountain, ver. 16; it is "the city that is called by thy name," ver. 18; it was the city which God had "chosen out of all the tribes of Israel, to put his name there." The people that are become a reproach are thy people, and thy name suffers in the reproach cast upon them, ver. 16; they are "called by thy name," ver. 19. Lord, thou hast a property in them, and therefore are interested in their interests; wilt thou not provide for thine own, for those of thine own house? They are thine, save them, Ps. cxix. 94.

20 And whiles I was speaking, and praying, and confessing my sin and the sin of my people Israel, and presenting my supplication before the LORD my God for the holy mountain of my God; 21 Yea, whiles I was speaking in prayer, even the man Gabriel, whom I had seen in the vision at the beginning, being caused to fly swiftly, touched me about the time of the evening oblation. 22 And he informed me, and talked with me, and said, O Daniel, I am now come forth to give thee skill and understanding. 23 At the beginning of thy supplications the commandment came forth, and I am come to shew thee; for thou art greatly beloved: therefore understand the matter, and consider the vision. 24 Seventy weeks are determined upon thy people and upon thy holy city, to finish the transgression, and to make an end of sins, and to make reconciliation for iniquity, and to bring in everlasting righteousness, and to seal up the vision and prophecy, and to anoint the most Holy. 25 Know therefore and understand, that from the going forth of the commandment to restore and to build Jerusalem unto the Messiah the Prince shall be seven weeks, and threescore and two weeks: the street shall be built again, and the wall, even in troublous times. 26 And after threescore and two weeks shall Messiah be cut off, but not for himself: and the people of the prince that shall come shall destroy the city and the sanctuary; and the end thereof shall be with a flood, and unto the end of the war desolations are determined. 27 And he shall confirm the covenant with many for one week: and in the midst of the week he shall cause the sacrifice and the oblation to cease, and for the overspreading of abominations he shall make it desolate, even until the consummation, and that determined shall be poured upon the desolate.

We have here the answer that was immediately sent to Daniel's prayer; and it is a very memorable one, as it contains the most illustrious prediction of Christ and gospel grace that is extant in all the Old Testament. If John Baptist was the morning star, this was the day-break to the Sun of righteousness; "the dayspring from on high." Here is,

First. The time when this answer was given.

1. It was while Daniel was at prayer. This he observed, and laid a mighty emphasis upon: "While I was speaking," ver. 20; yea, "whiles I was speaking in prayer," ver. 21; before he rose from his knees, and while there was yet more which he intended to say. He mentions the two heads he chiefly insisted upon in prayer, and which perhaps he designed yet farther to enlarge upon. 1st. He was confessing sin, and lamenting that, both "my sin," and "the sin of my people Israel." Daniel was a very great and good man, and yet he finds sin of his own to confess before God, and is ready to confess it; for there is not a just man upon earth that doth good, and sins not, nor that sins, and repents not. St. John puts himself into the number of those who deceive themselves, if they say they have no sin, and who therefore confess their sins, 1 Jno. i. 8. Good men find it an ease to their consciences to pour out their complaints before the Lord against themselves, and that is confessing sin. He also confessed the sin of his people, and bewailed that. Those who are heartily concerned for the glory of God, and the welfare of the church, and the souls of men, will mourn for others' sins as well as for their own. 2nd. He was "making supplications before the Lord his God," and presenting it to him as an intercessor for Israel; and in this prayer his concern was for "the holy mountain of his God," mount Zion. The desolations of the sanctuary lay nearer his heart than those of the city and the land; and the repair of that, and the setting up the public worship of the God of Israel again, was what he had in view in the deliverance he was preparing for, more than the re-establishment of their civil interests. Now while Daniel was thus employed, First. He had a grant made him of the mercy he prayed for. Note, God is very ready to hear prayer, and to give an answer of peace. Now was fulfilled what God had spoken, Isa. lxv. 24, "While they are yet speaking, I will hear." Daniel grew very fervent in prayer, and his affections were very strong, ver. 18, 19. And "while he was speaking" with such fervour and ardency, the angel came to him with a gracious answer. God is well pleased with lively devotions. We cannot now expect that God should send us answers to our prayer by angels; but if we pray with fervency for that which God hath promised we may by faith take the promise as an immediate answer to the prayer; for "he is faithful that has promised." Secondly. He had a discovery made him of a far greater and more glorious redemption which God would work out for his church in the latter days. Note, Those that would be brought acquainted with Christ and his grace must be much in prayer.

2. It was "about the time of the evening oblation," ver. 21. The altar was in ruins, and there was no oblation offered upon it; but it should seem the pious Jews in their captivity were daily thoughtful of the time when it should have been offered, and at that hour were ready to weep at the remembrance of it.

Antiochus. There are many who regard the symbols as indicating a great religious delusion and apostacy, such as Popery and Mahometanism. However, our space will not allow us to discuss the various theories, which can only be elucidated in separate works.

ix. 1, 2. The question of the identification of Darius has been alluded to under chap. v. 31. Ahasuerus is supposed to be the Astyages of the Greeks. Both names, Darius and Ahasuerus, were given to different persons, and it is not always certain which is intended by writers. As the seventy years were not yet finished, we must suppose that Daniel had special reasons for the course he pursued at this time. The prayer which follows requires no great critical skill for its interpretation, as almost every expression in it is simple and clear. Among its more interesting features, from a literary point of view, are its references to the older Scriptures, and especially to the law of Moses.

ix. 24. What is here written is given as the record of a distinct and desired and hoped that their prayer should be "set forth before God as incense," and the "lifting up of their hands," and their hearts with their hands, should be acceptable in his sight as the evening sacrifice, Ps. cxli. 2. The evening oblation was a type of the great sacrifice which Christ was to offer in the evening of the world; and it was in the virtue of that sacrifice that Daniel's prayer was accepted, when he prayed "for the Lord's sake," and for the sake of that this glorious discovery of redeeming love was made to him; the Lamb opened the seals in the virtue of his own blood.

Secondly. The messenger by whom this answer was sent. It was not given him in a dream, or by a voice from heaven; but, for the greater certainty and solemnity of it, an angel was sent on purpose, appearing in human shape, to give this answer to Daniel. Observe,

1. Who this angel or messenger was. It was the man Gabriel: if Michael the archangel be, as many suppose, no other than Jesus Christ, this Gabriel is the only created angel that is named in Scripture; Gabriel signifies, 'the mighty one of God;' for the angels are "great in power and might," 2 Pet. ii. 11. It was he "whom I had seen in the vision at the beginning." Daniel heard him called by his name, and thence learned it, ch. viii. 18; and, though then he trembled at his approach, yet he observed him so carefully that now he knew him again, knew him to be the same that he had seen at the beginning; and, being somewhat better acquainted with him, was not now so terrified at the sight of him as he had been at first. When this angel said to Zacharias, "I am Gabriel," Lu. i. 19, he intended thereby to put him in mind of this notice which he had given to Daniel of the Messiah's coming, when it was at a distance, for the confirming of his faith, in the notice he was then about to give of it, as at the door.

2. The instructions which this messenger received from the Father of lights to whom David prayed; ver. 23, "At the beginning of thy supplications" the word, "the commandment, came forth" from God. Notice was given to the angels in heaven of this counsel of God, which they were desirous to look into, and orders given to Gabriel to go immediately and bring the notice of it to Daniel. By this it appears it was not any thing Daniel said that moved God, for the answer was given as he began to pray; but God was well pleased with his serious, solemn address to the duty, and in token of that sent him this gracious message. Or, perhaps it was "at the beginning of Daniel's supplications," that Cyrus's word or commandment went forth to restore and to build Jerusalem, that going forth spoken of, ver. 25. The thing is done this very day; the proclamation of liberty to the Jews is signed this morning, just then when thou wast praying for it; and now at the close of this fast day Daniel has notice of it, as at the close of the day of atonement the jubilee trumpet sounded to proclaim liberty.

3. The haste he made to deliver his message. He was "caused to fly swiftly," ver. 21. Angels are winged messengers, quick in their motions, and delay not to execute the orders they receive; they run and "return like a flash of lightning," Eze. i. 14. But it should seem sometimes they are more expeditious than at other times, and make a quicker dispatch, as here the angel was "caused to fly swiftly," that is, he was ordered and he was enabled to fly swiftly. Angels do their work in obedience to Divine command, and in dependence upon Divine strength. Though they excel in wisdom, they fly swifter or slower, as God directs; and though they excel in power, they fly but as God causeth them to fly. Angels themselves are to us what he makes them to be; they are his ministers, and do his pleasure, Ps. ciii. 21.

4. The prefaces or introductions to his message. 1st. He "touched him," ver. 22; as before, ch. viii. 18; not to awaken him out of sleep, as then, but to give him a hint to break off his prayer, and to attend to that which he has to say in answer to it. Note, In order to the keeping up of our communion with God, we must not only be forward to speak to God, but as forward to hear what he has to say to us; when we have prayed, we must look up, must look after our prayers, must set ourselves upon our watch tower. 2nd. He "talked with him," ver. 22; talked familiarly with him, as one friend talks with another, that his terror might not make him afraid. He informed him on what errand he came, that he was sent from heaven on purpose with a kind message to him; "I am come to shew thee," ver. 23; to tell thee that which thou didst not know before. He had shewed him the troubles of the church under Antiochus, and the period of those troubles, ch. viii. 19, but now he has greater things to shew him; for he that is faithful in a little shall be intrusted with more. Nay, "I am now come forth to give thee skill and understanding," ver. 22; not only to shew thee these things, but to make thee understand them. 3rd. He assures him he was a favourite of heaven, else he had not had this intelligence sent him, and he must take it as a favour; "I am come to shew thee, for thou art greatly beloved;" thou art "a man of desires," acceptable to God, and whom he has a favour for. Note, Though God loves all his children, yet there are some that are more than the rest greatly beloved. Christ had one disciple that lay in his bosom, and that beloved disciple was he that was intrusted with the prophetical visions of the New Testament, as Daniel was with those of the Old. For what greater token can there be of God's favour to any man than for the secrets of the Lord to be with him? Abraham is the friend of God, and therefore "Shall I hide from Abraham that thing which I do?" Gen. xviii. 17. Note, Those may reckon themselves greatly beloved of God to whom, and in whom, he reveals his Son. Some observe that the title which this angel Gabriel gives to the Virgin Mary was much the same with this he here gives to Daniel, as if he designed to put her in mind of it, "Thou that art highly favoured;" as Daniel, "greatly beloved." 4th. He demands his serious attention to the discovery he was now about to make to him; "Therefore understand the matter and consider the vision," ver. 23. This intimates that it was a thing well worthy of his regard, above any of the visions he had been before favoured with. Note, Those who would understand the things of God must consider them; must apply their minds to them, ponder upon them, and compare spiritual things with spiritual. The reason why we are so much in the dark concerning the revealed will of God, and mistake concerning it, is for want of consideration. This vision both requires and deserves consideration.

Thirdly. The message itself, delivered with great solemnity, received no doubt with great attention, and recorded with great exactness; but in it, as is usual in prophecies, there are things dark and hard to be understood. Daniel, that understood by the book of the prophet Jeremiah the expiration of the seventy years of the captivity, is now honourably employed to make known to the church another more glorious release, which that was but a shadow of, at the end of another seventy, not years, but weeks of years. He prayed over that prophecy, and received this in answer to that prayer. He had prayed for his people, and the holy city, that they might be released, that it might be rebuilt; but God answers him above what he was able to ask or think. God not only grants but outdoes the desires of them that fear him, Ps. xxi. 4.

1. The times here determined are somewhat hard to be understood. In general it is seventy weeks; that is, seventy times seven years, which makes just four hundred and ninety years; that is, the great affairs that are yet to come concerning the people of Israel and the city of Jerusalem will lie within the compass of these years.

1st. These years are thus described by weeks. First. In conformity to the prophetical style, which is for the most part abstruse, and out of the common road of speaking, that the things foretold might not lie too obvious. Secondly. To put an honour upon the division of time into weeks, which was made purely by the sabbath day, and to signify that that should be perpetual. Thirdly. With reference to the seventy years of the captivity. As they had been so long kept out of the possession of their own land, so being now restored to it they should seven times as long be kept in the possession of it. So much more doth God delight in shewing mercy than in punishing. The land had enjoyed its sabbaths in a melancholy sense seventy years, Lev. xxvi. 34; but now the peop' of the Lord shall, in a comfortable sense, enjoy their sabbath seven times seventy years, and in them seventy sabbatical years, which makes ten jubilees. Such proportions are there in the disposals of Providence, that we might see and admire the wisdom of him who hath "determined the times before appointed."

2nd. The difficulties that arise about these seventy weeks are, First. Concerning the time when they commence, and whence they are to be reckoned. They are here dated "from the going forth of the commandment to restore and to build Jerusalem," ver. 25. I should most incline to understand this of the edict of Cyrus, mentioned Ezr. i. 1, for by it the people were restored; and though express mention be not made there of the building of Jerusalem, yet that is supposed in the building of the temple, and was foretold to be done by Cyrus, Isa. xliv. 28. He shall "say to Jerusalem, Thou shalt be built." That was, both in prophecy and history, the most famous decree for the building of Jerusalem. Nay, it should seem this going forth of the commandment (which may as well be meant of God's command concerning it as of Cyrus's) is the same with that going forth of the commandment mentioned, ver. 23, which was at the beginning of Daniel's supplications. And it looks very graceful that the seventy weeks should begin immediately upon the expiration of the seventy years. And there is nothing to be objected against this, but that by this reckoning the Persian monarchy, from the taking of Babylon by Cyrus to Alexander's conquest of Darius, lasted but one hundred and thirty years; whereas, by the particular account given of the reigns of the Persian emperors, it is computed that it continued two hundred and thirty years: so Thucydides, Xenophon, and others reckon. Those who fix it to that first edict set aside these computations of the heathen historians as uncertain and not to be relied upon. But others, willing to reconcile them, begin at the four hundred and ninety years, not at the edict of Cyrus, Ezr. i. 1, but at the second edict for the building of Jerusalem, issued out by Darius Nothus, above one hundred years after, mentioned, Ezr. vi.; others, in the seventh year of Artaxerxes Mnemon, who sent Ezra with a commission, Ezr. vii. 8—12. The learned Mr. Pool, in his Latin Synopsis, has a vast and most elaborate collection of what has been said, pro and con, concerning the different beginnings of these weeks, with which the learned may entertain themselves. Secondly. Concerning the period of them. And here likewise interpreters are not agreed. Some make them to end at the death of Christ; and think the express words of this famous prophecy will warrant us to conclude, that from this very hour, when Gabriel spoke to Daniel, at the time of the evening oblation, to the hour when Christ died, which was towards evening too, was exactly four hundred and ninety years; and I am willing enough to be of that opinion. But others think because it is said, that "in the midst of the week," that is, the last of the seventy weeks, he "shall cause the sacrifice and the oblation to cease," they end three years and a half after the death of Christ, when, the Jews having rejected the Gospel, the apostles turned to the Gentiles. But they who make them to end precisely at the death of Christ read it thus: He shall "make strong the testament to the many; the last seven," or the last week, yea, half that seven, or half that week, (namely, the latter half, the three years and a half which Christ spent in his public ministry,) shall bring to an end sacrifice and oblation. Others make these four hundred and ninety years to end with the destruction of Jerusalem, about thirty-seven years after the death of Christ, because these seventy weeks are said to be determined upon the people of the Jews and the holy city; and much is said here concerning the destruction of the city and the sanctuary. Thirdly. Concerning the division of them into seven weeks, and sixty-two weeks, and one week; and the reason of this is as hard to account for as any thing else. In the first seven weeks, or forty-nine years, the temple and city were built; and in the last single week Christ preached his Gospel, by which the Jewish economy was taken down, and the foundations laid of the gospel city and temple, which were to be built upon the ruins of the former.

3rd. But whatever uncertainty we may labour under concerning the exact fixing of these times, there is enough clear and certain to answer the two great ends of determining them. First. It did serve then to raise and support the expectations of believers. There were general promises of the coming of the Messiah made to the patriarchs; the preceding prophets had often spoken of him as one that should come, but never was the time fixed for his coming till now. And though there might be so much doubt concerning the date of this reckoning, that they could not ascertain the time just to a year, yet, by the light of this prophecy, they were directed about what time to expect him. And we find accordingly that when Christ came he was generally looked for, as the consolation of Israel, and redemption in Jerusalem by him, Lu. ii. 25, 38. There were those that for this reason thought the "kingdom of God should immmediately appear," Lu. xix. 11; and some think this was it that brought a more than ordinary concourse of people to Jerusalem, Acts ii. 5. Secondly. It doth serve still to refute and silence the expectations of unbelievers, who will not own that Jesus is he who should come, but still look for another. This prediction silenced them, and will condemn them; for, reckon these seventy weeks from which of the commandments to build Jerusalem we please, it is certain they are expired above one thousand five hundred years ago; so that the Jews are for ever without excuse who will not own that the Messiah is come, when they are gone so far beyond their utmost reckoning for his coming. But by this we are confirmed in our belief of the Messiah's being come, and that our Jesus is he, that he came just at the time prefixed, a time worthy to be had in everlasting remembrance.

2. The events here foretold are more plain and easy to be understood, at least to us now. Observe what is here foretold,

1st. Concerning the return of the Jews now speedily to their own land, and their settlement again there, which was the thing that Daniel now principally prayed for, and yet it is but briefly touched upon here in the answer to his prayer. Let this be a comfort to the pious Jews, that a commandment shall go forth to "restore and to build Jerusalem," ver. 25. And the commandment shall not be in vain; for, though the times will be very troublous, and this good work will meet with great opposition, yet it shall be carried on and brought to perfection at last. The street shall be built again as spacious and splendid as ever it was, and the walls, even in troublous times. Note, As long as we are here in this world we must expect troublous times, upon some account or other, even then when we have joyous times. Yet we must rejoice with trembling; it is but a gleam, it is but a lucid interval of peace and prosperity; the clouds will return after the rain, when the Jews are restored in triumph to their own land; yet there they must expect troublous times, and prepare for them. But this is our comfort, that God will carry on his own work, will build up his Jerusalem, will beautify it, will fortify it, even in troublous times. Nay, the revelation, yet it must be confessed that few portions of Scripture have evoked so much elaborate criticism and so many different interpretations. Professor Moses Stuart, as quoted by Barnes, says, "It would require a volume of considerable magnitude even to give a history of the ever-varying and contradictory opinions of critics respecting this locus vexatissimus, and perhaps a still larger one to establish an exegesis which would stand." He thinks that no interpretation yet given would resist every test, and that consequently one fully satisfactory had not appeared. And yet it is certain that some portions of the prophecy are explicable, and that a general idea of the whole is not unattainable. The seventy years of the captivity are to be followed by seventy weeks full of eventful interest, and followed by results of universal and eternal importance. The most popular view is that the seventy weeks are seventy times seven years, a prophetic week being seven years. When this is admitted, the difficulties are what year to start from, and what events troublousness of the times may, by the grace of God, contribute to the advancement of the church. The more it is afflicted the more it multiplies.

2nd. Concerning the Messiah and his undertaking. The carnal Jews looked for a Messiah that should deliver them from the Roman yoke, and give them temporal power and wealth; whereas they were here told that the Messiah should come upon another errand, purely spiritual, and upon the account of which he should be the more welcome. First. Christ came to take away sin, and to abolish that. Sin had made a quarrel between God and man, had alienated man from God, and provoked God against man; that was it that put dishonour upon God, and brought misery upon mankind; that was the great mischief-maker. He that would do God a real service, and man a real kindness, must be the destruction of that. Christ undertakes to be so, and for this purpose he is manifested, "to destroy the works of the devil." He doth not say, To finish your transgressions and your sins, but transgression and sin in general; for he is the propitiation not only for our sins, that are Jews, but "for the sins of the whole world." He came, 1*st.* To finish transgression; to restrain it, so some; to break the power of it, to bruise the head of that serpent that had done so much mischief; to take away the usurped dominion of that tyrant, and to set up a kingdom of holiness and love in the hearts of men upon the ruins of Satan's kingdom there, that where sin and death had reigned, righteousnes and life, through grace, might reign. When he died, he said, "It is finished;" sin has now had its death-wound given to it; like Samson's, "Let me die with the Philistines." Animamque in vulnere ponit,—'He inflicts the wound and dies." 2*nd.* To make an end of sin, to abolish it, that it may not rise up in judgment against us; to obtain the pardon of it, that it may not be our ruin. To 'seal up sins,' so the margin reads it, that they may not appear or break out against us, to accuse and condemn us; as, when Christ cast the devil into the bottomless pit, he set a seal upon him, Rev. xx. 3. When sin is pardoned it is sought for and not found, as that which is sealed up. 3*rd.* "To make reconciliation for iniquity," as by a sacrifice, to satisfy the justice of God, and so to make peace, and bring God and man together; not only as an arbitrator, or referee, who only brings the contending parties to a good understanding one of another, but as a surety or undertaker for us. He is not only the peacemaker, but the peace; he is the atonement. Secondly. He came to "bring in an everlasting righteousness." God might justly have made an end of the sin by making an end of the sinner; but Christ found out another way, and so made an end of sin as to save the sinner from it by providing a righteousness for him. We are all guilty before God, and shall be condemned as guilty, if we had not a righteousness wherein to appear before him. Had we stood, our innocency would have been our righteousness, but, being fallen, we must have something else to plead. And Christ has provided us a plea; the merit of his sacrifice is our righteousness, with this we answer all the demands of the law; "Christ has died, yea, rather, has risen again." Thus Christ is "the Lord our righteousness," for he is "made of God to us righteousness," that we might be "made the righteousness of God in him." By faith we apply this to ourselves, and plead it with God, and our faith is imputed to us for righteousness. Rom. iv. 3, 5. This is an everlasting righteousness, for Christ who is our righteousness, and the Prince of our peace, is the everlasting Father. It was from everlasting in the counsels of it, and will be to everlasting in the consequences of it. The application of it was from the beginning, for Christ was the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world, and will be the end, for he is "able to save to the uttermost." It is of everlasting virtue, Heb. x. 12; it is the rock that follows us to Canaan. Thirdly. He came to "seal up the vision and prophecy," that is, all the prophetical visions of the Old Testament which had reference to the Messiah. He sealed them up, that is, he accomplished them, answered them to a tittle; all things that were written in the law, the prophets, and the psalms, concerning the Messiah, were fulfilled in him; thus he confirmed the truth of them, as well as his own mission. He "sealed them up;" that is, he put an end to that method of God's discovering his mind and will, and took another course, by completing the Scripture canon in the New Testament, which is the more sure word of prophecy than that by vision, 2 Pet. i. 19; Heb. i. 1. Fourthly. He came to "anoint the Most Holy," that is, himself, the Holy One who was anointed, that is, appointed to his work, and qualified for it by the Holy Ghost, that oil of gladness which he received without measure above his fellows. Or, to anoint the gospel church, his spiritual temple or holy place, to sanctify and cleanse it, and appropriate it to himself, Eph. v. 6. Or, to consecrate for us "a new and living way into the holiest," by his own blood, Heb. x. 20, as the sanctuary was anointed, Ex. xxx. 25, &c. He is called Messiah, ver. 25, 26, which signifies Christ, Anointed, Jno. i. 41, because he received the unction, both for himself and for all that are his. Fifthly. In order to all this the Messiah must be cut off, must die a violent death, and so be cut off from the land of the living, as was foretold, Isa. liii. 8. Hence, when Paul preacheth the death of Christ, he saith he preached nothing but "what the prophets said should come," Acts xxvi. 22, 23; and thus it behoved Christ to suffer. He must be cut off, but not for himself, not for any sin of his own, but, as Caiaphas prophesied, he must "die for the people," in our stead, and for our good. Not for any advantage of his own; the glory he purchased for himself was no more but the glory he had before, Jno. xvii. 4, 5. No; it was to atone for our sins, and purchase life for us, that he was cut off. Sixthly. He must "confirm the covenant with many." He shall introduce a new covenant between God and man, a covenant of grace, since it was become impossible for us to be saved by a covenant of innocency. This covenant he shall confirm by his doctrine and miracles, by his death and resurrection, by the ordinances of baptism and the Lord's supper, which are the seals of the New Testament, assuring us that God is willing to accept of us upon gospel terms. His death made his testament of force, and enabled us to claim what is bequeathed by it. He confirmed it to the many, that is, to the common people; the poor were evangelized when the rulers and "Pharisees believed not on him." Or, he confirmed it with many, that is, with the Gentile world; the New Testament was not (like the Old) confined to the Jewish church, but was committed to all nations; Christ gave his life a ransom for many. Seventhly. He must "cause the sacrifice and oblation to cease." By offering himself a sacrifice once for all he shall put an end to all the Levitical sacrifice, shall supersede them, and set them aside. When the substance is come the shadows shall be done away. He causeth all the peace offerings to cease, when he has made peace by the blood of his cross, and by it confirmed the covenant of peace and reconciliation. By the preaching of his Gospel to the world, which the apostles were intrusted to do, he took men off from expecting remission by the blood of bulls and goats, and so "caused the sacrifice and oblation to cease." The apostle, to the Hebrews, shews what a better priesthood, altar, and sacrifice we have now than they had under the law, as a reason why we should hold fast our profession.

3rd. Concerning the final destruction of Jerusalem, and of the Jewish church and nation. And this follows immediately upon the cutting off of the Messiah; not only because it was the just punishment of those that put him to death, which was the sin that filled up the measure of their iniquity, and brought ruin upon them, but because, as things were, it was necessary to the perfecting of one of the great intentions of his death. He died to take away the ceremonial law, quite to abolish "that law of commandment," and to vacate the obligation of it. But the Jews would not be persuaded to quit it, still they kept it up with more zeal than ever; they would hear no talk of parting with it; they stoned Stephen, the first Christian martyr, for saying that Jesus should "change the customs which Moses delivered them," Acts vi. 14; so that there was no way to abolish the Mosaic economy but by destroying the temple, and the holy city, and the Levitical priesthood, and that whole nation, which so incurably doted on them. This was effectually done in less than forty years after the death of Christ, and it was a desolation that could never be repaired to this day. And this is it which is here largely foretold, that the Jews who returned out of captivity might not be overmuch lifted up with the rebuilding of their city and temple, because, in process of time, they would be finally destroyed, and not as now, for seventy years only, but might rather rejoice in hope of the coming of the Messiah, and the setting up of his spiritual kingdom in the world, which should never be destroyed. Now, First. It is here foretold that "the people of the prince" that shall come shall be the instruments of this destruction, that is, the Roman armies, belonging to the monarchy yet to come. Christ is the prince that shall come, and they are employed by him in this service; they are his armies, Mat. xxii. 7. Or, the Gentiles, who, though now strangers, shall become the people of the Messiah, shall destroy the Jews. Secondly. That the destruction should be by war, and the end of that war should be this desolation determined. The wars of the Jews with the Romans were, by their own obstinacy, made very long and very bloody, and they issued at length in the utter extirpation of that people. Thirdly. That the city and sanctuary should in a particular manner be destroyed and laid quite waste. Titus, the Roman general, would fain have saved the temple, but his soldiers were so enraged against the Jews that he could not restrain them from burning it to the ground, that this prophecy might be fulfilled. Fourthly. That all the resistance that should be made to this destruction should be in vain. The "end of it should be with a flood." It shall be a deluge of destruction, like that which swept away the old world, and which there will be no making head against. Fifthly. That hereby the sacrifice and oblation should be made to cease. And it must needs cease, when the family of the priests was so extirpated, and the genealogies of it so confounded, that, they say, there is no man in the world that can prove himself of the seed of Aaron. Sixthly. That there should be "an overspreading of abominations," a general corruption of the Jewish nation, and an abounding of iniquity among them, for which it should be made desolate, 1 Thes. ii. 17. Or, it is rather to be understood of the armies of the Romans, which were abominable to the Jews, they could not endure them, which overspread the nations, and by which it was made desolate. For these are the words which Christ refers to, Mat. xxiv. 15, "When ye shall see the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel, stand in the holy place, then let them which be in Judæa flee;" which is explained, Lu. xxi. 20, "When ye shall see Jerusalem compassed with armies, then flee." Seventhly. That the desolation should be total and final. "He shall make it desolate, even till the consummation;" that is, he shall make it completely desolate. It is a desolation determined, and it will be accomplished to the utmost. And when it is made desolate, it should seem there is something more determined, that is to be "poured upon the desolate," ver. 27; and what should that be but the spirit of slumber, Rom. xi. 8, 25, that blindness which is happened to Israel, until the fulness of the Gentiles shall come in? and then all Israel shall be saved.

CHAPTER X.

This chapter, and the two next, which conclude this book, make up one entire vision and prophecy, which was communicated to Daniel for the use of the church, not by signs and figures, as before, ch. vii. and viii., but by express words; and this was about two years after the vision in the foregoing chapter. Daniel prayed daily, but had a vision only now and then. In this chapter we have some things introductory to the prophecy; in ch. xi. the particular predictions, and ch. xii. the conclusion of it. This chapter shews us, I. Daniel's solemn fasting and humiliation before he had this vision, ver. 1—3. II. A glorious appearance of the Son of God to him, and the deep impression it made upon him, ver. 4—9. III. The encouragement that was given him to expect such a discovery of future events as should be satisfactory and useful both to others and to himself; and that he should be enabled both to understand the meaning of this discovery, though difficult, and to bear up under the lustre of it, though dazzling and dreadful, ver. 10—21.

IN the third year of Cyrus king of Persia a thing was revealed unto Daniel, whose name was called Belteshazzar; and the thing was true, but the time appointed was long: and he understood the thing, and had understanding of the vision. 2 In those days I Daniel was mourning three full weeks. 3 I ate no pleasant bread, neither came flesh nor wine in my mouth, neither did I anoint myself at all, till three whole weeks were fulfilled. 4 And in the four and twentieth day of the first month, as I was by the

to fix upon in subsequent periods, and even to fix the date of some events. As an example of what has been attempted, we will exhibit the scheme of Mr. Boyd, already referred to for his valuable book on the "Inspiration of Daniel:"—1st period: seven weeks=forty-nine years; from the decree of Artaxerxes to the death of Darius Nothus, or B.C. 454 to 405. 2nd period: sixty-two weeks=434 years; from the death of Darius Nothus to the public manifestation of the Messiah, or B.C. 405 to A.D. 30. 3rd period: one week divided into two parts, the first of three years and the second of four; (1) from our Lord's manifestation to the institution of the supper and crucifixion, or "cutting off of the Messiah;" (2) from these last events to the calling of the Gentiles and the new covenant; or from A.D. 30 to 33, and 33 to 37; the whole seventy weeks extending from B.C. 454 to A.D. 37. Other possible schemes are (1) from the first year of Cyrus, B.C. 536; (2) from the third year of Darius Hystaspes, B.C. 518; (3) from the seventh year of Artaxerxes Longimanus, B.C. 458; (4) from side of the great river, which is Hiddekel; 5 Then I lifted up mine eyes, and looked, and behold a certain man clothed in linen, whose loins were girded with fine gold of Uphaz: 6 His body also was like the beryl, and his face as the appearance of lightning, and his eyes as lamps of fire, and his arms and his feet like in colour to polished brass, and the voice of his words like the voice of a multitude. 7 And I Daniel alone saw the vision: for the men that were with me saw not the vision; but a great quaking fell upon them, so that they fled to hide themselves. 8 Therefore I was left alone, and saw this great vision, and there remained no strength in me: for my comeliness was turned in me into corruption, and I retained no strength. 9 Yet heard I the voice of his words: and when I heard the voice of his words, then was I in a deep sleep on my face, and my face toward the ground.

This vision is dated in the third year of Cyrus, that is, of his reign, after the conquest of Babylon; his third year since Daniel became acquainted with him, and a subject to him. Here is,

First. A general idea of this prophecy; ver. 1, "The thing was true." Every word of God is so. It was true that Daniel had such a vision, and that such and such things were said; this he solemnly attests upon the word of a prophet; et hoc paratus est verificare,—'he was prepared to verify it;' and if it was a word spoken from heaven, no doubt it is stedfast, and may be depended on. But the time appointed was long, as long as to the end of the reign of Antiochus, which was three hundred years; a long time, indeed, when it is looked upon as to come. Nay, and because it is usual with the prophets to glance at things spiritual and eternal, there is that in this prophecy which looks in type as far forward as to the end of the world, and the resurrection of the dead; and then he might well say, "The time appointed was long:" but however it was made as plain to him as if it had been a history rather than a prophecy; he understood the thing; so distinctly was it delivered to him, and did he receive it, that he could say he had "understanding of the vision." It did not so much operate upon his fancy as open his understanding.

Secondly. An account of Daniel's mortification of himself before he had this vision. Not in expectation of it,—nor when he prayed that solemn prayer, ch. ix., doth it appear that he had any expectation of the vision in answer to it; but purely from a principle of devotion, and pious sympathy with the afflicted people of God. He "was mourning full three weeks," ver. 2, for his own sins, and the sins of his people, and their sorrows. Some think the particular occasion of his mourning was the slothfulness and indifferency of many of the Jews, who, though they had liberty to return to their own land, continued still in the land of their captivity, not knowing how to value the privileges offered them; and perhaps it troubled him the more, because they that did so justified themselves by the example of Daniel, though they had not that reason to stay behind which he had. Others think it was because he heard of the obstruction given to the building of the temple by the enemies of the Jews, who "hired counsellors against them" to frustrate their purpose, (Ezr. iv. 4, 5,) "all the days of Cyrus;" and gained their point from his son, Cambyses, or Artaxerxes, who governed while Cyrus was absent in the Scythian war. Note, Good men cannot but mourn to see how slowly the work of God goes on in the world, and what opposition it meets with; how weak its friends are, and how active its enemies. During the days of Daniel's mourning he ate no pleasant bread; he could not live without meat, but ate little, and very sparingly, and mortified himself in the quality as well as quantity of what he ate, which may truly be reckoned fasting, and a token of humiliation and sorrow. He did not eat the pleasant bread he used to eat, but that which was coarse and unpalatable, which he would not be tempted to eat any more of than was just necessary to support nature. As ornaments, so delicates, are very disagreeable to a day of humiliation. Daniel ate no flesh, drank no wine, nor anointed himself, for these three weeks' time, ver. 3. Though he was now a very old man, and might plead that the decay of his nature required what was nourishing,—though he was a very great man, and might plead that, being used to dainty meats, he could not be without them, it would prejudice his health if he were,—yet, when it was both to testify and to assist his devotion, he could thus deny himself. Be it noted to the shame of many young ordinary people, who cannot persuade themselves thus to deny themselves.

Thirdly. A description of that glorious person whom Daniel saw in vision, which it is generally agreed could be no other than Christ himself, the eternal Word. He was by the side of the river Hiddekel, ver. 4, probably walking there, not for diversion, but devotion and contemplation, as Isaac walked in the field to meditate; and, being a person of distinction, he had his servants attending him at some distance. There he looked up, and saw one man, one alone, a certain man, even the man Christ Jesus. It must be he, for he appears in the same resemblance wherein he appeared to St. John in the isle of Patmos, Rev. i. 13—15. His dress was priestly, for he is the high priest of our profession, clothed in linen, as the high priest himself was on the day of atonement, that great day; his loins were girded, (in St. John's vision his paps were girded,) with a golden girdle, of the finest gold, that of Uphaz, for every thing about Christ is the best in its kind. The girding of his loins notes his ready and diligent application to his work, as his Father's servant, in the business of our redemption. His shape was amiable; his body like the beryl, a precious stone of a sky-colour; his countenance was awful, and enough to strike a terror on the beholders, for his face was as the appearance of lightning, which dazzles the eyes, both frightens and threatens; his eyes were bright and sparkling, as lamps of fire; his arms and feet shone like polished brass, ver. 6; his voice was loud and strong, and very piercing, like the voice of a multitude. The vox Dei, —'voice of God,' can overpower the vox populi,—'voice of the people.' Thus glorious did Christ appear, and it should engage us, 1st. To think highly and honourably of him. Now consider how great this man is, and in all things let him have the pre-eminence. 2nd. To admire his condescension for us and our salvation. Over all this splendour he drew a veil when he took upon him the form of a servant, and emptied himself.

Fourthly. The wonderful influence that this appearance had upon Daniel and his attendants, and the terror that it struck upon him and them.

1. His attendants saw not the vision; it was not fit they should be honoured with the sight of it. There is a Divine revelation vouchsafed to all, from converse with which none are excluded that do not exclude themselves; but such a vision must be peculiar to Daniel, that was a favourite. Paul's companions were aware of the light, but saw no man, Acts ix. 7; xxii. 9. Note, It is the honour of those who are beloved of God that what is hid from others is known to them. Christ "manifests himself to them, but not to the world," Jno. xiv. 22. But, though they saw not the vision, they were seized with an unaccountable trembling, either from the voice they heard or from some strange concussion or vibration of the air they felt, so it was that "a great quaking fell upon them, so that they fled to hide themselves," probably among the willows that grew by the river side. Note, There are many that have a "spirit of bondage to fear," that never receive "a spirit of adoption," to whom Christ has been, and will be, never otherwise but a terror. Now the fright that Daniel's attendants were in is a confirmation of the truth of the vision; it could not be Daniel's fancy, or the product of a heated imagination of his own, for it had a real, powerful, and strange effect upon those about him.

2. He himself saw it, and saw it alone, but he was not able to bear the sight of it. It not only dazzled his eyes, but overwhelmed his spirit, so that "there remained no strength in him," ver. 8. He said, as Moses himself, "I exceedingly fear and quake." His spirits were all so employed, either in an intense speculation of the glory of this vision or in the fortifying of his heart against the terror of it, that his body was left in a manner lifeless and spiritless; he had no vigour in him, and was but one remove from a dead carcase; he looked as pale as death, his colour was gone, and his comeliness in him was turned into corruption, and he retained no strength. Note, The greatest and best of men cannot bear the immediate discoveries of the Divine glory; no man can see it and live. It is next to death to see a glimpse of it, as Daniel here; but glorified saints see Christ as he is, and can bear the sight. But though Daniel was thus dispirited with the vision of Christ, yet he "heard the voice of his words," and knew what he said. Note, We must take heed, lest our reverence of God's glory by which we should be awakened to hear his voice, both in his word and in his providence, should degenerate into such a dread of him as will disable or indispose us to hear it. It should seem that, when the vision of Christ terrified Daniel, the voice of his words soon pacified and composed him, silenced his fear, and laid him to sleep in a holy security and serenity of mind; "When I heard the voice of his words I fell into a slumber," a sweet slumber, "on my face," and "my face towards the ground." When he saw the vision he threw himself prostrate into a posture of the most humble adoration, and dropped asleep, not as careless of what he heard and saw, but charmed with it. Note, How dreadful soever Christ may appear to those that are under convictions of sin, and in terror by reason of it, there is enough in his word to quiet their spirits, and to make them easy, if they will but attend to it, and apply it.

10 And, behold, an hand touched me, which set me upon my knees and upon the palms of my hands. 11 And he said unto me, O Daniel, a man greatly beloved, understand the words that I speak unto thee, and stand upright: for unto thee am I now sent. And when he had spoken this word unto me, I stood trembling. 12 Then said he unto me, Fear not, Daniel: for from the first day that thou didst set thine heart to understand, and to chasten thyself before thy God, thy words were heard, and I am come for thy words. 13 But the prince of the kingdom of Persia withstood me one and twenty days: but, lo, Michael, one of the chief princes, came to help me; and I remained there with the kings of Persia. 14 Now I am come to make thee understand what shall befall thy people in the latter days: for yet the vision is for many days. 15 And when he had spoken such words unto me, I set my face toward the ground, and I became dumb. 16 And, behold, one like the similitude of the sons of men touched my lips: then I opened my mouth, and spake, and said unto him that stood before me, O my lord, by the vision my sorrows are turned upon me, and I have retained no strength. 17 For how can the servant of this my lord talk with this my lord? for as for me, straightway there remained no strength in me, neither is there breath left in me. 18 Then there came again and touched me one like the appearance of a man, and he strengthened me, 19 And said, O man greatly beloved, fear not: peace be unto thee, be strong, yea, be strong. And when he had spoken unto me, I was strengthened, and said, the twentieth year of Artaxerxes, B.C. 444. All these years give important events concerning the Jews, and some of them bring us very near the death of Christ as the termination of the 490 years. Dr. Pusey, who gives these figures, insists especially on the decree of the seventh year of Artaxerxes as a commencement, which requires a modification of subsequent details. It is curious, however, to observe how all variations of this principle cluster round a few great facts, among which is the public work of the Lord Jesus.

Another remarkable circumstance is that the year-day theory enables us to harmonise facts with the division of his "weeks" which the prophet makes. This has been found utterly impossible with other theories. Moreover, none can help seeing that the words of the final portions of the prediction describe the events recorded in the gospels more exactly than any other events known to history. Not without reason does Dr. Pusey say that on the self-evident fact that "the sum of the parts is intended to be the same as the whole,

Let my lord speak; for thou hast strengthened me. 20 Then said he, Knowest thou wherefore I come unto thee? and now will I return to fight with the prince of Persia: and when I am gone forth, lo, the prince of Grecia shall come. 21 But I will shew thee that which is noted in the scripture of truth: and there is none that holdeth with me in these things, but Michael your prince.

Much ado here is to bring Daniel to be able to hear what Christ has to say to him. Still we have him in a fright, hardly and very slowly recovering himself; but is still answered and supported with good words and comfortable words. Let us see how Daniel is, by degrees, brought to himself, and gather up the several passages that are to the same purpose.

First. Daniel is in a great consternation, and finds it very difficult to get clear of it. The hand that touched him set him at first "upon his knees, and the palms of his hands," ver. 10. Note, Strength and comfort commonly come by degrees to those that have been long cast down and disquieted; they are first helped up a little, and then more. "After two days he will revive us, and then the third day he will raise us up;" and we must not "despise the day of small things," but be thankful for the beginnings of mercy. Afterwards he is helped up, but he stands trembling, ver. 11, for fear lest he fall again. Note, Before God "gives strength and power unto his people" he makes them sensible of their own weakness. "I trembled in myself, that I might rest in the day of trouble," Hab. iii. 16.

But when afterwards Daniel recovered so much strength in his limbs that he could stand steady, yet he tells us, ver. 15, that he "set his face towards the ground, and became dumb." He was as a man astonished, that knew not what to say, struck dumb with admiration and fear, and is loth to enter into discourse with one so far above him. He kept silence, yea even from good, till he had recollected himself a little. Well, at length he recovered not only the use of his feet, but the use of his tongue; and when he "opened his mouth," ver. 16, that which he had to say was to excuse his having been so long silent, for really he durst not speak, he could not speak. "O my lord," (so, in great humility, this prophet calls the angel, though the angels, in great humility, called themselves "fellow-servants to the prophets," Rev. xxii. 9,) "by the vision my sorrows are turned upon me," they break in upon me with violence, the sense of my sinful, sorrowful state turns upon me, when I see thy purity and brightness. Note, Man that has lost his integrity has reason to blush and be ashamed of himself, when he sees or considers the glory of the blessed angels that keep their integrity. "My sorrows turned upon me, and I have retained no strength" to resist them, or bear up ahead against them; and again, ver. 17, like one half dead with the fright, he complains, As for me "straightway there remained no strength in me" to receive these displays of the Divine glory and these discoveries of the Divine will. Nay, "There is no breath left in me;" such a deliquium did he suffer, that he could not draw one breath after another, but panted and languished, and was in a manner breathless. See how well it is for us that the treasure of Divine revelation is put into earthen vessels, that God speaks to us by men like ourselves, and not by angels. Whatever we may wish in a peevish dislike of the method God takes in dealing with us, it is certain, if we were tried, we should all be of Israel's mind at mount Sinai, when they said to Moses, "Speak thou to us, and we will hear, but let not God speak to us lest we die," Ex. xx. 19. If Daniel could not bear it, how could we? Now this he insists upon as an excuse for his irreverent silence, which otherwise had been blameworthy: "How can the servant of this my lord talk with this my lord?" ver. 17. Note, Whenever we enter into communion with God it becomes us to have a due sense of the vast distance and disproportion that there is between us and the holy angels, and of the infinite distance, and proportion at all, between us and the holy God; and to acknowledge that we cannot "order our speech by reason of darkness." How shall we that are dust and ashes speak to the Lord of glory!

Secondly. The blessed angel that was employed by Christ to converse with him gave him all the encouragement and comfort that could be. It should seem it was not he whose glory he saw in vision, ver. 5, 6, that here touched him, and talked with him. That was Christ, but this seems to have been the angel Gabriel, whom Christ had once before ordered to instruct Daniel, ch. viii. 16. The glorious appearance (as that of the God of glory to Abraham, Acts vii. 2,) was to give authority and to gain attention to what the angel should say. Christ himself comforted John, when he, in a like case, "fell at his feet as dead," Rev. i. 17; but here he did it by the angel, whom Daniel saw in a glory much inferior to that of the vision in the verses before; for he was "like the similitude of the sons of men," ver. 16; one like the appearance of a man, ver. 18. When he only appeared, as he had done before, ch. ix. 21, we do not find that Daniel was put into any disorder by it, as he was by this vision; and therefore he is here employed a third time with Daniel.

1. He lent him his hand to help him; touched him, and set him upon his hands and knees, ver. 10, else he had still lain grovelling; touched his lips, ver. 16, else he had been still dumb. Again, he touched him, ver. 18, and put strength into him, else he had still been staggering and trembling. Note, The hand of God's power, going along with the word of his grace, is alone effectual to redress all our grievances, and to rectify whatever is amiss in us. One touch from heaven brings us to our knees, sets us on our feet, opens our lips, and strengthens us; for it is God that works on us, and works in us, both to will and to do that which is good.

2. He assured him of the great favour that God had for him; Thou art "a man greatly beloved," ver. 11; and again, ver. 19, "O man greatly beloved!" Note, Nothing is more likely, nothing more effectual, to revive the drooping spirits of the saints than to be assured of God's love to them. Those are greatly beloved indeed whom God loves, and it is comfort enough to know it.

3. He silenced his fears, and encouraged his hopes, with good words and comfortable words. He said unto him, "Fear not, Daniel," ver. 12; and again, ver. 19, "O man greatly beloved, fear not, peace be unto thee; be strong, yea, be strong." Never did any tender mother quiet her child, when any thing had grieved or frightened it, with more compassion and affection than the angel here quieted Daniel. Those that are beloved of God have no reason to be afraid of any evil,—peace is to them: God himself speaks peace to them, and they ought, upon the warrant of that, to speak peace to themselves. And that peace, that joy of the Lord, will be their strength. Will God "plead against us with his great power," will he take the advantage against us of our being overcome by his terror? "No, but he will put strength into us," Job xxiii. 6. So he did into Daniel here, when, by reason of the lustre of the vision, no strength of his own remained in him. And he acknowledgeth it; ver. 19, When he had spoken to me I was strengthened." Note, God, by his word, puts life and strength and spirit into his people; for, if he saith, Be strong, power goes along with the word. And now Daniel has experienced the efficacy of God's strengthening word and grace, he is ready for any thing; Now "let my lord speak," and I can hear it, I can bear it, and am ready to do according to it; "for thou hast strengthened me." Note, To those that, like Daniel here, have no might, God increaseth strength, Isa. xl. 29; and we cannot keep up our communion with God but by strength derived from him: but when he is pleased to put strength into us we must make a good use of it, and say, "Speak, Lord, for thy servant hears." Let God enable us to comply with his will, and then, whatever it is, we will stand complete in it. Da quod jubes, et jube quod vis,—'Give what thou commandest, and then command what thou wilt.'

4. He assures him that his fastings and prayers were come up for a memorial before God, as the angel told Cornelius, Acts x. 4; ver. 12, "Fear not, Daniel." It is natural to fallen man to be afraid of an extraordinary messenger from heaven, as dreading to hear evil tidings thence; but Daniel needs not fear, for he has by his three weeks humiliation and supplication sent extraordinary messengers to heaven, which he may expect to return with an olive branch of peace; "From the first day that thou didst set thine heart to understand" the word of God, that is, to be the rule of thy prayers, "and to chasten thyself before thy God," that thou mightest put an edge upon thy prayers, "thy words were heard;" as before, "at the beginning of thy supplication," ch. ix. 24. Note, As the entrance of God's word is enlightening to the upright, so the entrance of their prayers is pleasing to him, Ps. cxix. 130. From the first day that we begin to look towards God in a way of duty he is ready to meet us in a way of mercy. Thus ready is God to hear prayer; "I said, I will confess, and thou forgavest."

5. He tells him that he was sent to him on purpose to bring him a prediction of the future state of the church, as a token of God's accepting his prayers for the church; "Knowest thou wherefore I come unto thee?" If thou knewest on what errand I come, thou wouldest not be put into such a consternation by it. Note, If we rightly understand the meaning of God's dealings with us, and the methods of his providence and grace concerning us, we would be better reconciled to them. "I am come for thy words," ver. 12, to bring thee a gracious answer to thy prayers. Thus, when God's praying people do call to him, he saith, "Here I am," Isa. lviii. 9; what would you have with me? See the power of prayer, what glorious things it has in its time fetched from heaven, what strange discoveries! On what errand did this angel come to Daniel? He tells him; ver. 14, "I am come to make thee understand what shall befall thy people in the latter days." Daniel was a curious, inquisitive man, that had all his days been searching into secret things; and it would be a mighty gratification to him to be let into the knowledge of things to come. Daniel had always been concerned for the church; its interests lay much upon his heart, and it would be a particular satisfaction to him to know what its state should be, and he would know the better what to pray for as long as he lived. He was now lamenting the difficulties which his people met with in the present day; but, that he might not be offended in those, the angel must tell him what greater difficulties are yet before them. And, if they be wearied, now they only run with the footmen, how will they contend with horses? Note, It would abate our resentment of present troubles to consider that we know not but much greater are before us, which we are concerned to provide for. Daniel must be made to know what shall befall his people in the latter days of the church, after the cessation of prophecy, and when the time drew nigh for the Messiah to appear, "for yet the vision is made for many days." The principal things that this vision was intended to give the church the foresight of would come to pass in the days of Antiochus, near three hundred years after this. Now that which the angel is intrusted to communicate to Daniel, and which Daniel is encouraged to expect from him, is not any curious speculations, moral prognostications, or rational prospects of his own, though he is an angel, but what he has received from the Lord. It was the "revelation of Jesus Christ" that the angel gave to St. John, to be "delivered to the churches," Rev. i. 1; so here, ver. 21, "I will shew thee what is written in the Scriptures of truth," that is, what is fixed in the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God. The decree of God is a thing written; it is a Scripture, which remains, and cannot be altered: "What I have written, I have written." As there are Scriptures for the revealed will of God, the letters patent, which are published to the world, so there are Scriptures for the secret will of God, the close rolls, which are sealed among his treasures, the book of his decrees. Both are Scriptures of truth; nothing shall be added to or taken from either of them. The secret things belong not to us, only now and then some few paragraphs have been copied out from the book of God's counsels, and delivered to the prophets for the use of the church, as here to Daniel; but they are the things revealed, even the words of this law, which belong to us, and to our children; and we are concerned to study what is written in these Scriptures of truth, for they are things which belong to our everlasting peace.

6. He gives him a general account of the adversaries of the church's cause, from whom it might be expected troubles would arise, and of its patrons, under whose protection it might be assured of safety and victory at last.

1st. The kings of the earth are and will be its adversaries; for they set themselves against the Lord, and against his anointed, Ps. ii. 2. The angel tells Daniel that he was to have come to him with a gracious answer to his prayers; but "the prince of the kingdom of Persia withstood him one and twenty days," just the three weeks that Daniel had been fasting and praying. Cambyses, king of Persia, had been very busy to embarrass the affairs of the Jews, and to do them all the mischief he could, and the angel had been all that time employed to counterwork him, so that he had been constrained to defer his visit to Daniel till now; for angels can be but in one place at a time. Or, as Dr. Lightfoot saith, this new king of Persia by hindering the temple had hindered those good tidings which otherwise he should have brought him. The kings and kingdoms of the world were indeed sometimes helpful to the church, but more often they were injurious to it. When I am gone forth from the kings of Persia,—when their monarchy is brought down for their unkindnesses to the Jews,—then "the prince of Grecia shall come," ver. 20. The Grecian monarchy, though favourable to the Jews at first, as the Persian was, yet will come to be vexatious to them. Such is the state of the church militant,—when it has got clear of one enemy it has another to encounter; and such a hydra's head is that of the old serpent,—when one storm is blown over it is not long before another riseth.

2nd. The God of heaven is and will be its protector; and under him the angels of heaven its patrons and guardians. First. Here is the angel Gabriel busy in the service of the church, making his part good in defence of it twenty-one days, against the prince of Persia, and remaining there with the kings of Persia, as consul, or liege-ambassador, to take care of the affairs of the Jews in that court, and to do them service, ver. 13. And, though much was done against them by the kings of Persia, God permitting it, it is likely much more mischief would have been done them, and they would have been quite ruined, (witness Haman's plot,) if God had not prevented it by the ministration of angels. Gabriel resolves, when he has dispatched this errand to Daniel, that he will return to fight with the prince of Persia,—will continue to oppose him.

every attempt to explain the prophecy so that it should end in Antiochus Epiphanes, or in any other than our Lord, shivers. On the other hand the subordinate periods, as well as the whole, fit in with the Christian interpretation." This being the case, we may wait without anxiety the exposition which shall in all respects be perfect. There are some critical questions associated with separate verses, but they are insignificant in comparison with the main problem.

x. 4. Hiddekel is the Tigris. The Syriac Peshito reads "Euphrates" here, but apparently by an error. The river Tigris rises near the Euphrates, and after a divergent course of great length falls into the Euphrates, and finds its way to the Persian Gulf. In its northern portion the Tigris is supplied by a number of streams, the three principal ones being of some importance. One of these affluents, rising in the Niphate Mountain, near Lake Arethusa, is called Digla or Dighto, which is only a variation of Hiddekel and other Oriental forms of the name.

and will at length humble and bring down that proud monarchy, ver. 20, though he knows another as mischievous, even that of Grecia, will rise instead of it. Secondly. Here is Michael our prince, the great protector of the church, and the patron of its just, but injured cause. "The first of the chief princes," ver. 13; some understand it of a created angel, but an archangel of the highest order, 1 Thes. iv. 16; Jude 9. Others think Michael the archangel is no other than Christ himself, the angel of the covenant, and the Lord of the angels; he whom Daniel saw in vision, ver. 5. He "came to help me," ver. 13; "and there is none but he that holdeth with me in these things," ver. 21. Christ is the church's prince, angels are not, Heb. ii. 5. He presides in the affairs of the church, and effectually provides for its good. He is said to hold with the angels, for it is he that makes them serviceable to the heirs of salvation. And if he were not on the church's side its case were bad. But, saith David, and so said the church, "The Lord taketh my part with them that help me," Ps. cxviii. 7; "The Lord is with them that uphold my soul," Ps. liv. 4.

CHAPTER XI.

The angel Gabriel, in this chapter, performs his promise made to Daniel in the foregoing chapter, that he would shew him "what should befall his people in the latter days," according to that which was written in the Scriptures of faith. Very particularly doth he here foretell the succession of the kings of Persia and Grecia, and the affairs of their kingdoms, especially the mischief which Antiochus Epiphanes did in his time to the church, which was foretold before, ch. viii. 11, 12. Here is one, I. A brief prediction of the setting up of the Grecian monarchy upon the ruins of the Persian monarchy, which was now newly begun, ver. 1—4. II. A prediction of the affairs of the two kingdoms of Egypt and Syria, with reference to each other, ver. 5—20. III. Of the rise of Antiochus Epiphanes, and his actions and successes, ver. 21—29. IV. Of the great mischief that he should do to the Jewish nation and religion, and his contempt of all religion, ver. 30—39. V. Of his fall and ruin at last, when he is in the heat of his pursuit, ver. 40—45.

ALSO I in the first year of Darius the Mede, even I, stood to confirm and to strengthen him. 2 And now will I shew thee the truth. Behold, there shall stand up yet three kings in Persia; and the fourth shall be far richer than they all: and by his strength through his riches he shall stir up all against the realm of Grecia. 3 And a mighty king shall stand up, that shall rule with great dominion, and do according to his will. 4 And when he shall stand up, his kingdom shall be broken, and shall be divided toward the four winds of heaven; and not to his posterity, nor according to his dominion which he ruled: for his kingdom shall be plucked up, even for others beside those.

Here, First. The angel Gabriel lets Daniel know the good service he had done to the Jewish nation; ver. 1, "In the first year of Darius the Mede," who destroyed Babylon, and released the Jews out of the house of bondage, "I stood a strength and fortress to him;" that is, I was instrumental to protect him, and give him success in his wars, and, after he had conquered Babylon, to confirm him in his resolution to release the Jews, which it is likely met with much opposition. Thus by the angel, and at the request of the watcher, the golden head was broken, and the axe laid to the root of the tree. Note, We must acknowledge the hand of God in the strengthening of those that are friends to the church for the service they are to do it, and confirming them in their good resolutions. And herein he useth the ministry of angels more than we are aware of. And the many instances we have known of God's care of his church formerly encourageth us to depend upon him in farther straits and difficulties.

Secondly. He foretells the reign of four Persian kings; ver. 2, "Now I will shew thee the truth," that is, the true meaning of the visions of the great image, and of the four beasts, and expound in plain terms what was before represented by dark types. 1. There shall stand up three kings in Persia, besides Darius, in whose reign this prophecy is dated, ch. x. 1. Mr. Broughton make these three to be Cyrus, Artaxasta or Artaxerxes, called by the Greeks Cambyses, and Ahasuerus, that married Esther, called Darius son of Hystaspes. To these three the Persians gave these attributes: Cyrus was a father, Cambyses a master, and Darius a hoarder up; so Herodotus. 2. There shall be a fourth, "far richer than them all," namely, Xerxes, of whose wealth the Greek authors take notice. By his strength, that is, his vast army, consisting of eight hundred thousand men at least, and his riches, with which he maintained and paid that vast army, he stirred up all against the realm of Greece. Xerxes's expedition against Greece is famous in history, and his shameful defeat that he met with. He that, when he went out, was the terror of Greece, in his return was the scorn of Greece. Daniel needed not be told what disappointment he would meet with, for he was a hinderer of the building of the temple; but soon after, about thirty years after the first return from captivity, Darius, a young king, revived the building of the temple, owning the hand of God against his predecessors for hindering it, Ezr. vi. 7.

Thirdly. He foretells Alexander's conquests, and the partition of his kingdom, ver. 3. He is the mighty king that shall stand up against the kings of Persia, and he shall "rule with great dominion" over many kingdoms, and with a despotic power, for he shall "do according to his will," and undo likewise, which, by the law of the Medes and Persians, their kings could not. When Alexander, after he had conquered Asia, would be worshipped as a god, then this was fulfilled, that he "shall do according to his will." That is God's prerogative, but was his pretension. But, ver. 4, his kingdom shall soon be broken, and divided into four parts, but not to his posterity; nor shall any of his successors reign according to his dominion; none of them shall have such large territories, nor such an absolute power. His kingdom was "plucked for others besides those" of his own family. Arideus, his brother, was made king of Macedonia; Olympias, Alexander's mother, killed him, and poisoned Alexander's two sons, Hercules and Alexander. Thus was his family rooted out by its own hands. See what decaying, perishing things worldly pomp and possessions are, and the powers by which they are got. Never was the vanity of the world and its greatest things shewn more evidently than in the story of Alexander; "All is vanity and vexation of spirit."

5 And the king of the south shall be strong, and one of his princes; and he shall be strong above him, and have dominion; his dominion shall be a great dominion. 6 And in the end of years they shall join themselves together; for the king's daughter of the south shall come to the king of the north to make an agreement: but she shall not retain the power of the arm; neither shall he stand, nor his arm: but she shall be given up, and they that brought her, and he that begat her, and he that strengthened her in these times. 7 But out of a branch of her roots shall one stand up in his estate, which shall come with an army, and shall enter into the fortress of the king of the north, and shall deal against them, and shall prevail: 8 And shall also carry captives into Egypt their gods, with their princes, and with their precious vessels of silver and of gold; and he shall continue more years than the king of the north. 9 So the king of the south shall come into his kingdom, and shall return into his own land. 10 But his sons shall be stirred up, and shall assemble a multitude of great forces: and one shall certainly come, and overflow, and pass through: then shall he return, and be stirred up, even to his fortress. 11 And the king of the south shall be moved with choler, and shall come forth and fight with him, even with the king of the north: and he shall set forth a great multitude; but the multitude shall be given into his hand. 12 And when he hath taken away the multitude, his heart shall be lifted up; and he shall cast down many ten thousands: but he shall not be strengthened by it. 13 For the king of the north shall return, and shall set forth a multitude greater than the former, and shall certainly come after certain years with a great army and with much riches. 14 And in those times there shall many stand up against the king of the south: also the robbers of thy people shall exalt themselves to establish the vision; but they shall fall. 15 So the king of the north shall come, and cast up a mount, and take the most fenced cities: and the arms of the south shall not withstand, neither his chosen people, neither shall there be any strength to withstand. 16 But he that cometh against him shall do according to his own will, and none shall stand before him: and he shall stand in the glorious land, which by his hand shall be consumed. 17 He shall also set his face to enter with the strength of his whole kingdom, and upright ones with him; thus shall he do: and he shall give him the daughter of women, corrupting her: but she shall not stand on his side, neither be for him. 18 After this shall he turn his face unto the isles, and shall take many: but a prince for his own behalf shall cause the reproach offered by him to cease; without

x. 5. The word Uphaz has not been certainly explained. By some it is taken as the name of a place, and by others as an epithet of gold, as fine or excellent in quality.

x. 6. The Hebrew word for "beryl" here is Tarshish. A precious stone is meant, but probably not the beryl. Fürst says the Tarshish was a stone with the lustre of gold, the chrysolite of the ancients, and the topaz of the moderns, named from one of the places called Tarshish. The modern Jews give the name of Tarshish to the beryl, but not much weight attaches to the fact. The colour of the topaz is more proper to the occasion. Although mineralogists are acquainted with a yellow variety of the beryl, the name is commonly given to gems which are sea-green or a bluish-green, commonly known as aquamarine. There is no reason to think the ancients were so minute in their distinctions. We think topaz is the proper explanation.

x. 13. This verse has been considered very difficult. It seems to nis own reproach he shall cause it to turn upon him. 19 Then he shall turn his face toward the fort of his own land: but he shall stumble and fall, and not be found. 20 Then shall stand up in his estate a raiser of taxes in the glory of the kingdom: but within few days he shall be destroyed, neither in anger, nor in battle.

Here is foretold,

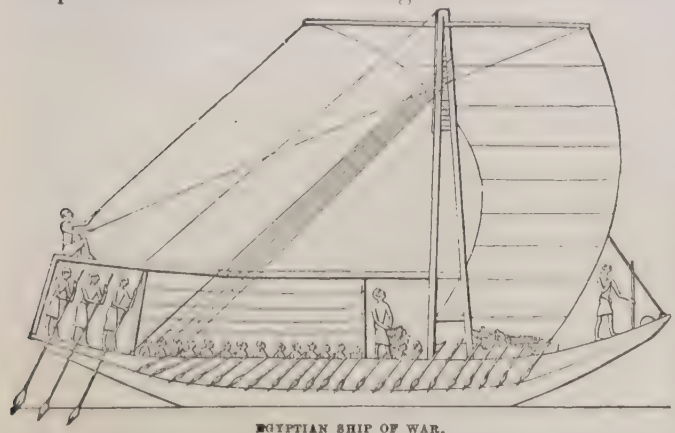
First. The rise and power of two great kingdoms, out of the remains of Alexander's conquests, ver. 5. 1. The kingdom of Egypt, which was made considerable by Ptolemæus Lagus, one of Alexander's captains, whose successors were from him called the Lagidæ. He is called the king of the south, that is, Egypt, named here, ver. 8, 42, 43. The countries that at first belonged to Ptolemy are reckoned to be Egypt, Phœnicia, Arabia, Libya, Ethiopia, &c. Theocr. Idyl. 17. 2. The kingdom of Syria, which was set up by Seleucus Nicanor, or, the Conqueror. He was one of Alexander's princes, and became stronger than the other, and had the greatest dominion of all, was the most powerful of all Alexander's successors; it was said he had no less than seventy-two kingdoms under him. Both these were strong against Judah, the affairs of which are particularly eyed in this prediction. Ptolemy, soon after he gained Egypt, invaded Judæa, and took Jerusalem, on a sabbath, pretending a friendly visit. Seleucus also gave disturbance to Judæa.

Secondly. The fruitless attempt to unite these two kingdoms, as iron and clay in Nebuchadnezzar's image, ver. 6. At "the end of certain years," above seventy after Alexander's death, the Lagidæ and the Seleucidæ shall associate, but not in sincerity. Ptolemy Philadelphus, king of Egypt, shall marry his daughter Berenice to Antiochus Theos, king of Syria, who had already a wife called Laodice. Berenice shall come to the king of the north, to make an agreement, but it shall not hold; "She shall not retain the power of the arm." Neither she nor her posterity shall establish themselves in the kingdom of the north; neither shall Ptolemy her father nor Antiochus her husband (betwixt whom there was to be a great alliance) stand, nor their arm; but "she shall be given up, and they that brought her," all that projected that unhappy marriage between her and Antiochus, which occasioned so much mischief, instead of producing a coalition between the northern and southern crowns as was hoped. Antiochus divorced Berenice, took his former wife Laodice again, who soon after poisoned him, procured Berenice and her son to be murdered, and set up her own son by Antiochus to be king, who was called Seleucus Callinicus.

Thirdly. A war between the two kingdoms, ver. 7, 8. A branch from the same root with Berenice shall "stand up in his estate." Ptolemæus Euergetes, the son and successor of Ptolemæus Philadelphus, shall come with an army against Seleucus Callinicus, king of Syria, to avenge his sister's quarrel, and shall prevail. And he shall carry away a rich booty both of persons and goods into Egypt, and shall "continue more years than the king of the north." This Ptolemy reigned forty-six years; and Justin saith, if his own affairs had not called him home, he had in this war made himself master of the whole kingdom of Syria. But, ver. 9, he shall be forced to "come into his kingdom, and return into his own land," to keep peace there, so that he can no longer carry on the war abroad. Note, It is very common for a treacherous peace to end in a bloody war.

Fourthly. The long and busy reign of Antiochus the Great, king of Syria. Seleucus Callinicus, that king of the north who was overcome, ver. 7, and died miserably, left two sons, Seleucus and Antiochus; these are his sons, that is, the sons of the king of the north that shall be stirred up, and shall assemble a multitude of great forces to recover what their father lost, ver. 10. But Seleucus the elder, being weak, and unable to rule his army, was poisoned by his friends, and reigned only two years; and his brother Antiochus succeeded him, who reigned thirty-seven years, and was called the Great. And therefore the angel, though he speaks of sons at first, goes on with the account of one only, who was but fifteen years old when he began to reign, and he shall "certainly come and overflow" and overrun, and shall be restored at length to what his father lost.

1. The king of the south, in this war, shall at first have great success. Ptolemæus Philopater, moved with indignation at the indignities done him by Antiochus the Great, shall (though otherwise a slothful prince) "come forth and fight with him;" and shall bring a vast army into the field of seventy thousand foot, and five thousand horse, and seventy-three elephants. And the other multitude (that is, the army of Antiochus, consisting of sixty-two thousand foot, and six thousand horse, and one hundred and two elephants,) shall be given into his hand. Polybius, who lived with Scipio, has given a particular account of this battle of Raphia. Ptolemæus Philopater, having gained this victory, grew very insolent; his heart was lifted up, then he went into the temple of God at Jerusalem, and, in defiance of the law, entered the most holy place, for which God has a controversy with him, so that, though he shall cast down many myriads, yet he shall not be strengthened by it, so as to secure his interest. For,



2. The king of the north, Antiochus the Great, shall return with a greater army than the former; and at the end of times, that is, years, he shall come often with a mighty army, and great riches, against the king of the south, namely, Ptolemæus Epiphanes, who succeeded Ptolemæus Philopater his father, when he was a child, which gave advantage to Antiochus the Great. In this expedition he had some powerful allies; ver. 14, "Many shall stand up against the king of the south." Philip of Macedon was confederate with Antiochus against the king of Egypt, and Scopas his general, whom he sent into Syria. Antiochus routed him, and destroyed a great part of his army; whereupon the Jews willingly yielded to Antiochus, joined with him, and helped him to besiege Ptolemæus's garrisons: then "the robbers of thy people shall exalt themselves to establish the vision," to help forward the accomplishment of this prophecy, "but they shall fall," and shall come to nothing, ver. 14. Hereupon, ver. 15, the king of the north, this same Antiochus Magnus, shall carry on his designs against the king of the south another way. 1st. He shall surprise his strongholds. All that he has got in Syria and Samaria, and the arms of the south, all the power of the king of Egypt, shall not be able to withstand him. See how dubious and variable the turns of the scale of war are; like buying and selling, it is winning and losing; sometimes one side gets the better, and sometimes the other, yet neither by chance. It is not, as they call it, the fortune of war; but according to the will and counsel of God, who brings some low, and raiseth others up. 2nd. He shall make himself master of the land of Judæa, ver. 16. "He that comes against him," that is, the king of the north, shall carry all before him, and do what he pleases, and he shall stand, and get footing in the glorious land, so the land of Israel was, and by his hand it was wasted and consumed, for with the spoil of that good land he victualled his vast army. The land of Judæa lay between these two potent kingdoms of Egypt and Syria, so that if all the struggles between them that was sure to suffer, for to it they both bore ill-will. Yet some read this, 'By his hand it shall be perfected;' as if it intimated that the land of Judæa being taken under the protection of this Antiochus, shall flourish, and be in better condition than it had been. 3rd. He shall still push on his war against the king of Egypt, and "set his face to enter with the strength of his whole kingdom," taking advantage of the infancy of Ptolemy Epiphanes, and the upright ones, that is, many of the pious Israelites, siding with him, ver. 17. And in prosecution of his design, he shall give him his daughter Cleopatra to wife, designing, as Saul, in giving his daughter to David, that she should be a snare to him, and do him a mischief; but she shall not stand on her father's side, nor be for him, but for her husband, and so that plot failed him. 4th. His war with the Romans is here foretold, ver. 18. He shall "turn his face to the isles," ver. 18; the isles of the Gentiles, Gen. x. 5, Greece and Italy. He took many of the isles about the Hellespont, Rhodes, Samos, Delos, &c. which, by war or treason, he made himself master of; but a prince, or state, so some, even the Roman senate, or a leader, even the Roman general, shall return his reproach, with which he abused the Romans, upon himself, or, shall make his shame rest on himself, and without his own shame, or any disgrace to himself, shall pay him again. This was fulfilled when the two Scipios were sent with an army against Antiochus. Hannibal was then with him, and advised him to invade Italy, and waste it as he had done; but he did not take his advice, and Scipio joined battle with him and gave him a total defeat, though Antiochus had seventy thousand men and the Romans but thirty thousand. Thus he caused "the reproach offered by him to cease." 5th. His fall. When he was totally routed by the Romans, and was forced to quit all he had in Europe to them, and had a very heavy tribute exacted from him, he turned to his own land, and, not knowing which way to raise money to pay his tribute, he plundered a temple of Jupiter, which so incensed his own subjects against him that they set upon him and killed him, so he was overthrown and fell, and was no more found, ver. 19. 6th. His next successor, ver. 20. There rose up one in his place, "a raiser of taxes," a sender forth of the extortioner, or extorter. This character was remarkably answered in Seleucus Philopater, the elder son of Antiochus the Great, who was a great oppressor of his own subjects, and exacted abundance of money from them; and, when he was told he would thereby lose his friends, he said he knew no better friend he had than money. He likewise attempted to rob the temple at Jerusalem, which this seems especially to refer to. "But within few days he shall be destroyed, neither in anger nor in battle," but poisoned by Heliodorus, one of his own servants, when he had reigned but twelve years, and done nothing remarkable.

From all this let us learn, 1. That God in his providence sets up one, and pulls down another, as he pleaseth; advanceth some from low beginnings, and depresseth others that were very high. Some have called great men the football of fortune; or, rather, they are the tools of providence. 2. This world is full of wars and fightings, which comes from men's lusts, and make it a theatre of sin and misery. 3. All the changes and revolutions of states and kingdoms, and every event, even the most minute and contingent, were plainly and perfectly foreseen by the God of heaven, and to him nothing is new. 4. No word of God shall fall to the ground; but what he hath designed, what he hath declared, shall infallibly come to pass, and even the sins of men shall be made to serve his purpose, and contribute to the bringing of his counsels to birth in their season; and yet God is not the author of sin. 5. That for the right understanding of some parts of Scripture, it is necessary that heathen authors be consulted, which give light to the Scripture, and shew the accomplishment of what is there foretold. We have, therefore, reason to bless God for the human learning with which many have done great service to Divine truths.

21 And in his estate shall stand up a vile person, to whom they shall not give the honour of the kingdom: but he shall come in peaceably, and obtain the kingdom by flatteries. 22 And with the arms of a flood shall they be overflown from before him, and shall be broken; yea, also the prince of the covenant. 23 And after the league made with him he shall work deceitfully: for he shall come up, and shall become strong with a small people. 24 He shall enter peaceably even upon the fattest places of the province; and he shall do that which his fathers have not done, nor his fathers' fathers; he shall scatter among them the prey, and spoil, and riches: yea, and he shall forecast his devices against the strong holds, even for a time. 25 And he shall stir up his power and his courage against the king of the south with a great army; and the king of the south shall be stirred up to battle with a very great and mighty army; but he shall not stand: for they shall forecast devices against him. 26 Yea, they that feed of the portion of his meat shall destroy him, and his army shall overflow: and many shall fall down slain. 27 And both these kings' hearts shall be to do mischief, and they shall speak lies at one table; but it shall not prosper: for yet the end shall be at the time appointed. 28 Then shall he return into his be parenthetic between verses 12 and 14, and introduced to confirm the declaration just received, that God was his constant friend. It may be rendered, "Now a prince of the kingdom of Persia had opposed me for twenty-one days, and behold Michael, one of the chief princes, came to my help, and I remained there along with the kings of Persia." Taken by itself, the verse does not suggest the remotest idea who Michael was, whether angel or archangel; it clearly bears upon the face of it that a Persian prince had endeavoured to compass Daniel's overthrow, but that Michael, one of the chief princes, appeared for his rescue, and he remained at court. It is to be observed that Michael is the name of an angel, but it is equally true that it is the name of men (Numb. xiii. 13; Ezra viii. 8). If we take the words of the verse as a continuation of the message of the angel speaking in verses 12, 14, &c., we must suppose that Michael was an angel, and proceed throughout on very different principles of interpretation. "The prince of the kingdom" is by some explained of land with great riches; and his heart shall be against the holy covenant; and he shall do exploits, and return to his own land. 29 At the time appointed he shall return, and come toward the south; but it shall not be as the former, or as the latter. 30 For the ships of Chittim shall come against him: therefore he shall be grieved, and return, and have indignation against the holy covenant: so shall he do; he shall even return, and have intelligence with them that forsake the holy covenant. 31 And arms shall stand on his part, and they shall pollute the sanctuary of strength, and shall take away the daily sacrifice, and they shall place the abomination that maketh desolate. 32 And such as do wickedly against the covenant shall he corrupt by flatteries: but the people that do know their God shall be strong, and do exploits. 33 And they that understand among the people shall instruct many: yet they shall fall by the sword, and by flame, by captivity, and by spoil, many days. 34 Now when they shall fall, they shall be holpen with a little help: but many shall cleave to them with flatteries. 35 And some of them of understanding shall fall, to try them, and to purge, and to make them white, even to the time of the end: because it is yet for a time appointed. 36 And the king shall do according to his will; and he shall exalt himself, and magnify himself above every god, and shall speak marvellous things against the God of gods, and shall prosper till the indignation be accomplished: for that that is determined shall be done. 37 Neither shall he regard the God of his fathers, nor the desire of women, nor regard any god: for he shall magnify himself above all. 38 But in his estate shall he honour the God of forces: and a god whom his fathers knew not shall he honour with gold, and silver, and with precious stones, and pleasant things. 39 Thus shall he do in the most strong holds with a strange god, whom he shall acknowledge and increase with glory: and he shall cause them to rule over many, and shall divide the land for gain. 40 And at the time of the end shall the king of the south push at him: and the king of the north shall come against him like a whirlwind, with chariots, and with horsemen, and with many ships; and he shall enter into the countries, and shall overflow and pass over. 41 He shall enter also into the glorious land, and many countries shall be overthrown: but these shall escape out of his hand, even Edom, and Moab, and the chief of the children of Ammon. 42 He shall stretch forth his hand also upon the countries: and the land of Egypt shall not escape. 43 But he shall have power over the treasures of gold and of silver, and over all the precious things of Egypt: and the Libyans and the Ethiopians shall be at his steps. 44 But tidings out of the east and out of the north shall trouble him: therefore he shall go forth with great fury to destroy, and utterly to make away many. 45 And he shall plant the tabernacles of his palace between the seas in the glorious holy mountain; yet he shall come to his end, and none shall help him.

All this is a prophecy of the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes, the little horn spoken of before, ch. viii. 9, a sworn enemy to the Jewish religion, and a bitter persecutor of those that adhered to it. What troubles the Jews met with in the reigns of the Persian kings were not so particularly foretold to Daniel as these, because then they had living prophets with them, Haggai and Zachariah, to encourage them; but these troubles in the days of Antiochus were foretold, because before that time prophecy would cease, and they would find it necessary to have recourse to the written word. Some things in this prediction concerning Antiochus are alluded to in the New Testament predictions of the antichrist, especially ver. 36, 37. And as it is usual with the prophets, when they foretell the prosperity of the Jewish church, to make use of such expressions as were applicable to the kingdom of Christ, and insensibly to slide into a prophecy of that, so, when they foretell the troubles of the church, they make use of such expressions as have a farther reference to the kingdom of the antichrist, the rise and ruin of that. Now, concerning Antiochus, the angel foretells here,

First. His character. He shall be a vile person. He called himself Epiphanes, the illustrious; but his character was the reverse of his surname. The heathen writers describe him to be an odd-humoured man, rude and boisterous, base and sordid. He would sometimes steal out of the court into the city, and herd himself with any scoundrel company, incognito. He made himself a companion of the common sort, and the basest strangers that came to town. He had the most unaccountable whims, so that some took him to be silly, others to be mad; hence he was called Epimanes, the madman. He is called a vile person, for he had been a long time a hostage at Rome for the fidelity of his father, when the Romans had subdued him. And it was agreed that, when the other hostages were exchanged, he should continue a prisoner at large.

Secondly. His accession to the crown. By a trick he got his elder brother's son, Demetrius, to be sent a hostage to Rome, in exchange for him, contrary to the cartel; and his elder brother being made away by Heliodorus, ver. 20, he took the kingdom. The states of Syria did not give it him, ver. 21, because they knew it belonged to his elder brother's son, nor did he get it by the sword, but came in peaceably, pretending to reign for his brother's son, Demetrius, then a hostage at Rome. But with the help of Eumenes and Attalus, neighbouring princes, he gained an interest in the people, and by flatteries obtained the kingdom, and established himself in it, and crushed Heliodorus, who made head against him "with the arms of a flood." They that opposed him were overflown and broken before him, even the prince of the covenant, his nephew, the rightful heir, whom he pretended to covenant with, that he would resign to him whenever he should return, ver. 22. But, ver. 23, "after the league made with him, he shall work deceitfully," as one whose avowed maxim it is, that princes ought not to be bound by their word any longer than it is for their interest. And with a small people, that at first cleave to him, he shall become strong, and, ver. 24, "he shall enter peaceably upon the fattest places" of the kingdom of Syria, and, very unlike his predecessors, shall scatter among the people the prey, and the spoil, and riches, to insinuate himself into their affections; but at the same time he shall "forecast his devices against the strongholds," to make himself master of them, so that his generosity shall last but for a time. When he has got the garrisons into his hands he will scatter his spoi. no more, but rule by force, as those commonly do that come in by fraud. He that comes in like a fox reigns like a lion. Some understand these verses of his first expedition into Egypt, when he came not as an enemy, but as a friend and guardian to the young king Ptolemæus Philometor, and therefore brought with him but few followers, yet those stout men, and faithful to his interest, whom he placed in divers of the strongholds in Egypt, thereby making himself master of them.

Thirdly. His war with Egypt, which was his second expedition thither. This is described, ver. 25—27, Antiochus shall "stir up his power and courage" against Ptolemæus Philometor, king of Egypt. Ptolemy thereupon "shall be stirred up to battle" against him, shall come against him with "a very great and mighty army;" but Ptolemy, though he has such a vast army, shall not be able to stand before him, for Antiochus's army shall overthrow his, and overpower it, and great multitudes of the Egyptian army shall fall down slain. And no marvel, for the king of Egypt shall be betrayed by his own counsellors. "They that feed of the portion of his meat," that eat of his bread, and live upon him, being bribed by Antiochus, shall "forecast devices against him," and even they "shall destroy him." And what fence is there against such treachery? After the battle a treaty of peace shall be set on foot, and these two kings shall meet at one council board, to adjust the articles of peace an evil angel, and extraordinary theories have been erected on that idea as a basis. That Michael is the angel is most probable, but for the rest we are in more doubt.

x. 20. "To fight with the prince of Persia," whoever that was, is to contend with him, the angel signifying that he would resist him. "The prince of Grecia" or "of Greece" must be explained in the same way as "prince of Persia," but whether it is to be understood of a man or of an angel critics are not agreed. It is, however, more natural to regard both princes as men; and as a matter of fact the Persian kingdom was overthrown by the Greeks. This took place under Alexander the Great, about two hundred years after the date assigned to this prediction, as is admitted on all hands.

x. 21. "Michael your prince" is commonly regarded as meaning that Michael was a guardian angel of the Jewish people. See notes on verse 13.

xi. 1. The great plainness of this chapter has been appealed to by between them, but they shall neither of them be sincere in it; for they shall in their pretences and promises of amity and friendship lie to one another, for their hearts shall be at the same time to do one another all the mischief they can. And then no marvel it shall not prosper. The peace shall not last; but the end of it shall be at the time appointed in the Divine providence, and then the war shall break out again, as a sore that is only skinned over.

Fourthly. Another expedition against Egypt. From the former he returned "with great riches," ver. 28; and therefore took the first occasion to invade Egypt again at the time appointed by the Divine providence, two years after, in the eighth year of his reign, ver. 29. He shall come towards the south. But this attempt shall not succeed as the two former did, nor shall he gain his point as he had done before once and again, for, ver. 30, "The ships of Chittim shall come against him;" that is, the navy of the Romans, or only ambassadors from the Romans emate, who came in two ships. Ptolemæus Philometor, king of Egypt, being now in a strict alliance with the Romans, craved their aid against Antiochus, who had besieged him and his mother Cleopatra in the city of Alexandria. The Roman senate thereupon sent an embassy to Antiochus, to command him to raise the siege, which, when he desired some time to consider of, and consult with his friends about, Popilius, one of the ambassadors, with his staff drew a circle about him, and told him, as one having authority, he should give a positive answer before he came out of that circle; whereupon, fearing the Roman power, he was forced immediately to give orders for the raising of the siege, and the retreat of his army out of Egypt. So Livy and others relate the story which this prophecy refers to: he shall be grieved and return; for it was a great vexation to him to be forced to yield thus.

Fifthly. His rage and cruel practices against the Jews. This is that part of his government, or misgovernment rather, which is most enlarged upon in this prediction. In his return from his expedition into Egypt, which he prophesied of, ver. 28, he did exploits against the Jews, in the 6th year of his reign; then he spoiled the city and temple; but the most terrible storm was in his return from Egypt two years after, prophesied of ver. 20. Then he took Judæa in his way home, and, because he could not gain his point in Egypt, by reason of the Romans interposing, he wreaked his revenge upon the poor Jews, who gave him no provocation, but had greatly provoked God to permit him to do it, ch. viii. 23.

1. He had a rooted antipathy to the Jews' religion. His heart was "against the holy covenant," ver. 20; and, ver. 30, he had "indignation against the holy covenant;" that covenant of peculiarity by which the Jews were incorporated a people distinct from all other nations, and dignified above them. He hated the law of Moses, and the worship of the true God, and was vexed at the privileges of the Jewish nation, and the promises made to them. Note, That which is the hope and joy of the people of God is the envy of their neighbours, and that is the holy covenant. Esau hated Jacob because he had got the blessing. And those that are strangers to the covenant are often enemies to it.

2. He carried on his malicious designs against the Jews by the assistance of some perfidious, apostate Jews; he kept up "intelligence with them that forsook the holy covenant," ver. 30; some of the Jews that were false to their religion, and introduced the customs of the heathen, with whom they made a covenant. See the fulfilling of this, 1 Mac. i. 11—15, where it is expressly said concerning those renegado Jews, that they "made themselves uncircumcised, and forsook the holy covenant." And, 2 Mac. iv. 9, we read of Jason, the brother of Onias the high priest, who, by the appointment of Antiochus, set up a school at Jerusalem "for the training up of youth in the fashions of the heathen." And 2 Mac. iv. 23, &c., of Menelaus, who fell in with the interests of Antiochus, and was the man that helped him into Jerusalem now in his last return from Egypt. We read much in the book of the Maccabees of the mischief done to the Jews by these treacherous men of their own nation, Jason, and Menelaus, and their party. These upon all occasions he made use of. "Such as do wickedly against the covenant," that throw up their religion and comply with the heathen, he shall "corrupt with flatteries," to harden them in their apostasy, and to make use of them as decoys to draw in others, ver. 32. Note, It is not strange if those who do not live up to their religion, but in their conversations "do wickedly against the covenant," are easily corrupted by flatteries to quit their religion. They that make shipwreck of a good conscience will soon make shipwreck of the faith.

3. He profaned the temple. "Arms stand on his part," ver. 31; not only his own army which he now brought from Egypt, but a great party of deserters from the Jewish religion that joined with them, and they polluted the sanctuary of strength, not only the holy city, but the temple. The story of this we have, 1 Mac. i. 21, &c., "They entered proudly into the sanctuary, took away the golden altar, and the candlestick," &c.; and therefore, ver. 25, "There was a great mourning in Israel, the princes and elders mourned," &c. And 2 Mac. v. 15, &c., "Antiochus went into the most holy temple; Menelaus, that traitor to the laws, and to his own country, being his guide." Antiochus, having resolved to bring all about him to be of his religion, took away the daily sacrifice, ver. 31. Some observe that the word tammidh, which signifies no more than "daily," is only here and in the parallel place used for the daily sacrifice, as if there were a designed liberty left to supply it either with sacrifice, which was suppressed by Antiochus, or with gospel worship, which is suppressed by the antichrist. Then he "set up the abomination of desolation upon the altar," 1 Mac. i. 54, even an idol altar, ver. 59, and called the temple the temple of Jupiter Olympus, 2 Mac. vi. 2.

4. He persecuted those who retained their integrity. Though there are many that forsake the covenant, and do wickedly against it, yet there is a people that do know their God, and retain the knowledge of him, and "they shall be strong and do exploits," ver. 32; when others yield to the tyrant's demands, and surrender their consciences to his impositions, they bravely keep their ground, resist the temptation, and make the tyrant himself ashamed of his attempt upon them. Good old Eleazar, one of the principal scribes, when he had swine's flesh thrust into his mouth, bravely spit it out again, though he knew he must be tormented to death for so doing; and was so, 2 Mac. vi. 19. The mother and her seven sons were put to death for adhering to their religion, 2 Mac. vii. This might well be called doing exploits; for to choose suffering rather than sin is a great exploit. And it was by faith, by being strong in faith, that they did those exploits, that they "were tortured, not accepting deliverance," as the apostle speaks, probably with reference to that story, Heb. xi. 35. Or it may refer to the military courage and achievements of Judas Maccabæus and others in opposition to Antiochus. Note, The right knowledge of God is and will be the strength of the soul, and in the strength of that gracious souls do exploits. They that know his name will put their trust in him, and by that trust will do great things. Now, concerning this people that knew their God, we are here told,

1st. That "they shall instruct many," ver. 33. They shall make it their business to shew others what they have learned themselves of the difference between truth and falsehood, good and evil. Note, They that have the knowledge of God themselves should communicate their knowledge to those about them; and this spiritual charity must be extensive,—they must instruct many. Some understand this of a society newly erected for the propagating of Divine knowledge, called Assideans, godly men, pietists, so the name signifies, that were both knowing and zealous in the law; these instructed many. Note, In times of persecution and apostasy, which are trying times, those that have knowledge ought to make use of it for the strengthening and establishing of others. They that understand aright themselves ought to do what they can to bring others to understand; for knowledge is a talent that must be traded with. Or, they shall instruct many by their perseverance in their duty, and their patient suffering for it. Good examples instruct many, and with many are the most powerful instructions.

2nd. They that fall by the cruelty of Antiochus shall be put to the torture, and put to death by his rage. Though they are so excellent and intelligent themselves, and so useful and serviceable to others, yet Antiochus shall shew them no mercy; but 'they shall fall for some days.' So it may be read, Rev. ii. 10, "Thou shalt have tribulation ten days." We read much in the books of the Maccabees of Antiochus's barbarous usage of the pious Jews, how many he slew in wars, and how many he murdered in cold blood. Women were put to death for having their children circumcised, and their "infants hanged about their neck," 1 Mac. i. 60, 61. But why did God suffer this? How can this be reconciled with the justice and goodness of God? I answer, Very well, if we consider what it was that God aimed at in this, ver. 35, "Some of them of understanding shall fall;" but it shall be for the good of the church, and for their own spiritual benefit, "It shall be to try them, and to purge, and to make them white." They needed these afflictions themselves. The best have their spots, which must be washed off, their dross, which must be purged out; and their troubles, particularly their share in the public troubles, help to do this, being sanctified to them by the grace of God. They are means of mortifying their corruptions, weaning them from the world, and awakening them to greater seriousness and diligence in religion; they try them, as silver in the furnace is refined from its dross; they purge them, as wheat in the barn is winnowed from the chaff; and "make them white," as cloth by the fuller is cleared from its spots: see 1 Pet. i. 7. Their sufferings for righteousness' sake would try and purge the nation of the Jews, would convince them of the truth, excellency, and power of that holy religion which these understanding men died for their adherence to. The blood of the martyrs is the seed of the church; it is precious blood, and not a drop of it should be shed but upon such a valuable consideration.

3rd. The cause of religion, though it be thus run upon, yet it shall not be run down. "When they shall fall" they shall not be utterly cast down, but "they shall be holpen with a little help," ver. 34. Judas Maccabæus and his brethren, and a few with them, shall make head against the tyrant, and assert the injured cause of their religion; they "pulled down the idolatrous altars, circumcised the children that they found uncircumcised, recovered the law out of the hand of the Gentiles, and the work prospered in their hands," 1 Mac. ii. 45. Note, Those that stand by the cause of religion when it is threatened and struck at, though they may not presently be delivered and made victorious, yet they shall have present help. And a little help must not be despised, but when times are very bad we must be thankful for some reviving. It is likewise foretold that "many shall cleave to them with flatteries;" when they see the Maccabees prosper some Jews shall join with them that are no true friends to religion, but only will pretend friendship, either with design to betray them or in hope to rise with them; but the fiery trial (ver. 35) will separate between the precious and the vile, and by it they that are perfect will be made manifest, and they that are not.

4th. Though these troubles may continue long, yet they will have an end. They are for a time appointed, a limited time fixed in the Divine counsels. This warfare shall be accomplished. Hitherto the power of the enemy shall come, and no farther; here shall its "proud waves be stayed."

5. He grew very proud, insolent, and profane; and, being puffed up with his conquests, bade defiance to heaven, and trampled upon every thing that was sacred, ver. 36, &c. And here, some think, begins a prophecy of the antichrist, the papal kingdom; and it is plain, St. Paul, in his prophecy of the rise and reign of the man of sin, alludes to this here, 2 Thes. ii. 4, which shews that Antiochus was a type and figure of that enemy, as Babylon also was; but this, being joined in a continued discourse with the foregoing prophecies concerning Antiochus, to me it seems probable that to him it principally refers, and in him had its primary accomplishment, and has reference to the other only by way of accommodation.

1st. He shall impiously dishonour the God of Israel, the only living and true God, called here the God of gods. He shall, in defiance of him and his authority, "do according to his will," against his people and his holy religion; he shall exalt himself above him, as Sennacherib did, and shall "speak marvellous things" against him, and against his laws and institutions. This was fulfilled when Antiochus forbade sacrifice to be offered in God's temple, and ordered the sabbaths to be profaned, the sanctuary and the holy people to be polluted, &c., to "the end they might forget the law, and change all the ordinances," and this upon pain of death, 1 Mac. i. 45.

2nd. He shall proudly put contempt upon all other gods, shall "magnify himself above every God," even the gods of the nations. Antiochus wrote to his own kingdom, that every one should leave the gods he had worshipped, and worship such as he ordered, contrary to the practice of all the conquerors that went before him; 1 Mac. i. 41, 42, "And all the heathen agreed according to the commandment of the king." As fond as they were of their gods, they did not think them worth suffering for; but, their gods being idols, it was all alike to them what gods they worshipped. Antiochus did not regard any god, but "magnified himself above all," ver. 37. He was so proud that he thought himself above the condition of a mortal man, that he could "command the waves of the sea, and reach to the stars of heaven," as his insolence and haughtiness is expressed, 2 Mac. ix. 8, 10. Thus he carried all before him, till the indignation was accomplished, ver. 36; till he had run his length, and filled up the measure of his iniquity: for that that is determined shall be done, and nothing more, nothing short.

3rd. He shall, contrary to the way of the heathen, disregard the god of his fathers, ver. 37. Though an affection to the religion of their ancestors was among the heathen almost as natural to them as "the desire of women," for, if you search through "the isles of Chittim," you will not find an instance of a nation that has changed their gods, Jer. ii. 10, 11, yet Antiochus shall not regard the god of his fathers; he made laws to abolish the religion of his country, and to bring in the idols of the Greeks. And though his predecessors had honoured the God of Israel, and given great gifts to the temple of Jerusalem, 2 Mac. iii. 2, 3, he offered the greatest indignities to God and his temple. His not regarding the desire of women may speak either his barbarous cruelty,—he shall spare no age or sex, no, not the tender ones,—or his unnatural lusts, or, in general, his contempt of every thing which men of honour have a concern for. Or, it might be accomplished in something we meet not with in history. Its being joined to his not regarding the god of his fathers intimates that the idolatries of his country had in them more of the gratifications of the flesh than those of other countries, (Lucian has written of the Syrian goddesses,) and yet that would not prevail to keep him to them.

doubters as a reason for thinking it was not written so early as the time of Daniel. Thus Dr. Arnold thinks "the pretended prophecy about the kings of Greece and Persia, and of the north and south, is mere history." The events, he says, are given with historical minuteness to the time of the Maccabees, but beyond that date all is imaginary. To this it is replied that the clearness of the predictions, as alleged, is no disproof of them, and that numerous incidents referring to a later age than that of the Maccabees are included in them, and have in part been manifestly fulfilled. The upholders of the genuineness and authenticity of the Book of Daniel, moreover, for the most part believe that some of the oracles therein are still unaccomplished and future. Writers, ancient and modern, have written extensively on this subject. Bishop Newton's "Dissertations" are still popular; and useful summaries of fact and argument are to be found in Cassell's and other Bible Dictionaries. It is obvious that we can at most refer thus vaguely to other authors,

4th. He shall set up an unknown god, a new god; ver. 38, "In his estate," in the room of the gods of his fathers, Apollo and Diana, deities of pleasure, he shall "honour the god of forces," a supposed deity of power, "a god whom his fathers knew not," nor worshipped, because he will be thought in wisdom and strength to excel his fathers. He shall honour this god "with gold, and silver, and precious stones," thinking nothing too good for the god he had taken a fancy to. This seems to be Jupiter Olympus, known among the Phœnicians by the name of Baal-semen, the Lord of heaven, but never introduced among the Syrians till Antiochus did it. Thus shall he do "in the most strong holds," in the temple of Jerusalem, which is called "the sanctuary of strength," ver. 31, and here the 'fortresses of munitions;' there he shall set up the image of this strange god. Some read it, 'He shall commit the munitions of strength,' or of the most strong god, that is, the city Jerusalem, to 'a strange god;' he put it under the protection and government of Jupiter Olympus. This god he shall not only acknowledge, but shall "increase with glory," by setting his image even upon God's altar. And he shall cause them that minister to this idol "to rule over many;" shall put them into places of power and trust, and they shall "divide the land for gain," shall be maintained richly out of the profits of the country. Some, by the Mahuzzim, or, "god of forces," that Antiochus shall worship, understand money, which is said to answer all things, and which is the great idol of worldly people.

Now here is very much that is applicable to the man of sin: he exalteth himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped; magnifies himself above all; his flatterers call him 'our Lord God the pope.' By forbidding marriage, and magnifying the single life, he pretends not to regard the desire of women, and honours the god of forces, the god Mahuzzim, or strongholds, that is, saints and angels, whom his followers take for their protectors, as the heathen did of old their demons. These they make presidents of several countries, &c., these they honour with vast treasures dedicated to them; and therein the learned Mr. Mede thinks this prophecy was fulfilled, and that it is referred to 1 Tim. iv. 1, 2.

5th. Here seems to be another expedition into Egypt, or at least a struggle with Egypt. The Romans had tied him up from invading Ptolemy, but now that "king of the south pusheth at him," ver. 40, makes an attempt upon some of his territories; whereupon Antiochus, the "king of the north, comes against him like a whirlwind," with incredible swiftness and fury, "with chariots and horses, and many ships," a great force; he shall come through countries, "and shall overthrow and pass over." In this flying march "many countries shall be overthrown" by him; and he shall enter into the glorious land, the land of Israel; it is the same word that is translated the pleasant land, ch. viii. 9. He shall make dreadful work among the nations thereabout, yet some shall escape his fury, particularly Edom and Moab, and "the chief of the children of Ammon," ver. 41. He did not put these countries under contribution, because they had joined with him against the Jews; but especially the land of Egypt shall not escape, but he will quite beggar that, so bare will he strip it. This some reckon his fourth and last expedition against Egypt, in the tenth or eleventh year of his reign, under pretence of assisting the younger brother of Ptolemæus Philometor against him. We read not of any great slaughter made in this expedition, but great plunder, for it should seem that was what he came for; "He shall have power over the treasures of gold and silver, and all the precious things of Egypt," ver. 43. Polybius, in Athenæus, relates that Antiochus, having got together abundance of wealth by spoiling young Philometor, and breaking league with him, and by the contributions of his friends, bestowed a vast deal upon a triumph, in imitation of Paulus Æmilius, and describes the extravagance of it. Here we are told how he got that money which he spent so profusely. Notice is here taken likewise of the use he made of the Libyans and Ethiopians, who bordered upon Egypt; they were at his steps, that is, he had them at his foot, had them at his beck, and they made inroads upon Egypt to serve him.

6. Here is a prediction of the fall and ruin of Antiochus. As before, ch. viii. 25, when he is in the height of his honour, flushed with victory, and laden with spoils, "tidings out of the east and out of the north," that is, out of the north-east, shall trouble him, ver. 44. Or, he shall have intelligence, both from the eastern and northern parts, that the king of Parthia is invading his kingdom. This obliged him to drop the enterprises he had in hand, and to go against the Persians and Parthians that were revolting from him. And this vexed him; for now he thought utterly to have ruined and extirpated the Jewish nation, when that expedition called him off in which he perished. This is explained by a passage in Tacitus, (though an impious one,) where he commends Antiochus for his attempt to take away the superstition of the Jews, and bring in the manners of the Greeks among them, (ut teterrimam gentem in melius mutaret,—'to meliorate an odious nation,') and laments that he was hindered from accomplishing it by the Parthian war. Now here is,

1st. The last effort of his rage against the Jews. When he finds himself perplexed and embarrassed in his affairs, he shall "go forth with great fury to destroy, and utterly to make away many." ver. 44. The story of this we have, 1 Mac. iii. 27, &c.; what a rage Antiochus was in when he heard of the successes of Judas Maccabæus, and the orders he gave to Lysias to destroy Jerusalem. Then he planted "the tabernacles of his palace," or tents of his court, "between the seas," between the Great Sea and the Dead Sea. He set up his royal pavilion at Emmaus, near Jerusalem, in token that, though he could not be present himself, yet he gave full power to his captains to prosecute the war against the Jews with the utmost rigour. He placed his tent there, as if he had taken possession of "the glorious holy mountain," and called it his own. Note, When impiety grows very impudent we may see its ruin near.

2nd. His exit. "He shall come to his end, and none shall help him;" that is, God shall cut him off in the midst of his days, and none shall be able to prevent his fall. This is the same with that which was foretold, ch. viii. 25, "He shall be broken without hand," where we took a view of his miserable end. Note, When God's time is come to bring proud oppressors to their end, none shall be able to help them, nor, perhaps, inclined to help them; for those that covet to be feared by all, when they are in their grandeur, when they come to be in distress will find themselves loved by none; none will lend them so much as a hand or a prayer to help them; and, if the Lord do not help, who shall?

Of the kings that came after Antiochus nothing is here prophesied, for that was the most malicious, mischievous enemy to the church; that was a type of the son of perdition, whom the Lord shall consume with the breath of his mouth, and destroy with the brightness of his coming, and none shall help him.

CHAPTER XII.

After the prediction of the troubles of the Jews under Antiochus, prefiguring the troubles of the Christian church under the antichristian power, we have here, I. Comforts, and very precious ones, prescribed as cordials for the support of God's people in those times of trouble; and they are such as may indifferently serve both for those former times of trouble under Antiochus and those latter which were prefigured by them, ver. 1—4. II. A conference between Christ and an angel concerning the time of the continuance of these events, designed for Daniel's satisfaction, ver. 5—7. III. Daniel's inquiry for his own satisfaction, ver. 8; and the answer he received to that inquiry, ver. 9—13.

AND at that time shall Michael stand up, the great prince which standeth for the children of thy people: and there shall be a time of trouble, such as never was since there was a nation even to that same time: and at that time thy people shall be delivered, every one that shall be found written in the book. 2 And many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt. 3 And they that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars for ever and ever. 4 But thou, O Daniel, shut up the words, and seal the book, even to the time of the end: many shall run to and fro, and knowledge shall be increased.

It is usual with the prophets, when they foretell the grievances of the church, to furnish it at the same time with proper antidotes, a remedy for every malady. And no relief is so sovereign, of such general application, so easily accommodated to every case, and of such powerful efficacy, as those that are fetched from Christ and the future state; thence the comforts here are fetched.

First. Jesus Christ shall appear his church's patron and protector. "At that time," when the persecution is at the hottest, "Michael shall stand up," ver. 1. The angel had told Daniel what a fast friend Michael was to the church, ch. x. 21. He all along shewed it in the upper world, the angels knew it; but now "Michael shall stand up" in his providence, and work deliverance for the Jews, "when he sees that their power is gone," Deu. xxxii. 36. Christ is that "great prince," for he is the "Prince of the kings of the earth," Rev. i. 5; and if he stand up for his church who can be against it? But this is not all; at that time, that is, soon after, Michael shall stand up for the working out our eternal salvation, the Son of God shall be incarnate, shall be manifested to destroy the works of the devil. Christ stood for the children of our people when he was made sin and a curse for them, stood in their stead as a sacrifice, bore the curse for them, to bear it from them. He stands for them in the intercession he ever lives to make within the veil; stands up for them, and stands their Friend. And after the destruction of antichrist, of whom Antiochus was a type, Christ shall "stand at the latter day upon the earth," shall appear for the complete redemption of all his.

Secondly. When Christ appears he will recompense tribulation to them that trouble his people. "There shall be a time of trouble;" threatening to all, but ruining to all the implacable enemies of God's kingdom among men; such trouble "as never was since there was a nation." Which is applicable, 1. To the destruction of Jerusalem, which Christ calls (perhaps with an eye to this here) such a "great tribulation as was not since the beginning of the world to this time," Mat. xxiv. 21. This the angel had spoken much of, ch. ix. 26, 27; and it happened about the same time that Christ set up the gospel kingdom in the world, that Michael our prince stands up. Or, 2. To the judgment of the great day, that day that shall burn as an oven, and consume the proud and all that do wickedly; that will be such a day of trouble as never was, to all those whom Michael our prince stands against.

Thirdly. He will work salvation for his people. "At that time thy people shall be delivered," delivered from the mischief and ruin designed them by Antiochus, even all those that were marked for preservation, that were "written among the living," Isa. iv. 3. When Christ comes into the world he will save his spiritual Israel from sin and hell, and will, at his second coming, complete their salvation, even the salvation of as many as were given him, as many as had "their names in the book of life," Rev. xx. 15. They were written there before the world, and will be found written there at the end of the world, when the books shall be opened.

Fourthly. There shall be a distinguishing resurrection of them that "sleep in the dust," ver. 2. 1. When God works deliverance for his people from persecution it is a kind of resurrection. So the Jews' release out of Babylon was represented in vision, Eze. xxxvii., and so the deliverance of the Jews from Antiochus, and other restorations of the church to outward prosperity; they were as life from the dead. Many of them that had long slept in the dust of obscurity and calamity shall then awake, some to that life, and honour, and comfort, that will be lasting, everlasting; but others, that when they return to their prosperity will return to their iniquity, to them it will be a resurrection to shame and contempt, for the prosperity of fools will but expose them and destroy them. 2. When, upon the appearing of Michael our prince, his Gospel is preached, many of them that "sleep in the dust," both Jews and Gentiles, shall be awakened by it, to take upon them a profession of religion, and shall rise out of their heathenism or Judaism; but, since there will be always a mixture of hypocrites with true saints, it is but some of them that are raised to life to whom the Gospel is a "savour of life unto life;" but others will be raised by it "to shame and contempt," to whom the Gospel of Christ will be a "savour of death unto death," and Christ himself set for their fall. The net of the Gospel incloseth both good and bad. But, 3. It must be meant of the general resurrection at the last day. "The multitude of them that sleep in the dust shall awake;" that is, all, which shall be a great many. Or, 'of them that sleep in the dust,' many shall arise to life, and many to shame. The Jews themselves understand this of the resurrection of the dead, at the end of time; and Christ seems to have had an eye to it when he speaks of the "resurrection of life," and the "resurrection of damnation," Jno. v. 29; and upon this the Jews are said by St. Paul to expect a resurrection of the dead both of "the just and of the unjust," Acts xxiv. 15. And nothing could come in more seasonably here; for, under Antiochus's persecution, some basely betrayed their religion, others bravely adhered to it. Now it would be a trouble to them, that when the storm was over they could neither reward the one nor punish the other; this, therefore, would be a satisfaction to them, that they would both be recom-

as the plan of this work does not permit us to do more. Of commentators we may, however, mention the names of Hengstenberg and Barnes.

xi. 6. Instead of the words, "he that begat her," the margin suggests another version, "whom she brought forth," i. e., "her offspring." The next words, "he that strengthened her," may be, and probably are, intended to include more than one, "whoever supported her."

xi. 17. "Daughter of women," no doubt, is an epithet of Cleopatra, whom her father, Antiochus III., made the wife of Ptolemy. It denotes her high condition.

xi. 20. The word "estate" here means station or position. Antiochus was succeeded by his son Seleucus, who was poisoned.

xi. 22. "The prince of the covenant" may be some monarch with whom an alliance existed, as the king of Egypt, who had made a treaty with Antiochus III.

pensed according to their works in the resurrection. And the apostle, speaking of the pious Jews that suffered martyrdom under Antiochus, tells us that though they were tortured, yet they "accepted not deliverance," because they "hoped to obtain this better resurrection," Heb. xi. 35.

Fifthly. There shall be a glorious reward conferred on those that, in the day of trouble and distress, being themselves wise, did instruct many. Such were taken particular notice of in the prophecy of the persecution, ch. xi. 33, that they should do eminent service, and yet should "fall by the sword and by flame." Now if there were not another life after this, they would be "of all men most miserable," and therefore we are here assured that they shall be recompensed in "the resurrection of the just," ver. 3. "They that be wise," that be teachers, so some read it,—for teachers have need of wisdom, and they that have wisdom themselves should communicate it to others,—they "shall shine as the brightness of the firmament," shall shine in glory, heavenly glory, the glory of the upper world. And they that by the wisdom they have, and the instructions they give, are instrumental to turn any, especially to "turn many to righteousness," shall shine "as the stars for ever and ever." Note, 1. There is a glory reserved for all the saints in the future state, for all that are wise, wise for their souls and eternity. A man's wisdom now "makes his face to shine," Eccl. viii. 1; but much more in that state where its power shall be perfected and its services rewarded. 2. The more good any do in this world, especially to the souls of men, the greater will be their glory and reward in the other world. They that turn men to righteousness, that "turn sinners from the errors of their ways," and help to "save their souls from death," Jas. v. 6, will share in the glory of those they have helped to heaven, which will be a great addition to their own glory. 3. Ministers of Christ, that have obtained mercy of him to be faithful and successful, and so are made burning and shining lights in this world, shall shine very bright in the other world, shall shine as the stars. Christ is the sun, the Fountain of the lights, both of grace and glory. Ministers, as stars, shine in both, with a light derived from him, and a diminutive light in comparison of him; yet, to those that are earthen vessels, it will be a glory infinitely transcending their deserts. They shall shine as the stars of different magnitudes, some in lesser, others in greater lustre; but, whereas the day is coming when the stars shall fall from heaven as leaves in autumn, these stars shall shine for ever and ever, shall never set, never be eclipsed.

Sixthly. That this prophecy of those times, though sealed up now, would be of great use to them that should live then, ver. 4. Daniel must now "shut up the words, and seal the book," because the time would be long ere these things were accomplished. And that was some comfort, that the Jewish nation, though in the infancy of their return from Babylon, while they were few and weak, they met with obstructions in their work, yet they were not persecuted for their religion till a long time after, when they were grown to some strength and maturity. He must seal the book, because it would not be understood, and therefore would not be regarded, till the things contained in it were accomplished; but he must keep it safe as a treasure of great value laid up for the ages to come, to whom it would be of great service; for "many shall then run to and fro, and knowledge shall be increased." Then this hid treasure shall be opened, and many shall search into it, and dig for the knowledge of it as for silver. They shall "run to and fro" to inquire out copies of it, shall collate them, and see that they be true and authentic; they shall read it over and over, shall meditate upon it and run it over in their minds; discurrent, they shall discourse of it, and talk it over among themselves, and compare notes about it, if by any means they may sift out the meaning of it; and thus "knowledge shall be increased." By consulting this prophecy on this occasion they shall be led to search other Scriptures, which shall contribute much to their advancement in useful knowledge; for "then shall we know, if we follow on to know the Lord," Hos. vi. 3. Those that would have their knowledge increased must take pains, must not sit still in slothfulness and bare wishes, but run to and fro,—must make use of all the means of knowledge, and improve all opportunities of getting their mistakes rectified, their doubts resolved, and their acquaintance with the things of God improved—to know more, and to know better, what they do know. And let us here see reason to hope that, 1. Those things of God which are now dark and obscure will hereafter be made clear and easy to be understood. Truth is the daughter of time; Scripture prophecies will be expounded by the accomplishment of them, and therefore they are given, and for that explication they are reserved. Therefore they are told us before, that when they do come to pass we may believe. 2. Those things of God which are despised, and neglected, and thrown by as useless, shall be brought into reputation, shall be found to be of great service, and be brought into request; for Divine revelation, however slighted for a time, shall be magnified and made honourable, and above all in the judgment of the great day, when the books shall be opened, and that book among the rest.

5 Then I Daniel looked, and, behold, there stood other two, the one on this side of the bank of the river, and the other on that side of the bank of the river. 6 And one said to the man clothed in linen, which was upon the waters of the river, How long shall it be to the end of these wonders? 7 And I heard the man clothed in linen, which was upon the waters of the river, when he held up his right hand and his left hand unto heaven, and sware by him that liveth for ever that it shall be for a time, times, and an half; and when he shall have accomplished to scatter the power of the holy people, all these things shall be finished. 8 And I heard, but I understood not: then said I, O my Lord, what shall be the end of these things? 9 And he said, Go thy way, Daniel: for the words are closed up and sealed till the time of the end. 10 Many shall be purified, and made white, and tried; but the wicked shall do wickedly: and none of the wicked shall understand; but the wise shall understand. 11 And from the time that the daily sacrifice shall be taken away, and the abomination that maketh desolate set up, there shall be a thousand two hundred and ninety days. 12 Blessed is he that waiteth, and cometh to the thousand three hundred and five and thirty days. 13 But go thou thy way till the end be: for thou shalt rest, and stand in thy lot at the end of the days.

Daniel had been made to foresee the amazing revolutions of states and kingdoms, as far as the Israel of God was concerned in them; in them he foresaw troublous times to the church, suffering, trying times, the prospect of which much affected him, and filled him with concern. Now there were two questions proper to be asked upon this head: When shall the end be? and, What shall the end be? These two questions are asked and answered here in the close of the book; and, though the comforts prescribed in the foregoing verses, one would think, were satisfactory enough, yet for more abundant satisfaction this is added.

First. The question, When the end shall be? is asked by an angel, ver. 5, 6. And, concerning this, we may observe,

1. Who it was that asked the question. Daniel had had a vision of Christ in his glory, the "man clothed in linen," ch. x. 5; but his discourse had been with the angel Gabriel, and now he looks and "behold other two," ver. 5, two angels that he had not seen before; one upon the bank of the river on one side, and the other on the other side, that, the river being between them, they might not whisper to one another, but what they said might be heard. Christ stood "on the waters of the river," ver. 6, "between the banks of Ulai;" it was therefore proper that the angels, his attendants, should stand on either bank, that they might be ready to go, one one way and the other the other way, as he should order them. These angels appeared, 1st. To adorn the vision, and make it the more illustrious, and to add to the glory of the Son of man, Heb. i. 6. Daniel had not seen them before, though it is probable they were there; but now, when they began to speak, he looked up and saw them. Note, The farther we look into the things of God, and the more we converse with them, the more we shall see of those things, and still new discoveries will be made us. They that know much, if they improve it, shall know more. 2nd. To confirm the discovery, that "out of the mouth of two or three witnesses" the word might be established; three angels appeared to Abraham. 3rd. To inform themselves, to hear and ask questions; for the mysteries of God's kingdom are things which the "angels desire to look into," 1 Pet. i. 12; and they are "known to the church," Eph. iii. 10. Now one of these two angels said, When shall the end be? Perhaps they both asked, first one and then the other, but Daniel heard only one.

2. To whom this question was put. To the man clothed in linen, of whom we read before, ch. x. 5. To Christ our great high priest, who "was upon the waters of the river," and whose spokesman or interpreter the angel Gabriel had all this while been. This river was Hiddekel, ch. x. 4, the same with Tigris, the place whereabout many of the events prophesied of would happen; there, therefore, is the scene laid. Hiddekel was mentioned as one of the rivers that watered the garden of Eden, Gen. ii. 14; fitly, therefore, doth Christ stand upon that river, for by him the trees in the paradise of God are watered. Waters signify people, and so his standing upon the waters notes his dominion over all; he "sits upon the flood," Ps. xxix. 10. He "treads upon the waters of the sea," Job ix. 8. And Christ, to shew that this was he in the days of the flesh, walked upon the water," Mat. xiv. 25. He was 'above the waters of the river,' so some read it. He appeared in the air over the river.

3. What the question was. "How long shall it be to the end of these wonders?" Daniel would not ask the question, because he would not pry into what was hidden, nor seem inquisitive concerning the times and the seasons, which the Father has "put in his own power," Acts i. 7; but, that he might have the satisfaction of the answer, the angel put the question in his hearing. Our Lord Jesus sometimes answered the questions which his disciples were afraid or ashamed to ask, Jno. xvi. 19. The angel asked, as one concerned, "How long shall it be?" What is the time prefixed, in the Divine counsels, for the end of these wonders? that is, these suffering, trying times, that are to pass over the people of God. Note, 1st. The troubles of the church are the wonder of angels. They admire that God will suffer his church to be thus afflicted, and yet what good he will do his church by his afflictions. 2nd. Good angels know no more of things to come than God is pleased to discover to them, much less do evil angels. 3rd. The holy angels in heaven are concerned for the church on earth, and lay to heart its afflictions; how much more, then, should we, who are more immediately related to it, and have so much of our peace in its peace! 4th. What answer was returned to it, by him who is indeed the numberer of secrets, and knows things to come.

First. Here is a more general account given of the continuance of these troubles to the angel that made the inquiry, ver. 7, that they shall continue "for a time, times and a half," that is, a year, two years, and half a year, as was before intimated, ch. vii. 25, but the one half of a prophetical week. Some understand it indefinitely, a certain time for an uncertain; it shall be for a time, that is, a considerable time, for times, a longer time yet, double to what it was thought at first it would be, and yet, indeed, it shall be but half a time, or a part of a time; when it is over it shall not seem half so much as was feared. But it is rather to be taken for a certain time; we meet with it in the Revelation, under the title, sometimes, of three days and a half, put for three years and a half; sometimes forty-two months, sometimes one thousand two hundred and sixty days. Now this determination of the time is here, 1*st.* Confirmed by an oath. The man clothed in linen lifted up both his hands to heaven, "and sware by him that lives for ever" and ever, that it shall be so. Thus the mighty angel whom St. John saw is brought in, with a plain reference to this vision here, standing with his "right foot on the sea, and his left foot on the earth," and with his hand lifted up to heaven, swearing "that there shall be no longer delay," Rev. x. 5, 6. This mighty one that Daniel saw stood with both feet on the water, and sware with both hands lifted up. Note, An oath is of use for confirmation. God only is to be sworn by, for he is the proper judge to whom we are to appeal; and lifting up the hand is a very proper and significant sign to be used in a solemn oath. 2*nd.* It is illustrated with a reason. God will suffer him to prevail, "till he shall have accomplished to scatter the power of the holy people;" God will suffer him to do his worst, and run his utmost length, and then "all these things shall be finished." Note, God's time to succour and relieve his people is when their affairs are brought to the last extremity; "in the mount of the Lord it shall be seen" that Isaac is saved, just then when he lies ready to be sacrificed. Now the event answered th

xi. 30. Chittim is usually explained to mean Cyprus, which was an important centre of commerce. Very probably the ambassadors sent by Rome to Antiochus in Egypt crossed in ships of Chittim, as they went by way of Greece and Chalcis, Delos and Rhodes, and thence to Alexandria.

xi. 31. Thus far it is generally agreed that Antiochus is the subject, but here expositors become divided, and while some hold that Antiochus is the chief theme to the end of the chapter, others think it is Antiochus as an emblem of Antichrist, and others that the Romans come in, but that the whole is not even yet fulfilled. There have been adduced on each side very powerful arguments, and it is not easy to say which has the most weighty array of supporters. A single point will show the difficulty of deciding positively. We read here of some who should pollute the sanctuary, put a stop to the daily offerings, and set up the abominations of idolatry. Now all this happened under Antiochus (1 Macc. i.), but it also happened prediction; Josephus saith expressly, in his book of the wars of the Jews, that Antiochus, surnamed Epiphanes, surprised Jerusalem by force, and held it three years and six months, and was then cast out of the country by the Asmoneans or Maccabees. Christ's public ministry continued three years and a half, during which time he endured the contradiction of sinners against himself, and lived in poverty and disgrace: and then, when his power seemed to be quite scattered at his death, and his enemies triumphed over him, he obtained the most glorious victory, and said, "It is finished."

Secondly. Here is something added more particularly concerning the time of the continuance of these troubles, in what is said to Daniel, ver. 11, 12; where we have, 1*st.* The event fixed from which the time of the trouble is to be dated. From the taking away of the daily sacrifice by Antiochus, and the setting up of the image of Jupiter upon the altar, which was the abomination of desolation. Then they must reckon their troubles to begin indeed, when they were deprived of the benefit of public ordinances; that was to them the beginning of sorrows, that was what they laid most to heart. 2*nd.* The continuance of their trouble. It shall last one "thousand two hundred and ninety days," three years and seven months, or, as some reckon, three years, six months, and fifteen days; and then, it is probable, the daily sacrifice was restored, and the abomination of desolation taken away, in remembrance of which the feast of dedication was observed even to our Saviour's time, Jno. x. 22. Though it do not appear by the history that it was exactly so long to a day, yet it appears that the beginning of the trouble was in the one hundred and forty-fifth year of the Seleucidæ, and the end of it in the one hundred and forty-eighth year; and either the restoring of the sacrifice and the taking away of the image was just so many days after, or some other previous event that was remarkable, which is not recorded. There are many particular times fixed in the Scripture prophecies, which it doth not appear by any history, sacred or profane, that the event answered, and yet no doubt it did punctually, as Isa. xvi. 14. 3*rd.* The completing of their deliverance, or at least a farther advance towards it, which is here set forty-five days after the former, and some think points at the death of Antiochus, one thousand three hundred and thirty-five days after his profaning the temple. "Blessed is he that waits," and comes to that time. It is said, 1 Mac. vi. 16, that Antiochus died in the one hundred and forty-ninth year of the kingdom of the Greeks, and, 2 Mac. ix. 28, x. 1, that the Maccabees, under a Divine conduct, recovered the temple and the city. Many good interpreters make these to be prophetical days, that is, so many years, and date them from the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans; but what events they then fall upon they are not agreed. Others date them from the corruption of the gospel worship by the antichrist, whose reign is confined in the apocalypse to one thousand two hundred and sixty days, that is, years, at the end of which he shall begin to fall; but thirty years after he shall be quite fallen, at the end of one thousand two hundred and ninety days; and whoever lives forty years longer, to one thousand three hundred and thirty-five days, will see glorious times indeed. Whether it looks so far forwards or no, I cannot tell; but this, however, we may learn, (1.) That there is a time fixed for the period of the church's troubles, and the bringing about of her deliverance, and this time will be punctually observed to a day. (2.) That this time must be waited for with faith and patience. (3.) That when it comes it will abundantly recompense us for our long expectation of it. Blessed is he that, having waited long, comes to it at last, for he will then have reason to say, "Lo, this is our God, and we have waited for him."

Secondly. The question, What shall the end be? is asked by Daniel, and an answer given to it. Observe,

1. Why Daniel asked this question. It was because, though he heard what was said to the angel, yet he did not understand it, ver. 8. Daniel was a very intelligent man, and had been conversant in visions and prophecies, and yet here he was puzzled; he did not understand the meaning of the time, times and the part of a time, at least not so clearly, and with so much certainty, as he wished. Note, The best men are often much at a loss in their inquiries concerning Divine things, and meet with that which they do not understand. But the better they are the more sensible they are of their own weakness and ignorance, and the more ready to acknowledge it.

2. What the question was, "O my Lord, what shall be the end of these things?" He directs his inquiry, not to the angel that talked with him, but immediately to Christ, for to whom else should we go with our inquiries? What shall be the final issue of these events? what do they tend to? what will they end in? Note, When we take a view of the affairs of this world, and of the church of God in it, we cannot but think what will be the end of these things. We see things move as if they would end in the utter ruin of God's kingdom among men; when we observe the prevalence of vice and impiety, the decay of religion, the sufferings of the righteous, and the triumphs of the ungodly over them, we may well ask, "O my Lord, what will be the end of these things?" But this may satisfy us in general, that all will end well at last. Great is the truth, and will prevail at long run. All opposing rule, principality, and power will be put down, and holiness and love will triumph, and be in honour to eternity. The end, this end, will come.

3. What answer is returned to this question. Besides what refers to the time, ver. 11, 12, of which before, here are some general instructions given to Daniel, with which he is dismissed from farther attendance.

1st. He must content himself with the discoveries that had been made to him, and not inquire any farther. "Go thy way, Daniel;" let it suffice thee that thou hast been admitted thus far to the foresight of things to come, but stop here. "Go thy way" about the king's business again, ch. viii. 27; "Go thy way" and record what thou hast seen and heard for the benefit of posterity, and covet not to see and hear more at present. Note, Communion with God is not our continual feast in this world; we sometimes are taken to be witnesses of Christ's glory, and we say, "It is good to be here;" but we must go down from the mount, and have there no continuing city. Those that know much know but in part, and still see there is a great deal that they are kept in the dark about, and are likely to be so till the veil is rent. Hitherto their knowledge shall go, but no farther; "Go thy way, Daniel," satisfied with what thou hast.

2nd. He must not expect that what had been said to him would be fully understood till it was accomplished. "The words are closed up and sealed," are involved in perplexities, and are likely to be so "till the time of the end," till the end of these things; nay, till the end of all things. Daniel was ordered to "seal the book to the time of the end," ver. 4. The Jews used to say, When Elias cometh he will tell us all things. They are "closed up and sealed," that is, the discovery designed to be made by them is now fully settled and completed. Nothing is to be added to it or taken from it, for it is "closed up and sealed;" ask not, therefore, after more. Nescire velle quæ magister maximus docere non vult erudita inscitia est.—'He has learned much who is willing to be ignorant of those things which the great Teacher does not choose to impart.'

3rd. He must count upon no other, but that as long as the world stands there will still be such a mixture as now we see there is of good and bad in it, ver. 10. We long to see all wheat and no tares in God's field, all corn and no chaff in God's floor; but it will not be till the time of the ingathering, till the winnowing day comes; both must grow together until the harvest. As it has been, so it is and will be; "the wicked shall do wickedly, but the wise shall understand." In this, as in other things, St. John's revelation closeth as Daniel did; Rev. xxii., "He which is filthy, let him be filthy still; and he which is holy, let him be holy still." First. There is no remedy but that wicked people will do wickedly; and such people there are and will be in the world to the end of time. 'So saith the proverb of the ancients "Wickedness proceedeth from the wicked," 1 Sam. xxiv. 13; and the observation of the moderns saith the same. Ill men will do ill things, and a corrupt tree will never bring forth good fruit; "Do men gather grapes of thorns?" or bring forth good things from an evil treasure in the heart? No, wicked practices are the natural products of wicked principles and dispositions. "Marvel not at the matter" then, Eccl. v. 8. We are told before that "the wicked will do wickedly," we can expect no better from them; but, which is worse, "none of the wicked shall understand." This is either, 1*st.* A part of their sin. They will not understand; they shut their eyes against light, and none so blind as they that will not see; therefore they are wicked because they will not understand. If they did but rightly know the truths of God, they would readily obey the laws of God, Ps. lxxxii. 5. Wilful sin is the effect of willing ignorance; therefore, they will not understand because they are wicked; therefore, they hate the light, and come not to the light, "because their deeds are evil," Jno. iii. 19. Or, 2*nd.* It is a part of their punishment. They will do wickedly, and therefore God hath given them up to blindness of mind, and has said concerning them, "They shall not understand," nor be converted and healed, Mat. xiii. 14, 15. God will not "give them eyes to see," because they will do wickedly, Deu. xxix. 4. Secondly. Yet, as bad as the world is, God will secure to himself a remnant of good people in it. Still there shall be some, there shall be many, to whom the providences and ordinances of God shall be "a savour of life unto life," while to others they are "a savour of death unto death." 1*st.* The providences of God shall do them good. "Many shall be purified, and made white, and tried" by their troubles, (compare ch. xi. 35) by the same troubles; which will but stir up the corruptions of the wicked, and make them do more wickedly. Note, The afflictions of good people are designed for their trial; but by these trials they are "purified and made white," their corruptions are purged out, their graces are brightened and made both more vigorous and more conspicuous, and are "found to praise, and honour, and glory," 1 Pet. i. 7. Those that are themselves sanctified and good, to them every event is sanctified, and works for good, and helps to make them better. 2*nd.* The word of God shall do them good. When the wicked understand not, but stumble at the word, the wise shall understand. Those that are wise in practice shall understand doctrine; those that are influenced and governed by the Divine law and love, shall be illuminated with a Divine light; for if any man will do his will he shall know the truth, Jno. vii. 17. "Give instruction to a wise man, and he will be yet wiser"

4th. He must comfort himself with the pleasing prospect of his own happiness, in death, in judgment, and to eternity, ver. 13. Daniel was now very old, and had been long engaged both in an intimate acquaintance with heaven and a great deal of public business on this earth; and now he must think of bidding farewell to this present state; "Go thou thy way till the end be." First. It is good for us all to think much of going away from this world; we are still going, and must be gone shortly, gone the way of all the earth. That must be our way; but this is our comfort, we shall not go till God calls for us to another world, and till he has done with us in this world, till he saith, "Go thou thy way," thou hast finished thy testimony, done thy work, and accomplished as a hireling thy day. Therefore, now, "Go thou thy way," and leave it to others to take thy room. Secondly. When a good man goes his way from this world he enters into rest. Thou shalt rest from all thy present toils and tosses, and shalt not see the evils that are coming on the next generation. Never can a child of God say more pertinently than in his dying moments, "Return unto thy rest, O my soul." Thirdly. Time and days will have an end. Not only our time and days will end very shortly, but all times and days will have an end at length; yet a little while, and time shall be no more, but all its revolutions will be numbered and finished. Fourthly. Our rest in the grave will be but till the end of the days, and then the peaceful rest will be happily disturbed by a joyful resurrection. Job foresaw this when he said of the dead, that "till the heavens be no more" they "shall not awake, nor be raised out of their sleep," implying that then they shall, Job xiv. 12. Fifthly. We must every one of us "stand in our lot at the end of the days." In the judgment of the great day we must have our allotment according to what we were and what we did in the body, either, Come, ye blessed, or, Go, ye cursed; and we must stand for ever in that lot. It was a comfort to Daniel, it is a comfort to all the saints, that, whatever their lot is in the days of time, they shall have a happy lot in the end of the days, shall have their lot among the chosen. And it ought to be the great care and concern of every one of us to secure a happy lot at last in the end of the days, and then we may well be content with our present lot, welcome the will of God. Sixthly. A believing hope and prospect of a blessed lot in the heavenly Canaan, at the end of the days, will be an effectual support to us when we are going our way out of this world, and will furnish us with living comforts in dying moments.

under the Romans, when Titus took Jerusalem, and subsequent rulers defiled the city and sacred places in every way. That this last would occur our Lord declared, alluding to this very verse, or to the similar phrase in chap. ix. 27 (Matt. xxiv. 15). Some say the Saviour clearly understood the passage of the Romans, but others think he used the reference to Daniel by way of accommodation in a distinct prophecy. It is observed on the one hand that some of the details cannot, with our knowledge, be applied to Antiochus; and on the other hand it is said there are details which do not fit the case of the Romans. A strong and ancient school of interpreters think Antiochus is the actual subject, but partly as a type of some later foe to God's Church and truth—a view deserving respectful consideration.

xi. 40. The king of the south, or of Egypt, would assail the king of the north, or of Syria, who would return to the charge; in other words, would invade Egypt by land and sea. Jerome says such an event occurred in the reign of Antiochus, and quotes Porphyry as the authority for the statement. Porphyry was an unbeliever, but he was a learned man, and would scarcely invent such a story.

xi. 41. In marked agreement with the view set forth in the last note, it is here indicated that the invader of the south would traverse Palestine, "the glorious land," but Edom, Moab, and the chief of Ammon would escape, being, in fact, not on his line of march. This exception of those three nations cannot refer to a late period, and must not be explained so as to contrast with prophecies of their fall. Edom, Ammon, and Moab finally disappear from the roll of nations after they come under the domination of the Romans, and their countries are still desolate.

xi. 42, 43. Egypt, or at least the best portions of it, were subdued by Antiochus, and he even obtained possession of the person of the king. It is doubtful what is meant by the reference to the Libyans and Ethiopians, and whether they co-operated with Antiochus or were conquered by him.

xi. 44, 45. It is known that Antiochus was disturbed by rumours from Parthia and Armenia in the east and north, and that he went on an expedition against them, on returning from which he died. This shows that the prophecy, as a whole, probably refers to him. In view of the facts, Barnes says, "Either the infidel must dispose of the testimony that Daniel lived and wrote at the time alleged, or, as an honest man, he should admit that he was inspired." The evidence that Daniel did live at the time alleged is too powerful

SUPPLEMENTARY NOTES TO THE BOOK OF DANIEL.

WHAT, asks Bishop Newton, is there wanting of external or internal evidence to prove the genuineness and authenticity of the book of Daniel? There is all the external evidence that can well be had or desired in a case of this nature; not only the testimony of the whole Jewish church and nation, who have constantly received this book as canonical, but of Josephus particularly, who recommends him as the greatest of the prophets; of the Jewish Targums and Talmuds, which frequently cite and appeal to his authority; of St. Paul and St. John, who have copied many of the prophecies; of our Saviour himself, who citeth his words, and styleth him Daniel the prophet; of ancient historians, who relate many of the same transactions; of the mother of the seven sons and of the father of the Maccabees, who both recommend the example of Daniel to their sons; of old Eleazar in Egypt, who, praying for the Jews then suffering under the persecution of Ptolemy Philopater, 3 Mac. vii. 6, 7, mentions the deliverance of Daniel out of the den of lions, together with the deliverance of the three men out of the fiery furnace; of the Jewish high priest, who shewed Daniel's prophecies to Alexander the Great, while he was at Jerusalem; and still higher, of Ezekiel, a contemporary writer, who greatly extols his piety and wisdom. Nor is the internal less powerful and convincing than the external evidence; for the language, the style, the manner of writing, and all other internal marks and characters, are perfectly agreeable to that age; and he appears plainly and undeniably to have been a prophet by the exact accomplishment of his prophecies. Indeed, it will entirely overthrow the notion of their being written in the days of Antiochus Epiphanes, or of the Maccabees, and will establish the credit of Daniel as a prophet beyond all contradiction, if it can be proved that there are several prophecies of his which have been fulfilled since the days of Antiochus Epiphanes and the Maccabees, as well as before; nay, that there are prophecies of his which are fulfilling in the world at this very time.—And yet, says Scott, in his Commentary, the prophecies of Daniel have, in all succeeding generations, received as undeniable accomplishment as those did which relate to more ancient events. They all take their beginning from about the prophet's days; they all give a concise prophetical history of the church, and of the world as far as immediately connected with it, nearly to the end of time; for even the prophecy of the seventy weeks, though the first coming of the Messiah is the most prominent subject, shews the state of the Jewish nation to this day, and intimates events which have not yet taken place. They all either expressly or by consequence predict four great monarchies, the fourth of which shall last "to the time of the end," "the end of the indignation." They all foretell long continued calamities to the Jewish nation, and to the people of God, at length terminating in the restoration of Israel, and the final and universal triumph of true religion, the kingdom of Christ and of his saints, which must endure to the general resurrection. They are not insulated predictions, they all exhibit the same grand outlines of the plan of Providence, to the period of the church's calamities, varied in such a manner as to reflect reciprocal light on each other; and for above two thousand years the most prominent parts of history form the best interpretation of these astonishing prophecies. For farther proofs of the authenticity and genuineness of this book, see Hengstenberg's "Treatise on the Authenticity of Daniel." There is an abridgment of his refutation of neological objections to that book in Horne's Introduction, and a brief account of the direct evidence, by Havernick, in the article Daniel, in Kitto's Cyclopædia of Biblical Literature.

CHAP. II.—5. The dream, with the interpretation thereof. The king's requisition to the wise men of Babylon, to tell him his dream, in the first instance, before they attempted to interpret it, though, as they alleged in excuse for not doing so, unusual and impossible for mere mortals, was yet founded on profound policy. He justly considered their telling the dream itself as a sure test of the truth of the interpretation afterwards, and which it was not unreasonable to require of them even upon their own principles; because the same Divine power which could communicate to them the interpretation, as they professed, could also communicate to them the dream itself. He did not forget the dream, as generally imagined, from the expression "The thing is gone from me," and which may rather be rendered, with the Septuagint and Arabic, 'The decree is gone forth from me,' and shall not be reversed; or with the Syriac version, 'The decree which I have pronounced is certain,' or unalterable, namely, for putting them all to death, if they could not tell the dream. And this surely was a more consistent reason why the wise men wished to gain time, or suspend the execution of it (ver. 8), and why Daniel, who was involved in their danger, complained, "Why is the decree so hasty from the king?"—Hale's Analysis, ii. 456. 34. A stone was cut without hands. To Henry's comment on these words we add the following:—This the fathers generally apply to Christ himself, who was miraculously born of a virgin without the concurrence of a man; but it should rather be understood of the kingdom of Christ, which was formed out of the Roman empire, not by number of hands, or strength of armies, but without human means and the virtue of second causes. This kingdom was set up by the God of heaven, and from hence the phrase of the kingdom of heaven came to signify the kingdom of the Messiah; and so it was used and understood by the Jews, and so it is applied by our Saviour in the New Testament. Other kingdoms were raised by human ambition and worldly power; but this was the work not of man, but of God; this was truly as it is called the kingdom of heaven, and (Jno. xviii. 36) a kingdom not of this world; its laws, its powers, were all Divine.—Bishop Newton on the Prophecies. "The stone" was entirely distinct from the image, nay directly opposite to it and all its interests; it must therefore mean a kingdom set up by the power of God, without the concurrence of human policy or force, and in opposition to all the authority and combined efforts of the princes of this world.—Scott, in loc. "Cut without hands;" particularly alluding, says A. Clarke, to the spiritual nature of our Lord's kingdom and government, in which no worldly policy, human maxims, or military force, were employed; for it was not by might or power, but by the Spirit of the Lord of hosts. 44. It shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms. From small beginnings the kingdom of Christ has already made an immense progress; it has subverted, and will continue to subvert, pagan and antichristian kingdoms, and to entirely destroy and disperse them; and at length it will triumph over all opposition, and "become a great mountain, and fill the whole earth." This part of the prophecy yet remains to be accomplished; so that we have in this dream a most extraordinary prophetical abstract of the most signal events which would take place through all succeeding ages, nearly to the consummation of all things. As far as the accomplishment has proceeded it has been most exact and undeniable; and future ages will be filled with astonishment and awe by witnessing this "stone cut out without hands" destroying the remaining toes of this image, and becoming universally triumphant.—Scott. The same excellent commentator observes, 'The kings and conquerors of the earth have in every age kept the nations in a perpetual tumult by their ambitious projects and the revolutions which they have occasioned. Some have been more eminent for wealth, some for power, some for hardy courage and ruinous success; their delight has been in destroying, subduing, breaking in pieces and crushing mankind; one form of tyranny has commonly been superseded by another, still more base and barbarous; and men in general have been groaning under the effects of their contests and vices, yet willingly concurring to support and encourage them! But all human power and prowess tend to decay; many mighty empires have gradually been weakened, till they have been gradually subverted by open enemies or by intestine convulsions.' In the midst of all these events "the God of heaven is setting up his kingdom," not by human might or power, but by his word and Spirit.—In the present times, May, 1848, how remarkable and suggestive are these observations!

CHAP. IV.—30. Is not this great Babylon. See Supplementary Note on Isa. xiii. 1.

CHAP. V.—27. Thou art weighed in the balance. The idea involved in this is sufficiently obvious in itself. But it is by no means impossible that the allusion received more force and meaning than we give to it from a reference to some opinion or custom common among the Babylonians. What that was we cannot say precisely; but probabilities may be suggested by analogies derived from other sources. Thus the Egyptians entertained the belief that the actions of the dead were solemnly weighed in balances before Osiris, and that the condition of the departed was determined according to the preponderance of good or evil. Such judgment scenes are very frequently represented in the paintings and papyri of ancient Egypt.—Pictorial Bible. See wood engraving.

CHAP. VI.—16. Cast into the den of lions. This is a new kind of punishment, observes the editor of the last quoted valuable work, not previously mentioned in Scripture; and that it first occurs here at Babylon is a remarkable fact, shewing the accuracy of the sacred writers in their references to the manners and usages of different nations. We are not aware that any ancient writer mentions that the inhabitants of Babylon were in the habit of throwing offenders to be devoured by lions kept in dens for the purpose. But we have the still more conclusive evidence of monuments brought to light by modern travellers, on the sites not only of Babylon but of Susa also, representing lions destroying and preying upon human beings. Our wood engraving is from a block of white marble found near the tomb of Daniel at Susa, and is thus described: 'It does not exceed ten inches in width and depth, measures twenty in length, and is hollow within, as if to receive some deposit. Three of its sides are cut in bas-relief, two of them with similar representations of a man apparently naked, except a sash round his waist and a sort of cap on his head. His hands are bound behind him. The corner of the stone forms the neck of the figure, so that its head forms one of its ends. Two lions in sitting postures appear on either side at the top, each having a paw on the head of the man.' These are certainly satisfactory illustrations of the custom in question, as existing at Babylon and Susa, and others might be adduced from Babylonian coins.

CHAP. VII.—7. A fourth beast, dreadful and terrible—and it had ten horns. This was doubtless, says Scott, an emblem of the Roman state—the invincible fortitude, hardiness and force of which perhaps were never equalled. By wars and conquests the Romans bore down all opposition, and reduced almost every kingdom or state in the known world into some kind or degree of dependence, drew all the spoil and wealth of many conquered nations to enrich their proud capital, and tyrannized over all that did not quietly yield 'obedience to their authority.' That which the Romans could not quietly enjoy in other countries they would give to other kings and rulers, that at all times when they would they might take it again, which liberality is here called "the stamping of the rest under their feet." This fourth empire was governed in another manner, and by other measures, than any of the preceding, and in process of time it was divided into ten kingdoms. These are indeed reckoned up in several ways by different writers, according to the date assigned to the enumeration; but in general it is clear that the principal kingdoms in Europe at this day sprung from them, and comprise them, excepting some of the more northern regions, and those possessed by the Turks. Mr. Faber's remarks on this point are well worthy the accurate student's attention, and his conclusion from it seems well founded. The historian Machiavel, little thinking what he was doing, reckons up the ten primary kingdoms as follows (we add Bishop Lloyd's dates): 1. The Ostrogoths in Mœsia (377); 2. The Visigoths in Pannonia (378); 3. The Suevi and Alani in Gascoigne and Spain (407); 4. The Vandals in Africa (407); 5. The Franks in France (407); 6. The Burgundians in Burgundy (407); 7. The Heruli and Thuringi in Italy (476); 8. The Saxons and Angles in Britain (476); 9. The Huns in Hungary (526); and 10. The Lombards, first upon the Danube and afterwards in Italy, (483—526.) Here then, upon the testimony of an historian and chronologer, are the ten kingdoms into which the Roman empire was originally divided, and consequently they are the first "ten horns" of which we are in quest.—Faber, vol. i. pp. 170-1. Not that there were constantly ten kingdoms; they were sometimes more, and sometimes fewer; but as Sir Isaac Newton says, (Observations on Daniel,) 'Whatever was their number afterwards, they are still called the ten kingdoms from their first number.' 8. Another little horn. We have seen already that the Roman empire was divided into ten horns or kingdoms, and among them possibly we may find another little horn or kingdom answering in all respects to the character here given. Machiavel himself (a popish historian) will lead us by the hand; for having shewn how the Roman empire was broken and divided by the incursions of the northern nations, he says, 'About this time the bishops of Rome began to take upon them, and to exercise greater authority than they had formerly done. At first, the successors of St. Peter were venerable and eminent for their miracles, and the holiness of their lives; and their examples added daily such numbers to the Christian church, that, to obviate or remove the confusions which were then in the world, many princes turned Christians, and the emperor of Rome being converted among the rest, and quitting Rome, to hold his residence at Constantinople, the Roman empire, as we have said before, began to decline, but the church of Rome augmented as fast.' And so he proceeds to give an account how the Roman empire declined, and the power of the church of Rome increased, first under the Goths, then under the Lombards, and afterwards by the calling in of the Franks. Here then is a little horn springing up among the other ten horns. The bishop of Rome was respectable as a bishop long before, but he did not become a horn properly (which is an emblem of strength and power,) till he became a temporal prince. He was to rise after the others, that is behind them, as the Greek translates it, οπισω αυτων, and as Mr. Mede explains it, so that the ten kings were not aware of the growing up of the little horn till it overtopped them, the word in the original signifying as well behind in place as after in time; as also post in Latin is used indifferently either of place or time. Three of the first horns to be overthrown. He is mentioned by Ezekiel, and criticism and archæology combine to show that the book contains internal proofs of its real antiquity. In the tenth edition of Horne's "Introduction to the Holy Scriptures," Dr. S. Davidson examines all the chief objections to the Book of Daniel, and refutes most of them, adding powerful arguments in its favour. The same author, in the third volume of his "Introduction to the Old Testament," repeats many of the same reasons for and against, but concludes in favour of the later origin of the book. A comparison of the two series of argument will show how much firmer is the ground taken in the former than in the latter by an industrious author, who has a high reputation for Hebrew scholarship and critical ability, as well as for great knowledge of books, but who changes his opinions too often for a man of permanent authority. The mention of Daniel in Ezekiel is a fact not easily to be set aside; and the internal evidences that both the books of Daniel and Ezekiel belong to a remote period
